EDITOR'S NOTE.

THIS edition of Mr. Browning's poems and plays makes no pretence to be critical. One of the most useful of the Shakespearian commentators, Mr. Theobald, has observed that the science of criticism, so far as it affects an editor, is reduced to three classes : "The emendation of corrupt passages, the explanation of obscure and difficult ones, and an inquiry into the beauties and defects of composition." Happily there are no corrupt passages in Browning, but undoubtedly there are some obscure and difficult ones, although the reader will often be surprised to find how frequently obscurity and difficulty will be dissipated and removed by a careful study of the context. So, too, Browning has his beauties and defects of composition ; but neither his beauties or defects of composition, nor the obscurities and difficulties of particular passages, are here discussed or explained. All that has been done is to prefix (within square brackets) to some of the plays and poems a few lines explanatory of the characters and events depicted and described, and to explain in the margin of the volumes the meaning of such words as might, if left unexplained, momentarily arrest the understanding of the reader. That some easy words have been explained and some hard ones left alone is more than likely, since, on such a subject, no standard exists either of information or of ignorance. Sir F. G. Kenyon has been kind enough to make the notes for "The Ring and the Book," but for the rest the Editor alone is responsible.

The edition is a complete one, containing all Mr. Browning's regularly published plays and poems, from Pauline (1833) to New Poems, edited by Sir F. G. Kenyon (1914). In the arrangement of the contents a chronological order has as far as possible been observed ; but as Mr. Browning himself rearranged some of his smaller poems regardless of their dates of publication, his publishers have not felt themselves at liberty in these cases to adhere to chronology. In all the poems the poet's latest readings have been followed.

PAULINE.

A FRAGMENT OF A CONFESSION.

1833.

[Browning was twenty years old when this Fragment was first published. Amongst the early works of great poets it must always occupy a distinguished place on account of the splendour and extreme beauty of many of its passages. As a rule, such early work is disappointing, or at all events insignificant and uninteresting, but "Pauline" is far from insignificant, and is always interesting. One sees a mind at work and a rich promise of a harvest to come. The story of the young Rossetti transcribing the whole poem from the copy in the British Museum is a literary anecdote always worth recording. Mr. Browning himself seems to have thought lightly of the poem, and in giving one of his own copies to Mr. Frederick Locker spoke of it as a literary curiosity only. In his later days he became a very severe critic of the life and conduct of Shelley, and did not care to be too frequently reminded of his boyish raptures for that strange and unaccountable being. It would be difficult and unprofitable to attempt to analyse "Pauline," the charm of which now consists in detached passages. It is the sole survivor of a great deal of Browning's youthful verse. In a copy recently sold, and formerly belonging to Mr. Crampon, is an autograph note from the Author, recording "that the poem was written in pursuance of a foolish plan, I forget or have no wish to remember, involving the assumption of several distinct characters;" whilst in a copy of his own he wrote, "Only this crab remains of the shapely Tree of Life in my fool's paradise."]

V. A. XX.

[This introduction would appear less absurdly pretentious did it apply, as was intended, to a completed structure of which the poem was meant for only a beginning and remains a fragment.]

PAULINE, mine own, bend o'er me—thy soft breast
Shall pant to mine,—bend o'er me—thy sweet
eyes,
And loosened hair, and breathing lips, and arms
Drawing me to thee—these build up a screen

To shut me in with thee, and from all fear ;
 So that I might unlock the sleepless brood
 Of fancies from my soul, their lurking-place,
 Nor doubt that each would pass, ne'er to return
 To one so watched, so loved and so secured.
 But what can guard thee but thy naked love ?
 Ah dearest, whoso sucks a poisoned wound
 Envenoms his own veins ! Thou art so good,
 So calm—if thou shouldst wear a brow less light

For some wild thought which, but for me, were kept

From out thy soul as from a sacred star !
 Yet till I have unlocked them it were vain
 To hope to sing ; some woe would light on me ;
 Nature would point at one whose quivering lip
 Was bathed in her enchantments, whose brow burned

Beneath the crown to which her secrets knelt,
 Who learned the spell which can call up the dead,

And then departed smiling like a fiend
 Who has deceived God,—if such one should seek

Again her altars and stand robed and crowned
 Amid the faithful ! Sad confession, first,
 Remorse and pardon and old claims renewed,
 Ere I can be—as I shall be no more.

I had been spared this shame if I had sat
 By thee for ever from the first, in place
 Of my wild dreams of beauty and of good,
 Or with them, as an earnest of their truth :
 No thought nor hope having been shut from
 thee,

No vague wish unexplained, no wandering aim

Sent back to bind on fancy's wings and seek Some strange fair world where it might be a law ;

But, doubting nothing, had been led by thee,
 Thro' youth, and saved, as one at length awaked

Who has slept through a peril. Ah vain, vain !

Thou lovest me ; the past is in its grave
 Tho' its ghost haunts us ; still this much is ours,

To cast away restraint, lest a worse thing
 Wait for us in the dark. Thou lovest me ;
 And thou art to receive not love but faith,
 For which thou wilt be mine, and smile and take

All shapes and shames, and veil without a fear

That form which music follows like a slave :
 And I look to thee and I trust in thee,
 As in a Northern night one looks alway,
 Unto the East for morn and spring, and joy.
 Thou seest then my aimless, hopeless state ;
 And, resting on some few old feelings won
 Back by thy beauty, wouldst that I essay
 The task which was to me what now thou art :
 And why should I conceal one weakness more ?

Thou wilt remember one warm morn when winter

Crept aged from the earth, and spring's first breath

Blew soft from the moist hills ; the blackthorn boughs,

So dark in the bare wood, when glistening
 In the sunshine were white with coming buds,

Like the bright side of a sorrow, and the banks

Had violets opening from sleep like eyes.

I walked with thee who knew'st not a deep shame

Lurked beneath smiles and careless words which sought

To hide it till they wandered and were mute,
 As we stood listening on a sunny mound
 To the wind murmuring in the damp copse,
 Like heavy breathings of some hidden thing
 Betrayed by sleep ; until the feeling rushed
 That I was low indeed, yet not so low
 As to endure the calmness of thine eyes.

And so I told thee all, while the cool breast
 I leaned on altered not its quiet beating :

And long ere words like a hurt bird's complaint

Bade me look up and be what I had been,
 I felt despair could never live by thee :

Thou wilt remember. Thou art not more
 dear

Than song was once to me ; and I ne'er sung
 But as one entering bright halls where all
 Will rise and shout for him : sure I must own
 That I am fallen, having chosen gifts
 Distinct from theirs—that I am sad and fain
 Would give up all to be but where I was,
 Not high as I had been if faithful found,
 But low and weak yet full of hope, and sure
 Of goodness as of life—that I would lose
 All this gay mastery of mind, to sit Once more with them, trusting in truth and love
 And with an aim—not being what I am.

Oh Pauline, I am ruined who believed That though my soul had floated from its sphere

Of wild dominion into the dim orb
 Of self—that it was strong and free as ever !
 It has conformed itself to that dim orb,
 Reflecting all its shades and shapes, and now
 Must stay where it alone can be adored.
 I have felt this in dreams—in dreams in which I seemed the fate from which I fled ; I felt
 A strange delight in causing my decay.
 I was a fiend in darkness chained for ever
 Within some ocean cave ; and ages rolled,
 Till through the cleft rock, like a moonbeam,
 came

A white swan to remain with me ; and ages
 Rolled, yet I tired not of my first free joy.
 In gazing on the peace of its pure wings :
 And then I said " It is most fair to me,

" Yet its soft wings must sure have suffered change

" From the thick darkness, sure its eyes are dim,

" Its silver pinions must be cramped and numbed

" With sleeping ages here ; it cannot leave me,
 " For it would seem, in light beside its kind,
 " Withered, tho' here to me most beautiful."
 And then I was a young witch whose blue
 eyes,

As she stood naked by the river springs,
 Drew down a god : I watched his radiant form
 Growing less radiant, and it gladdened me ;
 Till one morn, as he sat in the sunshine

Upon my knees, singing to me of heaven,
 He turned to look at me, ere I could lose
 The grin with which I viewed his perishing :
 And he shrieked and departed and sat long
 By his deserted throne, but sunk at last
 Murmuring, as I kissed his lips and curled
 Around him, " I am still a god—to thee."

Still I can lay my soul bare in its fall,
 Since all the wandering and all the weakness
 Will be a saddest comment on the song :
 And if, that done, I can be young again,
 I will give up all gained, as willingly
 As one gives up a charm which shuts him out
 From hope or part or care in human kind.
 As life wanes, all its care and strife and toil
 Seem strangely valueless, while the old trees
 Which grew by our youth's home, the waving mass

Of climbing plants heavy with bloom and dew,

The morning swallows with their songs like
 words,

All these seem clear and only worth our thoughts :

So, aught connected with my early life,
 My rude songs or my wild imaginings,
 How I look on them—most distinct amid
 The fever and the stir of after years !

I ne'er had ventured e'en to hope for this,
 Had not the glow I felt at His award,
 Assured me all was not extinct within :
 His whom all honour, whose renown springs
 up,

Like sunlight which will visit all the world,
 So that e'en they who sneered at him at first,
 Come out to it, as some dark spider crawls
 From his foul nets which some lit torch invades,

Yet spinning still new films for his retreat,
 Thou didst smile, poet, but can we forgive ?

Sun-treader,¹ life and light be thine for ever !

Thou art gone from us ; years go by and spring

¹ Shelley.

Gladdens and the young earth is beautiful,
Yet thy songs come not, other bards arise,
But none like thee! they stand, thy majesties,
Like mighty works which tell some spirit
there

Hath sat regardless of neglect and scorn,
Till, its long task completed, it hath risen
And left us, never to return, and all
Rush in to peer and praise when all in vain.
The air seems bright with thy past presence
yet,

But thou art still for me as thou hast been
When I have stood with thee as on a throne
With all thy dim creations gathered round
Like mountains, and I felt of mould like
them,
And with them creatures of my own were mixed,
Like things half-lived, catching and giving
life.

But thou art still for me who have adored
Thou single, panting but to hear thy name
Which I believed a spell to me alone,
Scarce deeming thou wast as a star to men!
As one should worship long a sacred spring Scarce worth a moth's flitting, which long grasses cross,

And one small tree embowers droopingly—
Joying to see some wandering insect won
To live in its few rushes, or some wild bird
To pasture on its boughs, or some wild bird
Stoop for its freshness from the trackless air:
And then should find it but the fountain-
head,

Long lost, of some great river washing towns
And towers, and seeing old woods which will live

But by its banks untrod of human foot,
Which, when the great sun sinks, lie quivering
In light as some thing lieth half of life
Before God's foot, waiting a wondrous
change;

Then girt with rocks which seek to turn or stay

Its course in vain, for it does ever spread
Like a sea's arm as it goes rolling on;
Being the pulse of some great country—so
Wast thou to me, and art thou to the world!

And I, perchance, half feel a strange regret
That I am not what I have been to thee:
Like a girl one has silently loved long
In her first loneliness in some retreat,
When, late emerged, all gaze and glow to view
Her fresh eyes and soft hair and lips which bloom

Like a mountain berry? doubtless it is sweet
To see her thus adored; but there have been Moments when all the world was in our praise,
Sweeter than any pride of after hours.

Yet, sun-treader, all hail! From my heart's heart

I bid thee hail! E'en in my wildest dreams,
I proudly feel I would have thrown to dust
The wreaths of fame which seemed o'er-hanging me,
To see thee for a moment as thou art.

And if thou livest, if thou lovest, spirit!
Remember me who set this final seal
To wandering thought—that one so pure as thou

Could never die. Remember me who flung
All honour from my soul, yet paused and said

"There is one spark of love remaining yet;
"For I have nought in common with him, shapes

"Which followed him avoid me, and foul forms

"Seek me, which ne'er could fasten on his
mind;

"And though I feel how low I am to him,
"Yet I aim not even to catch a tone
"Of harmonies he called profusely up;
"So, one gleam still remains, although the last."

Remember me who praise thee e'en with tears,
For never more shall I walk calm with thee;
Thy sweet imaginings are as an air,
A melody some wondrous singer sings,
Which, though it haunt men oft in the still eve;

They dream not to essay; yet it no less
But more is honoured: I was thine in shame
And now when all thy proud renown is out,

I am a watcher whose eyes have grown dim
With looking for some star which breaks on him
Altered and worn and weak and full of tears;

Autumn has come like spring returned to us,
Won from her girlishness; like one returned
A friend that was a lover, nor forgets
The first warm love, but full of sober thoughts
Of fading years; whose soft mouth quivers yet
With the old smile, but yet so changed and still!

And here am I the scoffer, who have probed
Life's vanity, won by a word again
Into my own life—by one little word

Of this sweet friend who lives in loving me,
Lives strangely on my thoughts and looks and words,

As fathoms down some nameless ocean thing
Its silent course of quietness and joy.

O dearest, if indeed I tell the past,
May'st thou forget it as a sad sick dream!
Or if it linger—my lost soul too soon
Sinks to itself and whispers we shall be
But closer linked, two creatures whom the earth
Bears singly, with strange feelings unrevealed.

Save to each other; or two lonely things
Created by some power whose reign is done,
Having no part in God or his bright world.
I am to sing whilst ebbing day dies soft,
As a lean scholar dies worn o'er his book,
And in the heaven stars steal out one by one
As hunted men steal to their mountain watch.
I must not think, lest this new impulse die
In which I trust; I have no confidence:
So, I will sing on fast as fancies come;
Rudely, the verse being as the mood it paints.

I strip my mind bare, whose first elements
I shall unveil—not as they struggled forth
In infancy, nor as they now exist,
When I am grown above them and can rule—
But in that middle stage when they were full Yet ere I had disposed them to my will;
And then I shall show how these elements
Produced my present state, and what it is.

I am made up of an intensest life,
Of a most clear idea of consciousness

Of self, distinct from all its qualities,
From all affections, passions, feelings, powers;
And thus far it exists, if tracked, in all—

But linked, in me, to self-supremacy,
Existing as a centre to all things,
Most potent to create and rule and call
Upon all things to minister to it;
And to a principle of restlessness
Which would be all, have, see, know, taste, feel, all—

This is myself, and I should thus have been

Though gifted lower than the meanest soul.

And of my powers, one springs up to save
From utter death a soul with such desire
Confined to clay—of powers the only one
Which marks me—an imagination which Has been a very angel, coming not
In fitful visions but beside me ever
And never failing me; so, though my mind
Forgets not, not a shred of life forgets,
Yet I can take a secret pride in calling
The dark past up to quell it regally.

A mind like this must dissipate itself,
But I have always had one lode-star; now,
As I look back, I see that I have halted
Or hastened as I looked towards that star—
A need, a trust, a yearning after God:
A feeling I have analysed but late,
But it existed, and was reconciled
With a neglect of all I deemed his laws,
Which yet, when seen in others, I abhorred.
I felt as one beloved, and so shut in
From fear; and thence I date my trust in signs
And omens, for I saw God everywhere;
And I can only lay it to the fruit
Of a sad after-time that I could doubt
Even his being—e'en the while I felt
His presence, never acted from myself,
Still trusted in a hand to lead me through
All danger; and this feeling ever fought
Against my weakest reason and resolve.

And I can love nothing—and this dull truth
Has come the last: but sense supplies a love
Encircling me and mingling with my life.

These make myself: I have long sought in vain

To trace how they were formed by circumstance,

Yet ever found them mould my wildest youth
Where they alone displayed themselves, converted

All objects to their use: how see their course!

They came to me in my first dawn of life
Which passed alone with wisest ancient books
All halo-girt with fancies of my own;
And I myself went with the tale—a god
Wandering after beauty, or a giant
Standing vast in the sunset—an old hunter
Talking with gods, or a high-crested chief
Sailing with troops of friends to Tenedos.
I tell you, nought has ever been so clear
As the place, the time, the fashion of those lives:

I had not seen a work of lofty art,
Nor woman's beauty nor sweet nature's face,
Yet, I say, never morn broke clear as those
On the dim clustered isles in the blue sea,
The deep groves and white temples and wet caves:

And nothing ever will surprise me now—
Who stood beside the naked Swift-footed,
Who bound my forehead with Proserpine's hair.

And strange it is that I who could so dream
Should e'er have stooped to aim at aught
beneath—

Aught low or painful; but I never doubted:
So, as I grew, I rudely shaped my life
To my immediate wants; yet strong beneath
Was a vague sense of power though folded
up—

A sense that, though those shades and times were past,
Their spirit dwelt in me, with them should rule.

Then came a pause, and long restraint chained
down

My soul till it was changed. I lost myself,
And were it not that I so loathe that loss,

I could recall how first I learned to turn
My mind against itself; and the effects
In deeds for which remorse was vain as for The wanderings of delirious dream; yet thence

Came cunning, envy, falsehood, all world's wrong

That spotted me: at length I cleansed my soul.

Yet long world's influence remained; and
nought

But the still life I led, apart once more,
Which left me free to seek soul's old delights, Could e'er have brought me thus far back to peace.

As peace returned, I sought out some pursuit;
And song rose, no new impulse but the one
With which all others best could be combined.
My life has not been that of those whose heaven

Was lampless save where poesy shone out;
But as a clime where glittering mountain-tops
And glancing sea and forests steeped in light
Give back reflected the far-flashing sun;
For music (which is earnest of a heaven,
Seeing we know emotions strange by it,
Not else to be revealed,) is like a voice,
A low voice calling fancy, as a friend,
To the green woods in the gay summer time:
And she fills all the way with dancing shapes
Which have made painters pale, and they go on

Till stars look at them and winds call to them
As they leave life's path for the twilight world Where the dead gather. This was not at first,

For I scarce knew what I would do. I had
An impulse but no yearning—only sang.

And first I sang as I in dream have seen
Music wait on a lyrist for some thought,
Yet singing to herself until it came.

I turned to those old times and scenes where all

That's beautiful had birth for me, and made
Rude verses on them all; and then I paused—
I had done nothing, so I sought to know

What other minds achieved. No fear out-broke.

As on the works of mighty bards I gazed,
In the first joy at finding my own thoughts
Recorded, my own fancies justified,
And their aspirings but my very own.
With them I first explored passion and
mind,—

All to begin afresh ! I rather sought
To rival what I wondered at than form
Creations of my own ; if much was light
Lent by the others, much was yet my own.

I paused again : a change was coming—came :
I was no more a boy, the past was breaking
Before the future and like fever worked.
I thought on my new self, and all my powers Burst out. I dreamed not of restraint, but gazed

On all things : schemes and systems went and came,

And I was proud (being vainest of the weak)
In wandering o'er thought's world to seek some one

To be my prize, as if you wandered o'er
The White Way for a star.

And my choice fell

Not so much on a system as a man—
On one, whom praise of mine shall not offend,
Who was as calm as beauty, being such Unto mankind as thou to me, Pauline,— Believing in them and devoting all His soul's strength to their winning back to
peace ;

Who sent forth hopes and longings for their
sake,

Clothed in all passion's melodies : such first
Caught me and set me, slave of a sweet task,
To disentangle, gather sense from song :
Since, song-inwoven, lurked there words which seemed

A key to a new world, the muttering
Of angels, something yet unguessed by man.
How my heart leapt as still I sought and found
Much there, I felt my own soul had conceived,
But there living and burning ! Soon the orb
Of his conceptions dawned on me ; its praise

Lives in the tongues of men, men's brows are high

When his name means a triumph and a pride,
So, my weak voice may well forbear to shame
What seemed decreed my fate : I threw myself
To meet it, I was vowed to liberty,
Men were to be as gods and earth as heaven,
And I—ah, what a life was mine to prove !
My whole soul rose to meet it. Now, Pauline,
I shall go mad, if I recall that time !

Oh let me look back ere I leave for ever
The time which was an hour one fondly waits
For a fair girl that comes a withered hag !
And I was lonely, far from woods and fields,
And amid dullest sights, who should be loose
As a stag ; yet I was full of bliss, who lived
With Plato and who had the key to life ;
And I had dimly shaped my first attempt,
And many a thought did I build up on thought,

As the wild bee hangs cell to cell ; in vain,
For I must still advance, no rest for mind.

'Twas in my plan to look on real life,
The life all new to me ; my theories
Were firm, so them I left, to look and learn Mankind, its cares, hopes, fears, its woes and joys ;

And, as I pondered on their ways, I sought
How best life's end might be attained—an end
Comprising every joy. I deeply mused.

And suddenly without heart-wreck I awoke
As from a dream : I said : " 'Twas beautiful,
" Yet but a dream, and so adieu to it ! "
As some world-wanderer sees in a far meadow Strange towers and high-walled gardens thick with trees,

Where song takes shelter and delicious mirth
From laughing fairy creatures peeping over,
And on the morrow when he comes to lie
For ever 'neath those garden-trees fruit-flushed

Sung round by fairies, all his search is vain.
First went my hopes of perfecting mankind,
Next—faith in them, and then in freedom's self
And virtue's self, then my own motives, and

All pleasure, howso'er minute, grows pain ;
 I envy—how I envy him whose soul
 Turns its whole energies to some one end,
 To elevate an aim, pursue success
 However mean ! So, my still baffled hope
 Seeks out abstractions ; I would have one joy,
 But one in life, so it were wholly mine,
 One rapture all my soul could fill : and this Wild feeling places me in dream afar
 In some vast country where the eye can see
 No end to the far hills and dales bestrewn
 With shining towers and towns, till I grow mad

Well-nigh, to know not one abode but holds
 Some pleasure, while my soul could grasp
 the world,

But must remain this vile form's slave : I look
 With hope to age at last, which quenching
 much,
 May let me concentrate what sparks it spares.

This restlessness of passion meets in me—
 A craving after knowledge : the sole proof
 Of yet commanding will is in that power
 Repressed ; for I beheld it in its dawn,
 The sleepless harpy with just-budding wings,
 And I considered whether to forego
 All happy ignorant hopes and fears, to live,
 Finding a recompense in its wild eyes.
 And when I found that I should perish so,
 I bade its wild eyes close from me for ever,
 And I am left alone with old delights ;
 See ! it lies in me a chained thing, still prompt
 To serve me if I loose its slightest bond :
 I cannot but be proud of my bright slave.

How should this earth's life prove my only
 sphere ?

Can I so narrow sense but that in life
 Soul still exceeds it ? In their elements
 My love outsoars my reason ; but since love
 Perforce receives its object from this earth
 While reason wanders chainless, the few truths

Caught from its wanderings have sufficed to quell.

Love chained below ; then what were love,
 set free,

Which, with the object it demands, would pass
 Reason companioning the seraphim ?

No, what I feel may pass all human love
 Yet fall far short of what my love should be.
 And yet I seem more warped in this than aught,

Myself stands out more hideously : of old
 I could forget myself in friendship, fame,
 Liberty, nay, in love of mightier souls ;
 But I begin to know what thing hate is—
 To sicken and to quiver and grow white—
 And I myself have furnished its first prey.
 Hate of the weak and ever-wavering will,
 The selfishness, the still-decaying frame
 But I must never grieve whom wing can waft Far from such thoughts—as now. Andromeda !¹

And she is with me : years roll, I shall change,
 But change can touch her not—so beautiful
 With her fixed eyes, earnest and still, and hair
 Lifted and spread by the salt-sweeping breeze,
 And one red beam, all the storm leaves in
 heaven,

Resting upon her eyes and hair, such hair,
 As she awaits the snake on the wet beach
 By the dark rock and the white wave just breaking

At her feet ; quite naked and alone ; a thing
 I doubt not, nor fear for, secure some god
 To save will come in thunder from the stars.
 Let it pass ! Soul requires another change.
 I will be gifted with a wondrous mind,
 Yet sunk by error to men's sympathy,
 And in the wane of life, yet only so
 As to call up their fears ; and there shall come

A time requiring youth's best energies ;
 And lo, I fling age, sorrow, sickness off,
 And rise triumphant, triumph through decay.

And thus it is that I supply the chasm
 'Twixt what I am and all I fain would be :
 But then, to know nothing, to hope for nothing,

To seize on life's dull joys from a strange fear
 Lest, losing them, all's lost and nought remains !

There's some vile juggle with my reason here ;
 I feel I but explain to my own loss
 These impulses : they live no less the same.
 Liberty ! what though I despair ? my blood
 Rose never at a slave's name proud as now.
 Oh sympathies, obscured by sophistries !—
 Why else have I sought refuge in myself,
 But from the woes I saw and could not stay ?
 Love ! is not this to love thee, my Pauline ?
 I cherish prejudice, lest I be left
 Utterly loveless ? witness my belief
 In poets, though sad change has come there
 too ;

No more I leave myself to follow them—
 Unconsciously I measure me by them—
 Let me forget it : and I cherish most
 My love of England—how her name, a word
 Of hers in a strange tongue makes my heart beat !

Pauline, could I but break the spell ! Not
 now—

All's fever—but when calm shall come again,
 I am prepared : I have made life my own.
 I would not be content with all the change
 One frame should feel, but I have gone in thought

Thro' all conjuncture, I have lived all life.
 When it is most alive, where strangest fate
 New-shapes it past surmise—the throes of men
 Bit by some curse or in the grasps of doom
 Half-visible and still-increasing round,
 Or crowning their wide being's general aim.

These are wild fancies, but I feel, sweet friend,
 As one breathing his weakness to the ear
 Of pitying angel—dear as a winter flower,
 A slight flower growing alone, and offering
 Its frail cup of three leaves to the cold sun,
 Yet joyous and confiding like the triumph
 Of a child : and why am I not worthy thee ?
 I can live all the life of plants, and gaze
 Drowsily on the bees that flit and play,
 Or bare my breast for sunbeams which will kill,
 Or open in the night of sounds, to look For the dim stars ; I can mount with the bird

Leaping airily his pyramid of leaves
 And twisted boughs of some tall mountain tree,

Or rise cheerfully springing to the heavens ;
 Or like a fish breathe deep the morning air
 In the misty sun-warm water ; or with flower
 And tree can smile in light at the sinking sun
 Just as the storm comes, as a girl would look
 On a departing lover—most serene.

Pauline, come with me, see how I could build
 A home for us, out of the world, in thought !
 I am uplifted : fly with me, Pauline !

Night, and one single ridge of narrow path
 Between the sullen river and the woods
 Waving and muttering, for the moonless night
 Has shaped them into images of life,
 Like the uprising of the giant-ghosts,
 Looking on earth to know how their sons fare :

Thou art so close by me, the roughest swell
 Of wind in the tree-tops hides not the panting Of thy soft breasts. No, we will pass to morning—

Morning, the rocks and valleys and old woods.

How the sun brightens in the mist, and here,
 Half in the air, like creatures of the place,
 Trusting the element, living on high boughs
 That swing in the wind—look at the silver spray

Flung from the foam-sheet of the cataract
 Amid the broken rocks ! Shall we stay here
 With the wild hawks ? No, ere the hot noon
 come,

Dive we down—safe ! See this our new retreat

Walled in with a sloped mound of matted shrubs,

Dark, tangled, old and green, still sloping
 down

To a small pool whose waters lie asleep
 Amid the trailing boughs turned water-plants :
 And tall trees overarch to keep us in,
 Breaking the sunbeams into emerald shafts,
 And in the dreamy water one small group
 Of two or three strange trees are got together

Wondering at all around, as strange beasts herd

Together far from their own land : all wildness,

No turf nor moss, for boughs and plants
pave all,

And tongues of bank go shelving in the lymph,

Where the pale-throated snake reclines his
head,

And old grey stones lie making eddies there,
The wild-mice cross them dry-shod. Deeper in !

Shut thy soft eyes—now look—still deeper in !
This is the very heart of the woods all round Mountain-like heaped above us ; yet even
here

One pond of water gleams ; far off the river Sweeps like a sea, barred out from land ; but one—

One thin clear sheet has overleaped and wound

Into this silent depth, which gained, it lies
Still, as but let by sufferance ; the trees bend
O'er it as wild men watch a sleeping girl,
And through their roots long creeping plants out-stretch

Their twined hair, steeped and sparkling ;
farther on,

Tall rushes and thick flag-knots have combined

To narrow it ; so, at length, a silver thread,
It winds, all noiselessly through the deep wood

Till thro' a cleft-way, thro' the moss and stone,
It joins its parent-river with a shout.

Up for the glowing day, leave the old woods !
See, they part like a ruined arch : the sky !
Nothing but sky appears, so close the roots
And grass of the hill-top level with the air—
Blue sunny air, where a great cloud floats laden

With light, like a dead whale that white birds pick,

Floating away in the sun in some north sea.
Air, air, fresh life-blood, thin and searching air,
The clear, dear breath of God that loveth us,

Where small birds reel and winds take their delight !

Water is beautiful, but not like air :
See, where the solid azure waters lie
Made as of thickened air, and down below,
The fern-ranks like a forest spread themselves
As though each pore could feel the element ;
Where the quick glancing serpent winds his
way,
Float with methere, Pauline!—but not like air.

Down the hill ! Stop—a clump of trees, see, set

On a heap of rock, which look o'er the far plain :

So, envious climbing shrubs would mount to rest
And peer from their spread boughs ; wide they wave, looking

At the muleteers who whistle on their way,
To the merry chime of morning bells, past all
The little smoking cots, mid fields and banks
And copses bright in the sun. My spirit wanders :

Hedgerows for me—those living hedgerows where

The bushes close and clasp above and keep Thought in—I am concentrated—I feel ;
But my soul saddens when it looks beyond :
I cannot be immortal, taste all joy.

O God, where do they tend—these struggling aims ?¹

What would I have ? What is this “sleep” which seems

To bound all ? can there be a “waking” point
Of crowning life ? The soul would never rule ;
It would be first in all things, it would have
Its utmost pleasure filled, but, that completé,
Commanding, for commanding, sickens it.
The last point I can trace is—rest beneath
Some better essence than itself, in weakness :
This is “myself,” not what I think should be :
And what is that I hunger for but God ?

My God, my God, let me for once look on
thee

As though nought else existed, we alone !

And as creation crumbles, my soul's spark
 Expands till I can say,—Even from myself
 I need thee and I feel thee and I love thee.
 I do not plead my rapture in thy works
 For love of thee, nor that I feel as one
 Who cannot die : but there is that in me
 Which turns to thee, which loves or which should love.

Why have I girt myself with this hell-dress?
 Why have I laboured to put out my life?
 Is it not in my nature to adore,
 And e'en for all my reason do I not Feel him, and thank him, and pray to him—
 now?

Can I forego the trust that he loves me?
 Do I not feel a love which only ONE . . .
 O thou pale form, so dimly seen, deep-eyed!
 I have denied thee calmly—do I not
 Pant when I read of thy consummate power,
 And burn to see thy calm pure truths out-flash
 The brightest gleams of earth's philosophy?
 Do I not shake to hear aught question thee?
 If I am erring save me, madden me,
 Take from me powers and pleasures, let me
 die

Agas, so I see thee! I am knit round
 As with a charm by sin and lust and pride,
 Yet though my wandering dreams have seen all shapes

Of strange delight, oft have I stood by thee—
 Have I been keeping lonely watch with thee
 In the damp night by weeping Olivet,
 Or leaning on thy bosom, proudly less,
 Or dying with thee on the lonely cross,
 Or witnessing thine outburst from the tomb.

A mortal, sin's familiar friend, doth here
 Avow that he will give all earth's reward,
 But to believe and humbly teach the faith,
 In suffering and poverty and shame,
 Only believing he is not unloved.

And now, my Pauline, I am thine for ever!
 I feel the spirit which has buoyed me up
 Desert me, and old shades are gathering fast;
 Yet while the last light waits, I would say much,
 This chiefly, it is gain that I have said

Somewhat of love I ever felt for thee
 But seldom told; our hearts so beat together
 That speech seemed mockery; but when dark hours come,
 And joy departs, and thou, sweet, deem'st it strange

A sorrow moves me, thou canst not remove,
 Look on this lay I dedicate to thee,
 Which through thee I began, which thus I end,
 Collecting the last gleams to strive to tell
 How I am thine, and more than ever now
 That I sink fast: yet though I deeper sink,
 No less song proves one word has brought me bliss,

Another still may win bliss surely back.
 Thou knowest, dear, I could not think all calm,

For fancies followed thought and bore me off,
 And left all indistinct; ere one was caught
 Another glanced; so, dazzled by my wealth,
 I knew not which to leave nor which to choose,

For all so floated, nought was fixed and firm.
 And then thou said'st a perfect bard was one
 Who chronicled the stages of all life,
 And so thou bad'st me shadow this first stage.
 'Tis done, and even now I recognize
 The shift, the change from last to past—discern

Faintly how life is truth and truth is good.
 And why thou must be mine is, that e'en now
 In the dim hush of night, that I have done,
 Despite the sad forebodings, love looks through—

Whispers,—E'en at the last I have her still,
 With her delicious eyes as clear as heaven
 When rain in a quick shower has beat down mist,

And clouds float white above like broods of swans.

How the blood lies upon her cheek, outspread
 As thinned by kisses! only in her lips
 It wells and pulses like a living thing,
 And her neck looks like marble misted o'er
 With love-breath,—a Pauline from heights
 above,

Stooping beneath me, looking up—one look
 As I might kill her and be loved the more,

So, love me—me, Pauline, and nought but me,
Never leave loving! Words are wild and weak,
Believe them not, Pauline! I stained myself
But to behold thee purer by my side,

To show thou art my breath, my life, a last
Resource, an extreme want: never believe Aught better could so look on thee; nor seek Again the world of good thoughts left for mine!

There were bright troops of undiscovered suns,
Each equal in their radiant course; there were Clusters of far fair isles which ocean kept
For his own joy, and his waves broke on them

Without a choice; and there was a dim crowd
Of visions, each a part of some grand whole:
And one star left his peers and came with peace
Upon a storm, and all eyes pined for him;

And one isle harboured a sea-beaten ship,
And the crew wandered in its bowers and plucked

Its fruits and gave up all their hopes of home;

And one dream came to a pale poet's sleep,
And he said, "I am singled out by God,

"No sin must touch me." Words are wild and weak,

But what they would express is,—Leave me
not,

Still sit by me with beating breast and hair
Loosened, be watching earnest by my side,

Turning my books or kissing me when I Look up—like summer wind! Be still to me

A help to music's mystery which mind fails
To fathom, its solution, no mere clue!

O reason's pedantry, life's rule prescribed!
I hopeless, I the loveless, hope and love.

Wiser and better, know me now, not when You loved me as I was. Smile not! I have Much yet to dawn on you, to gladden you.

No more of the past! I'll look within no

more.
I have too trusted my own lawless wants,
Too trusted my vain self, vague intuition—

Draining soul's wine alone in the still night,
And seeing how, as gathering films arose,

As by an inspiration life seemed bare
And grinning in its vanity, while ends

Foul to be dreamed of, smiled at me as fixed
And fair, while others changed from fair to foul

As a young witch turns an old hag at night.

No more of this! We will go hand in hand,
I with thee, even as a child—love's slave,
Looking no farther than his liege commands

And thou hast chosen where this life shall be.
The land which gave me thee shall be our home,

Where nature lies all wild amid her lakes
And snow-swathed mountains and vast pines begirt

With ropes of snow—where nature lies all bare.

Suffering none to view her but a race
Or stunted or deformed, like the mute dwarfs
Which wait upon a naked Indian queen.

And there (the time being when the heavens are thick

With storm) I'll sit with thee while thou dost sing

Thy native songs, gay as a desert bird
Which crieth as it flies for perfect joy,

Or telling me old stories of dead knights;
Or I will read great lays to thee—how she,

The fair pale sister, went to her chill grave¹
With power to love and to be loved and live:

Or we will go together, like twin gods
Of the infernal world, with scented lamp

Over the dead, to call and to awake,
Over the unshaped images which lie

Within my mind's cave: only leaving all,
That tells of the past doubt. So, when spring comes

With sunshine back again like an old smile,
And the fresh waters and awakened birds

And budding woods await us, I shall be Prepared, and we will question life once

more,
Till its old sense shall come renewed by
change,

Like some clear thought which harsh words
veiled before;

Feeling God loves us, and that all which errs
Is but a dream which death will dissipate.

And then what need of longer exile? Seek
My England, and, again there, calm approach

All I once fled from, calmly look on those ¹ Antigone.

The works of my past weakness, as one views
Some scene where danger met him long before.

Ah that such pleasant life should be but dreamed !

But whate'er come of it, and though it fade,
And though ere the cold morning all be gone,
As it may be ;—tho' music wait to wile,
And strange eyes and bright wine lure, laugh like sin

Which steals back softly on a soul half saved,
And I the first deny, decry, despise,
With this avowal, these intents so fair,—
Still be it all my own, this moment's pride !
No less I make an end in perfect joy.

E'en in my brightest time, a lurking fear
Possessed me : I well knew my weak resolves,
I felt the witchery that makes mind sleep
Over its treasure, as one half afraid
To make his riches definite : but now
These feelings shall not utterly be lost,
I shall not know again that nameless care
Lest, leaving all undone in youth, some new
And undreamed end reveal itself too late :
For this song shall remain to tell for ever
That when I lost all hope of such a change,
Suddenly beauty rose on me again.
No less I make an end in perfect joy,
For I, who thus again was visited,
Shall doubt not many another bliss awaits,
And, though this weak soul sink and darkness whelm,

Some little word shall light it, raisé aloft,
To where I clearer see and better love,
As I again go o'er the tracts of thought
Like one who has a right, and I shall live
With poets, calmer, purer still each time,
And beauteous shapes will come for me to seize,
And unknown secrets will be trusted me
Which were denied the waverer once ; but now
I shall be priest and prophet as of old.

Sun-treader, I believe in God and truth
And love ; and as one just escaped from death
Would bind himself in bands of friends to feel
He lives indeed, so, I would lean on thee !
Thou must be ever with me, most in gloom

If such must come, but chiefly when I die,
For I seem, dying, as one going in the dark
To fight a giant : but live thou for ever,
And be to all what thou hast been to me !
All in whom this wakes pleasant thoughts of me
Know my last state is happy, free from doubt
Or touch of fear. Love me and wish me well.

NOTE.

Je crains bien que mon pauvre ami ne soit pas toujours parfaitement compris dans ce qui reste à lire de cet étrange fragment, mais il est moins propre que tout autre à éclaircir ce qui de sa nature ne peut jamais être que songe et confusion. D'ailleurs je ne sais trop si en cherchant à mieux co-ordonner certaines parties l'on ne courrait pas le risque de nuire au seul mérite auquel une production si singulière peut prétendre, celui de donner une idée assez précise du genre qu'elle n'a fait qu'ébaucher. Ce début sans prétention, ce renouement des passions qui va d'abord en accroissant et puis s'apaise par degrés, ces élans de l'âme, ce retour soudain sur soi-même, et par-dessus tout, la tournure d'esprit tout particulière de mon ami, rendent les changemens presque impossibles. Les raisons qu'il fait valoir ailleurs, et d'autres encore plus puissantes, ont fait trouver grâce à mes yeux pour cet écrit qu'autrement je lui eusse conseillé de jeter au feu. Je n'en crois pas moins au grand principe de toute composition—à ce principe de Shakespeare, de Raphaëlle, de Beethoven, d'où il suit que la concentration des idées est due bien plus à leur conception qu'à leur mise en exécution : j'ai tout lieu de craindre que la première de ces qualités ne soit encore étrangère à mon ami, et je doute fort qu'un redoublement de travail lui fasse acquérir la seconde. Le mieux serait de brûler ceci ; mais que faire ?

Je crois que dans ce qui suit il fait allusion à un certain examen qu'il fit autrefois de l'âme, ou plutôt de son âme, pour découvrir la suite des objets auxquels il lui serait possible d'atteindre, et dont chacun une fois obtenu devait former une espèce de plateau d'où l'on pouvait apercevoir d'autres buts, d'autres projets, d'autres jouissances qui, à leur tour, devaient être surmontés. Il en résultait que l'oubli et le sommeil devaient tout terminer. Cette idée, que je ne saisis pas parfaitement, lui est peut-être aussi inintelligible qu'à moi.

PAULINE.

PARACELSUS.

1835.

[In his choice of Paracelsus, Browning exhibits that fondness for learned subjects and out-of-the-way reading which always characterised him. A Life of Paracelsus, did it only exist, would be a fascinating record of times and ideas now well-nigh inconceivable by us. Paracelsus (a name invented by himself to indicate that he was greater than Celsus) was the son of a doctor, and was born about 1490 in Einsiedeln, in the Swiss canton of Schwyz. He studied at Basel University, and was taught alchemy and chemistry by the renowned Trithemius. He also acquired in the mines in the Tyrol belonging to the Fugger family a practical acquaintance with minerals. His merit became that of an observer and an acquirer of facts. He wandered all over Europe, and even reached Samarcand. In 1526 he returned to Basel, and was appointed town physician, and lectured 'before the University. His behaviour was eccentric, and his conceit boundless. In 1528 he left Basel and resumed his wandering life. He died in Salzburg in 1541—some say he was murdered, and others that he drank himself to death. He has been credited with an enormous number of works explanatory of his system, which was a mixture of mysticism, charlatanism, and useful empiricism. He lectured both in Latin and German. Erasmus consulted him for the stone, and he is said to have cured the famous printer, Froben, of the gout. It is asserted on his behalf that he discovered zinc, hydrogen gas, and the tincture of opium. His aroth is sometimes supposed to have been electricity (see Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. xviii.). The poem sufficiently explains itself, and presents no difficulty to an intelligent reader.]

FESTUS, PARACELSUS, MICHAL.

Paracelsus. Come close to me, dear friends; still closer; thus!
Close to the heart which, though long time roll by
Ere it again beat quicker, pressed to yours,

As now it beats—perchance a long, long time—
At least henceforth your memories shall make Quiet and fragrant as befits their home.
Nor shall my memory want a home in yours—
Alas, that it requires too well such free
Forgiving love as shall embalm it there!
For if you would remember me aright,
As I was born to be, you must forget
All fitful strange and moody waywardness
Which e'er confused my better spirit, 'to dwell
Only on moments such as these, dear friends!
—My heart no truer, but my words and ways
More true to it: as Michal, some months
hence,
Will say, "this autumn was a pleasant time,"
For some few sunny days; and overlook

Its bleak wind, hankering after pining leaves.
Autumn would fain be sunny ; I would look
Liker my nature's truth : and both are frail,
And both beloved, for all our frailty.

Michal. Aureole !

Paracelsus. Drop by drop ! she is weeping like a child !

Not so ! I am content—more than content ;
Nay, autumn wins you best by this its mute
Appeal to sympathy for its decay :

Look up, sweet Michal, nor esteem the less
Your stained and drooping vines their grapes
bow down,

Nor blame those creaking trees bent with their fruit,

That apple-tree with a rare after-birth
Of peeping blooms sprinkled its wealth among !

Then for the winds—what wind that ever raved
Shall vex that ash which overlooks you both,
So proud it wears its berries ? Ah, at length,
The old smile meet for her, the lady of this Sequestered nest !—this kingdom, limited
Alone by one old populous green wall
Tenanted by the ever-busy flies,

Grey crickets and shy lizards and quick spiders,

Each family of the silver-threaded moss—
Which, look through near, this way, and it appears

A stubble-field or a cane-brake, a marsh
Of bulrush whitening in the sun : laugh now !
Fancy the crickets, each one in his house,
Looking out, wondering at the world—or best,
Yon painted snail with his gay shell of dew,
Travelling to see the glossy balls high up
Hung by the caterpillar, like gold lamps.

Michal. In truth we have lived carelessly and well.

Paracelsus. And shall, my perfect pair !— each, trust me, born

For the other ; nay, your very hair, when mixed,

Is of one hue. For where save in this nook
Shall you two walk, when I am far away,
And wish me prosperous fortune ? Stay :
that plant

Shall never wave its tangles lightly and softly,

VOL. I.

As a queen's languid and imperial arm
Which scatters crowns among her lovers, but you

Shall be reminded to predict to me
Some great success ! Ah see, the sun sinks broad

Behind Saint Saviour's : wholly gone, at last !
Festus. Now, Aureole, stay those wandering eyes awhile !

You are ours to-night, at least ; and while you spoke

Of Michal and her tears, I thought that none Could willing leave what he so seemed to
love :

But that last look destroys my dream—that look

As if, where'er you gazed, there stood a star !
How far was Wurzburg with its church and spire

And garden-walls and all things they contain,
From that look's far alighting ?

Paracelsus. I but spoke

And looked alike from a simple joy to see
The beings I love best, shut in so well
From all rude chances like to be my lot,
That, when afar, my weary spirit,—disposed
To lose awhile its care in soothing thoughts
Of them, their pleasant features, looks and
words,—

Needs never hesitate, nor apprehend Encroaching trouble may have reached them
too,

Nor have recourse to fancy's busy aid
And fashion even a wish in their behalf
Beyond what they possess already here ;
But, unobstructed, may at once forget
Itself in them, assured how well they fare.
Beside, this Festus knows he holds me one
Whom quiet and its charms arrest in vain,
One scarce aware of all the joys I quit,
Too filled with airy hopes to make account
Of soft delights his own heart garners up :
Whereas behold how much our sense of all That's beauteous proves alike ! When Festus learns

That every common pleasure of the world
Affects me as himself ; that I have just
As varied appetite for joy derived

From common things ; a stake in life, in short,
Like his ; a stake which rash pursuit of aims
That life affords not, would as soon destroy ;—
He may convince himself that, this in view,
I shall act well advised. And last, because,
Though heaven and earth and all things were at stake,
Sweet Michal must not weep, our parting eve.

Festus True : and the eve is deepening, and we sit

As little anxious to begin our talk
As though to-morrow I could hint of it
As we paced arm-in-arm the cheerful town
At sun-dawn ; or could whisper it by fits (Trithemius busied with his class the while)
In that dim chamber where the noon-streaks peer

Half frightened by the awful tones around ;
On some grassy lane unbosom all
From even-blush to midnight : but, tomorrow !

Have I full leave to tell my inmost mind ?
We have been brothers, and henceforth the
world

Will rise between us :—all my freest mind ?
'Tis the last night, dear Aureole !

Paracelsus. Oh, say on !

Devise some test of love, some arduous feat
To be performed for you : say on ! If night Be spent the while, the better ! Recall how oft

My wondrous plans and dreams and hopes and fears

Have—never wearied you, oh no !—as I
Recall, and never vividly as now,
Your true affection, born when Einsiedeln
And its green hills were all the world to us ;
And still increasing to this night which ends
My further stay at Würzburg. Oh, one day
You shall be very proud ! Say on, dear friends !

Festus. In truth ? 'Tis for my proper peace, indeed,

Rather than yours ; for vain all projects seem
To stay your course : I said my latest hope
Is fading even now. A story tells
Of some far embassy despatched to win

The favour of an eastern king, and how
The gifts they offered proved but dazzling dust
Shed from the ore-beds native to his clime.
Just so, the value of repose and love,
I meant should tempt you, better far than I
You seem to comprehend ; and yet desist
No whit from projects where repose nor love
Has part.

Paracelsus. Once more ? Alas ! As I foretold.

Festus. A solitary brier the bank puts forth
To save our swan's nest floating out to sea.

Paracelsus. Dear Festus, hear me. What is it you wish ?

That I should lay aside my heart's pursuit,
Abandon the some ends for which I live,
Reject God's great commission, and so die !
You bid me listen for your true love's sake :
Yet how has grown that love ? Even in a long
And patient cherishing of the self-same spirit
It now would quell ; as though a mother hoped

To stay the lusty manhood of the child
Once weak upon her knees. I was not born Informed and fearless from the first, but shrank

From aught which marked me out apart from men :

I would have lived their life, and died their death,

Lost in their ranks, eluding destiny :
But you first guided me through doubt and
fear,

Taught me to know mankind and know
myself ;

And now that I am strong and full of hope,
That, from my soul, I can reject all aims Save those your earnest words made plain to
me,

Now that I touch the brink of my design,
When I would have a triumph in their eyes,
A glad cheer in their voices—Michal weeps,
And Festus ponders gravely !

Festus. When you deign
To hear my purpose . . .

Paracelsus. Hear it ? I can say
Beforehand all this evening's conference !
'Tis this way, Michal, that he uses : first,

Or he declares, or I, the leading points
Of our best scheme of life, what is man's end
And what God's will; no two faiths e'er agreed

As his with mine. Next, each of us allows
Faith should be acted on as best we may;
Accordingly, I venture to submit
My plan, in lack of better, for pursuing
The path which God's will seems to authorize.
Well, he discerns much good in it, avows
This motive worthy, that hope plausible,
A danger here to be avoided, there
An oversight to be repaired: in fine
Our two minds go together—all the good
Approved by him, I gladly recognize,
All he counts bad, I thankfully discard,
And nought forbids my looking up at last
For some stray comfort in his cautious brow.
When, lo! I learn that, spite of all, there lurks

Some innate and inexplicable germ
Of failure in my scheme; so that at last
It all amounts to this—the sovereign proof
That we devote ourselves to God, is seen
In living just as though no God there were;
A life which, prompted by the sad and blind
Folly of man, Festus abhors the most;
But which these tenets sanctify at once,
Though to less subtle wits it seems the same,
Consider it how they may.

Michal. Is it so, Festus?
He speaks so calmly and kindly: is it so?

Paracelsus. Reject those glorious visions of God's love
And man's design; laugh loud that God should send
Vast longings to direct us; say how soon
Power satiates these, or lust, or gold; I know
The world's cry well, and how to answer it.
But this ambiguous warfare . . .

Festus. . . . Wearies so
That you will grant no last leave to your friend
To urge it?—for his sake, not yours? I wish
To send my soul in good hopes after you;
Never to sorrow that uncertain words
Erringly apprehended, a new creed
Ill understood, begot rash trust in you,
Had share in your undoing.

Paracelsus. Choose your side,
Hold or renounce: but meanwhile blame me not

Because I dare to act on your own views, Nor shrink when they point onward, nor espy

A peril where they most ensure success.

Festus. Prove that to me—but that! Prove you abide

Within their warrant, nor presumptuous boast
God's labour laid on you; prove, all you covet
A mortal may expect; and, most of all,
Prove the strange course you now affect, will lead

To its attainment—and I bid you speed,
Nay, count the minutes till you venture forth!
You smile; but I had gathered from slow
thought—

Much musing on the fortunes of my friend—
Matter I deemed could not be urged in vain;
But it all leaves me at my need: in shreds
And fragments I must venture what remains.

Michal. Ask at once, Festus, wherefore he should scorn . . .

Festus. Stay, Michal: Aureole, I speak guardedly

And gravely, knowing well, whate'er your error,

This is no ill-considered choice of yours,
No sudden fancy of an ardent boy.

Not from your own confiding words alone
Am I aware your passionate heart long since
Gave birth to, nourished and at length matures
This scheme. I will not speak of Einsiedeln,
Where I was born your elder by some years
Only to watch you fully from the first:
In all beside, our mutual tasks were fixed Even then—'twas mine to have you in my view

As you had your own soul and those intents
Which filled it when, to crown your dearest wish,

With a tumultuous heart, you left with me
Our childhood's home to join the favoured few Whom, here, Trithemius condescends to teach
A portion of his lore: and not one youth
Of those so favoured, whom you now despise,
Came earnest as you came, resolved, like you,

To grasp all, and retain all, and deserve
 By patient toil a wide renown like his.
 Now, this new ardour which supplants the old
 I watched, too ; 'twas significant and strange,
 In one matched to his soul's content at length
 With rivals in the search for wisdom's prize,
 To see the sudden pause, the total change ;
 From contest, the transition to repose—
 From pressing onward as his fellows pressed,
 To a blank idleness, yet most unlike
 The dull stagnation of a soul, content,
 Once foiled, to leave betimes a thrivelless quest.
 That careless bearing, free from all pretence
 Even of contempt for what it ceased to seek—
 Smiling humility, praising much, yet waiving
 What it professed to praise—though not so
 well
 Maintained but that rare outbreaks, fierce and brief,
 Revealed the hidden scorn, as quickly curbed.
 That ostentatious show of past defeat,
 That ready acquiescence in contempt,
 I deemed no other than the letting go
 His shivered sword, of one about to spring
 Upon his foe's throat ; but it was not thus :
 Not that way looked your brooding purpose
 then.
 For after-signs disclosed, what you confirmed,
 That you prepared to task to the uttermost
 Your strength, in furtherance of a certain aim
 Which—while it bore the name your rivals gave
 Their own most puny efforts—was so vast
 In scope that it included their best flights,
 Combined them, and desired to gain one prize
 In place of many,—the secret of the world,
 Of man, and man's true purpose, path and fate.
 - That you, not nursing as a mere vague dream
 This purpose, with the sages of the past,
 Have struck upon a way to this, if all
 You trust be true, which following, heart and
 soul,
 You, if a man may, dare aspire to KNOW :
 And that this aim shall differ from a host
 Of aims alike in character and kind,
 Mostly in this,—that in itself alone
 Shall its reward be, not an alien end
 Blending therewith ; no hope nor fear nor joy

Nor woe, to elsewhere move you, but this pure
 Devotion to sustain you or betray :
 Thus you aspire.

Paracelsus. You shall not state it thus :
 I should not differ from the dreamy crew
 You speak of. I profess no other share
 In the selection of my lot, than this
 My ready answer to the will of God
 Who summons me to be his organ. All Whose innate strength supports them shall succeed
 No better than the sages.

Festus. Such the aim, then,
 God sets before you ; and 'tis doubtless need
 That he appoint no less the way of praise
 Than the desire to praise ; for, though I hold
 With you, the setting forth such praise to be
 The natural end and service of a man,
 And hold such praise is best attained when
 man
 Attains the general welfare of his kind—
 Yet this, the end, is not the instrument.
 Presume not to serve God apart from such Appointed channel as he wills shall gather Imperfect tributes, for that sole obedience Valued perchance ! He seeks not that his altars

Blaze, careless how, so that they do but blaze.
 Suppose this, then ; that God selected you To know (heed well your answers, for my faith

Shall meet implicitly what they affirm)
 I cannot think you dare annex to such Selection aught beyond a steadfast will,
 An intense hope ; nor let your gifts create Scorn or neglect of ordinary means
 Conducive to success, make destiny Dispense with man's endeavour. Now, dare you search

Your inmost heart, and candidly avow
 Whether you have not rather wild desire
 For this distinction than security
 Of its existence ? whether you discern
 The path to the fulfilment of your purpose Clear as that purpose — and again, that purpose
 Clear as your yearning to be singled out
 For its pursuer. Dare you answer this ?

Paracelsus [after a pause]. No, I have nought to fear ! Who will may know
 The secret'st workings of my soul. What though
 It be so ?—if indeed the strong desire
 Eclipse the aim in me ?—if splendour break
 Upon the outset of my path alone,
 And duskest shade succeed ? What fairer seal
 Shall I require to my authentic mission
 Than this fierce energy ?—this instinct striving Because its nature is to strive ?—enticed
 By the security of no broad course,
 Without success forever in its eyes !
 How know I else such glorious fate my
 own,
 But in the restless irresistible force
 That works within me ? Is it for human will
 To institute such impulses ?—still less,
 To disregard their promptings ! What should I
 Do, kept among you all ; your loves, your cares,
 Your life —all to be mine ? Be sure that God Ne'er dooms to waste the strength he deigns impart !
 Ask the geier-eagle why she stoops at once
 Into the vast and unexplored abyss,
 What full-grown power informs her from the
 first,
 Why she not marvels, strenuously beating
 The silent boundless regions of the sky !
 Be sure they sleep not whom God needs !
 Nor fear
 Their holding light his charge, when every hour
 That finds that charge delayed, is a new death.
 This for the faith in which I trust ; and hence
 I can abjure so well the idle arts
 These pedants strive to learn and teach ;
 Black Arts,
 Great Works, the Secret and Sublime, forsooth—
 Let others prize : too intimate a tie
 Connects me with our God ! A sullen fiend
 To do my bidding, fallen and hateful sprites
 To help me—what are these, at best, beside
 God helping, God directing everywhere,
 So that the earth shall yield her secrets up,
 And every object there be charged to strike,
 Teach, gratify her master God appoints ?
 And I am young, my Festus, happy and free !
 I can devote myself ; I have a life
 To give ; I, singled out for this, the One !
 Think, think ! the wide East, where all Wisdom sprung ;
 The bright South, where she dwelt ; the hopeful North,
 All are passed o'er—it lights on me ! 'Tis
 time
 New hopes should animate the world, new light
 Should dawn from new revealings to a race
 Weighed down so long, forgotten so long ;
 thus shall
 The heaven reserved for us at last receive Creatures whom no unwonted splendours blind,
 But ardent to confront the unclouded blaze
 Whose beams not seldom blessed their pilgrimage,
 Not seldom glorified their life below.
Festus. My words have their old fate and make faint stand Against your glowing periods. Call this,
 truth—
 Why not pursue it in a fast retreat,
 Some one of Learning's many palaces,
 After approved example ?—seeking there Calm converse with the great dead, soul to
 soul,
 Who laid up treasure with the like intent
 —So lift yourself into their airy place,
 And fill out full their unfulfilled careers,
 Unravelling the knots their baffled skill
 Pronounced inextricable, true !—but left
 Far less confused. A fresh eye, a fresh hand, Might do much at their vigour's waning-
 point ;
 Succeeding with new-breathed new-hearted
 force,
 As at old games the runner snatched the torch
 From runner still : this way success might be.
 But you have coupled with your enterprise,
 An arbitrary self-repugnant scheme
 Of seeking it in strange and untried paths.
 What books are in the desert ? Writes the sea

The secret of her yearning in vast caves
Where yours will fall the first of human feet ?
Has wisdom sat there and recorded aught
You press to read ? Why turn aside from her
To visit, where her vesture never glanced,
Now—solitudes consigned to barrenness
By God's decree, which who shall dare impugn ?

Now—ruins where she paused but would not stay,

Old ravaged cities that, renouncing her,
She called an endless curse on, so it came :
Or worst of all, now—men you visit, men,
Ignobler troops who never heard her voice
Or hate it, men without one gift from Rome
Or Athens,--these shall Aureole's teachers be !
Rejecting past example, practice, precept,
Aldess 'mid these he thinks to stand alone :
Thick like a glory round the Stagirite
Your rivals throng, the sages : here stand you !
Whatever you may protest, knowledge is not
Paramount in your love ; or for her sake
You would collect all help from every source—
Rival, assistant, friend, foe, all would merge
In the broad class of those who showed her haunts,

And those who showed them not.

Paracelsus. What shall I say ?
Festus, from childhood I have been possessed
By a fire—by a true fire, or faint or fierce,
As from without some master, so it seemed,
Repressed or urged its current : this but ill
Expresses what would I convey : but rather
I will believe an angel ruled me thus,
Than that my soul's own workings, own high nature,

So became manifest. I knew not then
What whispered in the evening, and spoke out
At midnight. If some mortal, born too soon, Were laid away in some great trance—the ages

Coming and going all the while—till dawned
His true time's advent ; and could then record
The words they spoke who kept watch by his bed,—

Then I might tell more of the breath so light
Upon my eyelids, and the fingers light
Among my hair. Youth is confused ; yet never

So dull was I but, when that spirit passed,
I turned to him, scarce consciously, as turns
A water-snake when fairies cross his sleep.
And having this within me and about me While Einsiedeln, its mountains, lakes and woods

Confined me—what oppressive joy was mine
When life grew plain, and I first viewed the thronged,

The everlasting concourse of mankind !
Believe that ere I joined them, ere I knew
The purpose of the pageant, or the place
Consigned me in its ranks—while, just awake,
Wonder was freshest and delight most pure—
'Twas then that least supportable appeared
A station with the brightest of the crowd,
A portion with the proudest of them all.
And from the tumult in my breast, this only
Could I collect, that I must thenceforth die
Or elevate myself far, far above
The gorgeous spectacle. I seemed to long
At once to trample on, yet save mankind,
To make some unexampled sacrifice
In their behalf, to wring some wondrous good
From heaven or earth for them, to perish, winning

Eternal weal in the act : as who should dare
Pluck out the angry thunder from its cloud,
That, all its gathered flame discharged on
him,

No storm might threaten summer's azure
sleep :

Yet never to be mixed with men so much
As to have part even in my own work, share
In my own largess. Once the feat achieved,
I would withdraw from their officious praise,
Would gently put aside their profuse thanks.
Like some knight traversing a wilderness,
Who, on his way, may chance to free a tribe
Of desert-people from their dragon-foe ;
When all the swarthy race press round to kiss
His feet, and choose him for their king, and yield

Their poor tents, pitched among the sand-hills, for

His realm : and he points, smiling, to his scarf

Heavy with riveled gold, his burgonet

Gay set with twinkling stones—and to the East,

Where these must be displayed !

Festus.

Good : let us hear

No more about your nature, “which first shrank

“From all that marked you out apart from men !”

Paracelsus. I ‘ouch on that ; these words but analyse

The first mad impulse : ‘twas as brief as fond,
For as I gazed again upon the show,
I soon distinguished here and there a shape
Palm-wreathed and radiant, forehead and full eye.

Well pleased was I their state should thus at once Interpret my own thoughts :—“Behold the clue

“To all,” I rashly said, “and what I pine

“To do, these have accomplished : we are peers.

“They know and therefore rule : I, too, will know !”

You were beside me, Festus, as you say ;

You saw me plunge in their pursuits whom fame

Is lavish to attest the lords of mind,

Not pausing to make sure the prize in view

Would satiate my cravings when obtained,

But since they strove I strove. Then came a slow

And strangling failure. We aspired alike,

Yet not the meanest plodder, Trithem counts

A marvel, but was all-sufficient, strong,

Or staggered only at his own vast wits ;

While I was restless, nothing satisfied,

Distrustful, most perplexed. I would slur over

That struggle ; suffice it, that I loathed myself

As weak compared with them, yet felt somehow

A mighty power was brooding, taking shape
Within me ; and this lasted till one night

When, as I sat revolving it and more,

A still voice from without said—“Seest thou not,

“Desponding child, whence spring defeat and loss ?

“Even from thy strength. Consider : hast thou gazed “Presumptuously on wisdom’s countenance.

“No veil between ; and can thy faltering hands,

“Unguided by the brain the sight absorbs,

“Pursue their task as earnest blinkers do

“Whom radiance ne’er distracted ? Live their life

“If thou wouldst share their fortune, choose their eyes

“Unfed by splendour. Let each task present

“Its petty good to thee. Waste not thy gifts

“In profitless waiting for the gods’ descent,

“But have some idol of thine own to dress

“With their array. Know, not for knowing’s sake,

“But to become a star to men for ever ;

“Know, for the gain it gets, the praise it brings,

“The wonder it inspires, the love it breeds :

“Look one step onward, and secure that step !”

And I smiled as one never smiles but once,

Then first discovering my own aim’s extent,

Which sought to comprehend the works of God,

And God himself, and all God’s intercourse

With the human mind ; I understood, no less,

My fellows’ studies, whose true worth I saw,

But smiled not, well aware who stood by me.

And softer came the voice—“There is a way :

“’Tis hard for flesh to tread therein, imbued

“With frailty—hopeless, if indulgence first

“Have ripened inborn germs of sin to strength :

“Wilt thou adventure for my sake and man’s,

“Apart from all reward ?” And last it breathed—

“Be happy, my good soldier ; I am by thee.

“Be sure, even to the end !”—I answered not,

Knowing him. As he spoke, I was endued

With comprehension and a steadfast will ;

And when he ceased, my brow was sealed his own.

If there took place no special change in me,

How comes it all things wore a different hue

Thenceforward?—pregnant with vast consequence,

Teeming with grand result, loaded with fate?
So that when, quailing at the mighty range
Of secret truths which yearn for birth, I haste
To contemplate undazzled some one truth,
Its hearings and effects alone—at once
What was a speck expands into a star,
Asking a life to pass exploring thus,
Till I near craze. I go to prove my soul!
I see my way as birds their trackless way.
I shall arrive! what time, what circuit first,
I ask not: but unless God send his hail
Or blinding fireballs, sleet or stifling snow,
In some time, his good time, I shall arrive:
He guides me and the bird. In his good time!

Michal. Vex him no further, Festus; it is so!

Festus. Just thus you help me ever. This would hold

Were it the trackless air, and not a path
Inviting you, distinct with footprints yet
Of many a mighty marcher gone that way.
You may have puer views than theirs, perhaps,

But they were famous in their day— the proofs
Remain. At least accept the light they lend.

Paracelsus. Their light! the sum of all is briefly this:

They laboured and grew famous, and the fruits
Are best seen in a dark and groaning earth
Given over to a blind and endless strife
With evils, what of all their lore abates?
No; I reject and spurn them utterly
And all they teach. Shall I still sit beside Their dry wells, with a whitelip and filmed eye,
While in the distance heaven is blue above
Mountains where sleep the unsunned tarns?

Festus. And yet As strong delusions have prevailed ere now.
Men have set out as gallantly to seek
Their ruin. I have heard of such; yourself
Avow all hitherto have failed and fallen.

Michal. Nay, Festus, when but as the pilgrims faint

Through the drear way, do you expect to see
Their city dawn amid the clouds afar?

Paracelsus. Ay, sounds it not like some old well-known tale?

For me, I estimate their works and them
So rightly, that at times I almost dream
I too have spent a life the sages' way,
And tread once more familiar paths. Perchance

I perished in an arrogant self-reliance
Ages ago; and in that act, a prayer
For one more chance went up so earnest, so
Instinct with better light let in by death,
That life was blotted out—not so completely
But scattered wrecks enough of it remain,
Dim memories, as now, when once more seems

The goal in sight again. All which, indeed,
Is foolish, and only means—the flesh I wear,

The earth I tread, are not more clear to me
Than my belief, explained to you or no.

Festus. And who am I, to challenge and dispute

That clear belief? I will divest all fear.

Michal. Then Aureole is God's commissary! he shall Be great and grand—and all for us!

Paracelsus. No, sweet!
Not great and grand. If I can serve mankind
'Tis well; but there our intercourse must end:
I never will be served by those I serve.

Festus. Look well to this; here is a plague-spot, here,
Disguise it how you may! 'Tis true, you utter

This scorn while by our side and loving us:
'Tis but a spot as yet: but it will break
Into a hideous blotch if overlooked.

How can that course be safe which from the first

Produces carelessness to human love?
It seems you have abjured the helps which men

Who overpass their kind, as you would do,
I have humbly sought; I dare not thoroughly probe

This matter, lest I learn too much. Let be
That popular praise would little instigate
Your efforts, nor particular approval

Reward you ; put reward aside ; alone
 You shall go forth upon your arduous task,
 None shall assist you, none partake your toil,
 None share your triumph : still you must retain
 Some one to cast your glory on, to share
 Your rapture with. Were I elect like you,
 I would encircle me with love, and raise
 A rampart of my fellows ; it should seem Impossible for me to fail, so watched By gentle friends who made my cause their
 own.

They should ward off fate's envy—the great gift,

Extravagant when claimed by me alone,
 Being so a gift to them as well as me.
 If danger daunted me or ease seduced,
 How calmly their sad eyes should gaze reproach !

Michal. O Aureole, can I sing when all
 alone,

Without first calling, in my fancy, both
 To listen by my side—even I ! And you ?
 Do you not feel this ? Say that you feel this !

Paracelsus. I feel 'tis pleasant that my aims, at length

Allowed their weight, should be supposed to need

A further strengthening in these goodly helps !
 My course allures for its own sake, its sole
 Intrinsic worth ; and ne'er shall boat of mine
 Adventure forth for gold and apes at once.
 Your sages say, "if human, therefore weak :"

If weak, more need to give myself entire
 To my pursuit ; and by its side, all else . . .
 No matter ! I deny myself but little
 In waiving all assistance save its own.

Would there were some real sacrifice to make !

Your friends the sages threw their joys away,
 While I must be content with keeping mine.

Festus. But do not cut yourself from human weal !

You cannot thrive—a man that dares affect
 To spend his life in service to his kind
 For no reward of theirs, unbound to them
 By any tie ; nor do so, Aureole ! No—
 There are strange punishments for such. Give up

VOL. I.

(Although no visible good flow thence) some part

Of the glory to another ; hiding thus,
 Even from yourself, that all is for yourself.
 Say, say almost to God—"I have done all
 "For her, not for myself !"

Paracelsus. And who but lately

Was to rejoice in my success like you ?

Whom should I love but both of you ?

Festus. I know not :

But know this, you, that 'tis no will of mine
 You should abjure the lofty claims you make ;
 And this the cause—I can no longer seek
 To overlook the truth, that there would be
 A monstrous spectacle upon the earth,
 Beneath the pleasant sun, among the trees :
 —A being knowing not what love is. Hear
 me !

You are endowed with faculties which bear
 Annexed to them as 'twere a dispensation
 To summon meaner spirits to do their will
 And gather round them at their need ; inspiring

Such with a love themselves can never feel,
 Passionless 'mid their passionate votaries.

I know not if you joy in this or no,
 Or ever dream that common men can live
 On objects you prize lightly, but which make Their heart's sole treasure : the affections seem

Beauteous at most to you, which we must taste

Or die : and this strange quality accords,
 I know not how, with you ; sits well upon
 That luminous brow, though in another it scowls

An eating brand, a shame. I dare not judge you.

The rules of right and wrong thus set aside,
 There's no alternative—I own you one
 Of higher order, under other laws
 Than bind us ; therefore, curb not one bold glance !

'Tis best aspire. Once mingled with us
 all . . .

Michal. Stay with us, Aureole ! cast those hopes away,
 And stay with us ! An angel warns me, too,

B 2

Man should be humble : you are very proud : Even as he knows not how those beams are
 And God, dethroned, has doleful plagues born, for such ! As little knows he what unlocks their fount :
 Warns me to have in dread no quick And men have oft grown old among their repulse, books
 No slow defeat, but a complete success : To die case-hardened in their ignorance,
 You will find all you seek, and perish so ! Whose careless youth had promised what Paracelsus [after a pause]. Are these the long years barren firstfruits of my quest ? Of unremitted labour ne'er performed :
 I, love like this the natural lot of all ? While, contrary, it has chanced some idle
 How many years of pain might one such hour day,
 O'erbalance ? Dearest Michal, dearest To autumn loiterers just as fancy-free Festus, As the midgets in the sun, gives birth at last
 What shall I say, if not that I desire To truth—produced mysteriously as cape
 To justify your love ; and will, dear friends, Of cloud grown out of the invisible air.
 In swerving nothing from my first resolves. Hence, may not truth be lodged alike in all,
 See, the great moon ! and ere the mottled owls The lowest as the highest ? some slight film
 Were wide awake, I was to go. It seems The interposing bar which binds a soul
 You acquiesce at last in all save this — And makes the idiot, just as makes the sage
 If I am like to compass what I seek Some film removed, the happy outlet whence
 By the untried career I choose ; and then, Truth issues proudly ? See this soul of ours !
 If that career, making but small account How it strives weakly in the child, is loosed
 Of much of life's delight, will yet retain In manhood, clogged by sickness, back Sufficient to sustain my soul : for thus compelled
 I understand these fond fears just expressed. By age and waste, set free at last by death :
 And first ; the lore you praise and I neglect, Why is it, flesh enthral's it or enthrones ?
 The labours and the precepts of old time, What is this flesh we have to penetrate ?
 I have not lightly disesteemed. But, friends, Oh, not alone when life flows still, do truth
 Truth is within ourselves ; it takes no rise And power emerge, but also when strange
 From outward things, whate'er you may chance believe, Ruffles its current ; in unused conjuncture,
 There is an inmost centre in us all, When sickness breaks the body—hunger,
 Where truth abides in fulness ; and around, watching,
 Wall upon wall, the gross flesh hems it in, Excess or languor—oftenest death's approach,
 This perfect, clear perception—which is truth. Peril, deep joy or woe. One man shall crawl
 A baffling and perverting carnal mesh Through life surrounded with all stirring Binds it, and makes all error : and to KNOW things, Rather consists in opening out a way Unmoved ; and he goes mad : and from the Whence the imprisoned splendour may wreck escape, Of what he was, by his wild talk alone,
 Than in effecting entry for a light You first collect how great a spirit he hid.
 Supposed to be without. Watch narrowly Therefore, set free the soul alike in all,
 The demonstration of a truth, its birth, Discovering the true laws by which the flesh
 And you trace back the effluence to its spring Accloys the spirit ! We may not be doomed
 And source within us ; where broods To cope with seraphs, but at least the rest radiance vast, Shall cope with us. Make no more giants,
 To be elicited ray by ray, as chance God,
 Shall favour : chance—for hitherto, your sage But elevate the race at once ! We ask

To put forth just our strength, our human strength,

All starting fairly, all equipped alike,
Gifted alike, all eagle-eyed, true-hearted—

See if we cannot beat thine angels yet !

Such is my task. I go to gather this
The sacred knowledge, here and there dispersed

About the world, long lost or never found.

And why should I be sad or lorn of hope ?

Why ever make man's good distinct from God's,

Or, finding they are one, why dare mistrust ?

Who shall succeed if not one pledged like me ?

Mine is no mad attempt to build a world

Apart from his, like those who set themselves

To find the nature of the spirit they bore,

And, taught betimes that all their gorgeous dreams

Were only born to vanish in this life,

Refused to fit them to its narrow sphere,

But chose to figure forth another world

And other frames meet for their vast desires,—

And all a dream ! Thus was life scorned ;
but life

Shall yet be crowned : twine amaranth ! I am priest !

And all for yielding with a lively spirit

A poor existence, parting with a youth

Like those who squander every energy

Convertible to good, on painted toys,

Breath-bubbles, gilded dust ! And though

I spurn

All adventitious aims, from empty praise

To love's award, yet whoso deems such helps

Important, and concerns himself for me,

May know even these will follow with the rest—

As in the steady rolling Mayne, asleep

Yonder, is mixed its mass of schistous ore.

My own affections laid to rest awhile,

Will waken purified, subdued alone

By all I have achieved. Till then—till
then . . .

Ah, the time-wiling loitering of a page

Through bower and over lawn, till eve shall bring

The stately lady's presence whom he loves—
The broken sleep of the fisher whose rough coat

Enwraps the queenly pearl—these are faint types !

See, see, they look on me : I triumph
now !

But one thing, Festus, Michal ! I have told

All I shall e'er disclose to mortal : say—

Do you believe I shall accomplish this ?

Festus. I do believe !

Michal.

I ever did believe !

Paracelsus. Those words shall never fade from out my brain !

This earnest of the end shall never fade !

Are there not, Festus, are there not, dear
Michal,

Two points in the adventure of the diver,

One—when, a beggar, he prepares to plunge,

One—when, a prince, he rises with his pearl ?

Festus. I plunge !

Festus. We wait you when you rise !

II.—PARACELSUS ATTAINS.

SCENE.—Constantinople ; the house of a Greek Conjuror. 1521.

PARACELSUS.

Over the waters in the vaporous West

The sun goes down as in a sphere of gold

Behind the arm of the city, which between,

With all that length of domes and minarets,

Athwart the splendour, black and crooked runs

Like a Turk verse along a scimitar.

There lie, sullen memorial, and no more

Possess my aching sight ! 'Tis done at last.

Strange—and the juggles of a sallow cheat

I have won me to this act ! 'Tis as you cloud

Should voyage unwrecked o'er many a mountain-top

And break upon a molehill. I have dared

Come to a pause with knowledge ; scan for once

The heights already reached, without regard

To the extent above ; fairly compute

All I have clearly gained; for once excluding
A brilliant future to supply and perfect
All half-gains and conjectures and crude hopes:

And all because a fortune-teller willis
His credulous seekers should inscribe thus
much

Their previous life's attainment, in his roll,
Before his promised secret, as he vaunts,
Make up the sum: and here amid the scrawled
Uncouth recordings of the dupes of this Old arch-genethliac,¹ lie my life's results!

A few blurred characters suffice to note
A stranger wandered long through many lands
And reaped the fruit he coveted in a few
Discoveries, as appended here and there,
The fragmentary produce of much toil,
In a dim heap, fact and surmise together
Confusedly massed as when acquired; he was Intent on gain to come too much to stay
And scrutinise the little gained: the whole Slipt in the blank space 'twixt an idiot's gibber

And a mad lover's ditty—there it lies.

And yet those blottings chronicle a life—
A whole life, and my life! Nothing to do,
No problem for the fancy, but a life
Spent and decided, wasted past retrieve
Or worthy beyond peer. Stay, what does
this

Remembrance set down concerning "life"?
"Time fleets, youth fades, life is an empty
dream,"

"It is the echo of time; and he whose heart Beat first beneath a human heart, whose speech

"Was copied from a human tongue, can never

"Recall when he was living yet knew not this.
"Nevertheless long seasons pass o'er him

"Till some one hour's experience shows what nothing,

"It seemed, could clearer show; and ever after,

"An altered brow and eye and gait and
speech

"Attest that now he knows the adage true,
"Time fleets, youth fades, life is an empty
dream."

Ay, my brave chronicler, and this same hour
As well as any: now, let my time be!

Now! I can go no farther; well or ill,
'Tis done. I must desist and take my chance.
I cannot keep on the stretch: 'tis no back-shrinking—

For let but some assurance beam, some close
To my toil grow visible, and I proceed
At any price, though closing it, I die.
Else, here I pause. The old Greek's prophecy
Is like to turn out true: "I shall not quit
"His chamber till I know what I desire!"
Was it the light wind sang it o'er the sea?

An end, a rest! strange how the notion, once
Encountered, gathers strength by moments!
Rest!

Where has it kept so long? this throbbing
brow

To cease, this beating heart to cease, all cruel
And gnawing thoughts to cease! To dare let down

My strung, so high-strung brain, to dare unnerve

My harassed o'ertasked frame, to know my
place,

My portion, my reward, even my failure,
Assigned, made sure for ever! To lose myself

Among the common creatures of the world,
To draw some gain from having been a man,
Neither to hope nor fear, to live at length!
Even in failure, rest! But rest in truth

And power and recompense . . . I hoped that once!

What, sunk insensibly so deep? Has all
Been undergone for this? This the request
My labour qualified me to present
With no fear of refusal? Had I gone
Slightly through my task, and so judged fit

PARACELSUS

To moderate my hopes ; nay, were it now
My sole concern to exculpate myself,
End things or mend them,—why, I could not choose

A humbler mood to wait for the event !
No, no, there needs not this ; no, after all,
At worst I have performed my share of the task :

The rest is God's concern ; mine, merely this,
To know that I have obstinately held
By my own work. The mortal whose brave foot

Has trod, unscathed, the temple-court so far
That he descries at length the shrine of shrines,

Must let no sneering of the demons' eyes,
Whom he could pass unquailing, fasten now
Upon him, fairly past their power ; no, no—
He must not stagger, faint, fall down at last,
Having a charm to baffle them ; behold,
He bares his front : a mortal ventures thus
Serene amid the echoes, beams and glooms !
If he be priest henceforth, if he wake up
The god of the place to ban and blast him
there,

Both well ! What's failure or success to me ?
I have subdued my life to the one purpose
Whereto I ordained it ; there alone I spy,
No doubt, that way I may be satisfied.

Ves, well have I subdued my life ! beyond
The obligation of my strictest vow,
The contemplation of my wildest bond,
Which gave my nature freely up, in truth,
But in its actual state, consenting fully
All passionate impulses its soil was formed
To rear, should wither ; but foreseeing not
The tract, doomed to perpetual barrenness,
Would seem one day, remembered as it was,
Beside the parched sand-waste which now it is,

Already strewn with faint blooms, viewless
then.

I ne'er engaged to root up loves so frail
I felt them not ; yet now, 'tis very plain
Some soft spots had their birth in me at first,
If not love, say, like love : there was a time
When yet this wolfish hunger after knowledge

Set not remorselessly love's claims aside.
This heart was human once, or why recall Einsiedeln, now, and Würzburg which the Mayne

Forsakes her course to fold as with an arm ?

And Festus—my poor Festus, with his praise
And counsel and grave fears—where is he now
With the sweet maiden, long ago his bride ?
I surely loved them—that last night, at least,
When we . . . gone ! gone ! the better. I am saved

The sad review of an ambitious youth
Choked by vile lusts, unnoticed in their birth,
But let grow up and wind around a will Till action was destroyed. No, I have gone
Purging my path successively of aught
Wearing the distant likeness of such lusts.
I have made life consist of one idea :
Ere that was master, up till that was born,
I bear a memory of a pleasant life
Whose small events I treasure ; till one morn
I ran o'er the seven little grassy fields,
Startling the flocks of nameless birds, to tell
Poor Festus, leaping all the while for joy,
To leave all trouble for my future plans,
Since I had just determined to become
The greatest and most glorious man on earth.
And since that morn all life has been forgotten :

All is one day, one only step between
The outset and the end : one tyrant all-
Absorbing aim fills up the interspace,
One vast unbroken chain of thought, kept up
Through a career apparently adverse
To its existence : life, death, light and shadow,
The shows of the world, were bare receptacles
Or indices of truth to be wrung thence,
Not ministers of sorrow or delight :
A wondrous natural robe in which she went.
For some one truth would dimly beacon me
From mountains rough with pines, and flit and wink

O'er dazzling wastes of frozen snow, and tremble
Into assured light in some branching mine
Where ripens, swathed in fire, the liquid gold—

And all the beauty, all the wonder fell
On either side the truth, as its mere robe ;
I see the robe now — then I saw the form.
So far, then, I have voyaged with success,
So much is good, then, in this working sea
Which parts me from that happy strip of land :

But o'er that happy strip a sun shone, too !
And fainter gleams it as the waves grow rough,

And still more faint as the sea widens ; last
I sicken on a dead gulf streaked with light
From its own putrefying depths alone.

Then, God was pledged to take me by the
hand ;

Now, any miserable juggle can bid
My pride depart. All is alike at length :

God may take pleasure in confounding pride
By hiding secrets with the scorned and base—
I am here, in short : so little have I paired Throughout ! I never glanced behind to know

If I had kept my primal light from wane,
And thus miscensibly am—what I am !

Oh, bitter ; very bitter !

And more bit

To fear a deeper curse, an inner ruin,
Plague beneath plague, the last turning the
first

To light beside its darkness. Let me rep
My youth and its brave hopes, all dead and gone,

In tears which burn ! Would I were sure to win

Some startling secret in their stead, a tincture
Of force to flush old age with youth, or breed
Gold, or imprison moonbeams till they
change

To opal shafts !—only that, hurling it
Indignant back, I might convince myself
My aims remained supreme and pure as ever !
Even now, why not desire, for mankind's
sake,

That if I fail, some fault may be the cause,
That, though I sink, another may succeed ?
O God, the despicable heart of us !
Shut out this hideous mockery from my heart !

'Twas politic in you, Aureole, to reject
Single rewards, and ask them in the lump ;
At all events, once launched, to hold straight
on :

For now 'tis all or nothing. Mighty profit
Your gains will bring if they stop short of such Full consummation ! As a man, you had
A certain share of strength ; and that is gone
Already in the getting these you boast.
Do not they seem to laugh, as who should
say—

"Great master, we are here indeed, dragged
forth

"To light ; this hast thou done : be glad !
Now, seek

"The strength to use which thou hast spent in getting !"

And yet 'tis much, surely 'tis very much,
Thus to have emptied youth of all its gifts,
To feed a fire meant to hold out till morn
Arrived with inexhaustible light ; and lo,
I have heaped up my last, and day dawns
not !

And I am left with grey hair, faded hands,
And furrowed brow. Ha, have I, after all
Mistaken the wild nursing of my breast ?
Knowledge it seemed, and power, and re compense !

Was she who glided through my room of nights,

Who laid my head on her soft knees and smoothed

The damp locks,—whose sly soothings just began

When my sick spirit craved repose awhile—
God ! was I fighting sleep off for death's
sake ?

God ! Thou art mind ! Unto the master-
mind

Mind should be precious. Spare my mind
alone !

All else I will endure ; if, as I stand
Here, with my gains, thy thunder smite me
down,

I bow me ; 'tis thy will, thy righteous will ;
I o'erpass life's restrictions, and I die ;

And if no trace of my career remain
 Save a thin corpse at pleasure of the wind
 In these bright chambers level with the air,
 See thou to it ! But if my spirit fail,
 My once proud spirit forsake me at the last,
 Hast thou done well by me ? So do not thou Crush not my mind, dear God, though I be crushed !

Hold me before the frequency of thy seraphs
 And say—"I crushed him, lest he should disturb

"My law. Men must not know their strength : behold

"Weak and alone, how he had raised himself !"

But if delusions trouble me, and thou,
 Not seldom felt with rapture in thy help
 Throughout my toils and wanderings, dost intend

To work man's welfare through my weak endeavour,

To crown my mortal forehead with a beam
 From thine own blinding crown, to smile, and guide

This puny hand and let the work so wrought
 Be styled my work,—hear me ! I covet not
 An influx of new power, an angel's soul :

It were no marvel then—but I have reached
 Thus far, a man ; let me conclude, a man !
 Give but one hour of my first energy,
 Of that invincible faith, but only one !

That I may cover with an eagle-glance
 The truths I have, and spy some certain way
 To mould them, and completing them, possess !

Yet God is good : I started sure of that,
 And why dispute it now ? I'll not believe
 But some undoubted warning long ere this Had reached me : a fire-labrum¹ was not deemed

Too much for the old founder of these walls.
 Then, if my life has not been natural,
 It has been monstrous : yet, till late, my course
 So ardently engrossed me, that delight,
 A pausing and reflecting joy, 'tis plain,

¹ The sacred standard used by Constantine after his conversion.

Could find no place in it. True, I am worn ;
 But who clothes summer, who is life itself ?
 God, that created all things, can renew !
 And then, though after-life to please me now
 Must have no likeness to the past, what hinders
 Reward from springing out of toil, as changed
 As bursts the flower from earth and root and stalk ?

What use were punishment, unless some sin
 Be first detected ? let me know that first !
 No man could ever offend as I have done . . .

[A voice from within.]

I hear a voice, perchance I heard
 Long ago, but all too low,
 So that scarce a care it stirred
 If the voice were real or no :
 I heard it in my youth when first
 The waters of my life outburst :
 But, now their stream ebbs faint, I hear

That voice, still low, but fatal-clear—
 As if all poets, God ever meant
 Should save the world, and therefore lent
 Great gifts to, but who, proud, refused
 To do his work, or lightly used
 Those gifts, or failed through weak endeavour,

So, mourn cast off by him for ever,—
 As if these leaned in airy ring
 To take me ; this the song they sing.

"Lost, lost ! yet come,
 With our wan troop make thy home.
 Come, come ! for we
 Will not breathe, so much as breathe
 Reproach to thee,
 Knowing what thou sink'st beneath.
 So sank we in those old years,
 We who bid thee, come ! thou last
 Who, living yet, hast life o'erpast.
 And altogether we, thy peers,
 Will pardon crave for thee, the last
 Whose trial is done, whose lot is cast
 With those who watch but work no more,
 Who gaze on life but live no more.
 Yet we trusted thou shouldst speak
 The message which our lips, too weak,

Refused to utter,—shouldst redeem
 Our fault : such trust, and all a dream !
 Yet we chose thee a birthplace
 Where the richness ran to flowers :
 Couldst not sing one song for grace ?
 Not make one blossom man's and ours ?
 Must one more recreant to his race
 Die with unexerted powers,
 And join us, leaving as he found
 The world, he was to loosen, bound ?
 Anguish ! ever and for ever ;
 Still beginning, ending never.
 Yet, lost and last one, come !
 How couldst understand, alas,
 What our pale ghosts strove to say,
 As their shades did glance and pass
 Before thee night and day ?
 Thou wast blind as we were dumb :
 Once more, therefore, come, O come !
 How should we clothe, how arm the spirit
 Shall next thy post of life inherit—
 How guard him from thy speedy ruin ?
 Tell us of thy sad undoing
 Here, where we sit, ever pursuing
 Our weary task, ever renewing
 Sharp sorrow, far from God who gave Our powers, and man they could not save !”

APRILE enters.

Ha, ha ! our king that wouldst be, here at
 last ?
 Art thou the poet who shall save the
 world ?
 Thy hand to mine ! Stay, fix thine eyes on
 mine !
 Thou wouldst be king ? Still fix thine eyes on mine !

Paracelsus. Ha, ha ! why crouchest not ?
 Am I not king ?

So torture is not wholly unavailing !
 Have my fierce spasms compelled thee from thy lair ?

Art thou the sage I only seemed to be,
 Myself of after-time, my very self
 With sight a little clearer, strength more firm,
 Who robes him in my robe and grasps my

For just a fault, a weakness, a neglect ?
 I scarcely trusted God with the surmise
 That such might come, and thou didst hear the while !

Aprile. Thine eyes are lustreless to mine ;
 my hair

Is soft, nay silken soft : to talk with thee
 Flushes my cheek, and thou art ashy-pale.
 Truly, thou hast laboured, hast withstood
 her lips,

The siren's ! Yes, 'tis like thou hast attained !
 Tell me, dear master, wherefore now thou comest ?

I thought thy solemn songs would have their meed

In after-time ; that I should hear the earth
 Exult in thee and echo with thy praise,
 While I was laid forgotten in my grave.

Paracelsus. Ah fiend, I know thee, I am not thy dupe !

Thou art ordained to follow in my track,
 Reaping my sowing, as I scorned to reap
 The harvest sown by sages passed away.
 Thou art the sober searcher, cautious striver,
 As if, except through me, thou hast searched or striven !

Ay, tell the world ! Degrade me after all,
 To an aspirant after fame, not truth—
 To all but envy of thy fate, be sure !

Aprile. Nay, sing them to me ; I shall envy not :

Thou shalt be king ! Sing thou, and I will sit Beside, and call deep silence for thy songs,
 And worship thee, as I had ne'er been meant
 To fill thy throne : but none shall ever know !
 Sing to me ; for already thy wild eyes
 Unlock my heart-strings, as some crystal-shaft
 Reveals by some chance blaze its parent fount
 After long time : so thou reveal'st my soul.
 All will flash forth at last, with thee to hear !

Paracelsus. (His secret ! I shall get his secret—fool !)

I am he that aspired to KNOW : and thou ?

Aprile. I would LOVE infinitely, and be loved !

Paracelsus. Poor slave ! I am thy king indeed.

Aprile.

Thou deem'st

That—born a spirit, dowered even as thou,
 Born for thy fate—because I could not curb
 My yearnings to possess at once the full Enjoyment, but neglected all the means
 Of realizing even the frailest joy,
 Gathering no fragments to appease my want,
 Yet nursing up that want till thus I die—
 Thou deem'st I cannot trace thy safe sure march

O'er perils that o'erwhelm me, triumphing,
 Neglecting nought below for aught above,
 Despising nothing and ensuring all—
 Nor that I could (my time to come again)
 Lead thus my spirit securely as thine own.
 Listen, and thou shalt see I know thee well.
 I would love infinitely . . . Ah, lost ! lost !

Oh ye who armed me at such cost,
 How shall I look on all of ye
 With your gifts even yet on me ?

Paracelsus. (Ah, 'tis some moonstruck creature after all !

Such fond fools as are like to haunt this den :
 They spread contagion, doubtless : yet he seemed

To echo one foreboding of my heart
 So truly, that . . . no matter ! How he stands

With eve's last sunbeam staying on his hair
 Which turns to it as if they were akin :
 And those clear smiling eyes of saddest blue
 Nearly set free, so far they rise above
 The painful fruitless striving of the brow
 And enforced knowledge of the lips, firm-set
 In slow despondency's eternal sigh !
 Has he, too, missed life's end, and learned the cause ?)

I charge thee, by thy fealty, be calm !
 Tell me what thou wouldst be, and what I am.

Aprile. I would love infinitely, and be loved.

First : I would carve in stone, or cast in brass,
 The forms of earth. No ancient hunter lifted
 Up to the gods by his renown, no nymph
 Supposed the sweet soul of a woodland tree
 Or sapphirine spirit of a twilight star,
 Should be too hard for me ; no shepherd-king
 Regal for his white locks ; no youth who stands
 Silent and very calm amid the throng,

His right hand ever hid beneath his robe
 Until the tyrant pass ; no lawgiver,
 No swan-soft woman rubbed with lucid oils
 Given by a god for love of her—too hard !
 Every passion sprung from man, conceived
 by man,

Would I express and clothe it in its right
 form,

Or blend with others struggling in one form,
 Or show repressed by an ungainly form.

Oh, if you marvelled at some mighty spirit
 With a fit frame to execute its will—Even unconsciously to work its will—
 You should be moved no less beside some strong

Rare spirit, fettered to a stubborn body,
 Endeavouring to subdue it and inform it
 With its own splendour ! All this I would do :
 And I would say, this done, " His sprites created,

" God grants to each a sphere to be its world,
 " Appointed with the various objects needed
 " To satisfy its own peculiar want ;
 " So, I create a world for these my shapes
 " Fit to sustain their beauty and their strength."

And, at the word, I would contrive and paint
 Woods, valleys, rocks and plains, dells,
 sands and wastes,

Lakes which, when morn breaks on their quivering bed,

Blaze like a wyvern¹ flying round the sun,
 And ocean isles so small, the dog-fish tracking
 A dead whale, who should find them, would swim thrice

Around them, and fare onward—all to hold
 The offspring of my brain. Nor these alone :
 Bronze labyrinth, palace, pyramid and crypt,
 Baths, galleries, courts, temples and terraces, Marts, theatres and wharfs—all filled with
 men,

Men everywhere ! And this performed in turn,

When those who looked on, pined to hear the hopes

And fears and hates and loves which moved the crowd,

¹ Dragon.

I would throw down the pencil as the chisel, And we shall fade, and leave our task undone.
And I would speak ; no thought which ever We will be wise in time : what though our stirred work

A human breast should be untold ; all Be fashioned in despite of their ill-service, passions, Be crippled every way ? 'Twere little praise

All soft emotions, from the turbulent stir Did full resources wait on our goodwill Within a heart fed with desires like mine, At every turn. Let all be as it is.

Thou didst not gaze like me upon that end Foregoing all the marvels out of reach !

Till thine own powers for compassing the bliss Could I retain one strain of all the psalm

Whence I departed, whither I return,
I would dispart the waves, and stand once more
At home, and load my bark, and hasten back,
And fling my gains to them, worthless or true.
"Friends," I would say, "I went far, far for them,

"Past the high rocks the haunt of doves, the mounds

"Past tracks of milk-white minute blinding

Thus for my higher loves; and thus even weakness

Would win me honour. But not these alone Should claim my care; for common life, its wants

And ways, would I set forth in beauteous hues:

The lowest hind should not possess a hope,

A fear, but I'd be by him, saying better

Than he his own heart's language. I would live

For ever in the thoughts I thus explored,

As a discoverer's memory is attached

To all he finds; they should be mine hence-
forth.

Imbued with me, though free to all before:

For clay, once cast into my soul's rich mine,

Should come up crusted o'er with gems. Nor
this

Would need a meaner spirit, than the first;

Nay, 'twould be but the selfsame spirit, ♦ clothed

In humbler guise, but still the selfsame spirit:

As one spring wind unbinds the mountain snow
And comforts violets in their hermitage.

But, master, poet, who hast done all this,
How didst thou 'scape the ruin whelming me?

Didst thou, when nerving thee to this attempt,
Ne'er range thy mind's extent, as some wide hall,

Dazzled by shapes that filled its length with light,

Shapes clustered there to rule thee, not obey,
That will not wait thy summons, will not rise

Singly, nor when thy practised eye and hand

Can well transfer their loveliness, but crowd

By thee for ever, bright to thy despair?

Didst thou ne'er gaze on each by turns, and ne'er

Resolve to single out one, though the rest

Should vanish, and to give that one, entire

In beauty, to the world; forgetting, so,

Its peers, whose number baffles mortal power?

And, this determined, wast thou ne'er seduced

By memories and regrets and passionate love
To glance once more farewell? and did then

eyes

Fasten thee, brighter and more bright, until

Thou couldst but stagger back unto their feet,

And laugh that man's applause or welfare ever

Could tempt thee to forsake them? Or when years

Had passed and still their love possessed thee wholly,

When from without some murmur startled
thee

Of darkling mortals famished for one ray

Of thy so-hoarded luxury of light,

Didst thou ne'er strive even yet to break those spells

And prove thou couldst recover and fulfil

Thy early mission, long ago renounced,

And to that end, select some shape once more?

And did not mist-like influences, thick films,

Faint memories of the rest that charmed so long

Thine eyes, float fast, confuse thee, bear thee
off,

As whirling snow-drifts blind a man who treads

A mountain ridge, with guiding spear, through storm?

Say, though I fell, I had excuse to fall ;
 Say, I was tempted sorely : say but this,
 Dear lord, Aprile's lord !

Paracelsus. Clasp me not thus,
 Aprile ! That the truth should reach me thus !
 We are weak dust. Nay, clasp not or I faint !

Aprile. My king ! and envious thoughts could outrage thee ?

Lo, I forget my ruin, and rejoice
 In thy success, as thou ! Let our God's praise Go bravely through the world at last ! What care

Through me or thee ? I feel thy breath.
 Why, tears ?

Tears in the darkness, and from thee to me ?
Paracelsus. Love me henceforth, Aprile, while I learn

To love ; and, merciful God, forgive us both !
 We wake at length from weary dreams ; but both

I have slept in fairy-land : though dark and drear
 Appears the world before us, we no less
 Wake with our wrists and ankles jewelled still.
 I too have sought to KNOW as thou to LOVE—
 Excluding love as thou refusedst knowledge.
 Still thou hast beauty and I, power. We wake :

What penance canst devise for both of us ?

Aprile. I hear thee faintly. The thick darkness ! Even

Thine eyes are hid. 'Tis as I knew : I speak,
 And now I die. But I have seen thy face !
 O poet, think of me, and sing of me !

But to have seen thee and to die so soon !

Paracelsus. Die not, Aprile ! We must never part.

Are we not halves of one dissevered world,
 Whom this strange chance unites once more ?
 Part ? never !

Till thou the lover, know ; and I, the knower,
 Love—until both are saved. Aprile, hear !
 We will accept our gains, and use them—
 now !

God, he will die upon my breast ! Aprile !

Aprile. To speak but once, and die ! yet by his side.

Hush ! hush !

Ha ! go you ever girl about

With phantoms, powers ? I have created such,
 But these seem real as I.

Paracelsus. Whom can you see
 Through the accursed darkness ?

Aprile. Stay ; I know,
 I know them : who should know them well as I ?

White brows, lit up with glory ; poets all !

Paracelsus. Let him but live, and I have my reward !

Aprile. Yes ; I see now. God is the perfect poet,

Who in his person acts his own creations.

Had you but told me this at first ! Hush !
 hush !

Paracelsus. Live ! for my sake, because of my great sin,

To help my brain, oppressed by these wild
 words

And their deep import. Live ! 'tis not too late.

I have a quiet home for us, and friends.

Michal shall smile on you. Hear you ?
 I can thus,

And breathe my breath. I shall not lose one word

Of all your speech, one little word, Aprile !

Aprile. No, no. Crown me ? I am not one of you !

'Tis he, the king, you seek. I am not one.

Paracelsus. Thy spirit, at least, Aprile !
 Let me love !

I have attained, and now I may depart.

III.—PARACELSUS.

SCENE.—Basil ; a chamber in the house of
 PARACELSUS. 1526.

PARACELSUS, FESTUS.

Paracelsus. Heap logs and let the blaze laugh out !

Festus. True, true !

'Tis very fit all, time and chance and change
 Have wrought since last we sat thus, face to face

And soul to soul—all cares, far-looking fears,
Vague apprehensions, all vain fancies bred
By your long absence, should be cast away,
Forgotten in this glad un hoped renewal
Of our affections.

Paracelsus. Oh, omit not aught
Which witnesses your own and Michal's own Affection: spare not that! Only forget
The honours and the glories and what not,
It pleases you to tell profusely out.

Festus. Nay, even your honours, in a sense,
I waive:

The wondrous Paracelsus, life's dispenser,
Fate's commissary, idol of the schools
And courts, shall be no more than Aureole
still,

Still Aureole and my friend as when we parted
Some twenty years ago, and I restrained
As best I could the promptings of my spirit
Which secretly advanced you, from the first,
To the pre-eminent rank which, since, your
own

Adventurous ardour, nobly triumphing,
Has won for you.

Paracelsus. Yes, yes. And Michal's
face

Still wears that quiet and peculiar light
Like the dim circlet floating round a pearl?

Festus. Just so.

Paracelsus. And yet her calm sweet countenance,
Though saintly, was not sad; for she would sing

Alone. Does she still sing alone, bird-like,
Not dreaming you are near? Her carols dropt
In flakes through that old leafy bower built under

The sunny wall at Würzburg, from her lattice
Among the trees above, while I, unseen,
Sat conning some rare scroll from Tritheim's shelves

Much wondering notes so simple could divert
My mind from study. Those were happy days.
Respect all such as sing when all alone!

Festus. Scarcely alone: her children, you may guess,
Are wild beside her.

Paracelsus. Ah, those children quite

Unsettle the pure picture in my mind:
A girl, she was so perfect, so distinct:
No change, no change! Not but this added
grace

May blend and harmonize with its compeers,
And Michal may become her motherhood;
But 'tis a change, and I detest all change,
And most a change in aught I loved long since.

So, Michal—you have said she thinks of me?

Festus. O very proud will Michal be of you!
Imagine how we sat, long winter-nights,
Scheming and wondering, shaping your presumed

Adventure, or devising its reward;
Shutting out fear with all the strength of hope.
For it was strange how, even when most secure

In our domestic peace, a certain dim
And flitting shade could sadden all; it seemed
A restlessness of heart, a silent yearning,
A sense of something wanting, incomplete—
Not to be put in words, perhaps avoided
By mute consent—but, said or unsaid, felt
To point to one so loved and so long lost.
And then the hopes rose and shut out the fears—

How you would laugh should I recount them
now!

I still predicted your return at last
With gifts beyond the greatest of them all,
All Tritheim's wondrous troop; did one of which

Attain renown by any chance, I smiled,
As well aware of who would prove his peer.
Michal was sure some woman, long ere this,
As beautiful as you were sage, had loved . . .

Paracelsus. Far-seeing, truly, to discern so much

In the fantastic projects and day-dreams
Of a raw restless boy!

Festus. Oh, no: the sunrise
Well warranted our faith in this full noon!
Can I forget the anxious voice which said
"Festus, have thoughts like these ere shaped themselves

"In other brains than mine? have their possessors

"Existed in like circumstance? were they weak

"As I, or ever constant from the first,

"Despising youth's allurements and rejecting

"As spider-films the shackles I endure?

"Is there hope for me?"—and I answered
gravely

As an acknowledged elder, calmer, wiser,

More gifted mortal. O you must remember,

For all your glorious . . .

Paracelsus. Glorious? ay, this hair,

These hands—nay, touch them, they are mine! Recall

With all the said recallings, times when thus

To lay them by your own ne'er turned you pale

As now. Most glorious, are they not?

Festus. Why—why—

Something must be subtracted from success

So wide, no doubt. He would be scrupulous, truly,

Who should object such drawbacks. Still,
still, Aureole,

You are changed, very changed! 'Twere losing nothing

To look well to it: you must not be stolen

From the enjoyment of your well-won meed.

Paracelsus. My friend! you seek my pleasure, past a doubt:

You will best gain your point, by talking, not
Of me, but of yourself.

Festus. Have I not said

All touching Michal and my children? Sure;

You know, by this, full well how Aennchen looks

Gravely, while one disparts her thick brown
hair;

And Aureole's glee when some stray gannet builds

Amid the hith-trees by the lake. Small hope

Have I that he will honour (the wild imp)

His namesake. Sigh not! 'tis too much to ask

That all we love should reach the same proud fate.

But you are very kind to humour me

By showing interest in my quiet life;

You, who of old could never tame yourself

To tranquil pleasures, must at heart despise . . .

Paracelsus. Festus, strange secrets are let out by death

Who blabs so oft the follies of this world:

And I am death's familiar, as you know.

I helped a man to die, some few weeks since,

Warped even from his go-cart to one end—

The living on princes' smiles, reflected from

A mighty herd of favourites. No mean trick

He left untried, and truly well-nigh wormed

All traces of God's finger out of him:

Then died, grown old. And just an hour
before,

Having lain long with blank and soulless eyes,

He sat up suddenly, and with natural voice

Said that in spite of thick air and closed doors

God told him it was June; and he knew well,

Without such telling, harebells grew in June;

And all that kings could ever give or take

Would not be precious as those blooms to him.

Just so, allowing I am passing sage,

It seems to me much worthier argument

Why pansies,¹ eyes that laugh, bear beauty's prize

From violets, eyes that dream—(your Michal's choice)—

Than all fools find to wonder at in me

Or in my fortunes. And be very sure

I say this from no prurient restlessness,

No self-complacency, itching to turn,

Vary and view its pleasure from all points,

And, in this instance, willing other men

May be at pains, demonstrate to itself

The realness of the very joy it tastes.

What should delight me like the news of
friends

Whose memories were a solace to me oft,

As mountain-baths to wild fowls in their flight?

Other than you had wasted thought on me

Had you been wise, and rightly valued bliss.

But there's no taming nor repressing hearts:

God knows I need such!—So, you heard me
speak?

Festus. Speak? when?

Paracelsus. When but this morning at my class?

tum familiaris.—DORN.

There was noise and crowd enough. I saw you not.

Surely you know I am engaged to fill
The chair here?—that 'tis part of my proud fate

To lecture to as many thick-skulled youths
As please, each day, to throng the theatre,
To my great reputation, and no small
Danger of Basil's benches long unused
To crack beneath such honour?

Festus. I was there ;
I mingled with the throng : shall I avow
Small care was mine to listen ?—too intent
On gathering from the murmurs of the crowd
A full corroboration of my hopes !

What can I learn about your powers ? but they

Know, care for nought beyond your actual state,

Your actual value ; yet they worship you,
Those various natures whom you sway as one !
But ere I go, be sure I shall attend . . .

Paracelsus. Stop, o' God's name : the thing's by no means yet

Past remedy ! Shall I read this morning's labour

—At least in substance ? Nought so worth the gaining

As an apt scholar ! Thus then, with all due Precision and emphasis—you, beside, are clearly

Guiltless of understanding more, a whit,
The subject than your stool—allowed to be
A notable advantage.

Festus. Surely, Aureole,
You laugh at me !

Paracelsus. I laugh ? Ha, ha ! thank
heaven,

I charge you, if 't be so ! for I forget
Much, and what laughter should be like.

No less,
However, I forego that luxury
Since it alarms the friend who brings it back.
True, laughter like my own must echo strangely

To thinking men ; a smile were better far ;
So, make me smile ! If the exulting look
You wore but now be smiling, 'tis so long

Since I have smiled ! Alas, such smiles are born

Alone of hearts like yours, or herdsmen's souls

Of ancient time, whose eyes, calm as their flocks,

Saw in the stars mere garnishry of heaven,
And in the earth a stage for altars only.

Never change, Festus : I say, never change !

Festus. My God, if he be wretched after all !

Paracelsus. When last we parted, Festus,
you declared,

—Or Michal, yes, her soft lips whispered
words

I have preserved. She told me she believed
I should succeed (meaning, that in the search
I then engaged in, I should meet success)
And yet be wretched : now, she augured false.

Festus. Thank heaven ! but you spoke strangely : could I venture

To think bare apprehension lest your friend, Dazzled by your resplendent course, might find

Henceforth less sweetness in his own, could move

Such earnest mood in you ? Fear not, dear
friend,

That I shall leave you, inwardly repining
Your lot was not my own !

Paracelsus. And this for ever !
For ever ! gull who may, they will be gulled !
They will not look nor think ; 'tis nothing new

In them : but surely he is not of them !
My Festus, do you know, I reckoned, you—Though all beside were sand-blind—you, my
friend,

Would look at me, once close, with piercing
eye

Untroubled by the false glare that confounds
A weaker vision : would remain serene,
Though singular amid a gaping throng.

I feared you, or I had come, sure, long ere
this,

To Einsiedeln. Well, error has no end,
And Rhasis is a sage, and Basil boasts
A tribe of wits, and I am wise and blest

Past all dispute ! 'Tis vain to fret at it.
 I have vowed long ago my worshippers
 Shall owe to their own deep sagacity
 All further information, good or bad.
 Small risk indeed my reputation runs,
 Unless perchance the glance now searching
 me

Be fixed much longer ; for it seems to spell
 Dimly the characters a simpler man Might read distinct enough. Old Eastern books

Say, the fallen prince of morning some short space

Remained unchanged in semblance ; nay, his
 brow

Was hued with triumph : every spirit then Praising, his heart on flame the while :—a tale !

Well, Festus, what discover you, I pray ?

Festus. Some foul deed sullies then a life which else

Were raised supreme ?

Paracelsus. Good : I do well, most well !
 Why strive to make men hear, feel, fret
 themselves

With what is past their power to comprehend ?
 I should not strive now : only, having nursed
 The faint surmise that one yet walked the earth,

One, at least, not the utter fool of show,
 Not absolutely formed to be the dupe
 Of shallow plausibilities alone :

One who, in youth, found wise enough to choose

The happiness his riper years approve,
 Was yet so anxious for another's sake,
 That, ere his friend could rush upon a mad
 And ruinous course, the converse of his own,
 His gentle spirit essayed, prejudged for him
 The perilous path, foresaw its destiny,
 And warned the weak one in such tender
 words,

Such accents—his whole heart in every tone—

That oft their memory comforted that friend
 When it by right should have increased despair :

—Having believed, I say, that this one man

Could never lose the light thus from the first
 His portion—how should I refuse to grieve
 At even my gain if it disturb our old
 Relation, if it make me out more wise ?
 Therefore, once more reminding him how
 well

He prophesied, I note the single flaw
 That spoils his prophet's title. In plain
 words,

You were deceived, and thus were you deceived—

I have not been successful, and yet am
 Most miserable ; 'tis said at last ; nor you
 Give credit, lest you force me to concede
 That common sense yet lives upon the world !

Festus. You surely do not mean to banter
 me ?

Paracelsus. You know, or—if you have been wise enough

To cleanse your memory of such matters—
 knew,

As far as words of mine could make it clear,
 That 'twas my purpose to find joy or grief
 Solely in the fulfilment of my plan
 Or plot or whatso'er it was ; rejoicing
 Alone as it proceeded prosperously,
 Sorrowing then only when mischance re-tardad

Its progress. That was in those Würzburg days !

Not to prolong a theme I thoroughly hate,
 I have pursued this plan with all my strength ;
 And having failed therein most signally,
 Cannot object to ruin utter and drear
 As all-excelling would have been the prize
 Had fortune favoured me. I scarce have right
 To vex your frank good spirit late so glad
 In my supposed prosperity, I know,
 And, were I lucky in a glut of friends,
 Would well agree to let your error live,
 Nay, strengthen it with fables of success.
 But mine is no condition to refuse

The transient solace of so rare a godsend,
 My solitary luxury, my one friend :

Accordingly I venture to put off
 The wearisome vest of falsehood galling me,
 Secure when he is by. I lay me bare,
 Prone at his mercy—but he is my friend !

Not that he needs retain his aspect grave ;
That answers not my purpose ; for 'tis like,
Some sunny morning—Basil being drained
Of its wise population, every corner
Of the amphitheatre crammed with learned clerks,

Here Cœlompadius, looking worlds of wit,
Here Castellanus, as profound as he,
Munsterus here, Frobenius there, all squeezed
And staring,—that the zany of the show,
Even Paracelsus, shall put off before them
His trappings with a grace but seldom judged
Expedient in such cases :—the grim smile
That will go round ! Is it not therefore best
To venture a rehearsal like the present
In a small way ? Where are the signs I seek,
The first-fruits and fair sample of the scorn
Due to all quacks ? Why, this will never do !

Festus. These are foul vapours, Aureole ;
nought beside !

The effect of watching, study, weariness.
Were there a spark of truth in the confusion
Of these wild words, you would not outrage
thus

Your youth's companion. I shall ne'er regard These wanderings, bred of faintness and much study.

'Tis not thus you would trust a trouble to me,
To Michal's friend.

Paracelsus. I have said it, dearest
Festus !

For the manner, 'tis ungracious probably ;
You may have it told in broken sobs, one day,
And scalding tears, ere long : but I thought best

To keep that off as long as possible.
Do you wonder still ?

Festus. No ; it must oft fall out
That one whose labour perfects any work,
Shall rise from it with eye so worn that he
Of all men least can measure the extent
Of what he has accomplished. He alone
Who, nothing tasked, is nothing weary too,
May clearly scan the little he effects :
But we, the bystanders, untouched by toil,
Estimate each aright.

Paracelsus. This worthy Festus

Is one of them, at last ! 'Tis so with all !
First, they set down all progress as a dream ;
And next, when he whose quick discomfiture
Was counted on, accomplishes some few
And doubtful steps in his career,—behold,
They look for every inch of ground to vanish
Beneath his tread, so sure they spy success !
Festus. Few doubtful steps ? when death retires before

Your presence—when the noblest of mankind,

Broken in body or subdued in soul,
May through your skill renew their vigour,
raise

The shattered frame to pristine stateliness ?
When men in racking pain may purchase
dreams

Of what delights them most, swooning at
once

Into a sea of bliss or rapt along
As in a flying sphere of turbulent light ?
When we may look to you as one ordained
To free the flesh from fell disease, as frees
Our Luther's burning tongue the fettered
soul ?

When . . .

Paracelsus. When and where, the devil, did you get

This notable news ?

Festus. Even from the common voice ;
From those whose envy, daring not dispute
The wonders it decries, attributes them
To magic and such folly.

Paracelsus. Folly ? Why not To magic, pray ? You find a comfort doubtless

In holding, God ne'er troubles him about
Us or our doings : once we were judged worth
The devil's tempting . . . I offend : forgive
me,

And rest content. Your prophecy on the whole

Was fair enough as prophesyings go ;
At fault a little in detail, but quite Precise enough in the main ; and hereupon
I pay due homage : you guessed long ago
(The prophet !) I should fail—and I have failed.

Festus. You mean to tell me, then, the hopes which fed
Your youth have not been realized as yet
Some obstacle has barred them hitherto?
Or that their innate . . .

Paracelsus. As I said but now,
You have a very decent prophet's fame,
So you but shun details here. Little matter Whether those hopes were mad,—the aims they sought,
Safe and secure from all ambitious fools;
Or whether my weak wits are overcome
By what a better spirit would scorn: I fail.
And now methinks 'twere best to change a theme

I am a sad fool to have stumbled on.
I say confusedly what comes uppermost;
But there are times when patience proves at fault,
As now: this morning's strange encounter—
you

Beside me once again! you, whom I guessed
Alive, since hitherto (with Luther's leave)
No friend have I among the saints at peace,
To judge by any good their prayers' effect.
I knew you would have helped me—why not
he,

My strange competitor in enterprise,
Bound for the same end by another path,
Arrived, or ill or well, before the time,
At our disastrous journey's doubtful close?
How goes it with Aprile? Ah, they miss
Your lone sad sunny idleness of heaven,
Our martyrs for the world's sake; heaven
shuts fast:

The poor mad poet is howling by this time!
Since you are my sole friend then, here or
there,

I could not quite repress the varied feelings
This meeting wakens; they have had their vent,
And now forget them. Do the rear-mice still Hang like a fretwork on the gate (or what
In my time was a gate) fronting the road
From Einsiedeln to Lachen?

Festus. Trifle not:
Answer me, for my sake alone! You smiled
Just now, when I supposed some deed, unworthy

Yourself, might blot the else so bright result;
Yet if your motives have continued pure,
Your will unfaltering, and in spite of this,
You have experienced a defeat, why then
I say not you would cheerfully withdraw From contest—mortal hearts are not so fashioned—

But surely you would ne'ertheless withdraw.
You sought not fame nor gain nor even love,
No end distinct from knowledge,—I repeat
Your very words: once satisfied that knowledge

Is a mere dream, you would announce as
much,

Yourself the first. But how is the event?
You are defeated—and I find you here!

Paracelsus. As though "here" did not signify defeat!

I spoke not of my little labours here,
But of the break-down of my general aims:
For you, aware of their extent and scope,
To look on these sage lecturings, approved
By beardless boys, and bearded dotards worse,
As a fit consummation of such aims,
Is worthy notice. A professorship
At Basil! Since you see so much in it,
And think my life was reasonably drained
Of life's delights: to render me a match
For duties arduous as such post demands,—
Be it far from me to deny my power
To fill the petty circle lotted out
Of infinite space, or justify the host
Of honours thence accruing. So, take notice,
This jewel dangling from my neck preserves
The features of a prince, my skill restored
To plague his people some few years to come:
And all through a pure whim. He had cased
the earth

For me, but that the droll despair which seized
The vermin of his household, tickled me.
I came to see. Here, driven the physician,
Whose most infallible nostrum was at fault;
There quaked the astrologer, whose horoscope
Had promised him interminable years;
Here a monk fumbled at the sick man's mouth
With some undoubted relic—a sudary¹

¹ Napkin.

Of the Virgin ; while another piebald knave
Of the same brotherhood (he loved them ever)
Was actively preparing 'neath his nose
Such a suffumigation as, once fired,
Had stunk the patient dead ere he could groan.
I cursed the doctor and upset the brother,
Brushed past the conjurer, vowed that the first gust

Of stench from the ingredients just alight
Would raise a cross-grained devil in my sword,
Not easily laid : and ere an hour the prince
Slept as he never slept since prince he was.
A day—and I was posting for my life,
Placarded through the town as one whose spite
Had near availed to stop the blessed effects
Of the doctor's nostrum which, well seconded
By the sudary, and most by the costly smoke
Not leaving out the strenuous prayers sent up Hard by in the abbey—raised the prince to
life :

To the great reputation of the seer
Who, confident, expected all along
The glad event—the doctor's recompense—
Much largess from his highness to the monks—
And the vast solace of his loving people,
Whose general satisfaction to increase,
The prince was pleased no longer to defer
The burning of some dozen heretics
Remanded till God's mercy should be shown Touching his sickness : last of all were joined Ample directions to all loyal folk
To swell the complement by seizing me
Who—doubtless some rank sorcerer—endeavoured

To thwart these pious offices, obstruct
The prince's cure, and frustrate heaven by help
Of certain devils dwelling in his sword.
By luck, the prince in his first fit of thanks
Had forced this bauble on me as an earnest
Of further favours. This one case may serve
To give sufficient taste of many such,
So, let them pass. Those shelves support a pile

Of patents, licences, diplomas, titles
From Germany, France, Spain, and Italy ;
They authorize some honour ; ne'ertheless,
I set more store by this Erasmus sent ;
He trusts me ; our Frobenius is his friend,

And him "I raised" (nay, read it) "from the dead."

I weary you, I see. I merely sought
To show, there's no great wonder after all
That, while I fill the class-room and attract
A crowd to Basil, I get leave to stay,
And therefore need not scruple to accept
The utmost they can offer, if I please :
For 'tis but right the world should be prepared
To treat with favour c'en fantastic wants
Of one like me, used up in serving her.
Just as the mortal, whom the gods in part
Devoured, received in place of his lost limb
Some virtue or other—cured disease, I think ;
You mind the fables we have read together.

Festus. You do not think I comprehend a word.

The time was, Aureole, you were apt enough
To clothe the airiest thoughts in specious
breath ;

But surely you must feel how vague and strange
These speeches sound.

Paracelsus. Well, then : you know my hopes ;

I am assured, at length, those hopes were vain ;
That truth is just as far from me as ever ;
That I have thrown my life away ; that sorrow
On that account is idle, and further effort
To mend and patch what's marred beyond repairing,

As useless : and all this was taught your friend
By the convincing good old-fashioned method
Of force—by sheer compulsion. Is that plain?

Festus. Dear Aureole, can it be my fears were just ?

God will not . . .

Paracelsus. Now, 'tis this I most admire—

The constant talk men of your stamp keep up
Of God's will, as they style it ; one would swear
Man had but merely to uplift his eye,
And see the will in question characterized On the heaven's vault. 'Tis hardly wise to moot

Such topics : doubts are many and faith is weak.
I know as much of any will of God
As knows some dumb and tortured brute
what Man,

It is stern lord, wills from the perplexing blows 'Tis well : and your reward, or soon or late,
That plague him every way ; but there, of Will come from him whom no man serves in course, vain.

Where least he suffers, longest he remains—
My case ; and for such reasons I plod on,
Subdued but not convinced. I know as little Why I deserve to fail, as why I hoped Better things in my youth. I simply know
I am no master here, but trained and beaten
Into the path I tread ; and here I stay,
Until some further intimation reach me,
Like an obedient drudge. Though I prefer
To view the whole thing as a task imposed Which, whether dull or pleasant, must be done —

Yet, I deny not, there is made provision
Of joys which tastes less jaded might affect ;
Nay, some which please me too, for all my pride—

Pleasures that once were pains : the iron ring
Festering about a slave's neck grows at length
Into the flesh it cuts. I hate no longer
A host of petty vile delights, undreamed of
Or spurned before ; such now supply the place
Of my dead aims : as in the autumn woods
Where tall trees used to flourish, from their roots

Springs up a fungous brood sickly and pale,
Chill mushrooms coloured like a corpse's cheek.

Festus. If I interpret well your words, I
own

It troubles me but little that your aims,
Vast in their dawning and most likely grown
Extravagantly since, have baffled you.
Perchance I am glad ; you merit greater
praise ;

Because they are too glorious to be gained,
You do not blindly cling to them and die ;
You fell, but have not sullenly refused
To rise, because an angel worsted you
In wrestling, though the world holds not your peer,

And though too harsh and sudden is the
change

To yield content as yet, still you pursue
The ungracious path as though 'twere rosy-strewn.

Paracelsus. Ah, very fine ! For my part,
I conceive

The very pausing from all further toil,
Which you find heinous, would become a seal
To the sincerity of all my deeds.

To be consistent I should die at once ;

I calculated on no after-life ;

Yet (how crept in, how fostered, I know not)

Here am I with as passionate regret

For youth and health and love so vainly lavished,

As if their preservation had been first

And foremost in my thoughts ; and this strange fact

Humbled me wondrously, and had due force
In rendering me the less averse to follow

A certain counsel, a mysterious warning—

You will not understand—but 'twas a man

With aims not mine and yet pursued likemine,

With the same fervour and no more success,

Perishing in my sight ; who summoned me

As I would shun the ghastly fate I saw,

To serve my race at once ; to wait no longer

That God should interfere in my behalf,

But to distrust myself, put pride away,

And give my gains, imperfect as they were,

To men. I have not leisure to explain

How, since, a singular series of events

Has raised me to the station you behold,

Wherein I seem to turn to most account

The mere wreck of the past,—perhaps receive

Some feeble glimmering token that God views

And may approve my penance : therefore here

You find me, doing most good or least harm.

And if folks wonder much and profit little

'Tis not my fault ; only, I shall rejoice

When my part in the farce is shuffled through,

And the curtain falls : I must hold out till then.

Festus. Till when, dear Aureole ?

Paracelsus.

Till I'm fairly thrust
From my proud eminence. Fortune is fickle

And even professors fall : should that arrive,

I see no sin in ceding to my bent.

You little fancy what rude shocks apprise us

We sin ; God's intimations rather fall

In clearness than in energy : 'twere well
Did they but indicate the course to take
Like that to be forsaken. I would fain
Be spared a further sample. Here I stand,
And here I stay, be sure, till forced to flit.

Festus. Be you but firm on that head !
long ere then

All I expect will come to pass, I trust :
The cloud that wraps you will have disappeared.

Meantime, I see small chance of such event :
They praise you here as one whose lore, already

Divulged, eclipses all the past can show,
But whose achievements, marvellous as they
be,

Are faint anticipations of a glory
About to be revealed. When Basil's crowds
Dismiss their teacher, I shall be content
That he depart.

Paracelsus. This favour at their hands
I look for earlier than your view of things Would warrant. Of the crowd you saw today,

Remove the full half sheer amazement draws,
Mere novelty, nought else ; and next, the tribe
Whose innate blockish dulness just perceives
That unless miracles (as seem my works)
Be wrought in their behalf, their chance is slight

To puzzle the devil ; next, the numerous set
Who bitterly hate established schools, and help
The teacher that oppugns them, till he once
Have planted his own doctrine, when the teacher

May reckon on their rancour in his turn ;
Take, too, the sprinkling of sagacious knaves
Whose cunning runs not counter to the vogue
But seeks, by flattery and crafty nursing,
To force my system to a premature
Short-lived development. Why swell the list?
Each has his end to serve, and his best way
Of serving it : remove all these, remains
A scantling, a poor dozen at the best,
Worthy to look for sympathy and service,
And likely to draw profit from my pains.

Festus. 'Tis no encouraging picture : still these few

Redeem their fellows. Once the germ implanted,
Its growth, if slow, is sure.

Paracelsus. God grant it so !

I would make some amends : but if I fail,
The luckless rogues have this excuse to urge,
That much is in my method and my manner,
My uncouth habits, my impatient spirit,
Which hinders of reception and result
My doctrine : much to say, small skill to
speak !

These old aims suffered not a looking-off
Though for an instant ; therefore, only when
I thus renounced them and resolved to reap
Some present fruit—to teach mankind some
truth

So dearly purchased—only then I found
Such teaching was an art requiring cares
And qualities peculiar to itself :
That to possess was one thing—to display
Another. With renown first in my thoughts,
Or popular praise, I had soon discovered it :
One grows but little apt to learn these things.

Festus. If it be so, which nowise I believe,
There needs no waiting fuller dispensation
To leave a labour of so little use.

Why not throw up the irksome charge at
once ?

Paracelsus. A task, a task !

But wherefore hide the whole
Extent of degradation, once engaged
In the confessing vein ? Despite of all
My fine talk of obedience and repugnance,
Docility and what not, 'tis yet to learn
If when the task shall really be performed,
My inclination free to choose once more,
I shall do aught but slightly modify
The nature of the hated task I quit.
In plain words, I am spoiled ; my life still tends

As first it tended ; I am broken and trained
To my old habits : they are part of me.
I know, and none so well, my darling ends
Are proved impossible : no less, no less,
Even now what humours me, fond fool, as
when

Their faint ghosts sit with me and flatter me
And send me back content to my dull round ?

How can I change this soul?—this apparatus
 Constructed solely for their purposes,
 So well adapted to their every want,
 To search out and discover, prove and perfect;
 This intricate machine whose most minute
 And meanest motions have their charm to me
 Though to none else—an aptitude I seize,
 An object I perceive, a use, a meaning,
 A property, a fitness, I explain
 And I alone :—how can I change my soul?
 And this wronged body, worthless save when tasked

Under that soul's dominion—used to care
 For its bright master's cares and quite subdued
 Its proper cravings—not to ail nor pine
 So he but prosper—whither drag this poor Tried patient body? (God! how I essayed
 To live like that mad poet, for a while,
 To love alone; and how I felt too warped
 And twisted and deformed! What should I do,

Even tho' released from drudgery, but return
 Faint, as you see, and halting, blind and sore,
 To my old life and die as I began?
 I cannot feed on beauty for the sake
 Of beauty only, nor can drink in balm
 From lovely objects for their loveliness;
 My nature cannot lose her first imprint;
 I still must hoard and heap and class all truths
 With one ulterior purpose: I must know!
 Would God translate me to his throne, believe
 That I should only listen to his word
 To further my own aim! For other men,
 Beauty is prodigally strewn around,
 And I were happy could I quench as they
 This mad and thriveless longing, and content me

With beauty for itself alone: alas,
 I have addressed a frock of heavy mail
 Yet may not join the troop of sacred knights;
 And now the forest-creatures fly from me,
 The grass-banks cool, the sunbeams warm
 no more.

Best follow, dreaming that ere night arrive,
 I shall o'ertake the company and ride
 Glittering as they!

Festus. I think I apprehend
 What you would say: if you, in truth, design

To enter once more on the life thus left,
 Seek not to hide that all this consciousness
 Of failure is assumed!

Paracelsus. My friend, my friend,
 I toil, you listen; I explain, perhaps
 You understand: there our communion ends.
 Have you learnt nothing from to-day's discourse?

When we would thoroughly know the sick man's state

We feel awhile the fluttering pulse, press soft
 The hot brow, look upon the languid eye,
 And thence divine the rest. Must I lay bare
 My heart, hideous and beating, or tear up
 My vitals for your gaze, ere you will deem Enough made known? You! who are you,
 forsooth?

That is the crowning operation claimed
 By the arch-demonstrator—heaven the hall,
 And earth the audience. Let Aprile and you Secure good places: 'twill be worth the while.

Festus. Are you mad, Aureole? What can I have said

To call for this? I judged from your own
 words.

Paracelsus. Oh, doubtless! A sick wretch describes the ape

That mocks him from the bed-foot, and all gravely

You thither turn at once: or he recounts
 The perilous journey he has late performed,
 And you are puzzled much how that could be!
 You find me here, half stupid and half
 mad:

It makes no part of my delight to search
 Into these matters, much less undergo Another's scrutiny; but so it chances
 That I am led to trust my state to you:
 And the event is, you combine, contrast
 And ponder on my foolish words as though
 They thoroughly conveyed all hidden here—
 Here, loathsome with despair and hate and rage!

Is there no fear, no shrinking and no shame?
 Will you guess nothing? will you spare me
 nothing?

Must I go deeper? Ay or no?

Festus.

Dear friend . . . I had immortal feelings ; such shall never Paracelsus. True : I am brutal — 'tis a Be wholly quenched : no, no !

part of it ;

My friend, you wear

The plague's sign—you are not a lazar-haunter,
How should you know? Well then, you think it strange

A melancholy face, and certain 'tis
There's little cheer in all this dismal work.

I should profess to have failed utterly,
And yet propose an ultimate return
To courses void of hope : and this, because
You know not what temptation is, nor how
'Tis like to ply men in the sickliest part.

But was it my desire to set abroad
Such memories and forebodings? I foresaw Where they would drive. 'Twere better we discuss

You are to understand that we who make
Sport for the gods, are hunted to the end :
There is not one sharp volley shot at us,
Which 'scaped with life, though hurt, we slacken pace

News from Lucerne or Zurich ; ask and tell
Of Egypt's flaring sky or Spain's cork-groves.

And gather by the wayside herbs and roots
To staunch our wounds, secure from further harm :

Festus. I have thought : trust me, this mood will pass away !

We are assailed to life's extremest verge.

I know you and the lofty spirit you bear,
And easily ravel out a clue to all.

It will be well indeed if I return,

These are the trials meet for such as you,
Nor must you hope exemption : to be mortal
Is to be plied with trials manifold.

A harmless busy fool, to my old ways !

Look round ! The obstacles which kept the rest

I would forget hints of another fate,
Significant enough, which silent hours
Have lately scared me with.

From your ambition, have been spurned by
you ;

Festus.

Another ! and what ?

Their fears, their doubts, the chains that bind them all,

Paracelsus. After all, Festus, you say well :

Were flax before your resolute soul, which nought

I am

Avails to awe save these delusions bred
From its own strength, its selfsame strength disguised,

A man yet : I need never humble me.

Mocking itself. Be brave, dear Aureole !
Since

I would have been—something, I know not what ;

The rabbit has his shade to frighten him,
The fawn a rustling bough, mortals their cares,

But though I cannot soar, I do not crawl.

And higher natures yet would slight and laugh
At these entangling fantasies, as you

There are worse portions than this one of
mine.

At trammels of a weaker intellect,— Measure your mind's height by the shade it casts !

You say well !

Festus.

Ah !

I know you.

Paracelsus. And deeper degradation !

Paracelsus. And I know you, dearest
Festus !

If the mean stimulants of vulgar praise,
If vanity should become the chosen food
Of a sunk mind, should stifle even the wish
To find its early aspirations true,
Should teach it to breathe falsehood like life-breath—

And how you love unworthily ; and how
All admiration renders blind.

An atmosphere of craft and trick and lies ;

Festus. You hold

Should make it proud to emulate, surpass
Base natures in the practices which woke
Its most indignant loathing once . . . No, no !
Utter damnation is reserved for hell !

That admiration blinds ?

Paracelsus. Ay and alas !

Festus. Nought blinds you less than admiration, friend !

Whether it be that all love renders wise
In its degree ; from love which blends with
love—

Heart answering heart—to love which spends itself

In silent mad idolatry of some
Pre-eminent mortal, some great soul of souls,
Which ne'er will know how well it is adored.
I say, such love is never blind ; but rather Alive to every the minutest spot
Which mars its object, and which hate (supposed

So vigilant and searching) dreams not of.
Love broods on such : what then ? When first perceived

Is there no sweet strife to forget, to change,
To overflush those blemishes with all
The glow of general goodness they disturb ?
—To make those very defects an endless
source

Of new affection grown from hopes and fears ?
And, when all fails, is there no gallant stand
Made even for much proved weak ? no shrinking-back

Lest, since all love assimilates the soul
To what it loves, it should at length become Almost a rival of its idol ? Trust me,
If there be fiends who seek to work our hurt,
To ruin and drag down earth's mightiest spirits

Even at God's foot, 'twill be from such as
love,

Their zeal will gather most to serve their
cause ;

And least from those who hate, who most essay

By contumely and scorn to blot the light
Which forces entrance even to their hearts :
For thence will our defender tear the veil
And show within each heart, as in a shrine,
The giant image of perfection, grown
In hate's despite, whose calumnies were spawned

In the untroubled presence of its eyes.
True admiration blinds not ; nor am I
So blind. I call your sin exceptional ;
It springs from one whose life has passed the bounds

Prescribed to life. Compound that fault with God !

I speak of men ; to common men like me
The weakness you reveal endears you more,
Like the far traces of decay in suns.
I bid you have good cheer !

Paracelsus. Preclare ! Optime !

Think of a quiet mountain-cloistered priest
Instructing Paracelsus ! yet 'tis so.
Come, I will show you where my merit lies.
'Tis in the advance of individual minds
That the slow crowd should ground their expectation

Eventually to follow ; as the sea
Waits ages in its bed till some one wave
Out of the multitudinous mass, extends
The empire of the whole, some feet perhaps,
Over the strip of sand which could confine
Its fellows so long time : thenceforth the rest,
Even to the meanest, hurry in at once,
And so much is clear gained. I shall be glad
If all my labours, failing of aught else,
Suffice to make such inroad and procure
A wider range for thought : nay, they do
this ;

For, whatsoever my notions of true knowledge
And a legitimate success, may be,
I am not blind to my undoubted rank
When classed with others : I precede my age :
And whoso wills is very free to mount
These labours as a platform whence his own
May have a prosperous outset. But, alas !
My followers—they are noisy as you heard ;
But, for intelligence, the best of them
So clumsily wield the weapons I supply
And they extol, that I begin to doubt Whether their own rude clubs and pebble-stones

Would not do better service than my arms
Thus vilely swayed—if error will not fall
Sooner before the old awkward batterings
Than my more subtle warfare, not half learned.

Festus. I would supply that art, then, or withhold

New arms until you teach their mystery.

Paracelsus. Content you, 'tis my wish ; I have recourse

To the simplest training. Day by day I seek
To wake the mood, the spirit which alone
Can make those arms of any use to men.
Of course they are for swaggering forth at once
Graced with Ulysses' bow, Achilles' shield—
Flash on us, all in armour, thou Achilles!
Make our hearts dance to thy resounding step!
A proper sight to scare the crows away!

Festus. Pity you choose not then some other method

Of coming at your point. The marvellous art
At length established in the world bids fair
To remedy all hindrances like these:
Trust to Frobenius' press the precious lore
Obscured by uncouth manner, or unfit
For raw beginners; let his types secure
A deathless monument to after-time;
Meanwhile wait confidently and enjoy
The ultimate effect: sooner or later
You shall be all-revealed.

Paracelsus. The old dull question
In a new form; no more. Thus: I possess
Two sorts of knowledge; one, — vast,
shadowy,

Hints of the unbounded aim I once pursued:
The other consists of many secrets, caught
While bent on nobler prize,—perhaps a few
Prime principles which may conduct to much:
These last I offer to my followers here.
Now, bid me chronicle the first of these,
My ancient study, and in effect you bid
Revert to the wild courses just abjured:
I must go find them scattered through the
world.

Then, for the principles, they are so simple (Being chiefly of the overturning sort),
That one time is as proper to propound them
As any other—to-morrow at my class,
Or half a century hence embalmed in print.
For if mankind intend to learn at all,
They must begin by giving faith to them
And acting on them: and I do not see
But that my lectures serve indifferent well:
No doubt these dogmas fall not to the earth,
For all their novelty and rugged setting.
I think my class will not forget the day
I let them know the gods of Israel,
Ætius, Oribasius, Galen, Rhasis,

VOL. I.

Serapion, Avicenna, Averröes,
Were blocks!

Festus. And that reminds me, I heard something

About your waywardness: you burned their
books,

It seems, instead of answering those sages.

Paracelsus. And who said that?

Festus. Some I met yesternight With Æcolampadius. As you know, the purpose

Of this short stay at Basil was to learn
His pleasure touching certain missives sent
For our Zuinglius and himself. 'Twas he Apprised me that the famous teacher here
Was my old friend.

Paracelsus. Ah, I forgot: you went . . .

Festus. From Zurich with advices for the ear
Of Luther, now at Wittenberg—(you know,
I make no doubt, the differences of late
With Carolostadius)—and returning sought
Basil and . . .

Paracelsus. I remember. Here's a case,
now,

Will teach you why I answer not, but burn
The books you mention. Pray, does Luther dream

His arguments convince by their own force
The crowds that own his doctrine? No,
indeed!

His plain denial of established points
Ages had sanctified and men supposed Could never be oppugned while earth was under

And heaven above them—points which chance or time

Affected not—did more than the array
Of argument which followed. Boldly deny!
There is much breath-stopping, hair-stiffening
Awhile; then, amazed glances, mute awaiting The thunderbolt which does not come; and next,

Reproachful wonder and inquiry: those
Who else had never stirred, are able now
To find the rest out for themselves, perhaps
To outstrip him who set the whole at work,
—As never will my wise class its instructor.
And you saw Luther?

Festus. 'Tis a wondrous soul !
Paracelsus. True : the so - heavy chain which galled mankind
 Is shattered, and the noblest of us all
 Must bow to the deliverer—nay, the worker
 Of our own project—we who long before
 Had burst our trammels, but forgot the crowd,
 We should have taught, still groaned beneath their load :
 This he has done and nobly. Speed that may !
 Whatever be my chance or my mischance,
 What benefits mankind must glad me too ;
 And men seem made, though not as I believed,
 For something better than the times produce.
 Witness these gangs of peasants your new lights
 From Suabia have possessed, whom Mün-zer leads,
 And whom the duke, the landgrave and the elector
 Will calm in blood ! Well, well ; 'tis not my world !
Festus. Hark !
Paracelsus. 'Tis the melancholy wind
 astir
 Within the trees ; the embers too are grey :
 Morn must be near.
Festus. Best ope the casement : see,
 The night, late strewn with clouds and flying stars,
 Is blank and motionless : how peaceful sleep
 The tree-tops altogether ! Like an asp,
 The wind slips whispering from bough to bough.
Paracelsus. Ay ; you would gaze on a wind-shaken tree
 By the hour, nor count time lost.
Festus. So you shall gaze :
 Those happy times will come again.
Paracelsus. Gone, gone,
 Those pleasant times ! Does not the moaning wind
 Seem to bewail that we have gained such gains
 And bartered sleep for them ?
Festus. It is our trust
 That there is yet another world to mend
 All error and mischance.

Paracelsus. Another world !
 And why this world, this common world, to be
 A make-shift, a mere foil, how fair soever,
 To some fine life to come ? Man must be fed
 With angels' food, forsooth ; and some few traces
 Of a diviner nature which look out
 Through his corporeal baseness, warrant
 him
 In a supreme contempt of all provision
 For his inferior tastes—some straggling marks
 Which constitute his essence, just as truly
 As here and there a gem would constitute
 The rock, their barren bed, one diamond.
 But were it so—were man all mind—he gains
 A station little enviable. From God
 Down to the lowest spirit ministrant,
 Intelligence exists which casts our mind
 Into immeasurable shade. No, no :
 Love, hope, fear, faith—these make humanity ;
 These are its sign and note and character,
 And these I have lost !—gone, shut from me
 for ever,
 Like a dead friend safe from unkindness
 more !
 See, morn at length. The heavy darkness seems
 Diluted, grey and clear without the stars ;
 The shrubs bestir and rouse themselves as if Some snake, that weighed them down all night, let go
 His hold ; and from the East, fuller and fuller,
 Day, like a mighty river, flowing in ;
 But clouded, wintry, desolate and cold.
 Yet see how that broad prickly star-shaped plant,
 Half-down in the crevice, spreads its woolly
 leaves
 All thick and glistening with diamond dew.
 And you depart for Einsiedeln this day,
 And we have spent all night in talk like
 this !
 If you would have me better for your love,
 Revert no more to these sad themes.
Festus. One favour,
 And I have done. I leave you, deeply moved ;

Unwilling to have fared so well, the while My friend has changed so sorely. If this mood

Shall pass away, if light once more arise
Where all is darkness now, if you see fit
To hope and trust again, and strive again,
You will remember—not our love alone—
But that my faith in God's desire that man Should trust on his support, (as I must think You trusted) is obscured and dim through
you :

For you are thus, and this is no reward.
Will you not call me to your side, dear Aureole?

IV.—PARACELSUS ASPIRES.

SCENE.—Colmar in Alsatia : an Inn. 1528.

PARACELSUS, FESTUS.

Paracelsus [to JOHANNES OPORINUS, his Secretary]. Sic itur ad astra! Dear
Von Visenburg

Is scandalized, and poor Torinus paralysed,
And every honest soul that Basil holds
Aghast ; and yet we live, as one may say,
Just as though Liechtenfels had never set
So true a value on his sorry carcass,
And learned Pütter had not frowned us dumb.
We live ; and shall as surely start to-morrow
For Nuremberg, as we drink speedy scathe
To Basil in this mantling wine, suffused
A delicate blush, no fainter tinge is born
I' the shut heart of a bud. Pledge me, good

John—

“Basil ; a hot plague ravage it, and Pütter “Oppose the plague !” Even so? Do you too share

Their panic, the reptiles? Ha, ha ; faint through these,

Desist for these! They manage matters so
At Basil, 'tis like : but others may find means

To bring the stoutest braggart of the tribe
Once more to crouch in silence—means to breed

A stupid wonder in each fool again,

Now big with admiration at the skill
Which stript a vain pretender of his plumes :
And, that done,—means to brand each slavish
brow

So deeply, surely, ineffaceably,
That henceforth flattery shall not pucker it
Out of the furrow ; there that stamp shall stay
To show the next they fawn on, what they are,

This Basil with its magnates,—fill my cup,— Whom I curse soul and limb. And now despatch,

Despatch, my trusty John ; and what remains
To do, whate'er arrangements for our trip
Are yet to be completed, see you hasten
This night ; we'll weather the storm at least :
to-morrow

For Nuremberg ! Now leave us ; this grave clerk

Has divers weighty matters for my ear :

[OPORINUS goes out.]

And spare my lungs. At last, my gallant
Festus,

I am rid of this arch-knave that dogs my heels
As a gaunt crow a gasping sheep ; at last
May give a loose to my delight. How kind,
How very kind, my first best only friend !
Why, this looks like fidelity. Embrace me !
Not a hair silvered yet? Right ! you shall live
Till I am worth your love ; you shall be proud,
And I—but let time show ! Did you not wonder?

I sent to you because our compact weighed
Upon my conscience—(you recall the night
At Basil, which the gods confound !)—because Once more I aspire. I call you to my side :
You come. You thought my message strange?

Festus.

So strange

That I must hope, indeed, your messenger
Has mingled his own fancies with the words
Purporting to be yours.

Paracelsus.

He said no more,

'Tis probable, than the precious folk I leave
Said fiftyfold more roughly. Well-a-day,

'Tis true ! poor Paracelsus is exposed
At last ; a most egregious quack he proves :
And those he overreached must spit their hate
On one who, utterly beneath contempt,

Could yet deceive their topping wits. You heard
 Bare truth ; and at my bidding you come here
 To speed me on my enterprise, as once
 Your lavish wishes sped me, my own friend !
Festus. What is your purpose, Aureole ?
Paracelsus. Oh, for purpose,
 There is no lack of precedents in a case
 Like mine ; at least, if not precisely mine,
 The case of men cast off by those they sought
 To benefit.
Fe tus. They really cast you off ?
 I only heard a vague tale of some priest,
 Cured by your skill, who wrangled at your claim,
 Knowing his life's worth best ; and how the judge
 The matter was referred to, saw no cause
 To interfere, nor you to hide your full Contempt of him ; nor he, again, to smother
 His wrath thereat, which raised so fierce a flame
 That Basil soon was made no place for you.
Paracelsus. The affair of Liechtenfels ? the shallowest fable,
 The last and silliest outrage—mere pretence !
 I knew it, I foretold it from the first,
 How soon the stupid wonder you mistook
 For genuine loyalty—a cheering promise
 Of better things to come—would pall and pass ;
 And every word comes true. Saul is among
 The prophets ! Just so long as I was pleased
 To play off the mere antics of my art,
 Fantastic gambols leading to no end,
 I got huge praise : but one can ne'er keep
 down
 Our foolish nature's weakness. There they flocked,
 Poor devils, jostling, swearing and perspiring,
 Till the walls rang again ; and all for me !
 I had a kindness for them, which was right ;
 But then I stopped not till I tacked to that
 A trust in them and a respect—a sort
 Of sympathy for them ; I must needs begin
 To teach them, not amaze them, “to impart
 “The spirit which should instigate the search “Of truth,” just what you bade me ! I spoke out.
 Forthwith a mighty squadron, in disgust,
 Filed off—“the sifted chaff of the sack,” I
 said,
 Redoubling my endeavours to secure
 The rest. When lo ! one man had tarried so long
 Only to ascertain if I supported
 This tenet of his, or that ; another loved
 To hear impartially before he judged,
 And having heard, now judged ; this bland disciple
 Passed for my dupe, but all along, it seems,
 Spied error where his neighbours marvelled
 most ;
 That fiery doctor who had hailed me friend,
 Did it because my by-paths, once proved
 wrong
 And beacons properly, would commend
 again
 The good old ways our sires jogged safely o'er,
 Though not their squeamish sons ; the other worthy
 Discovered divers verses of St. John,
 Which, read successively, refreshed the soul,
 But, muttered backwards, cured the gout,
 the stone,
 The colic and what not. Quid multa ? The
 end
 Was a clear class-room, and a quiet leer
 From grave folk, and a sour reproachful glance
 From those in chief who, cap in hand, installed
 The new professor scarce a year before ;
 And a vast flourish about patient merit
 Obscured awhile by flashy tricks, but sure
 Sooner or later to emerge in splendour—
 Of which the example was some luckless wight
 Whom my arrival had discomfited,
 But now, it seems, the general voice recalled
 To fill my chair and so efface the stain
 Basil had long incurred. I sought no better,
 Only a quiet dismissal from my post,
 And from my heart I wished them better suited
 And better served. Good night to Basil,
 then !
 But fast as I proposed to rid the tribe
 Of my obnoxious back, I could not spare them
 The pleasure of a parting kick.

Festus.
Despise them as they merit !

Paracelsus. If I smile,
'Tis with as very contempt as ever turned Flesh into stone. This courteous recompense,
This grateful . . . Festus, were your nature fit

To be defiled, your eyes the eyes to ache
At gangrene-blotches, eating poison-blains,
The ulcerous barked scurf of leprosy
Which finds—a man, and leaves—a hideous
thing

That cannot but be mended by hell fire,
—I would lay bare to you the human heart
Which God cursed long ago, and devils make
since

Their pet nest and their never-tiring home.
Oh, sages have discovered we are born
For various ends—to love, to know : has ever
One stumbled, in his search, on any signs
Of a nature in us formed to hate ? To hate ?
If that be our true object which evokes
Our powers in fullest strength, be sure 'tis hate !

Yet men have doubted if the best and bravest
Of spirits can nourish him with hate alone.
I had not the monopoly of fools,
It seems, at Basil.

Festus. But your plans, your plans !
I have yet to learn your purpose, Aureole !

Paracelsus. Whether to sink beneath such ponderous shame,

To shrink up like a crushed snail, undergo
In silence and desist from further toil,
And so subside into a monument
Of one their censure blasted ? or to bow
Cheerfully as submissively, to lower
My old pretensions even as Basil dictates,
To drop into the rank her wits assign me
And live as they prescribe, and make that use
Of my poor knowledge which their rules allow,

Proud to be patted now and then, and careful
To practise the true posture for receiving
The amplest benefit from their hoofs' appliance

When they shall condescend to tutor me ?
Then, one may feel resentment like a flame

You smile : Within, and deck false systems in truth's garb,
And tangle and entwine mankind with error,
And give them darkness for a dower and falsehood

For a possession, ages : or one may mope
Into a shade through thinking, or else drowse
Into a dreamless sleep and so die off.

But I,—now Festus shall divine !—but I Am merely setting out once more, embracing
My earliest aims again ! What thinks he now ?

Festus. Your aims ? the aims ?—to know !
and where is found

The early trust . . .

Paracelsus. Nay, not so fast ; I say,
The aims—not the old means. You know they made me

A laughing-stock ; I was a fool ; you know
The when and the how : hardly those means
again !

Not but they had their beauty ; who should
know

Their passing beauty, if not I ? Still, dreams
They were, so let them vanish, yet in beauty
If that may be. Stay : thus they pass in song !

[He sings

I heap cassia, sandal-buds and stripes
Of labdanum,¹ and aloe-balls,
Smeared with dull nard an Indian wipes
From out her hair : such balsam falls
Down sea-side mountain pedestals,
From tree-tops where tired winds are fain,
Spent with the vast and howling main,
To treasure half their island-gain.

And strew faint sweetness from some old
Egyptian's fine worm-eaten shroud
Which breaks to dust when once unrolled ;
Or shredded perfume, like a cloud
From closet long to quiet vowed,
With moth and dropping arras hung,
Mouldering her lute and books among,
As when a queen, long dead, was young.

Mine, every word ! And on such pile shall die
My lovely fancies, with fair perished things,
Themselves fair and forgotten ; yes, forgotten,
Or why abjure them ? So, I made this rhyme

That fitting dignity might be preserved ;
No little proud was I ; though the list of drugs
Smacks of my old vocation, and the verse
Hails like the best of Luther's psalms.

Festus. But, Aureole,
Talk not thus wildly and madly. I am here—Did you know all ! I have travelled far, indeed,

To learn your wishes. Be yourself again !
For in this mood I recognize you less
Than in the horrible despondency
I witnessed last. You may account this, joy ;
But rather let me gaze on that despair
Than hear these incoherent words and see
This flushed cheek and intensely-sparkling eye.

Paracelsus. Why, man, I was light-hearted in my prime,
I am light-hearted now ; what would you have ?
Aprile was a poet, I make songs—
'Tis the very augury of success I want !
Why should I not be joyous now as then ?

Festus. Joyous ! and how ? and what remains for joy ?
You have declared the ends (which I am sick
Of naming) are impracticable.

Paracelsus. Ay,
I pursued as I pursued them—the arch-fool !
Listen : my plan will please you not, 'tis like,
But you are little versed in the world's ways.
This is my plan—(first drinking its good luck)—

I will accept all helps ; all I despised
So rashly at the outset, equally
With early impulses, late years have quenched :

I have tried each way singly : now for both !
All helps ! no one sort shall exclude the rest.
I seek to know and to enjoy at once,
Not one without the other as before.

Suppose my labour should seem God's own
cause

Once more, as first I dreamed,—it shall not balk me

Of the meanest earthliest sensualet delight
That may be snatched ; for every joy is gain,
And gain is gain, however small. My soul
Can die then, nor be taunted—"what was gained ?"

Nor, on the other hand, should pleasure follow
As though I had not spurned her hitherto,
Shall she o'ercloud my spirit's rapt communion

With the tumultuous past, the teeming future,
Glorious with visions of a full success.

Festus. Success !

Paracelsus.

And wherefore not ?

Why not prefer

Results obtained in my best state of being,
To those derived alone from seasons dark
As the thoughts they bred ? When I was best, my youth

Unwasted, seemed success not surest too ?

It is the nature of darkness to obscure.

I am a wanderer : I remember well

One journey, how I feared the track was missed,

So long the city I desired to reach

Lay hid ; when suddenly its spires afar

Flashed through the circling clouds ; you may conceive

My transport. Soon the vapours closed again,

But I had seen the city, and one such glance

No darkness could obscure : nor shall the present—

A few dull hours, a passing shame or two,

Destroy the vivid memories of the past.

I will fight the battle out ; a little spent

Perhaps, but still an able combatant.

You look at my grey hair and furrowed brow ?

But I can turn even weakness to account :

Of many tricks I know, 'tis not the least

To push the ruins of my frame, whereon

The fire of vigour trembles scarce alive,

Into a heap, and send the flame aloft.

What should I do with age ? So, sickness lends

An aid ; it being, I fear, the source of all

We boast of : mind is nothing but disease,

And natural health is ignorance.

Festus.

I see

But one good symptom in this notable scheme.

I feared your sudden journey had in view

To wreak immediate vengeance on your foes.

'Tis not so : I am glad.

Paracelsus.

And if I please

To spit on them, to trample them, what then ?

'Tis sorry warfare truly, but the fools
Provoke it. I would spare their self-conceit,
But if they must provoke me, cannot suffer
Forbearance on my part, if I may keep
No quality in the shade, must needs put forth Power to match power, my strength against their strength,
And teach them their own game with their own arms—

Why, be it so and let them take their chance !
I am above them like a god, there's no
Hiding the fact : what idle scruples, then,
Were those that ever bade me soften it,
Communicate it gently to the world,
Instead of proving my supremacy,
Taking my natural station o'er their head,
Then owning all the glory was a man's !
—And in my elevation man's would be.
But live and learn, though life's short, learning, hard !

And therefore, though the wreck of my past
self,

I fear, dear Pütter, that your lecture-room
Must wait awhile for its best ornament,
The penitent empiric, who set up
For somebody, but soon was taught his place ;
Now, but too happy to be let confess
His error, snuff the candles, and illustrate (Fiat experientia corpore vili)

Your medicine's soundness in his person.

Wait,
Good Pütter !

Festus. He who sneers thus, is a god !

Paracelsus. Ay, ay, laugh at me ! I am very glad

You are not gulled by all this swaggering ; you
Can see the root of the matter !—how I strive
To put a good face on the overthrow
I have experienced, and to bury and hide
My degradation in its length and breadth ;
How the mean motives I would make you think

Just mingle as is due with nobler aims,
The appetites I modestly allow
May influence me as being mortal still—
Do goad me, drive me on, and fast supplant
My youth's desires. You are no stupid dupe :
You find me out ! Yes, I had sent for you

To palm these childish lies upon you, Festus !
Laugh—you shall laugh at me !

Festus. The past, then, Aureole,
Proves nothing ? Is our interchange of love
Yet to begin ? Have I to swear I mean
No flattery in this speech or that ? For you,
Whate'er you say, there is no degradation ;
These low thoughts are no inmates of your
mind,

Or wherefore this disorder ? You are vexed
As much by the intrusion of base views,
Familiar to your adversaries, as they
Were troubled should your qualities alight
Amid their murky souls ; not otherwise,
A stray wolf which the winter forces down
From our bleak hills, suffices to affright
A village in the vales—while foresters Sleep calm, though all night long the famished troop

Snuff round and scratch against their crazy huts.

These evil thoughts are monsters, and will flee.

Paracelsus. May you be happy, Festus, my own friend !

Festus. Nay, further ; the delights you fain would think

The superseders of your nobler aims,
Though ordinary and harmless stimulants,
Will ne'er content you. . . .

Paracelsus. Hush ! I once despised them,
But that soon passes. We are high at first
In our demand, nor will abate a jot
Of toil's strict value ; but time passes o'er,
And humbler spirits accept what we refuse :
In short, when some such comfort is doled out
As these delights, we cannot long retain Bitter contempt which urges us at first
To hurl it back, but hug it to our breast
And thankfully retire. This life of mine
Must be lived out and a grave thoroughly earned :

I am just fit for that and nought beside.
I told you once, I cannot now enjoy,
Unless I deem my knowledge gains through
joy ;

Nor can I know, but straight warm tears reveal
My need of linking also joy to knowledge :
So, on I drive, enjoying all I can,

And knowing all I can. I speak, of course,
Confusedly; this will better explain—feel
here!

Quick beating, is it not?—a fire of the heart
To work off some way, this as well as any.
So, Festus sees me fairly launched; his calm Compassionate look might have disturbed me once;

But now, far from rejecting, I invite
What bids me press the closer, lay myself
Open before him, and be soothed with pity;
I hope, if he command hope, and believe
As he directs me—satiating myself
With his enduring love. And Festus quits me
To give place to some credulous disciple
Who holds that God is wise, but Paracelsus
Has his peculiar merits: I suck in
That homage, chuckle o'er that admiration,
And then dismiss the fool; for night is come,
And I betake myself to study again,
Till patient searchings after hidden lore
Half wring some bright truth from its prison;
my frame

Trembles, my forehead's veins swell out, my hair

Tingles for triumph. Slow and sure the morn Shall break on my pent room and dwindling lamp

And furnace dead, and scattered earths and ores;

When, with a failing heart and throbbing brow,
I must review my captured truth, sum up
Its value, trace what ends to what begins,
Its present power with its eventual bearings,
Latent affinities, the views it opens,
And its full length in perfecting my scheme.
I view it sternly circumscribed, cast down
From the high place my fond hopes yielded it, Proved worthless—which, in getting, yet had cost

Another wrench to this fast-falling frame.
Then, quick, the cup to quaff, that chases
sorrow!

I lapse back into youth, and take again
My fluttering pulse for evidence that God Means good to me, will make my cause his
own.

See! I have cast off this remorseless care

Which clogged a spirit born to soar so free,
And my dim chamber has become a tent,
Festus is sitting by me, and his Michal . . .
Why do you start? I say, she listening here,
(For yonder—Würzburg through the orchardbough!)

Motions as though such ardent words should find

No echo in a maiden's quiet soul,
But her pure bosom heaves, her eyes fill fast
With tears, her sweet lips tremble all the while!

Ha, ha!

Festus. It seems, then, you expect to reap
No unreal joy from this your present course,
But rather . . .

Paracelsus. Death! To die! I owe that
much

To what, at least, I was. I should be sad
To live contented after such a fall,
To thrive and fatten after such reverse!
The whole plan is a makeshift, but will last
My time.

Festus. And you have never mused and
said,

"I had a noble purpose, and the strength
"To compass it; but I have stopped half-way,
"And wrongly given the first-fruits of my toil
"To objects little worthy of the gift.
"Why linger round them still? why clench my fault?"

"Why seek for consolation in defeat,
"In vain endeavours to derive a beauty
"From ugliness? why seek to make the most "Of what no power can change, nor strive instead

"With mighty effort to redeem the past
"And, gathering up the treasures thus cast
down,

"To hold a steadfast course till I arrive
"At their fit destination and my own?"
You have never pondered thus?

Paracelsus. Have I, you ask,
Often at midnight, when most fancies come,
Would some such airy project visit me:
But ever at the end or will you hear
The same thing in a tale, a parable?
You and I, wandering over the world wide,

Chance to set foot upon a desert coast.
Just as we cry, "No human voice before
"Broke the inveterate silence of these rocks!"
—Their querulous echo startles us; we
turn:

What ravaged structure still looks o'er the sea?
Some characters remain, too! While we read,
The sharp salt wind, impatient for the last
Of even this record, wistfully comes and goes,
Or sings what we recover, mocking it.
This is the record; and my voice, the wind's.

[He sings.]

Over the sea our galleys went,
With cleaving prows in order brave
To a speeding wind and a bounding wave,
A gallant armament:

Each bark built out of a forest-tree
Left leafy and rough as first it grew,
And nailed all over the gaping sides,
Within and without, with black bull-hides,
Seethed in fat and suppld in flame,
To bear the playful billows' game:
So, each good ship was rude to see,
Rude and bare to the outward view,

But each upbore a stately tent
Where cedar pales in scented row
Kept out the flakes of the dancing brine,
And an awning drooped the mast below,
In fold on fold of the purple fine,
That neither noontide nor starshine
Nor moonlight cold which maketh mad,
Might pierce the regal tenement.

When the sun dawned, oh, gay and glad
We set the sail and plied the oar;
But when the night-wind blew like breath,
For joy of one day's voyage more,
We sang together on the wide sea,
Like men at peace on a peaceful shore;
Each sail was loosed to the wind so
free,

Each helm made sure by the twilight star,
And in a sleep as calm as death,
We, the voyagers from afar,

Lay stretched along, each weary crew
In a circle round its wondrous tent
Whence gleamed soft light and curled rich scent,

And with light and perfume, music too:]

VOL. I.

So the stars wheeled round, and the darkness past,
And at morn we started beside the mast,
And still each ship was sailing fast.

Now, one morn, land appeared—a speck
Dim trembling betwixt sea and sky:

"Avoid it," cried our pilot, "check
"The shout, restrain the eager eye!

But the heaving sea was black behind
For many a night and many a day,
And land, though but a rock, drew nigh;
So, we broke the cedar pales away,
Let the purple awning flap in the wind,

And a statue bright was on every deck!
We shouted, every man of us,
And steered right into the harbour thus,
With pomp and pæan glorious.

A hundred shapes of lucid stone!

All day we built its shrine for each,
A shrine of rock for every one,
Nor paused till in the westerling sun

We sat together on the beach
To sing because our task was done.
When lo! what shouts and merry songs!
What laughter all the distance stirs!
A loaded raft with happy throngs
Of gentle islanders!

"Our isles are just at hand," they cried,
"Like cloudlets faint in even sleeping;

"Our temple-gates are opened wide,
"Our olive-groves thick shade are keeping

"For these majestic forms"—they cried.
Oh, then we awoke with sudden start
From our deep dream, and knew, too
late,

How bare the rock, how desolate,
Which had received our precious freight:
Yet we called out—"Depart!

"Our gifts, once given, must here abide.
"Our work is done; we have no heart
"To mar our work,"—we cried.

Festus. In truth?

Paracelsus.

tracings faint

Nay, wait: all this in

On rugged stones strewn here and there, but piled

In order once : then follows—mark what follows !

“The sad rhyme of the men who proudly clung “To their first fault, and withered in their pride.”

Festus. Come back then, Aureole ; as you fear God, come !
This is foul sin ; come back ! Renounce the past,

Forswear the future ; look for joy no more,
But wait death's summons amid holy sights,
And trust me for the event—peace, if not joy.
Return with me to Einsiedeln, dear Aureole !

Paracelsus. No way, no way ! it would not turn to good.

A spotless child sleeps on the flowering moss—
’Tis well for him ; but when a sinful man,
Envyng such slumber, may desire to put
His guilt away, shall he return at once
To rest by lying there ? Our sires knew well (Spite of the grave discoveries of their sons)
The fitting course for such : dark cells, dim lamps,

A stone floor one may writhe on like a worm :
No mossy pillow blue with violets !

Festus. I see no symptom of these absolute
And tyrannous passions. You are calmer now.
This verse-making can purge you well enough
Without the terrible penance you describe.
You love me still : the lusts you fear will never Outrage your friend. To Einsiedeln, once
more !

Say but the word !

Paracelsus. No, no ; those lusts forbid :
They crouch, I know, cowering with half-shut
eye

Beside you ; ’tis their nature. Thrust yourself
Between them and their prey ; let some fool style me

Or king or quack, it matters not—then try Your wisdom, urge them to forego their treat !

No, no ; learn better and look deeper, Festus !
If you knew how a devil sneers within me
While you are talking now of this, now that,
As though we differed scarcely save in trifles !

Festus. Do we so differ ? True, change must proceed,

Whether for good or ill ; keep from me, which !
Do not confide all secrets : I was born
To hope, and you . . .

Paracelsus. To trust : you know the fruits !
Festus. Listen : I do believe, what you call
trust

Was self-delusion at the best : for, see !
So long as God would kindly pioneer
A path for you, and screen you from the world,
Procure you full exemption from man's lot,
Man's common hopes and fears, on the mere pretext

Of your engagement in his service—yield you
A limitless licence, make you God, in fact,
And turn your slave—you were content to say
Most courtly praises ! What is it, at last,
But selfishness without example ? None Could trace God's will so plain as you, while
yours

Remained implied in it ; but now you fail,
And we, who prate about that will, are fools !
In short, God's service is established here
As he determines fit, and not your way,
And this you cannot brook. Such discontent
Is weak. Renounce all creatureship at once !
Affirm an absolute right to have and use Your energies ; as though the rivers should
say—

“We rush to the ocean ; what have we to do “With feeding streamlets, lingering in the vales,

“Sleeping in lazy pools ?” Set up that plea,
That will be bold at last !

Paracelsus. ’Tis like enough.
The serviceable spirits are those, no doubt,
The East produces : lo, the master bids,—
They wake, raise terraces and garden-grounds
In one night's space ; and, this done, straight begin

Another century's sleep, to the great praise
Of him that framed them wise and beautiful,
Till a lamp's rubbing, or some chance akin,
Wake them again. I am of different mould.
I would have soothed my lord, and slaved for
him

And done him service past my narrow bond

And thus I get rewarded for my pains !
Beside, 'tis vain to talk of forwarding
God's glory otherwise ; this is alone
The sphere of its increase, as far as men Increase it ; why, then, look beyond this sphere ?
We are his glory ; and if we be glorious,
Is not the thing achieved ?

Festus. Shall one like me Judge hearts like yours ? Though years have changed you much,
And you have left your first love, and retain
Its empty shade to veil your crooked ways,
Yet I still hold that you have honoured God.
And who shall call your course without reward ?

For, wherefore this repining at defeat
Had triumph ne'er injured you to high hopes ?
I urge you to forsake the life you curse,
And what success attends me ?—simply talk
Of passion, weakness and remorse ; in short,
Anything but the naked truth—you choose
This so-despised career, and cheaply hold
My happiness, or rather other men's.
Once more, return !

Paracelsus. And quickly. John the thief
Has pilfered half my secrets by this time :
And we depart by daybreak. I am weary,
I know not how ; not even the wine-cup soothes
My brain to-night . . .

Do you not thoroughly despise me, Festus ?
No flattery ! One like you needs not be told
We live and breathe deceiving and deceived.
Do you not scorn me from your heart of hearts,

Me and my cant, each petty subterfuge,
My rhymes and all this frothy shower of
words,

My glosing self-deceit, my outward crust
Of lies which wrap, as tetter, morpew, furfair

Wrapt the sound flesh ?—so, see you flatter not !
Even God flatters : but my friend, at least,
Is true. I would depart, secure henceforth Against all further insult, hate and wrong
From puny foes ; my one friend's scorn shall brand me :

No fear of sinking deeper !

Festus. No, dear Aureole !
No, no ; I came to counsel faithfully.
There are old rules, made long ere we were born,
By which I judge you. I, so fallible,
So infinitely low beside your mighty
Majestic spirit !—even I can see
You own some higher law than ours which call Sin, what is no sin—weakness, what is strength.

But I have only these, such as they are,
To guide me ; and I blame you where they bid,
Only so long as blaming promises
To win peace for your soul : the more, that
sorrow

Has fallen on me of late, and they have helped me

So that I faint not under my distress.
But wherefore should I scruple to avow
In spite of all, as brother judging brother,
Your fate is most inexplicable to me ?
And should you perish without recompense
And satisfaction yet—too hastily
I have relied on love : you may have sinned,
But you have loved. As a mere human matter—

As I would have God deal with fragile men
In the end—I say that you will triumph yet !

Paracelsus. Have you felt sorrow, Festus ?—'tis because

You love me. Sorrow, and sweet Michal
yours !

Well thought on : never let her know this last Dull winding-up of all : these miscreants dared

Insult me—me she loved :—so, grieve her
not !

Festus. Your ill success can little grieve her now.

Paracelsus. Michal is dead ! pray Christ
we do not craze !

Festus. Aureole, dear Aureole, look not on me thus !

Fool, fool ! this is the heart grown sorrow-proof—

I cannot bear those eyes.

Paracelsus. Nay, really dead ?

Festus. 'Tis scarce a month.

Paracelsus. Stone dead !—then you have laid her
Among the flowers ere this. Now, do you know,

I can reveal a secret which shall comfort
Even you. I have no julep, as men think,
To cheat the grave ; but a far better secret.
Know, then, you did not ill to trust your love
To the cold earth : I have thought much of it :
For I believe we do not wholly die.

Festus. Aureole !

Paracelsus. Nay, do not laugh ;
there is a reason
For what I say : I think the soul can never Taste death. I am, just now, as you may see,
Very unfit to put so strange a thought
In an intelligible dress of words ;
But take it as my trust, she is not dead.

Festus. But not on this account alone ?
you surely,

—Aureole, you have believed this all along ?
Paracelsus. And Michal sleeps among the roots and dews,

While I am moved at Basil, and full of schemes

For Nuremberg, and hoping and despairing,
As though it mattered how the farce plays out,
So it be quickly played. Away, away !

Have your will, rabble ! while we fight the
prize,

Troop you in safety to the snug back-seats
And leave a clear arena for the brave
About to perish for your sport !—Behold !

V.—PARACELSUS ATTAINS.

SCENE.—Salzburg ; a cell in the Hospital of St. Sebastian. 1541.

FESTUS, PARACELSUS.

Festus. No change ! The weary night is well-nigh spent,
The lamp burns low, and through the casement-bars

Grey morning glimmers feebly : yet no
change !

Another night, and still no sigh has stirred
That fallen discoloured mouth, no pang relit
Those fixed eyes, quenched by the decaying body,

Like torch-flame choked in dust. While all beside

Was breaking, to the last they held out bright,
As a stronghold where life intrenched itself ;
But they are dead now—very blind and dead :
He will drowse into death without a groan.

My Aureole—my forgotten, ruined Aureole !
The days are gone, are gone ! How grand thou wast !

And now not one of those who struck thee
down—

Poor glorious spirit—concerns him event to stay
And satisfy himself his little hand
Could turn God's image to a livid thing.

Another night, and yet no change ! 'Tis
much

That I should sit by him, and bathe his brow,
And chafe his hands ; 'tis much : but he will sure

Know me, and look on me, and speak to me
Once more—but only once ! His hollow
cheek

Looked all night long as though a creeping laugh

At his own state were just about to break
From the dying man : my brain swam, my throat swelled,

And yet I could not turn away. In truth,
They told me how, when first brought here,
he seemed

Resolved to live, to lose no faculty ;
Thus striving to keep up his shattered strength,
Until they bore him to this stifling cell :

When straight his features fell, an hour made white

The flushed face, and relaxed the quivering limb,

Only the eye remained intense awhile
As though it recognized the tomb-like place,
And then he lay as here he lies.

Ay, here !
Here is earth's noblest, nobly garlanded—

Her bravest champion with his well-won prize—
 Her best achievement, her sublime amends
 For countless generations fleeting fast
 And followed by no trace ;—the creature-god
 She instances when angels would dispute
 The title of her brood to rank with them.
 Angels, this is our angel ! Those bright forms
 We clothe with purple, crown and call to thrones,
 Are human, but not his ; those are but men Whom ' other men press round and kneel
 before ;
 Those palaces are dwelt in by mankind ;
 Higher provision is for him you seek
 Amid our pomps and glories : see it here !
 Behold earth's paragon ! Now, raise thee,
 clay !

God ! Thou art love ! I build my faith on
 that.
 Even as I watch beside thy tortured child
 Unconscious whose hot tears fall fast by him,
 So doth thy right hand guide us through the
 world
 Wherein we stumble. God ! what shall we
 say ?
 How has he sinned ? How else should he have done ?
 Surely he sought thy praise —thy praise, for all
 He might be busied by the task so much
 As half forget awhile its proper end.
 Dost thou well, Lord ? Thou canst not but prefer
 That I should range myself upon his side—
 How could he stop at every step to set
 Thy glory forth ? Hadst thou but granted him Success, thy honour would have crowned success,
 A halo round a star. Or, say he erred,— Save him, dear God ; it will be like thee :
 bathe him
 In light and life ! Thou are not made like us ;
 We should be wroth in such a case ; but thou Forgivest — so, forgive these passionate
 thoughts
 Which come unsought and will not pass away !

I know thee, who hast kept my path, and
 made
 Light for me in the darkness, tempering
 sorrow
 So that it reached me like a solemn joy ;
 It were too strange that I should doubt thy
 love.
 But what am I ? Thou madest him and knowest
 How he was fashioned. I could never err
 That way : the quiet place beside thy feet,
 Reserved for me, was ever in my thoughts :
 But he—thou shouldst have favoured him as
 well !

Ah ! he wakens ! Aureole, I am here ! 'tis
 Festus !
 I cast away all wishes save one wish—
 Let him but know me, only speak to me !
 He mutters ; louder and louder ; any other
 Than I, with brain less laden, could collect What he pours forth. Dear Aureole, do but look !
 Is it talking or singing, this he utters fast ?
 Misery that he should fix me with his eye,
 Quick talking to some other all the while !
 If he would husband this wild vehemence
 Which frustrates its intent !—I heard, I know
 I heard my name amid those rapid words.
 Oh, he will know me yet ! Could I divert
 This current, lead it somehow gently back
 Into the channels of the past !—His eye
 Brighter than ever ! It must recognize me !

I am Erasmus : I am here to pray
 That Paracelsus use his skill for me.
 The schools of Paris and of Padua send
 These questions for your learning to resolve.
 We are your students, noble master : leave
 This wretched cell, what business have you
 here ?
 Our class awaits you ; come to us once more !
 (O agony ! the utmost I can do Touches him not ; how else arrest his ear ?)
 I am commissioned . . . I shall craze like
 him.
 Better be mute and see what God shall send.
Paracelsus. Stay, stay with me !

- Festus.* I will ; I am come here
To stay with you—Festus, you loved of old ;
Festus, you know, you must know !
- Paracelsus.* Festus ! Where's
Aprile, then ? Has he not chanted softly
The melodies I heard all night ? I could not Get to him for a cold hand on my breast,
But I made out his music well enough,
O well enough ! If they have filled him full
With magical music, as they freight a star
With light, and have remitted all his sin,
They will forgive me too, I too shall know !
- Festus.* Festus, your Festus !
- Paracelsus.* Ask him if Aprile Knows as he Loves—if I shall Love and
Know ?
- I try ; but that cold hand, like lead—so cold !
- Festus.* My hand, see !
- Paracelsus.* Ah, the curse, Aprile,
Aprile !
- We get so near—so very, very near !
'Tis an old tale : Jove strikes the Titans
down,
Not when they set about their mountain-piling
But when another rock would crown the work.
And Phaeton—doubtless his first radiant plunge
Astonished mortals, though the gods were
calm,
And Jove prepared his thunder : all old tales !
- Festus.* And what are these to you ?
- Paracelsus.* Ay, fiends must laugh
So cruelly, so well ! most like I never Could tread a single pleasure underfoot,
But they were grinning by my side, were chuckling
To see me toil and drop away by flakes !
Hell-spawn ! I am glad, most glad, that thus I fail !
- Your cunning has o'ershot its aim. One year,
One month, perhaps, and I had served your turn !
You should have curbed your spite awhile.
But now,
Who will believe 'twas you that held me
back ?
- Listen : there's shame and hissing and contempt,
And none but laughs who names me, none
but spits
Measureless scorn upon me, me alone,
The quack, the cheat, the liar,—all on me !
And thus your famous plan to sink mankind
In silence and despair, by teaching them
One of their race had probed the inmost truth,
Had done all man could do, yet failed no
less—
Your wise plan proves abortive. Men despair ?
- Ha, ha ! why, they are hooting the empiric,
The ignorant and incapable fool who rushed
Madly upon a work beyond his wits ;
Nor doubt they but the simplest of themselves
Could bring the matter to triumphant issue.
So, pick and choose among them all, accursed !
Try now, persuade some other to slave for
you,
To ruin body and soul to work your ends !
No, no ; I am the first and last, I think.
- Festus.* Dear friend, who are accursed ;
who has done . . .
- Paracelsus.* What have I done ? Fiends dare ask that ? or you,
Brave men ? Oh, you can chime in boldly, backed
By the others ! What had you to do, sage peers ?
- Here stand my rivals ; Latin, Arab, Jew,
Greek, join dead hands against me : all I ask
Is, that the world enrol my name with theirs,
And even this poor privilege, it seems,
They range themselves, prepared to disallow.
Only observe ! why, fiends may learn from
them !
- How they talk calmly of my throes, my fierce Aspirings, terrible watchings ; each one claiming
Its price of blood and brain ; how they dissect
And sneeringly disparage the few truths
Got at a life's cost ; they too hanging the while
About my neck, their lies misleading me
And their dead names browbeating me !
Grey crew,

Yet steeped in fresh malevolence from hell,
Is there a reason for your hate? My truths
Have shaken a little the palm about each prince?

Just think, Aprile, all these leering dotards
Were bent on nothing less than to be crowned As we! That yellow blear-eyed wretch in chief

To whom the rest cringe low with feigned
respect,

Galen of Pergamos and hell—nay speak
The tale, old man! We met there face to
face:

I said the crown should fall from thee. Once
more

We meet as in that ghastly vestibule:
Look to my brow! Have I redeemed my pledge?

Festus. Peace, peace; ah, see!

Paracelsus. Oh, emptiness of fame!
Oh Persic Zoroaster, lord of stars!

—Who said these old renowns, dead long ago,
Could make me overlook the living world
To gaze through gloom at where they stood,
indeed,

But stand no longer? What a warm light life
After the shade! In truth, my delicate witch,
My serpent-queen, you did but well to hide
The juggles I had else detected. Fire
May well run harmless o'er a breast like
yours!

The cave was not so darkened by the smoke
But that your white limbs dazzled me: oh,
white,

And panting as they twinkled, wildly dancing!

I cared not for your passionate gestures then,
But now I have forgotten the charm of charms,

The foolish knowledge which I came to seek,
While I remember that quaint dance; and
thus

I am come back, not for those mummeries,
But to love you, and to kiss your little feet
Soft as an ermine's winter coat!

Festus. A light

Will struggle through these thronging words
at last.

As in the angry and tumultuous West
A soft star trembles through the drifting clouds.

These are the strivings of a spirit which hates
So sad a vault should coop it, and calls up
The past to stand between it and its fate.

Were he at Einsiedeln—or Michal here!

Paracelsus. Cruel! I seek her now—I kneel—I shriek—

I clasp her vesture—but she fades, still fades;
And she is gone; sweet human love is gone!
'Tis only when they spring to heaven that angels

Reveal themselves to you; they sit all day
Beside you, and lie down at night by you
Who care not for their presence, muse or sleep,
And all at once they leave you, and you know
them!

We are so fooled, so cheated! Why, even
now

I am not too secure against foul play;
The shadows deepen and the walls contract:
No doubt some treachery is going on.

'Tis very dusk. Where are we put, Aprile?
Have they left us in the lurch? This murky loathsome

Death-trap, this slaughter-house, is not the hall

In the golden city! Keep by me, Aprile!
There is a hand groping amid the blackness
To catch us. Have the spider-fingers got you,
Poet? Hold on me for your life! If once
They pull you!—Hold!

'Tis but a dream—no more!

I have you still; the sun comes out again;
Let us be happy: all will yet go well!

Let us confer: is it not like, Aprile,
That spite of trouble, this ordeal passed,
The value of my labours ascertained,

Just as some stream foams long among the rocks

But after glideth glassy to the sea,
So, full content shall henceforth be my lot?
What think you, poet? Louder! Your clear voice

Vibrates too like a harp-string. Do you ask
How could I still remain on earth, should God
Grant me the great approval which I seek?

I, you, and God can comprehend each other,
But men would murmur, and with cause
enough ;

For when they saw me, stainless of all sin,
Preserved and sanctified by inward light,
They would complain that comfort, shut from
them,

I drank thus unspied ; that they live on,
Nor taste the quiet of a constant joy,
For ache and care and doubt and weariness,
While I am calm ; help being vouchsafed to me,
And hid from them.—'Twere best consider
that !

You reason well, Aprile ; but at least
Let me know this, and die ! Is this too much ?
I will learn this, if God so please, and die !

If thou shalt please, dear God, if thou shalt
please !

We are so weak, we know our motives least
In their confused beginning. If at first I sought . . . but wherefore bare my heart to thee ?

I know thy mercy ; and already thoughts
Flock fast about my soul to comfort it,
And intimate I cannot wholly fail,
For love and praise would clasp me willingly
Could I resolve to seek them. Thou art good,
And I should be content. Yet—yet first show
I have done wrong in daring ! Rather give
The supernatural consciousness of strength
Which fed my youth ! Only one hour of that
With thee to help—O what should bar me
then !

Lost, lost ! Thus things are ordered here !
God's creatures,

And yet he takes no pride in us !—none, none !
Truly there needs another life to come !
If this be all—(I must tell Festus that)
And other life await us not—for one,
I say 'tis a poor cheat, a stupid bungle,
A wretched failure. I, for one, protest
Against it, and I hurl it back with scorn.

Well, onward though alone ! Small time
remains,

And much to do : I must have fruit, must reap

Some profit from my toils. I doubt my body Will hardly serve me through ; while I have laboured

It has decayed ; and now that I demand
Its best assistance, it will crumble fast :
A sad thought, a sad fate ! How very full
Of wormwood 'tis, that just at altar-service,
The rapt hymn rising with the rolling smoke,
When glory dawns and all is at the best,
The sacred fire may flicker and grow faint
And die for want of a wood-piler's help !
Thus fades the flagging body, and the soul
Is pulled down in the overthrow. Well,
well—

Let men catch every word, let them lose
nought
Of what I say ; something may yet be done.

They are ruins ! Trust me who am one of you !
All ruins, glorious once, but lonely now.

It makes my heart sick to behold you crouch
Beside your desolate fane : the arches dim,
The crumbling columns grand against the moon,

Could I but rear them up once more—but that May never be, so leave them ! Trust me,
friends,

Why should you linger here when I have built
A far resplendent temple, all your own ?
Trust me, they are but ruins ! See, Aprile,
Men will not heed ! Yet were I not prepared
With better refuge for them, tongue of mine
Should ne'er reveal how blank their dwelling is :

I would sit down in silence with the rest.

Ha, what ? you spit at me, you grin and shriek
Contempt into my ear—my ear which drank God's accents once ? you curse me ? Why men, men,

I am not formed for it ! Those hideous eyes
Will be before me sleeping, waking, praying,
They will not let me even die. Spare, spare
me,

Sinning or no, forget that, only spare me
The horrible scorn ! You thought I could support it.

But now you see what silly fragile creature

Cowers thus. I am not good nor bad enough,
Not Christ nor Cain, yet even Cain was saved
From Hate like this. Let me but totter back !
Perhaps I shall elude those jeers which creep
Into my very brain, and shut these scorched
Eyelids and keep those mocking faces out.

Listen, Aprile ! I am very calm :
Be not deceived, there is no passion here
Where the blood leaps like an imprisoned
thing :

I am calm : I will exterminate the race !
Enough of that : 'tis said and it shall be.
And now be merry : safe and sound am I Who broke through their best ranks to get at you.

And such a havoc, such a rout, Aprile !

Festus. Have you no thought, no memory
for me,

Aureole ? I am so wretched—my pure Michal
Is gone, and you alone are left me now,
And even you forget me. Take my hand—
Lean on me thus. Do you not know me,
Aureole ?

Paracelsus. Festus, my own friend, you are come at last ?

As you say, 'tis an awful enterprise ;
But you believe I shall go through with it :
'Tis like you, and I thank you. Thank him
for me,

Dear Michal ! See how bright St. Saviour's
spire

Flames in the sunset ; all its figures quaint Gay in the glancing light : you might conceive them

A troop of yellow-vested white-haired Jews
Bound for their own land where redemption dawns.

Festus. Not that blest time—not our youth's time, dear God !

Paracelsus. Ha—stay ! true, I forget—all is done since,

And he is come to judge me. How he speaks,
How calm, how well ! yes, it is true, all true ;
All quackery ; all deceit ; myself can laugh
The first at it, if you desire : but still
You know the obstacles which taught me tricks
So foreign to my nature—envy and hate,

Blind opposition, brutal prejudice,
Bald ignorance—what wonder if I sunk
To humour men the way they most approved ?
My cheats were never palmed on such as you,
Dear Festus ! I will kneel if you require me,
Impart the meagre knowledge I possess,
Explain its bounded nature, and avow
My insufficiency—whate'er you will :
I give the fight up : let there be an end,
A privacy, an obscure nook for me.
I want to be forgotten even by God.

But if that cannot be, dear Festus, lay me,
When I shall die, within some narrow grave,
Not by itself—for that would be too proud—
But where such graves are thickest ; let it look
Nowise distinguished from the hillocks round,
So that the peasant at his brother's bed
May tread upon my own and know it not ;
And we shall all be equal at the last,
Or classed according to life's natural ranks,
Fathers, sons, brothers, friends—not rich,
nor wise,

Nor gifted : lay me thus, then say, "He lived
"Too much advanced before his brother men ;
"They kept him still in front : 'twas for their good

"But yet a dangerous station. It were strange "That he should tell God he had never ranked
"With men : so, here at least he is a man."

Festus. That God shall take thee to his breast, dear spirit,
Unto his breast, be sure ! and here on earth
Shall splendour sit upon thy name for ever.
Sun ! all the heaven is glad for thee : what
care

If lower mountains light their snowy phares
At thine effulgence, yet acknowledge not The source of day ? Their theft shall be their bale :

For after-ages shall retrack thy beams,
And put aside the crowd of busy ones
And worship thee alone—the master-mind,
The thinker, the explorer, the creator !
Then, who should sneer at the convulsive throes

With which thy deeds were born, would scorn as well

The sheet of winding subterraneous fire

Which, pent and writhing, sends no less at last
Huge islands up amid the simmering sea.
Behold thy might in me ! thou hast infused
Thy soul in mine ; and I am grand as thou,
Seeing I comprehend thee—I so simple,
Thou so august. I recognize thee first ;
I saw thee rise, I watched thee early and late,
And though no glance reveal thou dost accept
My homage—thus no less I proffer it,
And bid thee enter gloriously thy rest.

Paracelsus. Festus !

Festus. I am for noble Aureole, God !
I am upon his side, come weal or woe.
His portion shall be mine. He has done well.
I would have sinned, had I been strong enough,
As he has sinned. Reward him or I waive
Reward ! If thou canst find no place for him,
He shall be king elsewhere, and I will be
His slave for ever. There are two of us.

Paracelsus. Dear Festus !

Festus. Here, dear Aureole ! ever by you !

Paracelsus. Nay, speak on, or I dream again. Speak on !

Some story, anything—only your voice.

I shall dream else. Speak on ! ay, leaning so !

Festus. Thus the Mayne glideth

Where my Love abideth.

Sleep's no softer : it proceeds

On through lawns, on through meads,

On and on, whate'er befall,

Meandering and musical,

Though the niggard pasturage

Bears not on its shaven ledge

Aught but weeds and waving grasses

To view the river as it passes,

Save here and there a scanty patch

Of primroses too faint to catch

A weary bee.

Paracelsus. More, more ; say on !

Festus. And scarce it pushes

Its gentle way through strangling rushes

Where the glossy kingfisher

Flutters when noon-heats are near,

Glad the shelving banks to shun,

Red and steaming in the sun,

Where the shrew-mouse with pale throat

Burrows, and the speckled stoat ;

Where the quick sandpipers flit
In and out the marl and grit
That seems to breed them, brown as they :
Nought disturbs its quiet way,
Save some lazy stork that springs,
Trailing it with legs and wings,
Whom the shy fox from the hill
Rouses, creep he ne'er so still.

Paracelsus. My heart ! they loose my heart, those simple words ;

Its darkness passes, which nought else could
touch :

Likesome dark snake that force may not expel,
Which glideth out to music sweet and low.

What were you doing when your voice broke
through

A chaos of ugly images ? You, indeed !

Are you alone here ?

Festus. All alone : you know me ?
This cell ?

Paracelsus. An unexceptionable vault :
Good brick and stone : the bats kept out,
the rats

Kept in : a snug nook : how should I mistake it ?

Festus. But wherefore am I here ?

Paracelsus. Ah, well remembered !

Why, for a purpose—for a purpose, Festus !

'Tis like me : here I trifle while time fleets,

And this occasion, lost, will ne'er return.

You are here to be instructed. I will tell

God's message ; but I have so much to say,

I fear to leave half out. All is confused

No doubt ; but doubtless you will learn in
time.

He would not else have brought you here :
no doubt

I shall see clearer soon.

Festus. Tell me but this—

You are not in despair ?

Paracelsus. I ? and for what ?

Festus. Alas, alas ! he knows not, as I feared !

Paracelsus. What is it you would ask me with that earnest

Dear searching face ?

Festus. How feel you, Aureole ?

Paracelsus. Well :

Well. 'Tis a strange thing: I am dying,

Festus,

And now that fast the storm of life subsides,
I first perceive how great the whirl has been.
I was calm then, who am so dizzy now—
Calm in the thick of the tempest, but no less
A partner of its motion and mixed up
With its career. The hurricane is spent,
And the good boat speeds through the brightening weather;

But is it earth or sea that heaves below?
The gulf rolls like a meadow-swell, o'erstrewn
With ravaged boughs and remnants of the shore;

And now some islet, loosened from the land,
Swims past with all its trees, sailing to ocean;
And now the air is full of upturn canes,
Light strippings from the fan-trees, tamarisks Unrooted, with their birds still clinging to
them,

All high in the wind. Even so my varied life
Drifts by me; I am young, old, happy, sad,
Hoping, desponding, acting, taking rest,
And all at once: that is, those past conditions Float back at once on me. If I select
Some special epoch from the crowd, 'tis but
To will, and straight the rest dissolve away,
And only that particular state is present
With all its long-forgotten circumstance
Distinct and vivid as at first—myself
A careless looker-on and nothing more,
Indifferent and amused, but nothing more.
And this is death: I understand it all.
New being waits me; new perceptions must
Be born in me before I plunge therein;
Which last is Death's affair; and while I
speak,

Minute by minute he is filling me
With power; and while my foot is on the threshold

Of boundless life—the doors unopened yet,
All preparations not complete within—
I turn new knowledge upon old events,
And the effect is . . . but I must not tell;
It is not lawful. Your own turn will come
One day. Wait, Festus! You will die like me.

Festus. 'Tis of that past life that I burn to
hear.

Paracelsus. You wonder it engages me just
now?

In truth, I wonder too. What's life to me?
Where'er I look is fire, where'er I listen
Music, and where I tend bliss evermore.
Yet how can I refrain? 'Tis a refined
Delight to view those chances,—one last view.
I am so near the perils I escape,
That I must play with them and turn them over,

To feel how fully they are past and gone.
Still, it is like, some further cause exists
For this peculiar mood—some hidden purpose;

Did I not tell you something of it, Festus?
I had it fast, but it has somehow slipped
Away from me; it will return anon.

Festus. (Indeed his cheek seems young again, his voice

Complete with its old tones: that little laugh
Concluding every phrase, with upturned eye,
As though one stooped above his head to whom

He looked for confirmation and approval,
Where was it gone so long, so well preserved?
Then, the fore-finger pointing as he speaks,
Like one who traces in an open book
The matter he declares; 'tis many a year
Since I remarked it last: and this in him,
But now a ghastly wreck!)

And can it be,
Dear Aureole, you have then found out at last
That worldly things are utter vanity?
That man is made for weakness, and should wait

In patient ignorance, till God appoint . . .

Paracelsus. Ha, the purpose: the true purpose: that is it!

How could I fail to apprehend! You here,
I thus! But no more trifling: I see all,
I know all: my last mission shall be done
If strength suffice. No trifling! Stay; this posture

Hardly befits one thus about to speak:
I will arise.

Festus. Nay, Aureole, are you wild?
You cannot leave your couch.

Paracelsus. No help; no help;

Not even your hand. So! there, I stand once more!

Speak from a couch? I never lectured thus.
My gown—the scarlet lined with fur; now put
The chain about my neck; my signet-ring
Is still upon my hand, I think—even so;
Last, my good sword; ah, trusty Azoth, leapest
Beneath thy master's grasp for the last time?
This couch shall be my throne: I bid these walls
Be consecrate, this wretched cell become A shrine, for here God speaks to men through
me.
Now, Festus, I am ready to begin.
Festus. I am dumb with wonder.
Paracelsus. Listen, therefore, Festus!
There will be time enough, but none to spare.
I must content myself with telling only
The most important points. You doubtless feel
That I am happy, Festus; very happy.
Festus. 'Tis no delusion which uplifts him
thus!

Then you are pardoned, Aureole, all your sin?
Paracelsus. Ay, pardoned: yet why pardoned?
Festus. 'Tis God's praise
That man is bound to seek, and you . . .
Paracelsus. Have lived!
We have to live alone to set forth well
God's praise. 'Tis true, I sinned much, as
I thought,
And in effect need mercy, for I strove
To do that very thing; but, do your best
Or worst, praise rises, and will rise for ever.
Pardon from him, because of praise denied—
Who calls me to himself to exalt himself?
He might laugh as I laugh!

Festus. But all comes
To the same thing. 'Tis fruitless for mankind
To fret themselves with what concerns them
not;
They are no use that way: they should lie
down
Content as God has made them, nor go mad
In thriveless cares to better what is ill.

Paracelsus. No, no; mistake me not; let me not work
More harm than I have worked! This is my case:
If I go joyous back to God, yet bring
No offering, if I render up my soul
Without the fruits it was ordained to bear,
If I appear the better to love God
For sin, as one who has no claim on him,—
Be not deceived! It may be surely thus
With me, while higher prizes still await
The mortal persevering to the end.
Beside I am not all so valueless:
I have been something, though too soon I left
Following the instincts of that happy time.
Festus. What happy time? For God's sake, for man's sake,
What time was happy? All I hope to know
That answer will decide. What happy time?
Paracelsus. When but the time I vowed myself to man?
Festus. Great God, thy judgments are inscrutable!
Paracelsus. Yes, it was in me; I was born
for it—
I, Paracelsus: it was mine by right.
Doubtless a searching and impetuous soul Might learn from its own motions that some task
Like this awaited it about the world;
Might seek somewhere in this blank life of ours
For fit delights to stay its longings vast;
And, grappling Nature, so prevail on her
To fill the creature full she dared thus frame
Hungry for joy; and, bravely tyrannous,
Grow in demand, still craving more and more,
And make each joy conceded prove a pledge
Of other joy to follow—bating nought
Of its desires, still seizing fresh pretence
To turn the knowledge and the rapture
wrong
As an extreme, last boon, from destiny,
Into occasion for new covetings,
New strifes, new triumphs:—doubtless a strong soul,
Alone, unaided might attain to this,
So glorious is our nature, so august

Man's inborn uninstructed impulses,
His naked spirit so majestic !
But this was born in me ; I was made so ;
Thus much time saved : the feverish appetites,
The tumult of unproved desire, the unaimed
Uncertain yearnings, aspirations blind,
Distrust, mistake, and all that ends in tears
Were saved me ; thus I entered on my course.
You may be sure I was not all exempt
From human trouble ; just so much of doubt
As bade me plant a surer foot upon
The sun-road, kept my eye unruined 'mid
The fierce and flashing splendour, set my heart

Trembling so much as warned me I stood
there

On sufferance—not to idly gaze, but cast
Light on a darkling race ; save for that doubt,
I stood at first where all aspire at last
To stand : the secret of the world was mine.
I knew, I felt, (perception unexpressed,
Uncomprehended by our narrow thought,
But somehow felt and known in every shift
And change in the spirit,—nay, in every pore
Of the body, even,)—what God is, what we
are,

What life is—how God tastes an infinite joy
In infinite ways—one everlasting bliss,
From whom all being emanates, all power
Proceeds ; in whom is life for evermore,
Yet whom existence in its lowest form Includes ; where dwells enjoyment there is
he :

With still a flying point of bliss remote,
A happiness in store afar, a sphere
Of distant glory in full view ; thus climbs
Pleasure its heights for ever and for ever.
The centre-fire heaves underneath the earth,
And the earth changes like a human face ;
The molten ore bursts up among the rocks,
Winds into the stone's heart, outbranches bright

In hidden mines, spots barren river-beds,
Crumbles into fine sand where sunbeams bask—

God joys therein. The wroth sea's waves are edged

With foam, white as the bitten lip of hate,

When, in the solitary waste, strange groups
Of young volcanos come up, cyclops-like,
Staring together with their eyes on flame—
God tastes a pleasure in their uncouth pride.
Then all is still ; earth is a wintry clod :
But spring-wind, like a dancing psaltress, passes

Over its breast to waken it, rare verdure
Buds tenderly upon rough banks, between The withered tree-roots and the cracks of frost,

Like a smile striving with a wrinkled face ;
The grass grows bright, the boughs are swoln with blooms

Like chrysalids impatient for the air,
The shining dorrs are busy, beetles run
Along the furrows, ants make their ado ;
Above, birds fly in merry flocks, the lark
Soars up and up, shivering for very joy ;
Afar the ocean sleeps ; white fishing-gulls
Flit where the strand is purple with its tribe
Of nested limpets ; savage creatures seek Their loves in wood and plain—and God renews

His ancient rapture. Thus he dwells in all,
From life's minute beginnings, up at last
To man—the consummation of this scheme
Of being, the completion of this sphere
Of life : whose attributes had here and there
Been scattered o'er the visible world before,
Asking to be combined, dim fragments meant
To be united in some wondrous whole,
Imperfect qualities throughout creation,
Suggesting some one creature yet to make,
Some point where all those scattered rays should meet

Convergent in the faculties of man.
Power—neither put forth blindly, nor controlled

Calmly by perfect knowledge ; to be used
At risk, inspired or checked by hope and fear :
Knowledge—not intuition, but the slow
Uncertain fruit of an enhancing toil,
Strengthened by love : love—not serenely pure,
But strong from weakness, like a chance-sown
plant

Which, cast on stubborn soil, puts forth changed buds

And softer stains, unknown in happier climes;
Love which endures and doubts and is oppressed

And cherished, suffering much and much sustained,

And blind, oft-failing, yet believing love,
A half-enlightened, often-chequered trust :—
Hints and previsions of which faculties,
Are strewn confusedly everywhere about
The inferior natures, and all lead up higher,
All shape out dimly the superior race,
The heir of hopes too fair to turn out false,
And man appears at last. So far the seal
Is put on life ; one stage of being complete,
One scheme wound up : and from the grand result

A supplementary reflux of light,
Illustrates all the inferior grades, explains
Each back step in the circle. Not alone
For their possessor dawn those qualities,
But the new glory mixes with the heaven
And earth ; man, once descried, imprints for ever

His presence on all lifeless things : the winds
Are henceforth voices, wailing or a shout,
A querulous mutter or a quick gay laugh,
Never a senseless gust now man is born.

The herded pines commune and have deep thoughts,

A secret they assemble to discuss

When the sun drops behind their trunks which glare

Like grates of hell : the peerless cup afloat
Of the lake-lily is an urn, some nymph
Swims bearing high above her head : no bird
Whistles unseen, but through the gaps above
That let light in upon the gloomy woods,
A shape peeps from the breezy forest-top,
Arch with small puckered mouth and mocking eye.

The morn has enterprise, deep quiet droops
With evening, triumph takes the sunset hour,
Voluptuous transport ripens with the corn
Beneath a warm moon like a happy face :
—And this to fill us with regard for man.
With apprehension of his passing worth,
Desire to work his proper nature out,
And ascertain his rank and final place,

For these things tend still upward, progress is
The law of life, man is not Man as yet.

Nor shall I deem his object served, his end
Attained, his genuine strength put fairly forth,

While only here and there a star dispels
The darkness, here and there a towering mind
O'erlooks its prostrate fellows : when the host
Is out at once to the despair of night,
When all mankind alike is perfected,
Equal in full-blown powers—then, not till then,

I say, begins man's general infancy.

For wherefore make account of feverish starts
Of restless members of a dormant whole,
Impatient nerves which quiver while the body
Slumbers as in a grave? Oh long ago
The brow was twitched, the tremulous lids
astir,
The peaceful mouth disturbed ; half-uttered
speech

Ruffled the lip, and then the teeth were set,
The breath drawn sharp, the strong right-hand
clenched stronger,

As it would pluck a lion by the jaw ;
The glorious creature laughed out even in sleep !

But when full roused, each giant-limb awake,
Each sinew strung, the great heart pulsing fast,
He shall start up and stand on his own earth,
Then shall his long triumphant march begin,
Thence shall his being date,—thus wholly roused,

What he achieves shall be set down to him.
When all the race is perfected alike
As man, that is ; all tended to mankind,
And, man produced, all has its end thus far :
But in completed man begins anew
A tendency to God. Prognostics told
Man's near approach ; so in man's self arise
August anticipations, symbols, types
Of a dim splendour ever on before
In that eternal circle life pursues.

For men begin to pass their nature's bound,
And find new hopes and cares which fast supplant

Their proper joys and griefs ; they grow too great

For narrow creeds of right and wrong, which fade

Before the unmeasured thirst for good : while
peace

Rises within them ever more and more.

Such men are even now upon the earth,
Serene amid the half-formed creatures round
Who should be saved by them and joined with them.

Such was my task, and I was born to it—
Free, as I said but now, from much that chains
Spirits, high-dowered but limited and vexed
By a divided and delusive aim,
A shadow mocking a reality

Whose truth avails not wholly to disperse
The flitting mimic called up by itself,
And so remains perplexed and nigh put out
By its fantastic fellow's wavering gleam.

I, from the first, was never cheated thus ;
I never fashioned out a fancied good
Distinct from man's ; a service to be done,
A glory to be ministered unto
With powers put forth at man's expense, withdrawn

From labouring in his behalf ; a strength
Denied that might avail him. I cared not
Lest his success ran counter to success
Elsewhere : for God is glorified in man,
And to man's glory vowed I soul and limb.
Yet, constituted thus, and thus endowed,
I failed : I gazed on power till I grew blind.
Power ; I could not take my eyes from that :
That only, I thought, should be preserved, increased

At any risk, displayed, struck out at once—
The sign and note and character of man.
I saw no use in the past : only a scene
Of degradation, ugliness and tears,
The record of disgraces best forgotten,
A sullen page in human chronicles
Fit to erase. I saw no cause why man
Should not stand all-sufficient even now,
Or why his annals should be forced to tell
That once the tide of light, about to break
Upon the world, was sealed within its spring :
I would have had one day, one moment's space,
Change man's condition, push each slumbering claim

Of mastery o'er the elemental world
At once to full maturity, then roll
Oblivion o'er the work, and hide from man
What night had ushered morn. Not so, dear
child

Of after-days, wilt thou reject the past
Big with deep warnings of the proper tenure
By which thou hast the earth : for thee the present

Shall have distinct and trembling beauty, seen
Beside that past's own shade when, in relief,
Its brightness shall stand out : nor yet on thee
Shall burst the future, as successive zones
Of several wonder open on some spirit
Flying secure and glad from heaven to heaven :
But thou shalt painfully attain to joy,
While hope and fear and love shall keep thee
man !

All this was hid from me : as one by one
My dreams grew dim, my wide aims circum-scribed,

As actual good within my reach decreased,
While obstacles sprung up this way and that
To keep me from effecting half the sum,
Small as it proved ; as objects, mean within
The primal aggregate, seemed, even the least,
Itself a match for my concentrated strength—
What wonder if I saw no way to shun Despair ? The power I sought for man, seemed God's.

In this conjuncture, as I prayed to die,
A strange adventure made me know, one sin
Had spotted my career from its uprise ;
I saw Aprile—my Aprile there !

And as the poor melodious wretch dis-burthened

His heart, and moaned his weakness in my ear,

I learned my own deep error ; love's undoing
Taught me the worth of love in man's estate,

And what proportion love should hold with power

In his right constitution ; love preceding Power, and with much power, always much more love ;

Love still too straitened in his present means,
And earnest for new power to set love free.

I learned this, and supposed the whole was learned :

And thus, when men received with stupid wonder

My first revealings, would have worshipped me,
And I despised and loathed their proffered praise—

When, with awakened eyes, they took revenge
For past credulity in casting shame

On my real knowledge, and I hated them—

It was not strange I saw no good in man,

To overbalance all the wear and waste

(Of faculties, displayed in vain, but born

To prosper in some better sphere : and why ?

In my own heart love had not been made wise

To trace love's faint beginnings in mankind,

To know even hate is but a mask of love's,

To see a good in evil, and a hope

In ill-success ; to sympathize, be proud

Of their half-reasons, faint aspirings, dim

Struggles for truth, their poorest fallacies,

Their prejudice and fears and cares and doubts ;

All with a touch of nobleness, despite

Their error, upward tending all though weak,

Like plants in mines which never saw the sun,

But dream of him, and guess where he may be,

And do their best to climb and get to him.

All this I knew not, and I failed. Let men

Regard me, and the poet dead long ago

Who loved too rashly ; and shape forth a third

And better-tempered spirit, warned by both :

As from the over-radiant star too mad

To drink the life-springs, beamless thence itself—

And the dark orb which borders the abyss,

Ingulfed in icy night,—might have its course

A temperate and equidistant world.

Meanwhile, I have done well, though not all well.

As yet men cannot do without contempt ;

'Tis for their good, and therefore fit awhile

That they reject the weak, and scorn the false,

Rather than praise the strong and true, in me :

But after, they will know me. If I stoop

Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud,

It is but for a time ; I press God's lamp

Close to my breast ; its splendour, soon or late,

Will pierce the gloom : I shall emerge one day.
You understand me ? I have said enough ?

Festus. Now die, dear Aureole !

Paracelsus. Festus, let my hand—

This hand, lie in your own, my own true
friend !

Aprile ! Hand in hand with you, Aprile !

Festus. And this was Paracelsus !

NOTE.

THE liberties I have taken with my subject are very trifling ; and the reader may slip the foregoing scenes between the leaves of any memoir of Paracelsus he pleases, by way of commentary. To prove this, I subjoin a popular account, translated from the " Biographie Universelle, Paris," 1822, which I select, not as the best, certainly, but as being at hand, and sufficiently concise for my purpose. I also append a few notes, in order to correct those parts which do not bear out my own view of the character of Paracelsus ; and have incorporated with them a notice or two, illustrative of the poem itself.

" PARACELSUS (Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus ab Hohenheim) was born in 1493 at Einsiedeln, (¹) a little town in the canton of Schwyz, some leagues distant from Zurich. His father, who exercised the profession of medicine at Villach in Carinthia, was nearly related to George Bombast de Hohenheim, who became afterward Grand Prior of the Order of Malta : consequently Paracelsus could not spring from the dregs of the people, as Thomas Erastus, his sworn enemy, pretends.* It appears that his elementary education was much neglected, and that he spent part of his youth in pursuing the life common to the travelling literati of the age ; that is to say, in wandering from country to country, predicting the future by astrology and chiromancy, evoking apparitions, and practising the different operations of magic and alchemy, in which he had been initiated whether by his father or by various ecclesiastics, among the number of whom he particularizes the Abbot Tritheim, (2) and many German bishops.

* I shall disguise M. Renaudin's next sentence a little. " Hic (Erastus sc.) Paracelsum trimum a milite quodam, alii a sue exectum ferunt : constat imberbem illum, mulierumque osorem fuisse." A standing High-Dutch joke in those days at the expense of a number of learned men, as may be seen by referring to such rubbish at Melander's " Jocoseria," etc. In the prints from his portrait by Tinoretto, painted a year before his death, Paracelsus is barbatulus, at all events. But Erastus was never without a good reason for his faith—e.g. " Helvetium fuisse (Paracelsum) vix credo, vix enim ea regio tale monstrum ediderit." (De Medicina Nova.)

"As Paracelsus displays everywhere an ignorance of the rudiments of the most ordinary knowledge, it is not probable that he ever studied seriously in the schools: he contented himself with visiting the Universities of Germany, France, and Italy; and in spite of his boasting himself to have been the ornament of those institutions, there is no proof of his having legally acquired the title of Doctor, which he assumes. It is only known that he applied himself long, under the direction of the wealthy Sigismund Fugger of Schwatz, to the discovery of the Magnum Opus.

"Paracelsus travelled among the mountains of Bohemia, in the East, and in Sweden, in order to inspect the labours of the miners, to be initiated in the mysteries of the oriental adepts, and to observe the secrets of nature and the famous mountain of loadstone. (3) He professes also to have visited Spain, Portugal, Prussia, Poland, and Transylvania; everywhere communicating freely, not merely with the physicians, but the old women, charlatans and conjurers of these several lands. It is even believed that he extended his journeyings as far as Egypt and Tartary, and that he accompanied the son of the Khan of the Tartars to Constantinople, for the purpose of obtaining the secret of the tincture of Trismegistus from a Greek who inhabited that capital.

"The period of his return to Germany is unknown: it is only certain that, at about the age of thirty-three, many astonishing cures which he wrought on eminent personages procured him such a celebrity, that he was called in 1526, on the recommendation of Ecolampadius, (4) to fill a chair of physic and surgery at the University of Basil. There Paracelsus began by burning publicly in the amphitheatre the works of Avicenna and Galen, assuring his auditors that the latches of his shoes were more instructed than those two physicians; that all Universities, all writers put together, were less gifted than the hairs of his beard and of the crown of his head; and that, in a word, he was to be regarded as the legitimate monarch of medicine. 'You shall follow me,' cried he, 'you, Avicenna, Galen, Rhasis, Montagnana, Mesues, you, gentlemen of Paris, Montpellier, Germany, Cologne, Vienna,* and whosoever the Rhine and Danube nourish; you who inhabit the isles of the sea; you, likewise, Dalmatians, Athenians; thou, Arab; thou, Greek; thou, Jew: all shall follow me, and the monarchy shall be mine.' †

"But at Basil it was speedily perceived that the new Professor was no better than an egregious quack. Scarcely a year elapsed before his lectures had fairly driven away an audience incapable of comprehending their emphatic jargon. That which above all contributed to stilly his reputation was the debauched life he led. According to the testimony of Oporinus, who lived two years in his intimacy, Paracelsus scarcely ever ascended the lecture-desk unless half drunk, and only dictated to his secretaries when in a state of intoxication: if summoned to attend the sick, he rarely proceeded thither without previously drenching himself with wine. He was accustomed to retire to bed without changing his clothes; sometimes he spent the night in pot-houses with peasants, and in the morning knew no longer what he was about; and, nevertheless, up to the age of twenty-five his only drink had been water. (5)

"At length, fearful of being punished for a serious outrage on a magistrate, (6) he fled from Basil towards the end of the year 1527, and took refuge in Alsatia, whither he caused Oporinus to follow with his chemical apparatus.

"He then entered once more upon the career of ambulatory theosophist. ‡ Accordingly we find him at Colmar in 1528; at Nuremberg in 1529; at St. Gall in 1531; at Pfeffers in 1535; and at Augsburg in 1536: he next made some stay in Moravia, where he still further compromised his reputation by the loss of many distinguished patients, which compelled him

† See his works passim. I must give one specimen:—Somebody had been styling him "Luther alter." "And why not?" (he asks, as he well might). "Luther is abundantly learned, therefore you hate him and me; but we are at least a match for you.—Nam et contra vos et vestros universos principes Avicennam, Galenum, Aristotelem, etc. me satis superque munitum esse novi. Et vertex iste meus calvus ac depilis multo plura et sublimiora novit quam vester vel Avicenna vel universæ academix Proditæ. et signum date, qui viri sitis, quid roboris habeatis? quid autem sitis? Doctores et magistri, pediculos pectentes et fricantes pedicem." (Frag. Med.)

‡ "So migratory a life could afford Paracelsus but little leisure for application to books, and accordingly he informs us that for the space of ten years he never opened a single volume, and that his whole medical library was not composed of six sheets: in effect, the inventory drawn up after his death states that the only books which he left were the Bible, the New Testament, the Commentaries of St. Jerome on the Gospels, a printed volume on Medicine, and seven manuscripts."

* Erasmus, who relates this, here oddly remarks, "mirum quod non et Garamantios, Indos et Anglos adjunxit." Not so wonderful neither, if we believe what another adversary "had heard somewhere,"—that all Paracelsus' system came of his pillaging "Anglum quendam, Rogerium Bacchonem."

to betake himself to Vienna; from thence he passed into Hungary; and in 1538 was at Villach, where he dedicated his 'Chronicle' to the States of Carinthia, in gratitude for the many kindnesses with which they had honoured his father. Finally, from Mindelheim, which he visited in 1540, Paracelsus proceeded to Salzburg, where he died in the Hospital of St. Stephen (Sebastian is meant), Sept. 24, 1541. —(Here follows a criticism on his writings, which I omit.)

(1) Paracelsus would seem to be a fantastic version of Von Hohenheim; Ein-siedeln is the Latinized Eremus, whence Paracelsus is sometimes called, as in the correspondence of Erasmus, Eremita; Bombast, his proper name, probably acquired, from the characteristic phraseology of his lectures, that unlucky signification which it has ever since retained.

(2) Then Bishop of Spanheim, and residing at Würzburg in Franconia; a town situated in a grassy fertile country, whence its name, Herbipolis. He was much visited there by learned men, as may be seen by his "Epistolæ Familiares," Hag. 1536: among others, by his staunch friend Cornelius Agrippa, to whom he dates thence, in 1510, a letter in answer to the dedicatory epistle prefixed to the treatise De Occult. Philo-soph., which last contains the following ominous allusion to Agrippa's sojourn: "Quum nuper tecum, R. P. in cœnobio tuo apud Herbipolim aliquandiu conversatus, multa de chymicis, multa de magicis, multa de cabalisticis, ceterisque quæ adhuc in occulto delitescent, arcanis scientiis atque artibus una contulissimus," etc.

(3) "Inexplebilis illa aviditas naturæ perscrutandi secreta et reconditarum supellectile scientiarum animum locupletandi, uno eodemque loco diu persistere non patiebatur, sed Mercurii instar, omnes terras, nationes et urbes perlustRANDI igniculos supponebat, ut cum viris naturæ scrutatoribus, chymicis præsertim, ore tenus conferret, et quæ diuturnis laboribus nocturnisque vigiliis invenerant una vel altera communicatione obtineret." (Bitivskius in Præfat.) "Patris auxilio primum, deinde propria industria doctissimos viros in Germania, Italia, Gallia, Hispania, aliisque Europæ regionibus, nactus est præceptores; quorum liberali doctrina, et potissimum propria inquisitione ut qui esset ingenio acutissimo ac fere divino, tantum profecit, ut multi testati sint, in universa philosophia, tam ardua, tam arcana et abdita eruisse mortalium neminem." (Melch. Adam, in Vit. Germ. Medic.) "Paracelsus qui in intima nature viscera sic penitus introierit, metallorum stirpiumque vires et facultates tam incredibili ingenii acumine exploraverit ac perviderit, ad morbos omnes vel desperatos et opinione hominum insanabiles percurandum; ut cum Theophrasto nata primum medicina perfectaque videtur." (Petri Rami Orat. de Basilea.) His passion for wandering is best described in his own words: "Ecce amatorem adolescentem difficillimi itineris baud piget, ut venustam saltem puellam vel fœminam aspiciat: quanto minus nobilissimarum artium amore laboris ac cujuslibet tædiæ pigebit?" etc. ("Defensiones Septem adversus æmulos suos," 1573. Def. 4ta. "De peregrinationibus et exilio.")

(4) The reader may remember that it was in conjunction with Æcolampadius, then Divinity Professor at Basil, that Zuinglius published in 1528 an answer to Luther's Confession of Faith; and that both proceeded in company to the subsequent conference with Luther and Melancthon at Marburg. Their letters fill a large volume.—"D.D. Johannis Æcolampadii et Huldrici Zuinglii Epistolarum lib. quatuor," Bas. 1536. It must be also observed that Zuinglius began to preach in 1516, and at Zurich in 1519, and that in 1525 the Mass was abolished in the cantons. The tenets of Æcolampadius were supposed to be more evangelical than those up to that period maintained by the glorious German, and our brave Bishop Fisher, attacked them as the fouler heresy:—"About this time arose out of Luther's school one Æcolampadius, like a mighty and fierce giant; who, as his master had gone beyond the Church, went beyond his master (or else it had been impossible he could have been reputed the better scholar), who denied the real presence; him, this worthy champion (the Bishop) sets upon, and with five books (like so many smooth stones taken out of the river that doth always run with living water) slays the Philistine; which five books were written in the year of our Lord 1526, at which time he had governed the see of Rochester twenty years." (Life of Bishop Fisher, 1655.) Now, there is no doubt of the Protestantism of Paracelsus, Erasmus, Agrippa, etc., but the nonconformity of Paracelsus was always scandalous. L. Crasso ("Elogi d'Huomini Letterati," Ven. 1666) informs us that his books were excommunicated by the Church. Quenstedt (de Patr. Doct.) affirms "nec tantum novæ medicinæ, verum etiam novæ theologiæ autor est." Delrio, in his Disquisition. Magicar., classes him among those "partim atheos, partim hæreticos" (lib. i. cap. 3). "Omnino tamen multa theologica in ejusdem scriptis plane atheismum olent, ac durissime sonant in auribus vere Christiani." (D. Gabriels Claudi Schediasma de Tinct. Univ. Norimb. 1736.) I shall only add one more authority:—"Oporius dicit se (Paracel-

sum) aliquando Lutherum et Papam, non minus quam nunc Galenum et Hippocratem redacturum in ordinem munabatur, neque enim eorum qui hactenus in scripturam sacram scripserunt, sive veteres, sive recentiores, quenquam scripturæ nucleum recte eruisse, sed circa corticem et quasi membranam tantum hæreere." (Th. Erastus, Disputat. de Med. Nova.) These and similar notions had their due effect on Oporinus, who, says Zuingerus, in his "Theatrum," "longum vale dixit ei (Paracelso), ne ob præceptoris, aliqui amicissimi, horrendas blasphemias ipse quoque aliquando pœnas Deo Opt. Max. lueret."

(5) His defenders allow the drunkenness. Take a sample of their excuses: "Gentis hoc, non viri vitium est, a Taciti seculo ad nostrum usque non interrupto filo devolutum, sinceritati forte Germanæ cœsum, et nescio an aliquo consanguinitatis vinculo junctum. (Bitiskius.) The other charges were chiefly trumped up by Oporinus: "Domi, quod Oporinus amanuensis ejus sæpe narravit, nunquam nisi potus ad explicanda sua accessit, atque in medio conclavi ad columnam τετυφωμένος adstitem, apprehenso manibus capulo ensis, cujus κολωμα hospitium præbuit, ut aiunt, spiritui familiari, imaginationes aut concepta sua protulit:—alii illud quod in capulo habuit, ab ipso Azoth appellatum, medicinam fuisse prestantissimam aut lapidem Philosophicum putant." (Melch. Adam.) This famous sword was no laughing-matter in those days, and it is now a material feature in the popular idea of Paracelsus. I recollect a couple of allusions to it in our own literature, at the moment.

Ne had been known the Danish Gonswart,
Or Paracelsus with his long sword,
"Volpone," act ii. scene 2.

Bumbastus kept a devil's bird
Shut in the pommel of his sword,
That taught him all the cunning pranks
Of past and future mountebanks,
"Hudibras," part ii. cant. 3.

This Azoth was simply "laudanum suum." But in his time he was commonly believed to possess the double tincture—the power of curing diseases and transmuting metals. Oporinus often witnessed, as he declares, both these effects, as did also Francisus, the servant of Paracelsus, who describes, in a letter to Neander, a successful projection at which he was present, and the results of which, good golden ingots, were confided to his keeping. For the other quality, let the following notice vouch among many others:—"Degebat Theophrastus Norimbergæ prociis a medentibus illius urbis, et vaniloquus deceptorque proclamatus, qui, ut laboranti famæ subveniat, viros quosdam auctoritatis summæ in Republica illa adit, et infamiae amoliendæ, artique suæ asserendæ, specimen ejus pollicetur editurum, nullo stipendio vel accepto pretio, horum faciles præbentium aures jussu elephantiacos aliquot, a communionem hominum cæterorum segregatos, et in valedudinarium detrusos, alieno arbitrio eliguntur, quos virtute singulari remediortum suorum Theophrastus a fœda Græcorum lepra mundat, pristinaque sanitati restituit; conservat illustre harum curationum urbs in archivis suis testimonium." (Bitiskius.)* It is to be remarked that Oporinus afterwards repented of his treachery: "Sed respicit tandem, et quem vivum convitiis insectatus fuerat defunctum veneratione prosequitur, infames famæ præceptoris morsus in remorsus conscientie conversi pœnitentia, heu nimis tarda, vulnera claudere exanimi, quæ spiranti infixerant." For these "bites" of Oporinus, see Disputat. Erasti, and Andreae Jocisci "Oratio de Vit. ob. Opori;" for the "remorse," Mic. Toxita in pref. Testamenti, and Conringius (otherwise an enemy of Paracelsus), who says it was contained in a letter from Oporinus to Doctor Vegerus.†

Whatever the moderns may think of these marvellous attributes, the title of Paracelsus to be considered the father of modern chemistry is indisputable. Gerardus Vossius, "De Philos^a et Philos^{um} sectis," thus prefaces the ninth section of cap. 9, "De Chymia"—"Nobilem hanc medicinæ partem, diu sepultam avorum ætate, quasi ab orco revocavit Th. Paracelsus." I suppose many hints lie scattered in his neglected books, which clever appropriators have since developed with applause. Thus, it appears from his treatise "De Phlebotomia," and elsewhere, that he had discovered the circulation of the blood and the sanguification of the heart; as did after him Realdo Colombo, and still more perfectly Andrea Cesalpino of Arezzo, as Bayle and Bartoli observe. Even

* The premature death of Paracelsus casts no manner of doubt on the fact of his having possessed the Elivir Vite: the alchemists have abundant reasons to adduce, from which I select the following, as explanatory of a property of the Tincture not calculated on by its votaries—"Objectionem illam, quod Paracelsus non fuerit longævus, nonnulli quoque solvunt per rationes physicas; vitæ nimirum abbreviationem fortasse talibus accidere posse, ob Tincturam frequentiore ac largiore dosi sumtam, dum a summe efficaci et penetrabili hujus virtute calor innatus quasi suffocatur." (Gabrielis Clauderi Schediasma.)

† For a good defence of Paracelsus I refer the reader to Olaus Borrichius' treatise—"Hermetis ecce Sapientia vindicata," 1674. Or, if he is no more learned than myself in such matters, I mention simply that Paracelsus introduced the use of Mercury and Laudanum.

Javater quotes a passage from his work "De Natura Rerum," on practical Physiognomy, in which the definitions and axioms are precise enough: he adds, "though an astrological enthusiast, a man of prodigious genius." See Holcroft's translation, vol. iii. p. 179—"The Eyes." While on the subject of the writings of Paracelsus, I may explain a passage in the third part of the Poem. He was, as I have said, unwilling to publish his works, but in effect did publish a vast number. Valentius (in Præfat. in Paramyr.) declares "quod ad librorum Paracelsi copiam attinet, audio, a Germanis prope trecentos recenseri." "O fecunditas ingenii!" adds he, appositely. Many of these were, however, spurious; and Fred. Putschius gives his good edition (3 vols. fol. Gen. 1658) "rejectis suppositis solo ipsius nomine superbientibus quorum ingens circum fertur numerus." The rest were "charissimum et pretiosissimum authoris pignus, extorsum potius ab illo quam obtentum." "Jam minime eo volente atque iubente hæc ipsius scripta in lucem prodisse videntur; quippe quæ muro inclusa ipso absente, servi cujusdam indicio, fuito surrepta atque sublata sunt," says Valen-tius. These have been the study of a host of commentators, amongst whose labours are most notable, Petri Severini, "Idea Medicinæ Philosophiæ. Bas. 1571;" Mic. Toxetis, "Onomastica. Arg. 1574;" Dornei, "Dict. Parac. Franc. 1584;" and "Pl Philos^æ Compendium cum scholiis auctore Leone Suavio. Paris," (This last, a good book.)

(6) A disgraceful affair. One Liechtenfels, a canon, having been rescued in extremis by the "laudanum" of Paracelsus, refused the stipulated fee, and was supported in his meanness by the authorities, whose interference Paracelsus would not brook. His own liberality was allowed by his bitterest foes, who found a ready solution of his indifference to profit in the aforesaid sword-handle and its guest. His freedom from the besetting sin of a profession he abhorred—(as he curiously says somewhere, "Quis quæso deinceps honorem deferat professione tali, quæ a tam facinorosis nebulonibus obitur et administratur?")—is recorded in his epitaph, which affirms—"Bona sua in pauperes distribuenda collocandaque erogavit," honoravit, or ordinavit—for accounts differ.

STRAFFORD;

A TRAGEDY.

1837.

[Acted 1st May 1837 at Covent Garden Theatre, Mr. Macready as Strafford and Miss Helen Faucit as Lady Carlisle.]

DEDICATED, IN ALL AFFECTIONATE ADMIRATION,

TO

WILLIAM C. MACREADY.

LONDON: April 23, 1837.

STRAFFORD.

PERSONS.

CHARLES I.
Earl of HOLLAND.
Lord SAVILE.
Sir HENRY VANE.
WENTWORTH, Viscount WENTWORTH, Earl of STRAFFORD.
JOHN PYM.
JOHN HAMPDEN.
The younger VANE.
DENZIL HOLLIS.
BENJAMIN RUDYARD.
NATHANIEL FIENNES.
Earl of LOUDON.
MAXWELL, Usher of the Black Rod.
A Puritan.
Queen HENRIETTA.
LUCY PERCY, Countess of Carlisle.

Presbyterians, Scots Commissioners, Adherents of Strafford, Secretaries, Officers of the Court, &c. Two of Strafford's children.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A House near Whitehall. HAMPDEN, HOLLIS, the younger VANE, RUDYARD, FIENNES and many of the Presbyterian Party: LOUDON and other Scots Commissioners.

Vane. I say, if he be here—

Rudyard. (And he is here!)

Hollis. For England's sake let every man be still

Nor speak of him, so much as say his name,
Till Pym rejoin us! Rudyard! Henry Vane!
One rash conclusion may decide our course
And with it England's fate—think—England's fate!

Hampden, for England's sake they should be still!

Vane. You say so, Hollis? Well, I must be still.

It is indeed too bitter that one man,
Any one man's mere presence, should suspend

England's combined endeavour: little need
To name him!

Rudyard. For you are his brother, Hollis!

Hampden. Shame on you, Rudyard! time to tell him that,

When he forgets the Mother of us all.

Rudyard. Do I forget her?

Hampden. You talk idle hate
Against her foe: is that so strange a thing?
Is hating Wentworth all the help she needs?

A Puritan. The Philistine strode, cursing as he went:

But David—five smooth pebbles from the brook

Within his scrip . . .

Rudyard. Be you as still as David!

Fiennes. Here's Rudyard not ashamed to wag a tongue

Stiff with ten years' disuse of Parliaments ;
Why, when the last sat, Wentworth sat with us !

Rudyard. Let's hope for news of them now he returns—

He that was safe in Ireland, as we thought !
—But I'll abide Pym's coming.

Vane. Now, by Heaven,
They may be cool who can, silent who will—
Some have a gift that way ! Wentworth is here,
Here, and the King's safe closeted with him
Ere this. And when I think on all that's past
Since that man left us, how his single arm
Rolled the advancing good of England back
And set the woeful past up in its place,
Exalting Dagon where the Ark should be,—
How that man has made firm the fickle King (Hampden, I will speak out !)—in aught he feared

To venture on before ; taught tyranny
Her dismal trade, the use of all her tools,
To ply the scourge yet screw the gag so close
That strangled agony bleeds mute to death ;
How he turns Ireland to a private stage
For training infant villanies, new ways
Of wringing treasure out of tears and blood,
Unheard oppressions nourished in the dark
To try how much man's nature can endure
—If he dies under it, what harm ? if not,
Why, one more trick is added to the rest
Worth a king's knowing, and what Ireland
bears

England may learn to bear :—how all this while

That man has set himself to one dear task,
The bringing Charles to relish more and more Power, power without law, power and blood
too

—Can I be still ?

Hampden. For that you should be still.

Vane. Oh Hampden, then and now ! The year he left us,

The People in full Parliament could wrest
The Bill of Rights from the reluctant King ;
And now, he'll find in an obscure small room
A stealthy gathering of great-hearted men
That take up England's cause : England is
here !

Hampden. And who despairs of England ?

Rudyard. That do I,
If Wentworth comes to rule her. I am sick
To think her wretched masters, Hamilton,
The muckworm Cottington, the maniac Laud,
May yet be longed-for back again. I say,
I do despair.

Vane. And, Rudyard, I'll say this—
Which all true men say after me, not loud
But solemnly and as you'd say a prayer !
This King, who treads our England underfoot,
Has just so much . . . it may be fear or craft,
As bids him pause at each fresh outrage ;
friends,

He needs some sterner hand to grasp his own,
Some voice to ask, "Why shrink ? Am I not by ?"

Now, one whom England loved for serving
her,

Found in his heart to say, "I know where best
"The iron heel shall bruise her, for she leans
"Upon me when you trample." Witness, you !
So Wentworth heartened Charles, so England
fell.

But inasmuch as life is hard to take

From England . . .

Many Voices. Go on, Vane ! 'Tis well said, Vane !

Vane. —Who has not so forgotten Runny-mead !—

Voices. 'Tis well and bravely spoken,
Vane ! Go on !

Vane. —There are some little signs of late she knows

The ground no place for her. She glances round,

Wentworth has dropped the hand, is gone his way

On other service : what if she arise ?

No ! the King beckons, and beside him stands
The same bad man once more, with the same smile

And the same gesture. Now shall England crouch,

Or catch at us and rise ?

Voices.

The Renegade !

Haman ! Ahithophel !

Hampden. Gentlemen of the North,

It was not thus the night your claims were urged,

And we pronounced the League and Covenant,
The cause of Scotland, England's cause as well:

Vane there, sat motionless the whole night through.

Vane. Hampden!

Fiennes. Stay, Vane!

Loudon. Be just and patient, Vane!

Vane. Mind how you counsel patience,
Loudon! you

Have still a Parliament, and this your League
To back it; you are free in Scotland still:

While we are brothers, hope's for England yet.
But know you wherefore Wentworth comes?
to quench

This last of hopes? that he brings war with him?

Know you the man's self? what he dares?

Loudon. We know,
All know—'tis nothing new.

Vane. And what's new, then,
In calling for his life? Why, Pym himself—
You must have heard—ere Wentworth dropped our cause

He would see Pym first; there were many more Strong on the people's side and friends of his,
Eliot that's dead, Rudyard and Hampden here,
But for these Wentworth cared not; only, Pym
He would see—Pym and he were sworn, 'tis
said,

To live and die together; so, they met
At Greenwich. Wentworth, you are sure, was long,

Specious enough, the devil's argument
Lost nothing on his lips; he'd have Pym own
A patriot could not play a purer part
Than follow in his track; they two combined Might put down England. Well, Pym heard him out;

One glance—you know Pym's eye—one word was all:

"You leave us, Wentworth! while your head is on.

"I'll not leave you."

Hampden. Has he left Wentworth,
then?

Has England lost him? Will you let him
speak,

Or put your crude surmises in his mouth?
Away with this! Will you have Pym or Vane?

Voices. Wait Pym's arrival! Pym shall speak.

Hampden.

Meanwhile

Let Loudon read the Parliament's report
From Edinburgh: our last hope, as Vane says,
Is in the stand it makes. Loudon!

Vane.

No, no!

Silent I can be: not indifferent!

Hampden. Then each keep silence, praying God to spare

His anger, cast not England quite away
In this her visitation!

A Puritan.

Seven years long

The Midianite drove Israel into dens
And caves. Till God sent forth a mighty man,

Pym enters.

Even Gideon!

Pym. Wentworth's come: nor sickness,
care,

The ravaged body nor the ruined soul,
More than the winds and waves that beat his ship,

Could keep him from the King. He has not reached

Whitehall: they've hurried up a Council there
To lose no time and find him work enough.

Where's Loudon? your Scots' Parliament . . .
Loudon. Holds firm:

We were about to read reports.

Pym.

The King

Has just dissolved your Parliament.

Loudon and other Scots.

Great God!

An oath-breaker! Stand by us, England,
then!

Pym. The King's too sanguine; doubtless Wentworth's here;

But still some little form might be kept up.

Hampden. Now speak, Vane! Rudyard, you had much to say!

Hollis. The rumour's false, then . . .

Pym.

Ay, the Court gives out

His own concerns have brought him back:
I know

Tis the King calls him. Wentworth super-sedes

The tribe of Cottingtons and Hamiltons
Whose part is played; there's talk enough, by this,—

Merciful talk, the King thinks: time is now
To turn the record's last and bloody leaf
Which, chronicling a nation's great despair,
Tells they were long rebellious, and their lord
Indulgent, till, all kind expedients tried,
He drew the sword on them and reigned in
peace.

Laud's laying his religion on the Scots
Was the last gentle entry: the new page Shall run, the King thinks, "Wentworth thrust it down

"At the sword's point."

A Puritan. I'll do your bidding, Pym,
England's and God's—one blow!

Pym. A goodly thing—
We all say, friends, it is a goodly thing
To right that England. Heaven grows dark
above:

Let's snatch one moment ere the thunder fall,
To say how well the English spirit comes out
Beneath it! All have done their best, indeed,
From lion Eliot, that grand Englishman,
To the least here: and who, the least one here,
When she is saved (for her redemption dawns Dimly, most dimly, but it dawns—it dawns)
Who'd give at any price his hope away
Of being named along with the Great Men?
We would not—no, we would not give that up!

Hampden. And one name shall be dearer than all names.

When children, yet unborn, are taught that name

After their fathers',—taught what matchless
man . . .

Pym. . . . Saved England? What if Wentworth's should be still

That name?

Rudyard and others. We have just said it,
Pym! His death

Saves her! We said it—there's no way beside!
I'll do God's bidding, Pym! They struck down Joab

And purged the land.

Vane. No villanous striking-down!
Rudyard. No, a calm vengeance: let the whole land rise

And shout for it. No Feltons!

Pym. Rudyard, no!
England rejects all Feltons; most of all Since Wentworth . . . Hampden, say the trust again

Of England in her servants—but I'll think
You know me, all of you. Then, I believe,
Spite of the past, Wentworth rejoins you,
friends!

Vane and others. Wentworth? Apostate!
Judas! Double-dyed

A traitor! Is it Pym, indeed . . .

Pym. . . . Who says
Vane never knew that Wentworth, loved that
man,

Was used to stroll with him, arm locked in arm,
Along the streets to see the people pass,
And read in every island-countenance
Fresh argument for God against the King,—
Never sat down, say, in the very house
Where Eliot's brow grew broad with noble
thoughts,

(You've joined us, Hampden—Hollis, you as well.)

And then left talking over Gracchus' death . . .

Vane. To frame, we know it well, the choicest clause

In the Petition of Right: he framed such clause
One month before he took at the King's hand
His Northern Presidency, which that Bill Denounced.

Pym. Too true! Never more, never
more

Walked we together! Most alone I went.
I have had friends—all here are fast my
friends—

But I shall never quite forget that friend.
And yet it could not but be real in him!
You, Vane,—you, Rudyard, have no right to
trust

To Wentworth: but can no one hope with me?
Hampden, will Wentworth dare shed English blood

Like water?

Hampden. Ireland is Aceldama.

Pym. Will he turn Scotland to a hunting-ground
To please the King, now that he knows the King?

The People or the King? and that King, Charles!

Hampden. Pym, all here know you: you'll not set your heart

On any baseless dream. But say one deed Of Wentworth's since he left us . . .

[Shouting without.]
Vane. There! he comes,

And they shout for him! Wentworth's at Whitehall,

The King embracing him, now, as we speak, And he, to be his match in courtesies, Taking the whole war's risk upon himself, Now, while you tell us here how changed he is!

Hear you?

Pym. And yet if 'tis a dream, no more, That Wentworth chose their side, and brought the King

To love it as though Laud had loved it first, And the Queen after;—that he led their cause Calm to success, and kept it spotless through, So that our very eyes could look upon The travail of our souls, and close content That violence, which something mars even right

Which sanctions it, had taken off no grace From its serene regard. Only a dream!

Hampden. We meet here to accomplish certain good

By obvious means, and keep tradition up Of free assemblages, else obsolete, In this poor chamber: nor without effect Has friend met friend to counsel and confirm, As, listening to the beats of England's heart, We spoke its wants to Scotland's prompt reply By these her delegates. Remains alone That word grow deed, as with God's help it shall—

But with the devil's hindrance, who doubts too? Looked we or no that tyranny should turn Her engines of oppression to their use?

Whereof, suppose the worst be Wentworth here—

VOL. I.

Shall we break off the tactics which succeed In drawing out our formidablest foe, Let bickering and disunion take their place? Or count his presence as our conquest's proof, And keep the old arms at their steady play? Proceed to England's work! Fiennes, read the list!

Fiennes. Ship-money is refused or fiercely paid

In every county, save the northern parts Where Wentworth's influence . . .

[Shouting.]
Vane. I, in England's name,

Declare her work, this way, at end! Till now, Up to this moment, peaceful strife was best.

We English had free leave to think; till now, We had a shadow of a Parliament

In Scotland. But all's changed: they change the first,

They try brute-force for law, they, first of all . . .

Voices. Good! Talk enough! The old true hearts with Vane!

Vane. Till we crush Wentworth for her, there's no act

Serves England!

Voices. Vane for England!

Pym. Pym should be Something to England. I seek Wentworth, friends.

SCENE II.—Whitehall.

Lady CARLISLE and WENTWORTH.

Wentworth. And the King?

Lady Carlisle. Wentworth, learn on me! Sit then!

I'll tell you all; this horrible fatigue Will kill you.

Wentworth. No;—or, Lucy, just your arm;

I'll not sit till I've cleared this up with him: After that, rest. The King?

Lady Carlisle. Confides in you.

Wentworth. Why? or, why now?—They have kind throats, the knaves!

Shout for me—they!

Lady Carlisle. You come so strangely Or leave them out and go straight to the charge—soon :
Yet we took measures to keep off the crowd— The charge !
Did they shout for you ? Lady Carlisle. Oh, there's no charge,
no precise charge ;
Wentworth. Wherefore should they not ? Only they sneer, make light of—one may say,
Does the King take such measures for himself ? Nibble at what you do.
Beside, there's such a dearth of malcontents, Wentworth. I know ! but, Lucy,
You say ! I reckoned on you from the first !—Go on !
Lady Carlisle. I said but few dared carp at you. —Was sure could I once see this gentle friend
When I arrived, she'd throw an hour away
To help her . . . what am I ?
Lady Carlisle. You thought of me,
Dear Wentworth ?
Wentworth. But go on ! The party here !
Lady Carlisle. They do not think your Irish government
Of that surpassing value . . .
Wentworth. The one thing
Of value ! The one service that the crown
May count on ! All that keeps these very Vanes
In power, to vex me—not that they do vex,
Only it might vex some to hear that service
Decried, the sole support that's left the King !
Lady Carlisle. So the Archbishop says.
Wentworth. Ah ? well, perhaps
The only hand held up in my defence
May be old Laud's ! These Hollands then, these Saviles
Nibble ? They nibble ?—that's the very word !
Lady Carlisle. Your profit in the Customs,
Bristol says,
Exceeds the due proportion : while the tax . . .
Wentworth. Enough ! 'tis too unworthy,—
I am not
So patient as I thought. What's Pym about ?
Lady Carlisle. Pym ?
Wentworth. Pym and the People.
Lady Carlisle. Oh, the Faction !
Extinct—of no account : there'll never be Another Parliament.
Wentworth. Tell Savile that !
You may know—(ay, you do—the creatures
here
Never forget !) that in my earliest life
I was not . . . much that I am now ! The King

Lady Carlisle. He surely not disposed to let me bear
The same away from him of these late deeds
In Ireland ? I am yet his instrument
Be it for well or ill ? He trusts me, too !
Lady Carlisle. The King, dear Wentworth, purposes, I said,
To grant you, in the face of all the Court . . .
Wentworth. All the Court ! Evermore the Court about us !
Savile and Holland, Hamilton and Vane
About us,—then the King will grant me—
what ?
That he for once put these aside and say—
“ Tell me your whole mind, Wentworth ! ”
Lady Carlisle. You professed
You would be calm.
Wentworth. Lucy, and I am calm !
How else shall I do all I come to do,
Broken, as you may see, body and mind,
How shall I serve the King ? Time wastes
meanwhile,
You have not told me half. His footstep ! No.
Quick, then, before I meet him,—I am calm—
Why does the King distrust me ?
Lady Carlisle. He does not Distrust you.
Wentworth. Lucy, you can help me ; you
Have even seemed to care for me : one word !
Is it the Queen ?
Lady Carlisle. No, not the Queen : the party
That poisons the Queen's ear, Savile and Holland.
Wentworth. I know, I know : old Vane, too, he's one too ?
Go on—and he's made Secretary. Well ?

May take my word on points concerning Pym
Before Lord Savile's, Lucy, or if not,
I bid them ruin their wise selves, not me,
These Vanes and Hollands! I'll not be their tool

Who might be Pym's friend yet.

But there's the King!

Where is he?

Lady Carlisle. Just apprised that you arrive.

Wentworth. And why not here to meet me? I was told
He sent for me, nay, longed for me.

Lady Carlisle. Because,—
He is now . . . I think a Council's sitting now
About this Scots affair.

Wentworth. A Council sits?
They have not taken a decided course
Without me in the matter?

Lady Carlisle. I should say . . .

Wentworth. The war? They cannot have agreed to that?
Not the Scots' war?—without consulting me—
Me, that am here to show how rash it is,
How easy to dispense with?—Ah, you too Against me! well,—the King may take his
time.

—Forget it, Lucy! Cares make peevish: mine
Weigh me (but 'tis a secret) to my grave.

Lady Carlisle. For life or death I am your own, dear friend! [Goes out.]

Wentworth. Heartless! but all are heartless here. Go now,
Forsake the People!

I did not forsake

The People: they shall know it, when the
King

Will trust me!—who trusts all beside at once,
While I have not spoke Vane and Savile fair,
And am not trusted: have but saved the
throne:

Have not picked up the Queen's glove prettily,
And am not trusted. But he'll see me now.
Weston is dead: the Queen's half English
now—

More English: one decisive word will brush
These insects from . . . the step I know so
well!

The King! But now, to tell him . . . no—to ask

What's in me he distrusts:—or, best begin
By proving that this frightful Scots affair
Is just what I foretold. So much to say,
And the flesh fails, now, and the time is
come;

And one false step no way to be repaired.
You were avenged, Pym, could you look on me.

Pym enters.

Wentworth. I little thought of you just then.

Pym. No? I
Think always of you, Wentworth.

Wentworth. The old voice!
I wait the King, sir.

Pym. True—you look so pale!
A Council sits within; when that breaks up
He'll see you.

Wentworth. Sir, I thank you.
Pym. Oh, thank Laud!

You know when Laud once gets on Church
affairs

The case is desperate: he'll not be long
To-day: he only means to prove, to-day,
We English all are mad to have a hand
In butchering the Scots for serving God
After their fathers' fashion: only that!

Wentworth. Sir, keep your jests for those who relish them!

(Does he enjoy their confidence?) 'Tis kind
To tell me what the Council does.

Pym. You grudge
That I should know it had resolved on war
Before you came? no need: you shall have all
The credit, trust me!

Wentworth. Have the Council dared—
They have not dared . . . that is—I know you not.

Farewell, sir: times are changed.
Pym. —Since we two met

At Greenwich? Yes: poor patriots though we be,

You cut a figure, makes some slight return
For your exploits in Ireland! Changed indeed,

Could our friend Eliot look from out his grave!

Ah, Wentworth, one thing for acquaintance's sake,

Just to decide a question; have you, now, Felt your old self since you forsook us?

Wentworth.

Sir!

Pym. Spare me the gesture! you misapprehend.

Think not I mean the advantage is with me. I was about to say that, for my part, I never quite held up my head since then—Was quite myself since then: for first, you see, I lost all credit after that event

With those who recollect how sure I was Wentworth would outdo Eliot on our side.

Forgive me: Savile, old Vane, Holland here, Eschew plain-speaking: 'tis a trick I keep.

Wentworth. How, when, where, Savile, Vane, and Holland speak, Plainly or otherwise, would have my scorn, All of my scorn, sir . . .

Pym. . . . Did not my poor thoughts Claim somewhat?

Wentworth. Keep your thoughts! believe the King

Mistrusts me for their prattle, all these Vanes And Saviles! make your mind up, o' God's love,

That I am discontented with the King!

Pym. Why, you may be: I should be, that I know,

Were I like you.

Wentworth. Like me?

Pym. I care not much

For titles: our friend Eliot died no lord, Hampden's no lord, and Savile is a lord; But you care, since you sold your soul for one. I can't think, therefore, your soul's purchaser Did well to laugh you to such utter scorn When you twice prayed so humbly for its price,

The thirty silver pieces . . . I should say, The Earldom you expected, still expect, And may. Your letters were the movingest! Console yourself: I've borne him prayers just now

From Scotland not to be oppressed by Laud, Words moving in their way: he'll pay, be sure, As much attention as to those you sent.

Wentworth. False, sir! Who showed them you? Suppose it so,

The King did very well . . . nay, I was glad When it was shown me: I refused, the first!

John Pym, you were my friend—forebear me once!

Pym. Oh, Wentworth, ancient brother of my soul,

That all should come to this!

Wentworth. Leave me!

Pym. My friend,

Why should I leave you?

Wentworth. To tell Rudyard this, And Hampden this!

Pym. Whose faces once were bright At my approach, now sad with doubt and fear, Because I hope in you—yes, Wentworth, you Who never mean to ruin England—who Who shake off, with God's help, an obscene dream

In this Ezekiel chamber, where it crept Upon you first, and wake, yourself, your true And proper self, our Leader, England's Chief, And Hampden's friend!

This is the proudest day!

Come, Wentworth! Do not even see the King!

The rough old room will seem itself again!

We'll both go in together: you've not seen Hampden so long: come: and there's Fiennes: you'll have

To know young Vane. This is the proudest day!

[The King enters. WENTWORTH lets fall PYM's hand.

Charles. Arrived, my lord?—This gentleman, we know

Was your old friend.

The Scots shall be informed What we determine for their happiness.

[Pym goes out.

You have made haste, my lord.

Wentworth. Sir, I am come . . .

Charles. To see an old familiar—nay, 'tis well;

Aid us with his experience: this Scots' League And Covenant spreads too far, and we have proofs

That they intrigue with France : the Faction too,

Whereof your friend there is the head and front,

Abets them,—as he boasted, very like.

Wentworth. Sir, trust me ! but for this once, trust me, sir !

Charles. What can you mean ?

Wentworth. That you should trust me, sir !

Oh—not for my sake ! but 'tis sad, so sad

That for distrusting me, you suffer—you Whom I would die to serve : sir, do you think

That I would die to serve you ?

Charles. But rise, Wentworth !

Wentworth. What 'shall convince you ? What does Savile do

To prove him . . . Ah, one can't tear out one's heart

And show it, how sincere a thing it is !

Charles. Have I not trusted you ?

Wentworth. Say aught but that !

There is my comfort, mark you : all will be So different when you trust me—as you shall ! It has not been your fault,—I was away, Mistook, maligned, how was the King to know ?

I am here, now—he means to trust me, now—All will go on so well !

Charles. Be sure I do—

I've heard that I should trust you : as you came,

Your friend, the Countess, told me . . .

Wentworth. No,—hear nothing—

Be told nothing about me !—you're not told Your right-hand serves you, or your children love you !

Charles. You love me, Wentworth : rise !

Wentworth. I can speak now.

I have no right to hide the truth. 'Tis I Can save you ; only I. Sir, what must be ?

Charles. Since Laud's assured (the minutes are within) —Loath as I am to spill my subjects' blood . . .

Wentworth. That is, he'll have a war : what's done is done !

Charles. They have intrigued with France ; that's clear to Laud.

Wentworth. Has Laud suggested any way to meet

The war's expense ?

Charles. He'd not decide so far

Until you joined us.

Wentworth. Most considerate !

He's certain they intrigue with France, these Scots ?

The People would be with us.

Charles. Pym should know.

Wentworth. The People for us—were the People for us !

Sir, a great thought comes to reward your trust :

Summon a Parliament ! in Ireland first, Then, here.

Charles. In truth ?

Wentworth. That saves us ! that puts off

The war, gives time to right their grievances—To talk with Pym. I know the Faction,—Laud

So styles it,—tutors Scotland : all their plans Suppose no Parliament : in calling one You take them by surprise. Produce the proofs Of Scotland's treason ; then bid England help : Even Pym will not refuse.

Charles. You would begin

With Ireland ?

Wentworth. Take no care for that : that's sure

To prosper.

Charles. You shall rule me. You were best

Return at once : but take this ere you go !

Now, do I trust you ? You're an Earl : my Friend

Of Friends : yes, while . . . You hear me not !

Wentworth. Say it all o'er again—but once again :

The first was for the music : once again !

Charles. Strafford, my friend, there may have been reports,

Vain rumours. Henceforth touching Strafford is

To touch the apple of my sight : why gaze So earnestly ?

Wentworth. I am grown young again,
And foolish. What was it we spoke of?

Charles. Ireland,
The Parliament,—

Wentworth. I may go when I will?
—Now?

Charles. Are you tired so soon of us?
Wentworth. My King!

But you will not so utterly abhor
A Parliament? I'd serve you any way.

Charles. You said just now this was the only way.

Wentworth. Sir, I will serve you.
Charles. Strafford, spare yourself:
You are so sick, they tell me.

Wentworth. 'Tis my soul
That's well and prospers now.

This Parliament—
We'll summon it, the English one—I'll
care

For everything. You shall not need them
much.

Charles. If they prove restive . . .
Wentworth. I shall be with you.

Charles. Ere they assemble?
Wentworth. I will come, or else

Deposit this infirm humanity
I' the dust. My whole heart stays with you, my King! [As WENTWORTH goes out,
the QUEEN enters.

Charles. That man must love me.
Queen. Is it over then?

Why, he looks yellower than ever! Well,
At least we shall not hear eternally
Of service—services: he's paid at least.

Charles. Not done with: he engages to surpass

All yet performed in Ireland.
Queen. I had thought

Nothing beyond was ever to be done.
The war, Charles—will he raise supplies
enough?

Charles. We've hit on an expedient; he
. . . that is,
I have advised . . . we have decided on
The calling—in Ireland—of a Parliament.

Queen. O truly! You agree to that? Is
that

The first fruit of his counsel? But I guessed
As much.

Charles. This is too idle, Henriette!
I should know best. He will strain every nerve,

And once a precedent established . . .
Queen. Notice

How sure he is of a long term of favour!
He'll see the next, and the next after that;
No end to Parliaments!

Charles. Well, it is done.
He talks it smoothly, doubtless. If, indeed,
The Commons here . . .

Queen. Here! you will summon them
Here? Would I were in France again to see A King!

Charles. But, Henriette . . .
Queen. Oh, the Scots see clear!

Why should they bear your rule?
Charles. But listen, sweet!

Queen. Let Wentworth listen—you confide in him!

Charles. I do not, love,—I do not so confide!

The Parliament shall never trouble us
. . . Nay, hear me! I have schemes, such schemes: we'll buy

The leaders off: without that, Wentworth's counsel

Had ne'er prevailed on me. Perhaps I call it
To have excuse for breaking it for ever,
And whose will then the blame be? See you
not?

Come, dearest!—look, the little fairy, now,
That cannot reach my shoulder! Dearest,
come!

ACT II.

SCENE I.—(As in Act I. Scene I.)

The same Party enters.

Rudyard. Twelve subsidies!
Vane. Oh, Rudyard, do not laugh

At least!
Rudyard. True: Strafford called the Parliament—

'Tis he should laugh!

A Puritan. Out of the serpent's root
Comes forth a cockatrice.

Fiennes. —A stinging one,
If that's the Parliament: twelve subsidies!
A stinging one! but, brother, where's your
word

For Strafford's other nest-egg, the Scots' war?
The Puritan. His fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent.

Fiennes. Shall be? It chips the shell, man; peeps abroad.

Twelve subsidies!—Why, how now, Vane?

Rudyard. Peace, Fiennes!
Fiennes. Ah?—But he was not more a dupe than I,

Or you, or any here, the day that Pym Returned with the good news. Look up, friend Vane!

We all believed that Strafford meant us well
In summoning the Parliament.

HAMPDEN enters.

Vane. Now, Hampden,
Clear me! I would have leave to sleep again:
I'd look the People in the face again:
Clear me from having, from the first, hoped,
dreamed

Better of Strafford!

Hampden. You may grow one day
A steadfast light to England, Henry Vane!

Rudyard. Meantime, by flashes I make shift to see

Strafford revived our Parliaments; before,
War was but talked of; there's an army, now:
Still, we've a Parliament! Poor Ireland
bears

Another wrench (she dies the hardest
death!)—

Why, speak of it in Parliament! and lo,
'Tis spoken, so console yourselves!

Fiennes. The jest!
We clamoured, I suppose, thus long, to win
The privilege of laying on our backs
A sorer burden than the King dares lay!

Rudyard. Mark now: we meet at length, complaints pour in

From every county, all the land cries out
On loans and levies, curses ship-money,

Calls vengeance on the Star Chamber; we lend

An ear. "Ay, lend them all the ears you have!"

Puts in the King; "my subjects, as you find,
"Are fretful, and conceive great things of
you.

"Just listen to them, friends; you'll sanction
me

"The measures they most wince at, make them yours,

"Instead of mine, I know: and, to begin,

"They say my levies pinch them,—raise me straight

"Twelve subsidies!"

Fiennes. All England cannot furnish Twelve subsidies!

Hollis. But Strafford, just returned
From Ireland—what has he to do with that?
How could he speak his mind? He left before
The Parliament assembled. Pym, who knows
Strafford . . .

Rudyard. Would I were sure we know ourselves!

What is for good, what, bad—who friend,
who foe!

Hollis. Do you count Parliaments no gain?

Rudyard. A gain?

While the King's creatures overbalance us?

—There's going on, beside, among ourselves

A quiet, slow, but most effectual course

Of buying over, sapping, leavening

The lump till all is leaven. Glanville's gone.

I'll put a case; had not the Court declared

That no sum short of just twelve subsidies

Will be accepted by the King—our House,

I say, would have consented to that offer

To let us buy off ship-money!

Hollis. Most like,

If, say, six subsidies will buy it off,

The House . . .

Rudyard. Will grant them! Hampden, do you hear?

Congratulate with me! the King's the king,

And gains his point at last—our own ascent

To that detested tax? All's over, then!

There's no more taking refuge in this room,

Protesting, "Let the King do what he will,

"We, England, are no party to our shame :
 "Our day will come !" Congratulate with me !

Pym enters.

Vane. Pym, Strafford called this Parliament, you say,
 But we'll not have our Parliaments like those In Ireland, Pym !

Rudyard. Let him stand forth, your
 friend !

One doubtful act hides far too many sins ;
 It can be stretched no more, and, to my mind,
 Begins to drop from those it covered.

Other Voices. Good !
 Let him avow himself ! No fitter time !
 We wait thus long for you.

Rudyard. Perhaps, too long !
 Since nothing but the madness of the Court,

In thus unmasking its designs at once,
 Has saved us from betraying England. Stay—
 This Parliament is Strafford's : let us vote
 Our list of grievances too black by far
 To suffer talk of subsidies : or best,
 That ship-money's disposed of long ago
 By England : any vote that's broad enough :
 And then let Strafford, for the love of it,
 Support his Parliament !

Vane. And vote as well
 No war to be with Scotland ! Hear you, Pym ?
 We'll vote, no war ! No part nor lot in it
 For England !

Many Voices. Vote, no war ! Stop the new levies !
 No Bishops' war ! At once ! When next we meet !

Pym. Much more when next we meet !
 Friends, which of you

Since first the course of Strafford was in doubt,
 Has fallen the most away in soul from me ?

Vane. I sat apart, even now under God's eye, Pondering the words that should denounce
 you, Pym,

In presence of us all, as one at league
 With England's enemy.

Pym. You are a good
 And gallant spirit, Henry. Take my hand

And say you pardon me for all the pain
 Till now ! Strafford is wholly ours.

Many Voices.

Sure ? sure ?

Pym. Most sure : for Charles dissolves the Parliament

While I speak here.

—And I must speak, friends, now !
 Strafford is ours. The King detects the
 change,

Casts Strafford off for ever, and resumes
 His ancient path : no Parliament for us,
 No Strafford for the King !

Come, all of you,
 To bid the King farewell, predict success
 To his Scots' expedition, and receive Strafford, our comrade now. The next will be Indeed a Parliament !

Vane. Forgive me, Pym !
Voices. This looks like truth : Strafford can have, indeed,

No choice.

Pym. Friends, follow me ! He's with the King.

Come, Hampden, and come, Rudyard, and come, Vane !

This is no sullen day for England, sirs !
 Strafford shall tell you !

Voices. To Whitehall then ! Come !

SCENE II.—Whitehall.

CHARLES and STRAFFORD.

Charles. Strafford !

Strafford. Is it a dream ? my papers,
 here—

Thus, as I left them, all the plans you found
 So happy—(look ! the track you pressed my
 hand

For pointing out)—and in this very room,
 Over these very plans, you tell me, sir,
 With the same face, too—tell me just one thing That ruins them ! How's this ? What may this mean ?

Sir, who has done this ?

Charles. Strafford, who but I ?
 You bade me put the rest away : indeed
 You are alone.

Strafford. Alone, and like to be !
No fear, when some unworthy scheme grows ripe,
Of those, who hatched it, leaving me to loose
The mischief on the world ! Laud hatches war,
Falls to his prayers, and leaves the rest to me,
And I'm alone.

Charles. At least, you knew as much
When first you undertook the war.

Strafford. My liege,
Was this the way ? I said, since Laud would lap
A little blood, 'twere best to hurry over
The loathsome business, not to be whole months

At slaughter—one blow, only one, then, peace,
Save for the dreams. I said, to please you both
I'd lead an Irish army to the West,
While in the South an English . . . but you
look

As though you had not told me fifty times
'Twas a brave plan ! My army is all raised,
I am prepared to join it . . .

Charles. Hear me, Strafford !

Strafford. . . . When, for some little thing, my whole design
Is set aside—(where is the wretched paper ?)
I am to lead—(ay, here it is)—to lead
The English army : why ? Northumberland
That I appointed, chooses to be sick—
Is frightened : and, meanwhile, who answers for

The Irish Parliament ? or army, either ?
Is this my plan ?

Charles. So disrespectful, sir ?

Strafford. My liege, do not believe it ! I am yours,

Yours ever : 'tis too late to think about :

To the death, yours. Elsewhere, this untoward step

Shall pass for mine ; the world shall think it
mine.

But here ! But here ! I am so seldom here,
Seldom with you, my King ! I, soon to rush
Alone upon a giant in the dark !

Charles. My Strafford !

Strafford [examines papers awhile]. "Seize the passes of the Tyne !"

VOL. I

But, sir, you see—see all I say is true ?
My plan was sure to prosper, so, no cause
To ask the Parliament for help ; whereas
We need them frightfully.

Charles. Need the Parliament ?

Strafford. Now, for God's sake, sir, not one error more !

We can afford no error ; we draw, now,
Upon our last resource : the Parliament
Must help us !

Charles. I've undone you, Strafford !

Strafford. Nay—

Nay—why despond, sir, 'tis not come to
that !

I have not hurt you ? Sir, what have I said
To hurt you ? I unsay it ! Don't despond !
Sir, do you turn from me ?

Charles. My friend of friends !

Strafford. We'll make a shift. Leave me
the Parliament !

Help they us ne'er so little and I'll make Sufficient out of it. We'll speak them fair.
They're sitting, that's one great thing ; that half gives

Their sanction to us ; that's much : don't despond !

Why, let them keep their money, at the worst !
The reputation of the People's help

Is all we want : we'll make shift yet !

Charles. Good Strafford !

Strafford. But meantime, let the sum be ne'er so small

They offer, we'll accept it : any sum—

For the look of it : the least grant tells the Scots

The Parliament is ours—their staunch ally Turned ours : that told, there's half the blow to strike !

What will the grant be ? What does Glanville think ?

Charles. Alas !

Strafford. My liege ?

Charles. Strafford !

Strafford. But answer me !

Have they . . . O surely not refused us half ?
Half the twelve subsidies ? We never looked

For all of them. How many do they give ?

Charles. You have not heard . . .

D 2

Strafford. (What has he done?)—Heard "His head is mine!" Don't stop me there!
what? You know

But speak at once, sir, this grows terrible! My head is yours, but never stop me there!

[The KING continuing silent.]

You have dissolved them!—I'll not leave Charles. Too shameful, Strafford! You this man. advised the war,

Charles. 'Twas old Vane's ill-judged And . . . vehemence. Strafford. I! I! that was never spoken with

Strafford. Old Vane? Till it was entered on! That loathe the war!

Charles. He told them, just about to vote That say it is the maddest, wickedest . . .
the half, Do you know, sir, I think within my heart,

That nothing short of all twelve subsidies That you would say I did advise the war;
Would serve our turn, or be accepted. And if, through your own weakness, or what's worse,

Strafford. Vane!

Vane! Who, sir, promised me, that very These Scots, with God to help them, drive
Vane . . . me back,

O God, to have it gone, quite gone from me, You will not step between the raging People
The one last hope—I that despair, my hope— And me, to say . . .

That I should reach his heart one day, and I knew it! from the first cure I knew it! Never was so cold a heart!

All bitterness one day, be proud again Remember that I said it—that I never
And young again, care for the sunshine too, Believed you for a moment!

And never think of Eliot any more,— —And, you loved me?

God, and to toil for this, go far for this, You thought your perfidy profoundly hid
Get nearer, and still nearer, reach this heart Because I could not share the whisperings And find Vane there! With Vane, with Savile? What, the face was masked?

[Suddenly taking up a paper, and continuing with a forced calmness.]

Northumberland is sick: I had the heart to see, sir! Face of flesh,
Well, then, I take the army: Wilmot leads But heart of stone—of smooth cold frightful
The horse, and he, with Conway, must secure stone!

The passes of the Tyne: Ormond supplies Ay, call them! Shall I call for you? The
My place in Ireland. Here, we'll try the City: Scots

If they refuse a loan—debase the coin Goaded to madness? Or the English—Pym—
And seize the bullion! we've no other Shall I call Pym, your subject? Oh, you think choice. I'll leave them in the dark about it all?

Herbert . . . They shall not know you? Hampden, Pym shall not?

And this while I am here! with you! PYM, HAMPDEN, VANE, etc., enter.

And there are hosts such, hosts like Vane! I go, [Dropping on his knee.] Thus favoured with
And, I once gone, they'll close around you, your gracious countenance sir, What shall a rebel League avail against

When the least pique, pettiest mistrust, is sure Your servant, utterly and ever yours?

To ruin me—and you along with me! So, gentlemen, the King's not even left

Do you see that? And you along with me! The privilege of bidding me farewell

--Sir, you'll not ever listen to these men, Who haste to save the People—that you style

And I away, fighting your battle? Sir, Your People—from the mercies of the Scots

If they—if She—charge me, no matter how— And France their friend?

Say you, "At any time when he returns

[To CHARLES.] Pym's grave grey eyes are fixed
Upon you, sir!

Your pleasure, gentlemen?
Hampden. The King dissolved us—'tis the King we seek
And not Lord Strafford.

Strafford. —Strafford, guilty too
Of counselling the measure. [To CHARLES].

(Hush . . . you know—
You have forgotten—sir, I counselled it)
A heinous matter, truly! But the King
Will yet see cause to thank me for a course Which now, perchance . . . (Sir, tell them so!)—he blames.

Well, choose some fitter time to make your
charge:

I shall be with the Scots, you understand?
Then yelp at me!

Meanwhile, your Majesty Binds me, by this fresh token of your
trust . . .

[Under the pretence of an earnest farewell, STRAFFORD conducts CHARLES to the door, in such a manner as to hide his agitation from the rest: as the King disappears, they turn as by one impulse to PYM, who has not changed his original posture of surprise.

Hampden. Leave we this arrogant strong wicked man!

Vane and others. Hence, Pym! Come out of this unworthy place
To our old room again! He's gone.

[STRAFFORD, just about to follow the KING, looks back.

Pym. Not gone!
[To STRAFFORD.] Keep tryst! the old appointment's made anew:
Forget not we shall meet again!

Strafford. So be it!
And if an army follows me?

Vane. His friends
Will entertain your army!

Pym. I'll not say
You have misreckoned, Strafford: time shows,

Perish

Body and spirit! Fool to feign a doubt,
Pretend the scrupulous and nice reserve
Of one whose prowess shall achieve the feat!
What share have I in it? Do I affect
To see no dismal sign above your head
When God suspends his ruinous thunder
there?

Strafford is doomed. Touch him not one of you! [PYM, HAMPDEN, &c., go out.
Strafford. Pym, we shall meet again!

Lady CARLISLE enters.

You here, child?
Lady Carlisle. Hush—
I know it all: hush, Strafford!

Strafford. Ah? you know?
Well. I shall make a sorry soldier, Lucy!
All knights begin their enterprise, we read,
Under the best of auspices; 'tis morn,
The Lady girds his sword upon the Youth (He's always very young)—the trumpets sound,

Cups pledge him, and, why, the King blesses
him—

You need not turn a page of the romance
To learn the Dreadful Giant's fate. Indeed,
We've the fair Lady here; but she apart,—
A poor man, rarely having handled lance,
And rather old, weary, and far from sure
His Squires are not the Giant's friends. All's
one:

Let us go forth!
Lady Carlisle. Go forth?

Strafford. What matters it?
We shall die gloriously—as the book says.

Lady Carlisle. To Scotland? Not to Scotland?

Strafford. Am I sick
Like your good brother, brave Northumberland?

Beside, these walls seem falling on me.

Lady Carlisle. Strafford,
The wind that saps these walls can undermine Your camp in Scotland, too. Whence creeps the wind?

Have you no eyes except for Pym? Look
here!

A breed of silken creatures lurk and thrive

In your contempt. You'll vanquish Pym?

Old Vane

Can vanquish you. And Vane you think to fly?

Rush on the Scots! Do nobly! Vane's slight sneer

Shall test success, adjust the praise, suggest

The faint result: Vane's sneer shall reach you there.

—You do not listen!

Strafford. Oh,—I give that up!

There's fate in it: I give all here quite up.

Care not what old Vane does or Holland does

Against me! 'Tis so idle to withstand!

In no case tell me what they do!

Lady Carlisle. But, Strafford . . .

Strafford. I want a little strife, beside; real strife;

This petty palace-warfare does me harm:

I shall feel better, fairly out of it.

Lady Carlisle. Why do you smile?

Strafford. I got to fear them, child!

I could have torn his throat at first, old Vane's,

As he leered at me on his stealthy way

To the Queen's closet. Lord, one loses heart!

I often found it on my lips to say

"Do not traduce me to her!"

Lady Carlisle. But the King . . .

Strafford. The King stood there, 'tis not so long ago,

—There; and the whisper, Lucy, "Be my friend

"Of friends!"—My King! I would have . . .

Lady Carlisle. . . . Died for him?

Strafford. Sworn him true, Lucy: I can die for him.

Lady Carlisle. But go not, Strafford! But you must renounce

This project on the Scots! Die, wherefore die?

Charles never loved you.

Strafford. And he never will.

He's not of those who care the more for men That they're unfortunate.

Lady Carlisle. Then wherefore die

For such a master?

Strafford. You that told me first

How good he was—when I must leave true friends

To find a truer friend!—that drew me here

From Ireland,—“I had but to show myself
“And Charles would spurn Vane, Savile, and the rest”—

You, child, to ask me this?

Lady Carlisle. (If he have set

His heart abidingly on Charles!)

Then, friend,

I shall not see you any more.

Strafford. Yes, Lucy.

There's one man here I have to meet.

Lady Carlisle. (The King!

What way to save him from the King?

My soul—

That lent from its own store the charmed disguise

Which clothes the King—he shall behold my soul!)

Strafford.—I shall speak best if you'll not gaze

Upon me: I had never thought, indeed,

To speak, but you would perish too, so sure!

Could you but know what 'tis to bear, my friend,

One image stamped within you, turning blank

The else imperial brilliance of your mind,—

A weakness, but most precious,—like a flaw

't the diamond, which should shape forth some sweet face

Yet to create, and meanwhile treasured there

Lest nature lose her gracious thought for ever!

Strafford. When could it be? no! Yet . . . was it the day

We waited in the anteroom, till Holland

Should leave the presence-chamber?

Lady Carlisle. What?

Strafford. —That I

Described to you my love for Charles?

Lady Carlisle. (Ah, no—

One must not lure him from a love like that!

Oh, let him love the King and die! 'Tis past.

I shall not serve him worse for that one brief

And passionate hope, silent for ever now!)

And you are really bound for Scotland then?

I wish you well: you must be very sure

Of the King's faith, for Pym and all his crew

Will not be idle—setting Vane aside!

Strafford. If Pym is busy,—you may write of Pym.

Lady Carlisle. What need, since there's your King to take your part?

He may endure Vane's counsel; but for
Pym—

Think you he'll suffer Pym to . . .

Strafford. Child, your hair
Is glossier than the Queen's!

Lady Carlisle. Is that to ask
A curl of me?

Strafford. Scotland—the weary way!

Lady Carlisle. Stay, let me fasten it.

—A rival's, Strafford?

Strafford [showing the George]. He hung it there: twine yours around it, child!

Lady Carlisle. No—no—another time—I trifle so!

And there's a masque on foot. Farewell.
The Court

Is dull; do something to enliven us

In Scotland: we expect it at your hands.

Strafford. I shall not fail in Scotland.

Lady Carlisle. Prosper—if You'll think of me sometimes!

Strafford. How think of him
And not of you? of you, the lingering streak
(A golden one) in my good fortune's eve.

Lady Carlisle. Strafford . . . Well, when the eve has its last streak

The night has its first star. [She goes out.]

Strafford. That voice of hers—
You'd think she had a heart sometimes!

His voice
Is soft too.

Only God can save him now.

Be Thou about his bed, about his path!

His path! Where's England's path? Diverging wide,

And not to join again the track my foot
Must follow—whither? All that forlorn way
Among the tombs! Far—far—till . . .

What, they do
Then join again, these paths? For, huge in the dusk,
There's—Pym to face!

Why then, I have a foe
To close with, and a fight to fight at last Worthy my soul! What, do they beard the King,

And shall the King want Strafford at his need?
Am I not here?

Not in the market-place,
Pressed on by the rough artisans, so proud To catch a glance from Wentworth! They lie down

I hungry yet smile "Why, it must end some
day:

"Is he not watching for our sake?" Not
there!

But in Whitehall, the whited sepulchre,
The . . .

Curse nothing to-night! Only one name

They'll curse in all those streets to-night.
Whose fault?

Did I make kings? set up, the first, a man
To represent the multitude, receive
All love in right of them—supplant them so,
Until you love the man and not the king—
The man with the mild voice and mournful
eyes

Which send me forth.

—To breast the bloody sea
That sweeps before me: with one star for guide.

Night has its first, supreme, forsaken star.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Opposite Westminster Hall.

Sir HENRY VANE, Lord SAVILE, Lord
HOLLAND and others of the Court.

Sir H. Vane. The Commons thrust you
out?

Savile. And what kept you
From sharing their civility?

Sir H. Vane. Kept me?
Fresh news from Scotland, sir! worse than the last,

If that may be. All's up with Strafford there:
Nothing to bar the mad Scots marching hither
Next Lord's-day morning. That detained me, sir!

Well now, before they thrust you out,—go
on,—

Their Speaker—did the fellow Lenthall say
All we set down for him?

Holland. Not a word missed.
Ere he began, we entered, Savile, I
And Bristol and some more, with hope to breed

A wholesome awe in the new Parliament.
But such a gang of graceless ruffians, Vane,
As glared at us!

Vane. So many?

Savile. Not a bench
Without its complement of burly knaves;
Your hopefulness among them: Hampden leant
Upon his shoulder—think of that!

Vane. I'd think
On Lenthall's speech, if I could get at it.
Urged he, I ask, how grateful they should prove

For this unlooked-for summons from the King?

Holland. Just as we drilled him.

Vane. That the Scots will march
On London?

Holland. All, and made so much of it,
A dozen subsidies at least seemed sure

To follow, when . . .

Vane. Well?

Holland. 'Tis a strange thing, now!
I've a vague memory of a sort of sound,
A voice, a kind of vast unnatural voice—
Pym, sir, was speaking! Savile, help me out:
What was it all?

Savile. Something about "a matter"—
No,—“work for England.”

Holland. “England's great revenge”
He talked of.

Savile. How should I get used to Pym
More than yourselves?

Holland. However that be,
'Twas something with which we had nought
to do,

For we were “strangers” and 'twas “England's work”—

(All this while looking us straight in the face)
In other words, our presence might be spared.
So, in the twinkling of an eye, before
I settled to my mind what ugly brute
Was likest Pym just then, they yelled us out,
Locked the doors after us, and here are we.

Vane. Eliot's old method . . .

Savile. Prithee, Vane, a truce
To Eliot and his times, and the great Duke,
And how to manage Parliaments! 'Twas you
Advised the Queen to summon this: why,
Strafford

(To do him justice) would not hear of it.

Vane. Say rather, you have done the best of turns

To Strafford: he's at York, we all know why.
I would you had not set the Scots on Strafford
Till Strafford put down Pym for us, my lord!

Savile. Was it I altered Strafford's plans?
did I . . .

A Messenger enters.

Messenger. The Queen, my lords—she sends me: follow me

At once; 'tis very urgent! she requires
Your counsel: something perilous and strange Occurs her command.

Savile. ‘We follow, friend!’
Now, Vane;—your Parliament will plague us all!

Vane. No Strafford here beside!

Savile. If you dare hint

I had a hand in his betrayal, sir . . .

Holland. Nay, find a fitter time for quarrels
—Pym

Will overmatch the best of you; and, think,
The Queen!

Vane. Come on, then: understand, I loathe

Strafford as much as any—but his use!
To keep off Pym, to screen a friend or two,
I would we had reserved him yet awhile.

SCENE II.—Whitehall.

The QUEEN and Lady CARLISLE.

Queen. It cannot be.

Lady Carlisle. It is so.

Queen. Why, the House

Have hardly met.

Lady Carlisle. They met for that.

Queen. No, no!
Meet to impeach Lord Strafford? 'Tis a jest.

Lady Carlisle. A bitter one.

Queen. Consider ! 'Tis the House
We summoned so reluctantly, which nothing
But the disastrous issue of the war
Persuaded us to summon. They'll wreak all
Their spite on us, no doubt ; but the old way
Is to begin by talk of grievances :
They have their grievances to busy them.

Lady Carlisle. Pym has begun his speech.

Queen. Where's Vane ?—That is,
Pym will impeach Lord Strafford if he leaves
His Presidency ; he's at York, we know, Since the Scots beat him : why should he leave York ?

Lady Carlisle. Because the King sent for
him.

Queen. Ah—but if
The King did send for him, he let him know
We had been forced to call a Parliament—
A step which Strafford, now I come to think,
Was vehement against.

Lady Carlisle. The policy
Escaped him, of first striking Parliaments
To earth, then setting them upon their feet
And giving them a sword : but this is idle.
Did the King send for Strafford ? He will come.

Queen. And what am I to do ?

Lady Carlisle. What do ? Fail, madam !
Be ruined for his sake ! what matters how,
So it but stand on record that you made
An effort, only one ?

Queen. The King away
At Theobald's !

Lady Carlisle. Send for him at once :
he must
Dissolve the House.

Queen. Wait till Vane finds the truth
Of the report : then . . .

Lady Carlisle. —It will matter little What the King does. Strafford that lends his arm
And breaks his heart for you !

Sir H. VANE enters.

Vane. The Commons, madam,
Are sitting with closed doors. A huge debate,
No lack of noise ; but nothing, I should guess,

Concerning Strafford : Pym has certainly
Not spoken yet.

Queen [to Lady CARLISLE]. You hear ?

Lady Carlisle. I do not hear
That the King's sent for !

Vane. Savile will be able
To tell you more.

HOLLAND enters.

Queen. The last news, Holland ?

Holland. Pym
Is raging like a fire. The whole House means
To follow him together to Whitehall
And force the King to give up Strafford.

Queen. Strafford ?

Holland. If they content themselves with Strafford ! Laud
Is talked of, Cottington and Windebank
too.

Pym has not left out one of them—I would
You heard Pym raging !

Queen. Vane, go find the King !
Tell the King, Vane, the People follow Pym
To brave us at Whitehall !

SAVILE enters.

Savile. Not to Whitehall--
'Tis to the Lords they go : they seek redress
On Strafford from his peers—the legal way,
They call it.

Queen. (Wait, Vane !)

Savile. But the adage gives Long life to threatened men. Strafford can save

Himself so readily : at York, remember,
In his own county : what has he to fear ?
The Commons only mean to frighten him
From leaving York. Surely, he will not
come.

Queen. Lucy, he will not come !

Lady Carlisle. Once more, the King
Has sent for Strafford. He will come.

Vane. Oh doubtless !
And bring destruction with him : that's his
way.

What but his coming spoilt all Conway's plan ?
The King must take his counsel, choose his
friends,

Be wholly ruled by him ! What's the result ?
The North that was to rise, Ireland to help,—
What came of it ? In my poor mind, a fright
Is no prodigious punishment.

Lady Carlisle. A fright ?

Pym will fail worse than Strafford if he thinks
To frighten him. [To the QUEEN.] You will not save him then ?

Savile. When something like a charge is made, the King

Will best know how to save him : and 'tis clear,
While Strafford suffers nothing by the matter,
The King may reap advantage : this in question,

No dinning you with ship-money complaints !

Queen [to Lady CARLISLE.] If we dissolve them, who will pay the army ?

Protect us from the insolent Scots ?

Lady Carlisle. In truth,

I know not, madam. Strafford's fate concerns
Me little : you desired to learn what course
Would save him : I obey you.

Vane. Notice, too,

There can't be fairer ground for taking full Revenge—(Strafford's revengeful)—than he'll have

Against his old friend Pym.

Queen. Why, he shall claim

Vengeance on Pym !

Vane. And Strafford, who is he

To 'scape unscathed amid the accidents
That harass all beside ? I, for my part,
Should look for something of discomfiture
Had the King trusted me so thoroughly
And been so paid for it.

Holland. He'll keep at York :

All will blow over : he'll return no worse,
Humbled a little, thankful for a place
Under as good a man. Oh, we'll dispense
With seeing Strafford for a month or two !

STRAFFORD enters.

Queen. You here !

Strafford. The King sends for me, madam.

Queen. Sir,

'The King . . .

Strafford. An urgent matter that imports the King !

[To Lady CARLISLE.] Why, Lucy, what's in agitation now,

That all this muttering and shrugging, see,
Begins at me ? They do not speak !

Lady Carlisle. 'Tis welcome !

For we are proud of you—happy and proud To have you with us, Strafford ! You were staunch

At Durham : you did well there ! Had you
not

Been stayed, you might have . . . we said, even now,

Our hope's in you !

Vane [to Lady CARLISLE.] The Queen would speak with you.

Strafford. Will one of you, his servants here, vouchsafe

To signify my presence to the King ?

Savile. An urgent matter ?

Strafford. None that touches you,

Lord Savile ! Say, it were some treacherous
Sly pitiful intriguing with the Scots—

You would go free, at least ! (They hail divine

My purpose !) Madam, shall I see the King ?

The service I would render, much concerns
His welfare.

Queen. But his Majesty, my lord,

May not be here, may . . .

Strafford. Its importance, then,
Must plead excuse for this withdrawal,
madam,

And for the grief it gives Lord Savile here.

Queen [who has been conversing with VANE and HOLLAND.] The King will see you, sir !

[To Lady CARLISLE.] Mark me :
Pym's worst

Is done by now : he has impeached the Earl,
Or found the Earl too strong for him, by now.
Let us not seem instructed ! We should work
No good to Strafford, but deform ourselves
With shame in the world's eye. [*To STRAF-
FORD.*] His Majesty

Has much to say with you.
Strafford. Time fleeting, too !

[To Lady CARLISLE.] No means of getting them away ? And She—

What does she whisper? Does she know my purpose?

What does she think of it? Get them away!

Queen [to Lady CARLISLE]. He comes to baffle Pym—he thinks the danger far off: tell him no word of it! a time for help will come; we'll not be wanting then. Keep him in play, Lucy—you, self-possessed and calm! [To STRAFFORD.] To spare your lordship some delay

I will myself acquaint the King. [To Lady CARLISLE.] Beware!

[The QUEEN, VANE, HOLLAND, and SAVILE go out.]

Strafford. She knows it?

Lady Carlisle. Tell me, Strafford!

Strafford. Afterward!

This moment's the great moment of all time.

She knows my purpose?

Lady Carlisle. Thoroughly: just now she bade me hide it from you.

Strafford. Quick, dear child, the whole o' the scheme?

Lady Carlisle. (Ah, he would learn if they connive at Pym's procedure! Could they but have once apprised the King! But there's no time for falsehood, now.) Strafford, the whole is known.

Strafford. Known and approved?

Lady Carlisle. Hardly discountenanced.

Strafford. And the King—say, the King consents as well?

Lady Carlisle. The King's not yet informed, but will not dare to interpose.

Strafford. What need to wait him, then? He'll sanction it! I stayed, child, tell him, long! It vexed me to the soul—this waiting here.

You know him, there's no counting on the King. Tell him I waited long!

Lady Carlisle. (What can he mean? Rejoice at the King's hollowness?)

Strafford. I knew they would be glad of it,—all over once, I knew they would be glad: but he'd contrive, The Queen and he, to mar, by helping it, An angel's making.

Lady Carlisle. (Is he mad?) Dear Strafford,

You were not wont to look so happy. Sweet,

I tried obedience thoroughly. I took The King's wild plan: of course, ere I could reach

My army, Conway ruined it. I drew The wrecks together, raised all heaven and earth,

And would have fought the Scots: the King at once

Made truce with them. Then, Lucy, then, dear child,

God put it in my mind to love, serve, die For Charles, but never to obey him more!

While he endured their insolence at Ripon I fell on them at Durham. But you'll tell

The King I waited? All the anteroom Is filled with my adherents.

Lady Carlisle. Strafford—Strafford, What daring act is this you hint?

Strafford. No, no! 'Tis here, not daring if you knew? all here!

[Drawing papers from his breast. Full proof, see, ample proof—does the Queen know

I have such damning proof? Bedford and Essex,

Brooke, Warwick, Savile (did you notice Savile?

Thesimper that I spoil?), Saye, Mandeville—Sold to the Scots, body and soul, by Pym!

Lady Carlisle. Great heaven!

Strafford. From Savile and his lords, to Pym

And his losels, crushed!—Pym shall no ward the blow

Nor Savile creep aside from it! The Crew And the Cabal—I crush them!

Lady Carlisle. And you go—Strafford,—and now you go?—

Strafford. —About no work In the background, I promise you! I go Straight to the House of Lords to claim these knaves.

Mainwaring!

Lady Carlisle. Stay—stay, Strafford!

Strafford. She'll return,
The Queen—some little project of her own!
No time to lose: the King takes fright
perhaps.

Lady Carlisle. Pym's strong, remember!

Strafford. Very strong, as fits
The Faction's head—with no offence to Hampton,

Vane, Rudyard and my loving Hollis: one
And all they lodge within the Tower to-night
In just equality. Bryan! Mainwaring!

[Many of his Adherents enter.]

The Peers debate just now (a lucky chance)
On the Scots' war; my visit's opportune
When all is over, Bryan, you proceed
To Ireland: these dispatches, mark me,
Bryan,

Are for the Deputy, and these for Ormond:
We want the army here—my army, raised
At such a cost, that should have done such good,

And was inactive all the time! no matter,
We'll find a use for it. Willis . . . or, no
—you!

You, friend, make haste to York: bear this,
at once . . .

Or,—better stay for form's sake, see yourself!
The news you carry. You remain with me
To execute the Parliament's command, Mainwaring! Help to seize these lesser knaves,

Take care there's no escaping at backdoors:
I'll not have one escape, mind me—not one!
I seem revengeful, Lucy? Did you know
What these men dare!

Lady Carlisle. It is so much they dare!

Strafford. I proved that long ago; my turn is now.

Keep sharp watch, Goring, on the citizens!
Observe who harbours any of the brood
That scramble off: be sure they smart for it!
Our coffers are but lean.

And you, child, too,
Shall have your task; deliver this to Laud.
Laud will not be the slowest in my praise:
"Thorough" he'll cry!—Foolish, to be so glad!

This life is gay and glowing, after all:

'Tis worth while, Lucy, having foes like mine
Just for the bliss of crushing them. To-day
Is worth the living for.

Lady Carlisle. That reddening brow!
You seem . . .

Strafford. Well—do I not? I would be well—

I could not but be well on such a day!
And, this day ended, 'tis of slight import
How long the ravaged frame subjects the soul
In Strafford.

Lady Carlisle. Noble Strafford!

Strafford. No farewell!
I'll see you anon, to-morrow—the first thing.
—If She should come to stay me!

Lady Carlisle. Go—'tis nothing—
Only my heart that swells: it has been thus Ere now: go, Strafford!

Strafford. To-night, then, let it be.
I must see Him: you, the next after Him.
I'll tell you how Pym looked. Follow me,
friends!

You, gentlemen, shall see a sight this hour
To talk of all your lives. Close after me!
"My friend of friends!"

[STRAFFORD and the rest go out.]

Lady Carlisle. The King—ever the King!
No thought of one beside, whose little word
Unveils the King to him—one word from me,
Which yet I do not breathe!

Ah, have I spared
Strafford a pang, and shall I seek reward
Beyond that memory? Surely too, some way
He is the better for my love. No, no—
He would not look so joyous—I'll believe
His very eye would never sparkle thus,
Had I not prayed for him this long, long while.

SCENE III.—The Antechamber of the House of Lords.

Many of the Presbyterian Party. The Adherents of STRAFFORD, etc.

A Group of Presbyterians.—1. I tell you he struck Maxwell: Maxwell sought
To stay the Earl: he struck him and passed

2. Fear as you may, keep a good countenance
Before these rufflers.

3. Strafford here the first,
With the great army at his back!

4. No doubt.
I would Pym had made haste: that's Bryan,
hush—

The gallant pointing.

Strafford's Followers. — 1. Mark these worthies, now!

2. A goodly gathering! "Where the

A Presbyterian. Stand back, sirs!

One of Strafford's Followers. Are we in Geneva?

A Presbyterian. No, nor in Ireland; we have leave to breathe.

One of Strafford's Followers. Truly? Behold how privileged we be
That serve "King Pym"! There's Some-one at Whitehall

Who skulks obscure; but Pym struts . . .

The Presbyterian. Nearer.

A Follower of Strafford. Higher,
We look to see him. [To his Companions.]

I'm to have St. John
In charge; was he among the knaves just now
That followed Pym within there?

Another. The gaunt man
Talking with Rudyard. Did the Earl expect
Pym at his heels so fast? I like it not.

MAXWELL enters.

Another. Why, man, they rush into the net! Here's Maxwell—

Ha, Maxwell? How the brethren flock around
The fellow! Do you feel the Earl's hand yet Upon your shoulder, Maxwell?

Maxwell. Gentlemen,
Stand back! a great thing passes here.

A Follower of Strafford. [To another.] The Earl

Is at his work! [To M.] Say, Maxwell, what great thing!

Speak out! [To a Presbyterian.] Friend,
I've a kindness for you! Friend,

I've seen you with St. John: O stockishness!
Wear such a ruff, and never call to mind

St. John's head in a charger? How, the plague,

Not laugh?

Another. Say, Maxwell, what great thing!

Another.

Nay, wait:

The jest will be to wait.

First.

And who's to bear
These demure hypocrites? You'd swear they came . . .

Came . . . just as we come!

[A Puritan enters hastily and without observing STRAFFORD'S Followers.]

The Puritan. How goes on the work?

Has Pym . . .

A Follower of Strafford. The secret's out at last. Aha,

The carrion's scented! Welcome, crow the
first!

Gorge merrily, you with the blinking eye!

"King Pym has fallen!"

The Puritan. Pym?

A Strafford. Pym!

A Presbyterian. Only Pym?

Many of Strafford's Followers. No, brother, not Pym only; Vane as well, Rudyard as well, Hampden, St. John as
well!

A Presbyterian. My mind misgives: can it be true?

Another. Lost! Lost!

A Strafford. Say we true, Maxwell?

The Puritan. Pride before destruction,
A haughty spirit goeth before a fall.

Many of Strafford's Followers. Ah now!

The very thing! A word in season!

A golden apple in a silver picture,

To greet Pym as he passes!

[The doors at the back begin to open, noise and light issuing.]

Maxwell. Stand back, all!

Many of the Presbyterians. I hold with Pym! And I!

Strafford's Followers. Now for the text!
He comes! Quick!

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Whitehall.

The KING, the QUEEN, HOLLIS, Lady CARLISLE. (VANE, HOLLAND, SAVILE, in the background.)

Lady Carlisle. Answer them, Hollis, for his sake! One word!

Charles. [To HOLLIS.] You stand, silent and cold, as though I were Deceiving you—my friend, my playfellow (of other times. What wonder after all? Just so, I dreamed my People loved me.

Hollis. Sir, It is yourself that you deceive, not me. You'll quit me comforted, your mind made up That, since you've talked thus much and grieved thus much, All you can do for Strafford has been done.

Queen. If you kill Strafford—(come, we grant you leave, Suppose)—

Hollis. I may withdraw, sir?
Lady Carlisle. Hear them out 'Tis the last chance for Strafford! I hear them out!

Hollis. "If we kill Strafford"—on the eighteenth day Of Strafford's trial—"We!"

Charles. Pym, my good Hollis—Pym, I should say!

Hollis. Ah, true—sir, pardon me! You witness our proceedings every day; But the screened gallery, I might have guessed,

Admits of such a partial glimpse at us, Pym takes up all the room, shuts out the view. Still, on my honour, sir, the rest of the place Is not unoccupied. The Commons sit—That's England; Ireland sends, and Scotland too,

Their representatives; the Peers that judge Are easily distinguished; one remarks The People here and there: but the close curtain

Must hide so much!

Queen. Acquaint your insolent crew, This day the curtain shall be dashed aside! It served a purpose.

Hollis. Think! This very day! Ere Strafford rises to defend himself?

Charles. I will defend him, sir!—sanction the past

This day: it ever was my purpose. Rage At me, not Strafford!

Lady Carlisle. Nobly!—will he not Do nobly?

Hollis. Sir, you will do honestly; And, for that deed, I too would be a king.

Charles. Only, to do this now!—"deaf" (in your style)

"To subjects' prayers,"—I must oppose them now!

It seems their will the trial should proceed,— So palpably their will!

Hollis. You peril much, But it were no bright moment save for that. Strafford, your prime support, the sole roof-tree

Which props this quaking House of Privilege, (Floods come, winds beat, and see—the treacherous sand!)

Doubtless, if the mere putting forth an arm Could save him, you'd save Strafford.

Charles. And they dare Consume calmly this great wrong! No hope?

This ineffaceable wrong! No pity then?

Hollis. No plague in store for perfidy?—Farewell!

You called me, sir—[To Lady CARLISLE.] you, lady, bade me come

To save the Earl: I came, thank God for it, To learn how far such perfidy can go!

You, sir, concert with me on saving him Who have just ruined Strafford!

Charles. I?—and how?

Hollis. Eighteen days long he throws, one after one,

Pym's charges back: a blind moth-eaten law! —He'll break from it at last: and whom to thank?

The mouse that gnawed the lion's net for him Got a good friend,—but he, the other mouse,

That looked on while the lion freed himself—

Fared he so well, does any fable say?

Charles. What can you mean?

Hollis. Pym never could have proved

Strafford's design of bringing up the troops

To force this kingdom to obedience: Vane—

Your servant, not our friend, has proved it.

Charles. Vane?

Hollis. This day. Did Vane deliver up or no

Those notes which, furnished by his son to Pym,

Seal Strafford's fate?

Charles. Sir, as I live, I know

Nothing that Vane has done! What treason next?

I wash my hands of it. Vane, speak the truth!

Ask Vane himself!

Hollis. I will not speak to Vane,

Who speak to Pym and Hampden every day.

Queen. Speak to Vane's master then!

What gain to him

Were Strafford's death?

Hollis. Ha? Strafford cannot turn

As you, sir, sit there—bid you forth, demand

If every hateful act were not set down

In his commission?—whether you contrived

Or no, that all the violence should seem

His work, the gentle ways—your own,—his part,

To counteract the King's kind impulses—

While . . . but you know what he could say! And then

He might produce,—mark, sir!—a certain charge

To set the King's express command aside,

If need were, and be blameless. He might add . . .

Charles. Enough!

Hollis. —Who bade him break the Parliament,

Find some pretence for setting up sword-law!

Queen. Retire!

Charles. Once more, whatever Vane dared do,

I know not: he is rash, a fool—I know Nothing of Vane!

Hollis. Well—I believe you. Sir, Believe me, in return, that . . .

[Turning to Lady CARLISLE.] Gentle lady, The few words I would say, the stones might hear

Sooner than these,—I rather speak to you, You, with the heart! The question, trust me takes

Another shape, to-day: not, if the King Or England shall succumb,—but, who shall pay The forfeit, Strafford or his master. Sir, You loved me once: think on my warning now! [Goes out.]

Charles. On you and on your warning both!—Carlisle!

That paper!

Queen. But consider!

Charles. Give it me!

There, signed—will that content you? Do not speak!

You have betrayed me, Vane! See! any day, According to the tenor of that paper, He bids your brother bring the army up, Strafford shall head it and take full revenge. Seek Strafford! Let him have the same, before He rises to defend himself!

Queen. In truth?

That your shrewd Hollis should have worked a change

Like this! You, late reluctant . . .

Charles. Say, Carlisle,

Your brother Percy brings the army up, Falls on the Parliament—(I'll think of you, My Hollis!) say, we plotted long—'tis mine, The scheme is mine, remember! Say, I curse! Vane's folly in your hearing! If the Earl Does rise to do us shame, the fault shall lie With you, Carlisle!

Lady Carlisle. Nay, fear not me! but still

That's a bright moment, sir, you throw away. Tear down the veil and save him!

Queen. Go, Carlisle!

Lady Carlisle. (I shall see Strafford— speak to him: my heart Must never beat so, then! And if I tell

The truth? What's gained by falsehood?

There they stand

Whose trade it is, whose life it is! How vain
To gild such rottenness! Strafford shall know, Thoroughly know them!

Queen. Trust to me! [To

CARLISLE.] Carlisle,

You seem inclined, alone of all the Court,
To serve poor Strafford: this bold plan of yours
Merits much praise, and yet . . .

Lady Carlisle. Time presses, madam.

Queen. Yet—may it not be something premature?

Strafford defends himself to-day—reserves
Some wondrous effort, one may well suppose!

Lady Carlisle. Ay, Hollis hints as much.

Charles. Why linger then?

Haste with the scheme—my scheme: I shall be there

To watch his look. Tell him I watch his look!

Queen. Stay, we'll precede you!

Lady Carlisle. At your pleasure.

Charles. Say—

Say, Vane is hardly ever at Whitehall!

I shall be there, remember!

Lady Carlisle. Doubt me not.

Charles. On our return, Carlisle, we wait
you here!

Lady Carlisle. I'll bring his answer. Sir,
I follow you.

(Prove the King faithless, and I take away
All Strafford cares to live for: let it be—
'Tis the King's scheme!

My Strafford, I can save,
Nay, I have saved you, yet am scarce content, Because my poor name will not cross your
mind.

Strafford, how much I am unworthy you!)

SCENE II.—A Passage adjoining Westminster Hall.

*Many Groups of Spectators of the Trial.
Officers of the Court, etc.*

1st Spectator. More crowd than ever! Not know Hampden, man?
That's he, by Pym, Pym that is speaking now.

No, truly, if you look so high you'll see Little enough of either!

2nd Spectator.

Stay: Pym's arm

Points like a prophet's rod.

3rd Spectator.

Ay, ay, we've heard

Some pretty speaking: yet the Earl escapes.

4th Spectator. I fear it: just a foolish word or two

About his children—and we see, forsooth,
Not England's foe in Strafford, but the man
Who, sick, half-blind . . .

2nd Spectator.

What's that Pym's

saying now

Which makes the curtains flutter? look! A
hand

Clutches them. Ah! The King's hand!

5th Spectator.

I had thought

Pym was not near so tall. What said he,
friend?

2nd Spectator. "Nor is this way a novel way of blood,"

And the Earl turns as if to . . . look! look!

Many Spectators.

There!

What ails him? no—he rallies, see—goes on,
And Strafford smiles. Strange!

An Officer.

Haselrig!

Many Spectators.

Friend? Friend?

The Officer. Lost, utterly lost: just when we looked for Pym

To make a stand against the ill effects

Of the Earl's speech! Is Haselrig without?
Pym's message is to him.

3rd Spectator.

Now, said I true?

Will the Earl leave them yet at fault or no?

1st Spectator. Never believe it, man!

These notes of Vane's

Ruin the Earl.

5th Spectator. A brave end: not a whit
Less firm, less Pym all over. Then, the trial
Is closed. No—Strafford means to speak
again?

An Officer. Stand back, there!

5th Spectator.

Why, the

Earl is coming hither!

Before the court breaks up! His brother,
look,—

You'd say he'd deprecated some fierce act
In Strafford's mind just now.

An Officer. Stand back, I say ! [To a Messenger.] In truth ? This slip, tell and Spectator. Who's the veiled woman Lane, contains as much that he talks with ? As I can call to mind about the matter.

Many Spectators. Hush— Eliot would have disdained . . .

The Earl ! the Earl ! [Calling after the Messenger.] And Radcliffe, say, [Enter STRAFFORD, SLINGSBY, and other Secretaries, HOLLIS, Lady CARLISLE, MAXWELL, BAL- FOUR, etc. STRAFFORD converses with Lady CARLISLE.

The only person who could answer Pym, Is safe in prison, just for that.

Well, well !

Hollis. So near the end ! Be patient—
Return ! [To Lady CARLISLE.] Nay, child, why look so grieved ?

Strafford [to his Secretaries]. Here—anywhere—or, 'tis freshest here ! All's gained without the King ! You saw Pym quail ?

Tospend one's April here, the blossom-month :
Set it down here ! What shall I do when they acquit me, think you,

[They arrange a table, papers, etc.
So, Pym can quail, can cower
Because I glance at him, yet more's to do ?
What's to be answered, Slingsby ? Let us end !
[To Lady CARLISLE.] Child, I refuse his offer ; whatsoe'er

It be ! Too late ! Tell me no word of him !
'Tis something, I Hollis, I assure you that—
To stand, sick as you are, some eighteen days
Fighting for life and fame against a pack
Of very curs, that lie through thick and thin,
Eat flesh and bread by wholesale, and can't say

“ Strafford ” if it would take my life !
Lady Carlisle. Be moved !
Glance at the paper !
Strafford. Already at my heels !
Pym's faulting bloodhounds scent the track again.

Peace, child ! Now, Slingsby !
[Messengers from LANE and other of STRAFFORD'S Counsel within the Hall are coming and going during the Scene.
Strafford [setting himself to write and dictate]. I shall beat you, Hollis !
Do you know that ? In spite of St. John's tricks,
In spite of Pym—your Pym who shrank from me !
Eliot would have contrived it otherwise.

But tranquilly resume my task as though
Nothing had intervened since I proposed
To call that traitor to account ! Such tricks,
Trust me, shall not be played a second time,
Not even against Laud, with his grey hair—
Your good work, Hollis ! Peace ! To make amends,
You, Lucy, shall be here when I impeach Pym and his fellows.

Hollis. Wherefore not protest
Against our whole proceeding, long ago ?
Why feel indignant now ? Why stand this while Enduring patiently ?
Strafford. Child, I'll tell you—

You, and not Pym—you, the slight graceful girl

Tall for a flowering lily, and not Hollis—
Why I stood patient ! I was fool enough
To see the will of England in Pym's will ;
To fear, myself had wronged her, and to wait
Her judgment : when, behold, in place of it . . .

[To a Messenger who whispers.] Tell Lane to answer no such question ! Law,—

I grapple with their law ! I'm here to try
My actions by their standard, not my own !
Their law allowed that levy : what's the rest
To Pym, or Lane, any but God and me ?

Lady Carlisle. The King's so weak ! Secure this chance ! 'Twas Vane, Never forget, who furnished Pym the notes . . .

Strafford. Fit,—very fit, those precious notes of Vane,
To close the Trial worthily ! I feared
Some spice of nobleness might linger yet
And spoil the character of all the past.
Vane eased me . . . and I will go back and say

As much—to Pym, to England ! Follow me !
I have a word to say ! There, my defence
Is done !

Stay ! why be proud ? Why care to own
My gladness, my surprise ?—Nay, not surprise !

Wherefore insist upon the little pride
Of doing all myself, and sparing him
The pain ? Child, say the triumph is my King's !

When Pym grew pale, and trembled, and sank down,
One image was before me : could I fail ?
Child, care not for the past, so indistinct,
Obscure—there's nothing to forgive in it
'Tis so forgotten ! From this day begins
A new life, founded on a new belief
In Charles.

Hollis. In Charles ? Rather believe in Pym !

And here he comes in proof ! Appeal to Pym !

Say how unfair . . .

Strafford. To Pym ? I would say nothing !

I would not look upon Pym's face again.

Lady Carlisle. Stay, let me have to think
I pressed your hand !

[STRAFFORD and his friends go out.]

Enter HAMPDEN and VANE.

Vane. O Hampden, save the great misguided man !
Plead Strafford's cause with Pym ! I have remarked
He moved no muscle when we all de-claimed

Against him : you had but to breathe—he turned
Those kind calm eyes upon you.

[Enter PYM, the Solicitor-General
ST. JOHN, the Managers of the Trial, FIENNES, RUDYARD, etc.

Rudyard. Horrible !
Till now all hearts were with you : I withdraw

For one. Too horrible ! But we mistake
Your purpose, Pym : you cannot snatch away
The last spar from the drowning man.

Fiennes. He talks
With St. John of it—see, how quietly !

[To other Presbyterians.] You'll join us ?
Strafford may deserve the worst :

But this new course is monstrous. Vane, take heart !

This Bill of his Attainder shall not have
One true man's hand to it.

Vane. Consider, Pym !
Confront your Bill, your own Bill : what is it ?
You cannot catch the Earl on any charge,—
No man will say the law has hold of him
On any charge ; and therefore you resolve
To take the general sense on his desert,
As though no law existed, and we met
To found one. You refer to Parliament
To speak its thought upon the abortive mass
Of half-borne-out assertions, dubious hints
Hereafter to be cleared, distortions—ay,
And wild inventions. Every man is saved
The task of fixing any single charge
On Strafford : he has but to see in him
The enemy of England.

Pym. A right scruple !
I have heard some called England's enemy
With less consideration.

Vane. Pity me !
Indeed you made me think I was your friend !
I who have murdered Strafford, how remove
That memory from me ?

Pym. I absolve you, Vane.
Take you no care for aught that you have done !

Vane. John Hampden, not this Bill !
Reject this Bill !

He staggers through the ordeal : let him go, Strew no fresh fire before him ! Plead for us !

When Strafford spoke, your eyes were thick with tears !

Hampden. England speaks louder : who are we, to play

The generous pardoner at her expense,
Magnanimously waive advantages,
And, if he conquer us, applaud his skill ?

Vane. He was your friend.

Pym. I have heard that before.

Fiennes. And England trusts you.

Hampden. Shame be his, who turns
The opportunity of serving her
She trusts him with, to his own mean account—

Who would look nobly frank at her expense !

Fiennes. I never thought it could have come to this.

Pym. But I have made myself familiar,
Fiennes,

With this one thought—have walked, and sat, and slept,

This thought before me. I have done such things,

Being the chosen man that should destroy
The traitor. You have taken up this thought
To play with, for a gentle stimulant,
To give a dignity to idler life
By the dim prospect of emprise to come,
But ever with the softening, sure belief,
That all would end some strange way right
at last.

Fiennes. Had we made out some weightier charge !

Pym. You say
That these are petty charges : can we come
To the real charge at all ? There he is safe
In tyranny's stronghold. Apostasy
Is not a crime, treachery not a crime :
The cheek burns, the blood tingles, when you speak
The words, but where's the power to take revenge

Upon them ? We must make occasion serve,—
The oversight shall pay for the main sin
That mocks us.

Rudyard. But this unexampled course,
This Bill !

Pym. By this, we roll the clouds away
Of precedent and custom, and at once
Bid the great beacon-light God sets in all,
The conscience of each bosom, shine upon
The guilt of Strafford : each man lay his hand
Upon his breast, and judge !

Vane. I only see
Strafford, nor pass his corpse for all beyond !

Rudyard and others. Forgive him ! He would join us, now he finds

What the King counts reward ! The pardon,
too,

Should be your own. Yourself should bear to Strafford

The pardon of the Commons.

Pym. Meet him ? Strafford ?

Have we to meet once more, then ? Be it so !
And yet—the prophecy seemed half fulfilled
When, at the Trial, as he gazed, my youth,
Our friendship, divers thoughts came back
at once.

And left me, for a time . . . 'Tis very sad !
To-morrow we discuss the points of law
With Lane—to-morrow ?

Vane. Not before to-morrow—
So, time enough ! I knew you would relent !

Pym. The next day, Haselrig, you introduce

The Bill of his Attainder. Pray for me !

SCENE III.—Whitehall.

The KING.

Charles. My loyal servant ! To defend himself

Thus irresistibly,—withholding aught
That seemed to implicate us !

We have done
Less gallantly by Strafford. Well, the future
Must recompense the past.

She tarries long.
I understand you, Strafford, now !

The scheme—
Carlisle's mad scheme—he'll sanction it, I
fear,

For love of me. 'Twas too precipitate :
Before the army's fairly on its march,
He'll be at large : no matter.

Well, Carlisle?

Enter Pym.

Pym. Fear me not, sir :—my mission is to save,
This time.

Charles. To break thus on me ! Unannounced !

Pym. It is of Strafford I would speak.

Charles. No more
Of Strafford ! I have heard too much from
you.

Pym. I spoke, sir, for the People ; will you hear

A word upon my own account?

Charles. Of Strafford ?
(So turns the tide already ? Have we tamed
The insolent brawler ?—Strafford's eloquence Is swift in its effect.) Lord Strafford, sir,
Has spoken for himself.

Pym. Sufficiently.
I would apprise you of the novel course
The People take : the Trial fails.

Charles. Yes, yes :
We are aware, sir : for your part in it
Means shall be found to thank you.

Pym. Pray you, read
This schedule ! I would learn from your own mouth

--(It is a matter much concerning me)—
Whether, if two Estates of us concede
The death of Strafford, on the grounds set
forth

Within that parchment, you, sir, can resolve
To grant your own consent to it. This Bill
Is framed by me. If you determine, sir,
That England's manifested will should guide
Your judgment, ere another week such will Shall manifest itself. If not,—I cast
Aside the measure.

Charles. You can hinder, then,
The introduction of this Bill ?

Pym. I can.

Charles. He is my friend, sir : I have wronged him : mark you,

Had I not wronged him, this might be. You think

Because you hate the Earl . . . (turn not away, We know you hate him)—no one else could
love

Strafford : but he has saved me, some affirm.
Think of his pride ! And do you know one
strange,

One frightful thing ? We all have used the man
As though a drudge of ours, with not a source
Of happy thoughts except in us ; and yet
Strafford has wife and children, household
cares,

Just as if we had never been. Ah sir,
You are moved, even you, a solitary man
Wed to your cause—to England if you will !

Pym. Yes—think, my soul—to England !
Draw not back !

Charles. Prevent that Bill, sir ! All your course seems fair

Till now. Why, in the end, 'tis I should sign
The warrant for his death ! You have said
much

I ponder on ; I never meant, indeed,
Strafford should serve me any more. I take The Commons' counsel ; but this Bill is
yours—

Nor worthy of its leader : care not, sir,
For that, however ! I will quite forget
You named it to me. You are satisfied ?

Pym. Listen to me, sir ! Eliot laid his
hand,

Wasted and white, upon my forehead once ;
Wentworth—he's gone now !—has talked on,
whole nights,

And I beside him ; Hampden loves me : sir,
How can I breathe and not wish England well,
And her King well ?

Charles. I thank you, sir, who leave
That King his servant. Thanks, sir !

Pym. Let me speak !
—Who may not speak again ; whose spirit yearns

For a cool night after this weary day :
—Who would not have my soul turn sicker yet
In a new task, more fatal, more august,
More full of England's utter weal or woe.
I thought, sir, could I find myself with you,

After this trial, alone, as man to man—
I might say something, warn you, pray you,
save —

Mark me, King Charles, save—you !
But God must do it. Yet I warn you, sir—
(With Strafford's faded eyes yet full on me)
As you would have no deeper question moved —"How long the Many must endure the
One,"

Assure me, sir, if England give assent
To Strafford's death, you will not interfere !
Or—

Charles. God forsakes me. I am in a net
And cannot move. Let all be as you say !

Enter Lady CARLISLE.

Lady Carlisle. He loves you -- looking beautiful with joy

Because you sent me ! he would spare you all
The pain ! he never dreamed you would forsake

Your servant in the evil day -- nay, see Your scheme returned ! That generous heart of his !

He needs it not -- or, needing it, disdains
A course that might endanger you -- you, sir,
Whom Strafford from his inmost soul . . .

[Seeing Pym.] Well met !

No fear for Strafford ! All that's true and brave

On your own side shall help us : we are now
Stronger than ever.

Ha -- what, sir, is this ?
All is not well ! What parchment have you
there ?

Pym. Sir, much is saved us both.

Lady Carlisle. This Bill ! Your lip
Whitens -- you could not read one line to me
Your voice would falter so !

Pym. No recreant yet !
The great word went from England to my
soul,

And I arose. The end is very near.

Lady Carlisle. I am to save him ! All have shrunk beside ;

'Tis only I am left. Heaven will make strong
The hand now as the heart. Then let both die !

ACT V.

SCENE I. — Whitehall.

HOLLIS, Lady CARLISLE.

Hollis. Tell the King then ! Come in with me !

Lady Carlisle. Not so !

He must not hear till it succeeds.

Hollis. Succeed ?

No dream was half so vain -- you'd rescue
Strafford

And outwit Pym ! I cannot tell you . . . lady,
The block pursues me, and the hideous show.
To-day . . . is it to-day ? And all the while He's sure of the King's pardon. Think, I have

To tell this man he is to die. The King
May rend his hair, for me ! I'll not see Strafford !

Lady Carlisle. Only, if I succeed, remember -- Charles

Has saved him. He would hardly value life
Unless his gift. My staunch friends wait.

Go in --

You must go in to Charles !

Hollis. And all beside

Left Strafford long ago. The King has signed
The warrant for his death ! the Queen was sick

Of the eternal subject. For the Court, --

The Trial was amusing in its way,
Only too much of it : the Earl withdrew
In time. But you, fragile, alone, so young Amid rude mercenaries -- you devise

A plan to save him ! Even though it fails,
What shall reward you ?

Lady Carlisle. I may go, you think,
To France with him ? And you reward me,
friend,

Who lived with Strafford even from his youth
Before he set his heart on state-affairs
And they bent down that noble brow of his.
I have learned somewhat of his latter life,
And all the future I shall know : but, Hollis,
I ought to make his youth my own as well.
Tell me, -- when he is saved !

Hollis. My gentle friend,
He should know all and love you, but 'tis vain!

Lady Carlisle. Love? no—too late now!
Let him love the King!
'Tis the King's scheme! I have your word, remember!

We'll keep the old delusion up. But, quick!
Quick! Each of us has work to do, beside!

Go to the King! I hope—Hollis—I hope!
Say nothing of my scheme! Hush, while we speak

Think where he is! Now for my gallant
friends!

Hollis. Where he is? Calling wildly upon
Charles,
Guessing his fate, pacing the prison-floor.
Let the King tell him! I'll not look on Strafford.

SCENE II.—The Tower.

They sing.

*O bell andare
Per barca in mare,
Verso la sera
Di Primavera!*

William. The boat's in the broad moonlight all this while—

*Verso la sera
Di Primavera!*

And the boat shoots from underneath the moon
Into the shadowy distance; only still
You hear the dipping oar—

Verso la sera,

And faint, and fainter, and then all's quite
gone,
Music and light and all, like a lost star.

Anne. But you should sleep, father: you were to sleep.

Strafford. I do sleep, Anne; or if not—you must know
There's such a thing as . . .

William. You're too tired to sleep?

Strafford. It will come by-and-by and all day long,

In that old quiet house I told you of:

We sleep safe there.

Anne. Why not in Ireland?

Strafford. No!

Too many dreams!—That song's for Venice,

William:

You know how Venice looks upon the map—
Isles that the mainland hardly can let go?

William. You've been to Venice, father?

Strafford. I was young, then.

William. A city with no King; that's why I like

Even a song that comes from Venice.

Strafford. William!

William. Oh, I know why! Anne, do you love the King?

But I'll see Venice for myself one day.

Strafford. See many lands, boy—England last of all,—

That way you'll love her best.

William. Why do men say
You sought to ruin her then?

Strafford. Ah,—they say that.

William. Why?

Strafford. I suppose they must have words to say,

As you to sing.

Anne. But they make songs beside:
Last night I heard one, in the street beneath,

That called you . . . Oh, the names!

William. Don't mind her, father!
They soon left off when I cried out to them.

Strafford. We shall so soon be out of it, my boy!

'Tis not worth while: who heeds a foolish
song?

William. Why, not the King.

Strafford. Well: it has been the fate
Of better; and yet,—wherefore not feel sure That Time, who in the twilight comes to mend

All the fantastic day's caprice, consign

To the low ground once more the ignoble Term,
And raise the Genius on his orb again,—
That Time will do me right?

Anne. (Shall we sing, William?
He does not look thus when we sing.)

Strafford. For Ireland,
Something is done: too little, but enough
To show what might have been.

William. (I have no heart
To sing now! Anne, how very sad he looks!
Oh, I so hate the King for all he says!)

Strafford. Forsook them! What, the common songs will run
That I forsook the People? Nothing more?
Ay, Fame, the busy scribe, will pause, no
doubt,

Turning a deaf ear to her thousand slaves
Noisy to be enrolled,—will register
The curious glosses, subtle notices,
Ingenious clearings-up one fain would see
Beside that plain inscription of The Name—
The Patriot Pym, or the Apostate Strafford!

[The Children resume their song timidly, but break off.]

Enter HOLLIS and an Attendant.

Strafford. No,—Hollis? in good time!—
Who is he?

Hollis. One
That must be present.

Strafford. Ah—I understand.
They will not let me see poor Laud alone.
How politic! They'd use me by degrees
To solitude: and, just as you came in,
I was solicitous what life to lead
When Strafford's "not so much as Constable
"In the King's service." Is there any means
To keep oneself awake? What would you do
After this bustle, Hollis, in my place?

Hollis. Strafford!

Strafford. Observe, not but that
Pym and you
Will find me news enough—news I shall hear
Under a quince-tree by a fish-pond side
At Wentworth. Garrard must be re-engaged
My newsman. Or, a better project now—
What if when all's consummated, and the Saints

Reign, and the Senate's work goes swim-mingly,—

What if I venture up, some day, unseen,
To saunter through the Town, notice how
Pym,

Your Tribune, likes Whitehall, drop quietly
Into a tavern, hear a point discussed,
As, whether Strafford's name were John or James—

And be myself appealed to—I, who shall Myself have near forgotten!

Hollis. I would speak . . .

Strafford. Then you shall speak,—not
now. I want just now,
To hear the sound of my own tongue. This place

Is full of ghosts.

Hollis. Nay, you must hear me,
Strafford!

Strafford. Oh, readily! Only, one rare thing more,—

The minister! Who will advise the King,
Turn his Sejanus, Richelieu and what not,
And yet have health—children, for aught I
know—

My patient pair of traitors! Ah,—but,
Williama—

Does not his cheek grow thin?

William. 'Tis you look thin,
Father!

Strafford. A scamper o'er the breezy wolds
Sets all to-rights.

Hollis. You cannot sure forget
A prison-roof is o'er you, Strafford?

Strafford. No,
Why, no. I would not touch on that, the first.

I left you that. Well, Hollis? Say at once,
The King can find no time to set me free!
A mask at Theobald's? ¹

Hollis. Hold: no such affair
Detains him.

Strafford. True: what needs so great a matter?

The Queen's lip may be sore. Well: when he pleases,—

¹ A house near Cheshant in Herts.

Only, I want the air : it vexes flesh
To be pent up so long.

Hollis. The King—I bear
His message, Strafford : pray you, let me
speak !

Strafford. Go, William ! Anne, try o'er your song again !

[The Children retire.]

They shall be loyal, friend, at all events.
I know your message : you have nothing new
To tell me : from the first I guessed as much.
I know, instead of coming here himself,
Leading me forth in public by the hand,
The King prefers to leave the door ajar
As though I were escaping—bids me trudge
While the mob gapes upon some show prepared
On the other side of the river ! Give at once
His order of release ! I've heard, as well
Of certain poor manoeuvres to avoid
The granting pardon at his proper risk ;
First, he must prattle somewhat to the Lords,
Must talk a trifle with the Commons first,
Be grieved I should abuse his confidence,
And far from blaming them, and . . .

Where's the order ?

Hollis. Spare me !

Strafford. Why, he'd not have me steal away ?

With an old doublet and a steeple hat
Like Prynne's ? Be smuggled into France,
perhaps ?

Hollis, 'tis for my children ! 'Twas for them
I first consented to stand day by day
And give your Puritans the best of words,
Be patient, speak when called upon, observe
Their rules, and not return them prompt their lie !

What's in that boy of mine that he should prove

Son to a prison-breaker ? I shall stay And he'll stay with me. Charles should know as much,

He too has children !

[Turning to HOLLIS's Companion.] Sir, you feel for me !

No need to hide that face ! Though it have looked

Upon me from the judgment-seat . . . I know

Strangely, that somewhere it has looked on
me . . .

Your coming has my pardon, nay, my thanks :
For there is one who comes not.

Hollis. Whom forgive,
As one to die !

Strafford. True, all die, and all need
Forgiveness : I forgive him from my soul.

Hollis. 'Tis a world's wonder : Strafford,
you must die !

Strafford. Sir, if your errand is to set me free
This heartless jest mars much. Ha ! Tears in truth ?

We'll end this ! See this paper, warm—feel
—warm

With lying next my heart ! Whose hand is
there ?

Whose promise ? Read, and loud for God to hear !

"Strafford shall take no hurt"—read it, I say !

"In person, honour, nor estate"—

Hollis. The King . . .

Strafford. I could unking him by a breath !
You sit

Where Loudon sat, who came to prophesy
The certain end, and offer me Pym's grace
If I'd renounce the King : and I stood firm
On the King's faith. The King who lives . . .

Hollis. To sign

The warrant for your death.

Strafford. "Put not your trust

"In princes, neither in the sons of men,"

In whom is no salvation !"

Hollis. Trust in God !

The scaffold is prepared : they wait for you :

He has consented. Cast the earth behind !

Charles. You would not see me, Strafford, at your foot !

It was wrung from me ! Only, curse me not !

Hollis [to STRAFFORD]. As you hope grace and pardon in your need,

Be merciful to this most wretched man.

[Voices from within.]

Verso la sera

Di Primavera.

Strafford. You'll be good to those children, sir ? I know

You'll not believe her, even should the Queen
Think they take after one they rarely saw.
I had intended that my son should live
A stranger to these matters : but you are
So utterly deprived of friends ! He too Must serve you—will you not be good to
him ?

Or, stay, sir, do not promise—do not swear !
You, Hollis—do the best you can for me !
I've not a soul to trust to : Wandesford's dead,
And you've got Radcliffe safe, Laud's turn comes next :

I've found small time of late for my affairs,
But I trust any of you, Pym himself—
No one could hurt them : there's an infant,
too.

These tedious cares ! Your Majesty could spare them.

Nay—pardon me, my King ! I had forgotten
Your education, trials, much temptation,
Some weakness : there escaped a peevish
word—

'Tis gone : I bless you at the last. You know
All's between you and me : what has the world
To do with it ? Farewell !

Charles [at the door]. Balfour ! Balfour !

Enter BALFOUR.

The Parliament !—go to them : I grant all Demands. Their sittings shall be permanent :
Tell them to keep their money if they will :
I'll come to them for every coat I wear
And every crust I eat : only I choose To pardon Strafford. As the Queen shall choose !
—You never heard the People howl for blood,
Beside !

Balfour. Your Majesty may hear them now :
The walls can hardly keep their murmurs out :
Please you retire !

Charles. Take all the troops, Balfour !

Balfour. There are some hundred thousand of the crowd.

Charles. Come with me, Strafford ! You'll not fear, at least !

Strafford. Balfour, say nothing to the world of this !

I charge you, as a dying man, forget

You gazed upon this agony of one . . .
Of one . . . or if . . . why you may say,
Balfour,

The King was sorry : 'tis no shame in him :
Yes, you may say he even wept, Balfour,
And that I walked the lighter to the block
Because of it. I shall walk lightly, sir !
Earth fades, heaven breaks on me : I shall stand next

Before God's throne : the moment's close at
hand

When man the first, last time, has leave to lay
His whole heart bare before its Maker, leave
To clear up the long error of a life
And choose one happiness for evermore.
With all mortality about me, Charles,
The sudden wreck, the dregs of violent death—
What if, despite the opening angel-song,
There penetrate one prayer for you ? Be saved Through me ! Bear witness, no one could prevent

My death ! Lead on ! ere he awake—best,
now !

All must be ready : did you say, Balfour,
The crowd began to murmur ? They'll be kept

Too late for sermon, at St. Antholin's !
Now ! But tread softly—children are at play
In the next room. Precede ! I follow—

Enter Lady CARLISLE, with many Attendants.

Lady Carlisle. Me !

Follow me, Strafford, and be saved ! The King ?

[To the KING.] Well—as you ordered, they are ranged without,

The convoy . . . [seeing the KING's state.]

[To STRAFFORD.] You know all, then !
Why, I thought

It looked best that the King should save you,
—Charles

Alone ; 'tis a shame that you should owe me aught.

Or no, not shame ! Strafford, you'll not feel shame

At being saved by me ?

Hollis. All true ! Oh Strafford,

She saves you! all her deed! this lady's deed!

And is the boat in readiness? You, friend, Are Billingsley, no doubt. Speak to her, Strafford!

See how she trembles, waiting for your voice! The world's to learn its bravest story yet.

Lady Carlisle. Talk afterward! Long nights in France enough, To sit beneath the vines and talk of home.

Strafford. You love me, child? Ah, Strafford can be loved

As well as Vane! I could escape, then? Lady Carlisle. Haste!

Advance the torches, Bryan! Strafford. I will die.

They call me proud: but England had no right,

When she encountered me—her strength to mine—

To find the chosen foe a craven. Girl, I fought her to the utterance, I fell, I am her's now, and I will die. Beside, The lookers-on! Eliot is all about

This place, with his most uncomplaining brow. Lady Carlisle. Strafford!

Strafford. I think if you could know how much

I love you, you would be repaid, my friend! Lady Carlisle. Then, for my sake!

Strafford. Even for your sweet sake, I stay.

Hollis. For their sake! Strafford. To bequeath a stain?

Leave me! Girl, humour me and let me die! Lady Carlisle. Bid him escape—wake,

King! Bid him escape! Strafford. True, I will go! Die, and forsake the King? I'll not draw back from the last service.

Lady Carlisle. Strafford! Strafford. And, after all, what is disgrace to me? Let us come, child! That it should end this way!

Lead then! but I feel strangely: it was not To end this way.

Lady Carlisle. Lean—lean on me!

VOL. I.

Strafford. My King! Oh, had he trusted me—his friend of friends!

Lady Carlisle. I can support him, Hollis! Strafford. Not this way!

This gate—I dreamed of it, this wery gate. Lady Carlisle. It opens on the river: our good boat Is moored below, our friends are there.

Strafford. The same: Only with something ominous and dark,

Fatal, inevitable. Lady Carlisle. Strafford! Strafford!

Strafford. Not by this gate! I feel what will be there!

I dreamed of it, I tell you: touch it not! Lady Carlisle. To save the King,—Straf-ford, to save the King!

[As STRAFFORD opens the door, Pym is discovered with HAMPDEN, VANE, etc. STRAFFORD falls back; Pym follows slowly and confronts him.]

Pym. Have I done well? Speak, England! Whose sole sake

I still have laboured for, with disregard To my own heart,—for whom my youth was made Barren, my manhood waste, to offer up

Her sacrifice—this friend, this Wentworth here—

Who walked in youth with me, loved me, it may be,

And whom, for his forsaking England's cause, I hunted by all means (trusting that she Would sanctify all means) even to the block Which waits for him. And saying this, I feel

No bitterer pang than first I felt, the hour I swore that Wentworth might leave us, but I Would never leave him: I do leave him now. I render up my charge (be witness, God!)

To England who imposed it. I have done Her bidding—poorly, wrongly,—it may be,

With ill effects—for I am weak, a man: Still, I have done my best, my human best,

Not faltering for a moment. It is done. And this said, if I say . . . yes, I will say

I never loved but one man—David not More Jonathan! Even thus, I love him now!

And look for my chief portion in that world
 Where great hearts led astray are turned again,
 (Soon it may be, and, certes, will be soon :
 My mission over, I shall not live long,)—
 Ay, here I know I talk—I dare and must,
 Of England, and her great reward, as all
 I look for there ; but in my inmost heart,
 Believe, I think of stealing quite away
 To walk once more with Wentworth—my youth's friend
 Purged from all error, gloriously renewed,
 And Eliot shall not blame us Then indeed . . .
 This is no meeting, Wentworth ! Tears increase
 Too hot. A thin mist—is it blood?—enwraps
 The face I loved once. Then, the meeting be !
Strafford. I have loved England too ;
 we'll meet then, Pym.
 As well die now ! Youth is the only time
 To think and to decide on a great course :
 Manhood with action follows ; but 'tis dreary,
 To have to alter our whole life in age—
 The time past, the strength gone ! As well die now.
 When we meet, Pym, I'd be set right—not
 now !
 Best die. Then if there's any fault, fault too
 Dies, smothered up. Poor grey old little Laud
 Maydream his dream out, of a perfect Church,
 In some blind corner. And there's no one left.
 I trust the King now wholly to you, Pym !
 And yet, I know not : I shall not be there :
 Friends fail—if he have any. And he's weak,
 And loves the Queen, and . . . Oh, my fate is nothing—
 Nothing ! But not that awful head—not that !
Pym. If England shall declare such will
 to me . . .
Strafford. Pym, you help England ! I,
 that am to die,
 What I must see ! 'tis here—all here ! My
 God,
 Let me but gasp out, in one word of fire,
 How thou wilt plague him, satiating hell !
 What ? England that you help, become through you
 A green and putrefying charnel, left
 Our children . . . some of us have children,
 Pym—
 Some who, without that, still must ever wear
 A darkened brow, an over-serious look,
 And never properly be young ! No word ?
 What if I curse you ? Send a strong curse
 forth
 Clothed from my heart, lapped round with horror till
 She's fit with her white face to walk the world
 Scaring kind natures from your cause and
 you—
 Then to sit down with you at the board-head,
 The gathering for prayer . . . O speak, but
 speak !
 . . . Creep up, and quietly follow each one home,
 You, you, you, be a nestling care for each
 To sleep with,—hardly moaning in his dreams,
 She gnaws so quietly,—till, lo he starts,
 Gets off with half a heart eaten away !
 Oh, shall you 'scape with less if she's my
 child ?
 You will not say a word—to me—to Him ?
Pym. If England shall declare such will
 to me . . .
Strafford. No, not for England now, not for Heaven now,— See, Pym, for my sake, mine who kneel to
 you !
 There, I will thank you for the death, my
 friend !
 This is the meeting : let me love you well !
Pym. England,—I am thine own ! Dost thou exact
 That service ? I obey thee to the end.
Strafford. O God, I shall die first—I shall die first !

SORDELLO.

1840

[Sordello was a Mantuan Troubadour mentioned by Dante, some of whose poetry is extant. See Sismondi's "History of the Literature of the South of Europe," vol. i. An analysis of Browning's poem may be found in Mrs. Orr's Handbook.]

TO J. MILSAND, OF DIJON.

DEAR FRIEND,—Let the next poem be introduced by your name, therefore remembered along with one of the deepest of my affections, and so repay all trouble it ever cost me. I wrote it twenty-five years ago for only a few, counting even in these on somewhat more care about its subject than they really had. My own faults of expression were many; but with care for a man or book such would be surmounted, and without it what avails the faultlessness of either? I blame nobody, least of all myself, who did my best then and since; for I lately gave time and pains to turn my work into what the many might,—instead of what the few must,—like: but after all, I imagined another thing at first, and therefore leave as I find it. The historical decoration was purposely of no more importance than a background requires; and my stress lay on the incidents in the development of a soul: little else is worth study. I, at least, always thought so—you, with many known and unknown to me, think so—others may one day think so; and whether my attempt remain for them or not, I trust, though away and past it, to continue ever yours,

SORDELLO.

BOOK THE FIRST.

WHO will, may hear Sordello's story told:
His story? Who believes me shall behold
The man, pursue his fortunes to the end,
Like me: for as the friendless-people's friend
Spied from his hill-top once, despite the din
And dust of multitudes, Pentapolin

Named o' the Naked Arm,¹ I single out
Sordello, compassed murkily about
With ravage of six long sad hundred years.
Only believe me. Ye believe?

Appears

Verona . . . Never,—I should warn you
first,—

Of my own choice had this, if not the worst,
Yet not the best expedient, served to tell
A story I could body forth so well
By making speak, myself kept out of view,
The very man as he was wont to do,
And leaving you to say the rest for him.
Since, though I might be proud to see the dim
Abysmal past divide its hateful surge,
Letting of all men this one man emerge
Because it pleased me, yet, that moment past,
I should delight in watching first to last
His progress as you watch it, not a whit
More in the secret than yourselves who sit Fresh-chapleted to listen. But it seems
Your setters-forth of unexampled themes,
Makers of quite new men, producing them,
Would best chalk broadly on each vesture's hem

The wearer's quality; or take their stand,
Motley on back and pointing-pole in hand,
Beside him. So, for once I face ye, friends, Summoned together from the world's four ends,

Dropped down from heaven or cast up from hell,

To hear the story I propose to tell.
Confess now, poets know the dragnet's trick,
Catching the dead, if fate denies the quick,

And shaming her ; 'tis not for fate to choose
Silence or song because she can refuse
Real eyes to glisten more, real hearts to ache Less oft, real brows turn smother for our
sake :

I have experienced something of her spite ;
But there's a realm wherein she has no right
And I have many lovers. Say, but few Friends fate accords me? Here they are :
now view

The host I muster ! Many a lighted face
Foul with no vestige of the grave's disgrace ;
What else should tempt them back to taste
our air

Except to see how their successors fare ?
My audience ! and they sit, each ghostly man
Striving to look as living as he can,
Brother by breathing brother ; thou art set,
Clear-witted critic, by . . . but I'll not fret
A wondrous soul of them, nor move death's spleen

Who loves not to unlock them. Friends ! I mean

The living in good earnest—ye elect
Chiefly for love—suppose not I reject
Judicious praise, who contrary shall peep,
Some fit occasion, forth, for fear ye sleep,
To glean your bland approvals. Then,
appear,

Verona ! stay—thou, spirit, come not near
Now—not this time desert thy cloudy place
To scare me, thus employed, with that pure
face !

I need not fear this audience, I make free
With them, but then this is no place for thee !
The thunder-phrase of the Athenian,¹ grown
Up out of memories of Marathon,
Would echo like his own sword's griding screech

Braying a Persian shield,—the silver speech
Of Sidney's self, the starry paladin,
Turn intense as a trumpet sounding in
The knights to tilt,—wert thou to hear !

What heart

Have I to play my puppets, bear my part
Before these worthies ?

¹ Æschylus.

Lo, the past is hurled

In twain : up-thrust, out-staggering on the
world.

Subsiding into shape, a darkness rears
Its outline, kindles at the core, appears
Verona. 'Tis six hundred years and more
Since an event. The Second Friedrich wore
The purple, and the Third Honorius filled
The holy chair. That autumn eve was stilled :
A last remains of sunset dimly burned
O'er the far forests, like a torch-flame turned
By the wind back upon its bearer's hand
In one long flare of crimson ; as a brand,
The woods beneath lay black. A single
eye

From all Verona cared for the soft sky.
But, gathering in its ancient market-place,
Talked group with restless group ; and not a
face

But wrath made livid, for among them were Death's staunch purveyors, such as have in care

To feast him. Fear had long since taken root
In every breast, and now these crushed its fruit,

The ripe hate, like a wine : to note the way
It worked while each grew drunk ! Men grave and grey

Stood, with shut eyelids, rocking to and fro,
Letting the silent luxury trickle slow

About the hollows where a heart should be ;
But the young gulped with a delirious glee
Some foretaste of their first debauch in blood
At the fierce news : for, be it understood,
Envoys apprised Verona that her prince
Count Richard of Saint Boniface, joined since
A year with Azzo, Este's Lord, to thrust
Taurello Salinguerra, prime in trust
With Ecelin Romano, from his seat

Ferrara,—over zealous in the feat
And stumbling on a peril unaware,
Was captive, trammelled in his proper snare,
They phrase it, taken by his own intrigue.

Immediate succour from the Lombard League
Of fifteen cities that affect the Pope,
For Azzo, therefore, and his fellow-hope
Of the Guelf cause, a glory overcast !
Men's faces, late agape, are now aghast.

"Prone is the purple pavis;¹ Este makes "Mirth for the devil when he undertakes
"To play the Ecelin; as if it cost
"Merely your pushing-by to gain a post
"Like his! The patron tells ye, once for all,
"There be sound reasons that preferment fall
"On our beloved" . . .

"Duke o' the Rood, why not?"
Shouted an Estian, "grudge ye such a lot?
"The hill-cat boasts some cunning of her
own,
"Some stealthy trick to better beasts unknown,
"That quick with prey enough her hunger
blunts,
"And feeds her fat while gaunt the lion hunts."

"Taurello," quoth an envoy, "as in wane
"Dwelt at Ferrara. Like an osprey fain
"To fly but forced the earth his couch to make
"Far inland, till his friend the tempest wake,
"Waits he the Kaiser's coming; and as yet
"That fast friend sleeps, and he too sleeps:
but let

"Only the billow freshen, and he snuffs
"The aroused hurricane ere it enroughs
"The sea it means to cross because of him.
"Sinketh the breeze? His hope-sick eye grows dim;

"Creep closer on the creature! Every day
"Strengthens the Pontiff; Ecelin, they say,
"Dozes now at Oliero, with dry lips
"Telling upon his perished finger-tips
"How many ancestors are to depose
"Ere he be Satan's Viceroy when the doze
"Deposits him in hell. So, Guelfs rebuilt
"Their houses; not a drop of blood was spilt
"When Cino Bocchinpane chanced to meet
"Buccio Virtù—God's wafer, and the street
"Is narrow! Tutti Santi, think, a-swarm
"With Ghibellins, and yet he took no harm!
"This could not last. Off Salinguerra went "To Padua, Podestà, 'with pure intent,'
"Said he, 'my presence, judged the single bar
"To permanent tranquillity, may jar

¹ Shield.

"No longer'—so! his back is fairly turned?
"The pair of goodly palaces are burned,
"The gardens ravaged, and our Guelfs laugh, drunk
"A week with joy. The next, their laughter sunk

"In sobs of blood, for they found, some strange way,
"Old Salinguerra back again—I say,
"Old Salinguerra in the town once more
"Uprooting, overturning, flame before,
"Blood fetlock-high beneath him. Azzo fled;
"Who 'scaped the carnage followed; then
the dead

"Were pushed aside from Salinguerra's
throne,
"He ruled once more Ferrara, all alone,
"Till Azzo, stunned awhile, revived, would pounce
"Coupled with Boniface, like lynx and ounce,
"On the gorged bird. The burghers ground their teeth

"To see troop after troop encamp beneath
"I' the standing corn thick o'er the scanty patch

"It took so many patient months to snatch
"Out of the marsh; while just within their walls
"Men fed on men. At length Taurello calls
"A parley: 'let the Count wind up the war!'
"Richard, light-hearted as a plunging star,
"Agrees to enter for the kindest ends
"Ferrara, flanked with fifty chosen friends,
"No horse-boy more, for fear your timid sort

"Should fly Ferrara at the bare report.
"Quietly through the town they rode, jog-jog;
"Ten, twenty, thirty,—curse the catalogue
"Of burnt Guelf houses! Strange, Taurello
shows

"Not the least sign of life'—whereat arose
"A general growl: 'How? With his victors by?

"I and my Veronese? My troops and I?
"Receive us, was your word?' So jogged they on,

"Nor laughed their host too openly: once
gone
"Into the trap!—"

Six hundred years ago ! Dispread themselves, mantling the troubled
 Such the time's aspect and peculiar woe (Yourselves may spell it yet in chronicles,
 Albeit the worm, our busy brother, drills
 His sprawling path through letters anciently
 Made fine and large to suit some abbot's
 eye)
 When the new Hohenstauffen dropped the mask,
 Flung John of Brienne's favour from his
 casque,
 Forswore crusading, had no mind to leave
 Saint Peter's proxy leisure to retrieve
 Losses to Otho and to Barbaross,
 Or make the Alps less easy to recross ;
 And, thus confirming Pope Honorius' fear,
 Was excommunicate that very year.
 "The triple-bearded Teuton come to life !"
 Groaned the Great League ; and, arming for
 the strife,
 Wide Lombardy, on tiptoe to begin,
 Took up, as it was Guelph or Ghibellin,
 Its cry : what cry ?
 "The Emperor to come !" His crowd of feudatories, all and some,
 That leapt down with a crash of swords,
 spears, shields,
 One fighter on his fellow, to our fields,
 Scattered anon, took station here and there,
 And carried it, till now, with little care—
 Cannot but cry for him ; how else rebut
 Us longer ?—cliffs, an earthquake suffered jut
 In the mid-sea, each domineering crest
 Which nought save such another throe can wrest
 From out (conceive) a certain chokeweed grown
 Since o'er the waters, twine and tangle thrown
 Too thick, too fast accumulating round,
 Too sure to over-riot and confound
 Ere long each brilliant islet with itself,
 Unless a second shock save shoal and shelf,
 Whirling the sea-drift wide : alas, the bruised
 And sullen wreck ! Sunlight to be diffused
 For that !—sunlight, 'neath which, a scum at
 first,
 The million fibres of our chokeweed nurst

main,
 And, shattered by those rocks, took hold
 again,
 So kindly blazed it—that same blaze to brood
 O'er every cluster of the multitude
 Still hazarding new clasps, ties, filaments,
 An emulous exchange of pulses, vents
 Of nature into nature ; till some growth
 Unfancied yet, exuberantly clothe
 A surface solid now, continuous, one :
 "The Pope, for us the People, who begun
 "The People, carries on the People thus,
 "To keep that Kaiser off and dwell with us !"
 See you ?
 Or say, Two Principles that live
 Each fitly by its Representative.
 "Hill-cat"—who called him so ?—the grace-fullest
 Adventurer, the ambiguous stranger-guest
 Of Lombardy (sleek but that ruffling fur, Those talons to their sheath !) whose velvet purr
 Soothes jealous neighbours when a Saxon scout —Arpo or Yoland, is it ?—one without
 A country or a name, presumes to couch
 Beside their noblest ; until men avouch
 That, of all Houses in the Trevisan,
 Conrad describes no fitter, rear or van,
 Than Ecelo ! They laughed as they enrolled
 That name at Milan on the page of gold,
 Godego's lord,—Ramon, Marostica,
 Cartiglion, Bassano, Loria,
 And every sheep-cote on the Suabian's fief !
 No laughter when his son, "the Lombard
 Chief"
 Forsooth, as Barbarossa's path was bent
 To Italy along the Vale of Trent, Welcomed him at Roncaglia ! Sadness
 now—
 The hamlets nested on the Tyrol's brow,
 The Asolan and Euganean hills,
 The Rhetian and the Julian, sadness fills
 Them all, for Ecelin vouchsafes to stay
 Among and care about them ; day by day
 Choosing this pinnacle, the other spot,
 A castle building to defend a cot,

A cot built for a castle to defend,
Nothing but castles, castles, nor an end
To boasts how mountain ridge may join with ridge

Ily sunken gallery and soaring bridge.
He takes, in brief, a figure that beseems
The griesliest nightmare of the Church's
dreams,

—A Signory firm-rooted, unestranged
From its old interests, and nowise changed
By its new neighbourhood: perchance the vaunt
Of Otho, "my own Este shall supplant
"Your Este," come to pass. The sire led in A son as cruel; and this Ecelin
Had sons, in turn, and daughters sly and tall
And curling and compliant; but for all
Romano (so they styled him) throve, that neck
Of his so pinched and white, that hungry
cheek

Proved 'twas some fiend, not him, the man's-flesh went

To feed: whereas Romano's instrument,
Famous Taurello Salinguerra, sole
I' the world, a tree whose boughs were slipt
the bole

Successively, why should not he shed blood
To further a design? Men understood
Living was pleasant to him as he wore
His careless surcoat, glanced some missive
o'er,

Propped on his truncheon in the public way,
While his lord lifted writhen hands to pray,
Lost at Oliero's convent.

Hill-cats, face
Our Azzo, our Guelf Lion! Why disgrace
A worthiness conspicuous near and far (Atii at Rome while free and consular, Este at Padua who repulsed the Hun)
By trumpeting the Church's princely son?
—Styled Patron of Rovigo's Polesine,
Ancona's march, Ferrara's . . . ask, in fine,
Our chronicles, commenced when some old monk

Found it intolerable to be sunk
(Vexed to the quick by his revolting cell)
Quite out of summer while alive and well:
Ended when by his mat the Prior stood,
'Mid busy promptings of the brotherhood,

Striving to coax from his decrepit brains
The reason Father Porphyry took pains
To blot those ten lines out which used to stand

First on their charter drawn by Hildebrand.

The samenight wears. Verona's rule of yore
Was vested in a certain Twenty-four;
And while within his palace these debate
Concerning Richard and Ferrara's fate,
Glide we by clapping doors, with sudden glare
Of cressets¹ vented on the dark, nor care
For aught that's seen or heard until we shut
The smother in, the lights, all noises but The carroch's booming: safe at last! Why
strange

Such a recess should lurk behind a range
Of banquet rooms? Your finger—thus—you push

A spring, and the wall opens, would you rush
Upon the banqueters, select your prey, Waiting (the slaughter-weapons in the way Strewing this very bench) with sharpened ear
A preconcerted signal to appear;
Or if you simply crouch with beating heart,
Bearing in some voluptuous pageant part
To startle them. Normutes nor masquers now;
Nor any . . . does that one man sleep whose brow

The dying lamp-flame sinks and rises o'er?
What woman stood beside him? not the more
Is he unfastened from the earnest eyes
Because that arras fell between! Her wise
And lulling words are yet about the room,
Her presence wholly poured upon the gloom
Down even to her vesture's creeping stir.
And so reclines he, saturate with her,
Until an outcry from the square beneath Pierces the charm: he springs up, glad to breathe,

Above the cunning element, and shakes
The stupor off as (look you) morning breaks
On the gay dress, and, near concealed by it,
The lean frame like a half-burnt taper, lit
Erst at some marriage-feast, then laid away
Till the Armenian bridegroom's dying day,
In his wool wedding-robe.

¹ Torches.

For he--for he,
 Gate-vein of this hearts' blood of Lombardy,
 (If I should falter now)—for he is thine !
 Sordello, thy forerunner, Florentine !
 A herald-star I know thou didst absorb
 Relentless into the consummate orb
 That scared it from its right to roll along
 A sempiternal path with dance and song
 Fulfilling its allotted period,
 Serenest of the progeny of God—
 Who yet resigns it not ! His darling stoops
 With no quenched lights, desponds with no blank troops
 Of disenfranchised brilliances, for, blent
 Utterly with thee, its shy element
 Like thine uplurneth prosperous and clear.
 Still, what if I approach the august sphere
 Named now with only one name, disentwine
 That under-current soft and argentine
 From its fierce mate in the majestic mass Leavened as the sea whose fire was mixt with glass
 In John's transcendent vision,—launch once
 more
 That lustre ? Dante, pacer of the shore
 Where glutted hell disgorgeth filthiest gloom,
 Unbitten by its whirling sulphur-spume—
 Or whence the grieved and obscure waters slope
 Into a darkness quieted by hope ;
 Plucker of anaranthis grown beneath God's
 eye
 In gracious twilights where his chosen lie,—
 I would do this ! If I should falter now !
 In Mantua territory half is slough,
 Half pine-tree forest ; firs, scarlet oaks
 Breed o'er the river-beds ; even Mincio chokes
 With sand the summer through : but 'tis morass
 In winter up to Mantua walls. There was,
 Some thirty years before this evening's coil,
 One spot reclaimed from the surrounding spoil,
 Goito ; just a castle built amid
 A few low mountains ; firs and larches hid
 Their main defiles, and rings of vineyard bound
 The rest. Some captured creature in a pound,

Whose artless wonder quite precludes distress,
 Secure beside in its own loveliness,
 So peered with airy head, below, above,
 The castle at its toils, the lapwings love
 To glean among at grape-time. Pass within.
 A maze of corridors contrived for sin,
 Dusk winding-stairs, dim galleries got past,
 You gain the inmost chambers, gain at last
 A maple-panelled room : that haze which seems
 Floating about the panel, if there gleams
 A sunbeam over it, will turn to gold
 And in light-graven characters unfold
 The Arab's wisdom everywhere ; what shade Marred them a moment, those slim pillars
 made,
 Cut like a company of palms to prop
 The roof, each kissing top entwined with top,
 Leaning together ; in the carver's mind
 Some knot of bacchanals, flushed cheek combined
 With straining forehead, shoulders purpled,
 hair
 Diffused between, who in a goat-skin bear
 A vintage ; graceful sister-palms ! But quick
 To the main wonder, now. A vault, see ;
 thick
 Black shade about the ceiling, though fine slits
 Across the buttress suffer light by fits
 Upon a marvel in the midst. Nay, stoop—
 A dullish grey-streaked cumbrous font, a group
 Round it,—each side of it, where'er one sees,—
 Upholds it ; shrinking Caryatides
 Of just-tinged marble like Eve's lily flesh
 Beneath her maker's finger when the fresh
 First pulse of life shot brightening the snow.
 The font's edge burthens every shoulder, so
 They muse upon the ground, eyelids half closed ;
 Some, with meek arms behind their backs disposed,
 Some, crossed above their bosoms, some, to veil
 Their eyes, some, propping chin and cheek
 so pale,

Some, hanging slack an utter helpless length
Dead as a buried vestal whose whole strength
Goes when the grate above shuts heavily.
So dwell these noiseless girls, patient to see,
Like priestesses because of sin impure
Penanced for ever, who resigned endure,
Having that once drunk sweetness to the dregs.

And every eve, Sordello's visit begs
Pardon for them : constant as eve he came
To sit beside each in her turn, the same
As one of them, a certain space : and awe
Made a great indistinctness till he saw Sunset slant cheerful through the buttresschinks,

Gold seven times globed ; surely our maiden shrinks

And a smile stirs her as if one faint grain
Her load were lightened, one shade less the stain

Obscured her forehead, yet one more bead slipt

From off the rosary whereby the crypt
Keeps count of the contritions of its charge ?
Then with a step more light, a heart more large,

He may depart, leave her and every one
To linger out the penance in mute stone.
Ah, but Sordello ? 'Tis the tale I mean
To tell you.

In this castle may be seen,
On the hill-tops, or underneath the vines,
Or eastward by the mound of firs and pines
That shuts out Mantua, still in loneliness,
A slender boy in a loose page's dress,
Sordello : do but look on him awhile
Watching ('tis autumn) with an earnest smile
The noisy flock of thievish birds at work
Among the yellowing vineyards ; see him lurk
('Tis winter ^{even} with its sullenest of storms)
Beside that arras length of brodered forms,
On tiptoe, lifting in both hands a light
Which makes yon warrior's visage flutter bright

—Ecelo, dismal father of the brood,
And Ecelin, close to the girl he wooed,
Auria, and their Child, with all his wives
From Agnes to the Tuscan that survives,

Lady of the castle, Adelaide. His face —Look, now he turns away ! Yourselves shall trace

(The delicate nostril swerving wide and fine,
A sharp and restless lip, so well combine
With that calm brow) a soul fit to receive Delight at every sense ; you can believe
Sordello foremost in the regal class

Nature has broadly severed from her mass
Of men, and framed for pleasure, as she frames
Some happy lands, that have luxurious names,
For loose fertility ; a footfall there
Suffices to upturn to the warm air
Half-germinating spices ; mere decay
Produces richer life ; and day by day
New pollen on the lily-petal grows,

And still more labyrinthine buds the rose.
You recognise at once the finer dress
Of flesh that amply lets in loveliness
At eye and ear, while round the rest is furled (As though she would not trust them with her world)

A veil that shows a sky not near so blue,
And lets but half the sun look fervid through.
How can such love ?—like souls on each full-fraught

Discovery brooding, blind at first to aught
Beyond its beauty, till exceeding love
Becomes an aching weight ; and, to remove
A curse that haunts such natures—to preclude

Their finding out themselves can work no good
To what they love nor make it very blest
By their endeavour,—they are fain invest
The lifeless thing with life from their own soul,
Availing it to purpose, to control,
To dwell distinct and have peculiar joy
And separate interests that may employ
That beauty fitly, for its proper sake.
Nor rest they here ; fresh births of beauty
wake

Fresh homage, every grade of love is past,
With every mode of loveliness : then cast
Inferior idols off their borrowed crown
Before a coming glory. Up and down Runs arrowy fire, while earthly forms combine

To throb the secret forth ; a touch divine—

And the scaled eyeball owns the mystic rod ;
Visibly through his garden walketh God.

So fare they. Now revert. One character Denotes them through the progress and the stir,—

A need to blend with each external charm,
Bury themselves, the whole heart wide and warm,—

In something not themselves ; they would belong

To what they worship—stronger and more strong

Thus prodigally fed—which gathers shape
And feature, soon imprisons past escape
The votary framed to love and to submit
Nor ask, as passionate he kneels to it,
Whence grew the idol's empery. So runs
A legend ; light had birth ere moons and suns,

Flowing through space a river and alone,
Till chaos burst and blank the spheres were strown

Hither and thither, foundering and blind ·
When into each of them rushed light—to
find

Itself no place, foiled of its radiant chance.
Let such forego their just inheritance !
For there's a class that eagerly looks, too,
On beauty, but, unlike the gentler crew,
Proclaims each new revelation born a twin
With a distinctest consciousness within,
Referring still the quality, now first Revealed, to their own soul—its instinct nursed

In silence, now remembered better, shown
More thoroughly, but not the less their own ;
A dream come true ; the special exercise
Of any special function that implies
The being fair, or good, or wise, or strong,
Dormant within their nature all along—
Whose fault ? So, homage, other souls direct Without, turns inward. "How should this deject

"Thee, soul?" they murmur ; "wherefore strength be quelled

"Because, its trivial accidents withheld,

"Organs are missed that clog the world, inert,

"Wanting a will, to quicken and exert,

"Like thine—existence cannot satiate,

"Cannot surprise? Laugh thou at envious
fate,

"Who, from earth's simplest combination stamp

"With individuality—uncramp

"By living its faint elemental life,

"Dost soar to heaven's completest essence rife

"With grandeurs, unaffronted to the last,

"Equal to being all!"

In truth? Thou hast
Life, then—wilt challenge life for us: our race
Is vindicated so, obtains its place
In thy ascent, the first of us; whom we May follow, to the meanest, finally,
With our more bounded wills?

Ah, but to find
A certain mood enervate such a mind,
Counsel it slumber in the solitude
Thus reached nor, stooping, task for mankind's good

Its nature just as life and time accord

"—Too narrow an arena to reward

"Emprize—the world's occasion worthless
since

"Not absolutely fitted to evince

"Its mastery!" Or if yet worse befall,

And a desire possess it to put all

That nature forth, forcing our straitened
sphere

Contain it,—to display completely here

The mastery another life should learn,

Thrusting in time eternity's concern,—

So that Sordello . . .

Fool, who spied the mark
Of leprosy upon him, violet-dark
Already as he loiters? Born just now,
With the new century, beside the glow
And efflorescence out of barbarism;
Witness a Greek or two from the abyss
That stray through Florence-town with studious air,

Calming the chisel of that Pisan pair:

If Nicolo should carve a Christus yet!

While at Siena is Guidone set,

Forehead on hand; a painful birth must be

Matured ere Saint Eufemia's sacristy

Or transept gather fruits of one great gaze
At the moon : look you ! The same orange haze,—

The same blue stripe round that—and, in the midst,

Thy spectral whiteness, Mother-maid, who didst

Pursue the dizzy painter !

Woe, then, worth

Any officious babble letting forth
The leprosy confirmed and ruinous
To spirit lodged in a contracted house !
Go back to the beginning, rather ; blend
It gently with Sordello's life ; the end
Is piteous, you may see, but much between Pleasant enough. Meantime, some pyx to screen

The full-grown pest, some lid to shut upon
The goblin ! So they found at Babylon,
(Colleagues, mad Lucius and sage Antonine)
Sacking the city, by Apollo's shrine,
In rummaging among the rarities,
A certain coffer ; he who made the prize
Opened it greedily ; and out there curled
Just such another plague, for half the world
Was stung. Crawl in then, hag, and couch asquat,

Keeping that blotchy bosom thick in spot
Until your time is ripe ! The coffer-lid
Is fastened, and the coffer safely hid
Under the Loxian's¹ choicest gifts of gold.

Who will may hear Sordello's story told,
And how he never could remember when He dwelt not at Goito. Calmly, then,
About this secret lodge of Adelaide's
Glided his youth away ; beyond the glades
On the fir-forest border, and the rim
Of the low range of mountain, was for him
No other world : but this appeared his own
To wander through at pleasure and alone.
The castle too seemed empty ; far and wide
Might he disport ; only the northern side
Lay under a mysterious interdict—
Slight, just enough remembered to restrict
His roaming to the corridors, the vault
Where those font-bearers expiate their fault,

The maple-chamber, and the little nooks
And nests, and breezy parapet that looks
Over the woods to Mantua : there he strolled.
Some foreign women-servants, very old,
Tended and crept about him—all his clue
To the world's business and embroiled ado
Distant a dozen hill-tops at the most.
And first a simple sense of life engrossed
Sordello in his drowsy Paradise ;
The day's adventures for the day suffice—
Its constant tribute of perceptions strange,
With sleep and stir in healthy interchange,
Suffice, and leave him for the next at ease
Like the great palmer-worm that strips the trees,

Eats the life out of every luscious plant,
And, when September finds them sere or scant,
Puts forth two wondrous winglets, alters quite,
And hies him after unforeseen delight.
So fed Sordello, not a shard² dissheathed ;
As ever, round each new discovery, wreathed
Luxuriantly the fancies infantine
His admiration, bent on making fine
Its novel friend at any risk, would fling
In gay profusion forth : a ficklest king,
Confessed those minions !—eager to dispense
So much from his own stock of thought and sense

As might enable each to stand alone
And serve him for a fellow ; with his own,
Joining the qualities that just before Had graced some older favourite. Thus they wore

A fluctuating halo, yesterday
Set flicker and to-morrow filched away,—
Those upland objects each of separate name,
Each with an aspect never twice the same,
Waxing and waning as the new-born host
Of fancies, like a single night's hoar-frost,
Gave to familiar things a face grotesque ;
Only, preserving through the mad burlesque
A grave regard. Conceive ! the orpine³
patch

Blossoming earliest on the log-house thatch—
The day those archers wound along the vines—
Related to the Chief that left their lines

² A fragment.

³ Stonecrop.

To climb with clinking step the northern stair
Up to the solitary chambers where Sordello never came. Thus thrall reached thrall :

He o'er-festooning every interval,
As the adventurous spider, making light
Of distance, shoots her threads from depth to height,

From barbican to battlement : so flung
Fancies forth and in their centre swung
Our architect,—the breezy morning fresh
Above, and merry,—all his waving mesh Laughing with lucid dew-drops rainbow-edged.

This world of ours by tacit pact is pledged
To laying such a spangled fabric low
Whether by gradual brush or gallant blow.
But its abundant will was baulked here : doubt
Rose tardily in one so fenced about
From most that nurtures judgment,—care and pain :

Judgment, that dull expedient we are fain,
Less favoured, to adopt betimes and force
Stead us, diverted from our natural course
Of joys—contrive some yet amid the dearth,
Vary and render them, it may be, worth
Most we forego. Suppose Sordello hence
Selfish enough, without a moral sense
However feeble ; what informed the boy
Others desired a portion in his joy ?

Or say a ruthless chance broke woof and warp—

A heron's nest beat down by March winds sharp,

A fawn breathless beneath the precipice,
A bird with unsoiled breast and unfilmed
eyes

Warm in the brake—could these undo the trance

Lapping Sordello ? Not a circumstance

That makes for you, friend Naddo ! Eat fern-seed¹

And peer beside us and report indeed

If (your word) "genius" dawned with throes and stings

And the whole fiery catalogue, while springs,

Summers, and winters quietly came and went.

Time put at length that period to content,
By right the world should have imposed :
bereft

Of its good offices, Sordello, left
To study his companions, managed rip
Their fringe off, learn the true relationship, Core with its crust, their nature with his
own :

Amid his wild-wood sights he lived alone.
As if the poppy felt with him ! Though he Partook the poppy's red effrontery Till Autumn spoiled their fleering quite with rain,

And, turbanless, a coarse brown rattling crane

Lay bare. That's gone : yet why renounce, for that,

His disenchanted tributaries—flat
Perhaps, but scarce so utterly forlorn,
Their simple presence might not well be borne

Whose parley was a transport once : recall
The poppy's gifts, it flaunts you, after all,
A poppy :—why distrust the evidence
Of each soon satisfied and healthy sense ?
The new-born judgment answered, "little boots

"Beholding other creatures' attributes
"And having none !" or, say that it sufficed,
"Yet, could one but possess, oneself," (enticed

Judgment) "some special office !" Nought
beside

Serves you ? "Well then, be somehow justified

"For this ignoble wish to circumscribe
"And concentrate, rather than swell, the tribe

"Of actual pleasures : what, now, from without

"Effects it ?—proves, despite a lurking doubt.

"Mere sympathy sufficient, trouble spared ?

"That, tasting joys by proxy thus, you fared
"The better for them ?" Thus much craved his soul.

Alas, from the beginning love is whole

And true ; if sure of nought beside, most sure
Of its own truth at least ; nor may endure
A crowd to see its face, that cannot know
How hot the pulses throb its heart below :
While its own helplessness and utter want
Of means to worthily be ministrant
To what it worships, do but fan the more
Its flame, exalt the idol far before
Itself as it would have it ever be.
Souls like Sordello, on the contrary,
Coerced and put to shame, retaining will,
Care little, take mysterious comfort still,
But look forth tremblingly to ascertain
If others judge their claims not urged in vain,
And say for them their stifled thoughts aloud.
So, they must ever live before a crowd :
—“Vanity,” Naddo tells you.

Whence contrive
A crowd, now ? From these women just alive,
That archer-troop ? Forth glided—not alone
Each painted warrior, every girl of stone,
Nor Adelaide (bent double o’er a scroll,
One maiden at her knees, that eve, his soul
Shook as he stumbled through the arras’d glooms
On them, for, ’mid quaint robes and weird perfumes,
Started the meagre Tuscan up,—her eyes,
The maiden’s, also, bluer with surprise)
—But the entire out-world : whatever, scraps
And snatches, song and story, dreams
perhaps,
Conceited the world’s offices, and he
Had hitherto transferred to flower or tree,
Not counted a befitting heritage
Each, of its own right, singly to engage Some man, no other,—such now dared to stand Alone. Strength, wisdom, grace on every
hand
Soon disengaged themselves, and he discerned
A sort of human life : at least, was turned
A stream of lifelike figures through his brain.
Lord, liegeman, valvassor¹ and suzerain,

¹ Vassal.

Ere he could choose, surrounded him ; a stuff

To work his pleasure on ; there, sure enough :
But as for gazing, what shall fix that gaze ?
Are they to simply testify the ways
He who convoked them sends his soul along
With the cloud’s thunder or a dove’s brood-
song ?

—While they live each his life, boast each his own

Peculiar dower of bliss, stand each alone
In some one point where something dearest
loved

Is easiest gained—far worthier to be proved
Than aught he envies in the forest-wights !
No simple and self-evident delights,
But mixed desires of unimagined range,
Contrasts or combinations, new and strange,
Irk some perhaps, yet plainly recognized
By this, the sudden company—loves prized
By those who are to prize his own amount Of loves. Once care because such make account,

Allow that foreign recognitions stamp
The current value, and his crowd shall vamp
Him counterfeits enough ; and so their print
Be on the piece, ’tis gold, attests the mint,
And “good,” pronounce they whom his new appeal

Is made to : if their casual print conceal—
This arbitrary good of theirs o’ergloss
What he has lived without, nor felt the loss—
Qualities strange, ungainly, wearisome, —What matter ? So must speech expand the dumb

Part-sigh, part-smile with which Sordello, late
Whom no poor woodland-sights could satiate,
Betakes himself to study hungrily
Just what the puppets his crude phantasy
Supposes notable, — popes, kings, priests, knights,—

May please to promulgate for appetites ;
Accepting all their artificial joys
Not as he views them, but as he employs
Each shape to estimate the other’s stock
Of attributes, whereon—a marshalled flock
Of authorized enjoyments—he may spend
Himself, be men, now, as he used to blend

With tree and flower—nay more entirely, else
 'Twere mockery: for instance, "How excels
 "My life that chieftain's?" (who apprised
 the youth
 Ecelin, here, becomes this month, in truth,
 Imperial Vicar?) "Turns he in his tent
 "Remissly? Be it so—my head is bent
 "Deliciously amid my girls to sleep.
 "What if he stalks the Trentine-pass? Yon steep
 "I climbed an hour ago with little toil:
 "We are alike there. But can I, too, foil
 "The Guelph's paid stabber, carelessly afford "Saint Mark's a spectacle, the sleight o' the sword
 "Baffling the treason in a moment?" Here
 No rescue! Poppy he is none, but peer
 To Ecelin, assuredly: his hand,
 Fashioned no otherwise, should wield a brand
 With Ecelin's success—try, now! He soon
 Was satisfied, returned as to the moon
 From earth; left each abortive boy's-attempt
 For feats, from failure happily exempt,
 In fancy at his beck. "One day I will "Accomplish it! Are they not older still "—Not grown-up men and women? 'Tis
 beside
 "Only a dream; and though I must abide "With dreams now, I may find a thorough vent
 "For all myself, acquire an instrument
 "For acting what these people act; my
 soul
 "Hunting a body out may gain its whole
 "Desire some day!" How else express chagrin
 And resignation, show the hope steal in
 With which he let sink from an aching wrist
 The rough-hewn ash-bow? Straight, a gold shaft hissed
 Into the Syrian air, struck Malek down Superbly! "Crosses to the breach! God's
 Town
 "Is gained him back!" Why bend rough ash-bows more?
 Thus lives he: if not careless as before,
 Comforted: for one may anticipate,
 Rehearse the future, be prepared when fate

Shall have prepared in turn real men whose names
 Startle, real places of enormous fames,
 Este abroad and Ecelin at home
 To worship him,—Mantua, Verona, Rome
 To witness it. Who grudges time so spent?
 Rather test qualities to heart's content—
 Summon them, thrice selected, near and far—
 Compress the starriest into one star,
 And grasp the whole at once!

The pageant thinned
 Accordingly; from rank to rank, like wind
 His spirit passed to winnow and divide;
 Back fell the simpler phantasms; every side
 The strong clave to the wise; with either classed
 The beauteous; so, till two or three amassed
 Mankind's beseeemingnesses, and reduced
 Themselves eventually,—graces loosed,
 Strengths lavished,—all to heighten up One
 Shape
 Whose potency no creature should escape.
 Can it be Friedrich of the bowmen's talk?
 Surely that grape-juice, bubbling at the stalk,
 Is some grey scorching Saracenic wine
 The Kaiser quaffs with the Miramolins¹—Those swarthy hazel-clusters, seamed and chapped,
 Or filberts russet-sheathed and velvet-capped,
 Are dates plucked from the bough John Brienne sent
 To keep in mind his sluggish armament
 Of Canaan:—Friedrich's, all the pomp and fierce Demeanour! But harsh sounds and sights transpierce
 So rarely the serene cloud where he dwells
 Whose looks enjoin, whose lightest words are spells
 On the obdurate! That right arm indeed
 Has thunder for its slave; but where's the need
 Of thunder if the stricken multitude
 Harkens, arrested in its angriest mood,
 While songs go up exulting, then disspread,
 Dispart, disperse, lingering overhead

Like an escape of angels? 'Tis the tune,
Nor much unlike the words his women croon
Smilingly, colourless and faint-designed
Each, as a worn-out queen's face some remind
Of her extreme youth's love-tales. "Eglamor "Made that!" Half minstrel and half emperor,

What but ill objects vexed him? Such he slew.

The kinder sort were easy to subdue
By those ambrosial glances, dulcet tones;
And these a gracious hand advanced to thrones
Beneath him. Wherefore twist and torture
this,

Striving to name afresh the antique bliss,
Instead of saying, neither less nor more,
He had discovered, as our world before,
Apollo? That shall be the name; nor bid
Me rag by rag expose how patchwork hid
The youth—what thefts of every clime and
day

Contributed to purfle the array
He climbed with (June at deep) some close ravine

Mid clatter of its million pebbles sheen,
Over which, singing soft, the runnel slipped
Elate with rains: into whose streamlet dipped
He foot, yet trod, you thought, with unwet sock—

Though really on the stubs of living rock
Ages ago it crenelled; vines for roof,
Lindens for wall; before him, aye aloof,
Flittered in the cool some azure damsel-fly,
Born of the simmering quiet, there to die.
Emerging whence, Apollo still, he spied
Mighty descents of forest; multiplied
Tuft on tuft, here, the frolic myrtle-trees,
Theregendered the grave maple stocks at ease.
And, proud of its observer, straight the wood Tried old surprises on him; black it stood
A sudden barrier ('twas a cloud passed o'er)
So dead and dense, the tiniest brute no more Must pass; yet presently (the cloud dispatched)

Each clump, behold, was glistering detached
A shrub, oak-boles shrunk into ilex-stems!
Yet could not he denounce the stratagems

He saw thro', till, hours thence, aloft would hang

White summer-lightnings; as it sank and sprang

To measure, that whole palpitating breast
Of heaven, 'twas Apollo, nature prest
At eve to worship.

Time stole: by degrees
The Pythons perish off; his votaries
Sink to respectful distance; songs redeem
Their pains, but briefer; their dismissals seem Emphatic; only girls are very slow
To disappear—his Delians! Some that glow
O' the instant, more with earlier loves to wrench

Away, reserves to quell, disdains to quench;
Alike in one material circumstance—
All soon or late adore Apollo! Glance
The bevy through, divine Apollo's choice,
His Daphne! "We secure Count Richard's
voice

"In Este's counsels, good for Este's ends
"As our Taurello," say his faded friends,
"By granting him our Palma!"—the sole
child,

They mean, of Agnes Este who beguiled
Ecelin, years before this Adelaide Wedded and turned him wicked: "but the maid

"Rejects his suit," those sleepy women boast.
She, scorning all beside, deserves the most Sordello: so, conspicuous in his world
Of dreams sat Palma. How the tresses curled
Into a sumptuous swell of gold and wound
About her like a glory! even the ground
Was bright as with spilt sunbeams; breathe not, breathe
Not!—poised, see, one leg doubled underneath,

Its small foot buried in the dimpling snow,
Rests, but the other, listlessly below,
O'er the couch-side swings feeling for cool air.
The vein-streaks swollen a richer violet where
The languid blood lies heavily; yet calm
On her slight prop, each flat and outspread palm,

As but suspended in the act to rise
By consciousness of beauty, whence her eyes

Turn with so frank a triumph, for she meets
Apollo's gaze in the pine glooms.

Time fleets :

That's worst ! Because the pre-appointed age
Approaches. Fate is tardy with the stage
And crowd she promised. Lean he grows and pale,

Though restlessly at rest. Hardly avail Fancies to soothe him. Time steals, yet
alone

He tarries here ! The earnest smile is gone.
How long this might continue matters not ;

—For ever, possibly ; since to the spot
None come : our lingering Taurello quits

Mantua at last, and light our lady flits
Back to her place disburthened of a care.
Strange—to be constant here if he is there !

Is it distrust ? Oh, never ! for they both Goad Ecelin alike, Romano's growth
Is daily manifest, with Azzo dumb
And Richard wavering : let but Friedrich
come,

Find matter for the minstrelsy's report —Lured from the Isle and its young Kaiser's court

To sing up a Messina morning up,
And, double rillet of a drinking cup,
Sparkle along to ease the land of drouth,
Northward to Provence that, and thus far south

The other ! What a method to apprise
Neighbours of births, espousals, obsequies,
Which in their very tongue the Troubadour Records ! and his performance makes a tour,

For Trouveres bear the miracle about,
Explain its cunning to the vulgar rout,
Until the Formidable House is famed
Over the country—as Taurello aimed,
Who introduced, although the rest adopt,
The novelty. Such games, her absence stopped,

Begin afresh now Adelaide, recluse
No longer, in the light of day pursues
Her plans at Mantua : whence an accident
Which, breaking on Sordello's mixed content
Opened, like any flash that cures the blind,
The veritable business of mankind.

BOOK THE SECOND.

THE woods were long austere with snow : at
last

Pink leaflets budded on the beech, and fast
Larches, scattered through pine-tree solitudes, Brightened, “as in the slumbrous heart o' the woods

“Our buried year, a witch, grew young again
“To placid incantations, and that stain
“About were from her cauldron, green smoke blent

“With those black pines”—so Eglamor gave vent

To a chance fancy. Whence a just rebuke
From his companion ; brother Naddo shook
The solemnest of brows : “Beware,” he said,
“Of setting up conceits in nature's stead !”

Forth wandered our Sordello. Nought so sure
As that to-day's adventure will secure
Palma, the visioned lady—only pass
O'er yon damp mound and its exhausted grass, Under that brake where sundawn feeds the stalks

Of withered fern with gold, into those walks
Of pine and take her ! Buoyantly he went.
Again his stooping forehead was besprent
With dew-drops from the skirting ferns. Then wide

Opened the great morass, shot every side
With flashing water through and through ;
a-shine,

Thick-steaming, all-alive. Whose shape
divine,

Quivered i' the farthest rainbow-vapour, glanced

Athwart the flying herons ? He advanced,
But warily ; though Mincio leaped no more,
Each foot-fall burst up in the marsh-floor
A diamond jet : and if he stopped to pick
Rose-lichen, or molest the leeches quick,
And circling blood-worms, minnow, newt or loach,

A sudden pond would silently encroach
This way and that. On Palma passed. The verge

Of a new wood was gained. She will emerge

Flushed, now, and panting,—crowds to see,— will own
She loves him—Boniface to hear, to groan,
To leave his suit ! One screen of pine-trees
still
Opposes : but—the startling spectacle—
Mantua, this time ! Under the walls—a crowd
Indeed, real men and women, gay and loud
Round a pavilion. How he stood !

In truth
No prophecy had come to pass : his youth
In its prime now—and where was homage poured
Upon Sordello ?—born to be adored,
And suddenly discovered weak, scarce made
To cope with any, cast into the shade
By this and this. Yet something seemed to prick
And tingle in his blood ; a sleight—a trick—
And much would be explained. It went for nought—

The best of their endowments were ill bought
With his identity : nay, the conceit,
That this day's roving led to Palma's feet
Was not so vain—list ! The word, "Palma !"
Steal

Aside, and die, Sordello ; this is real,
And this—abjure !

What next ? The curtains see
Dividing ! She is there ; and presently
He will be there—the proper You, at length—
In your own cherished dress of grace and
strength :
Most like, the very Boniface !

Not so.
It was a showy man advanced ; but though
A glad cry welcomed him, then every sound Sank and the crowd disposed themselves around,
—"This is not he," Sordello felt ; while,
"Place

"For the best Troubadour of Boniface !" Hollaed the Jongleurs,—"Eglamor,¹ whose lay
"Concludes his patron's Court of Love today !"

¹ A Troubadour.

Obsequious Naddo strung the master's lute
With the new lute-string, "Elys," named to suit

The song : he stealthily at watch, the while,
Biting his lip to keep down a great smile
Of pride : then up he struck. Sordello's brain
Swam ; for he knew a sometime deed again ;
So, could supply each foolish gap and chasm
The minstrel left in his enthusiasm,
Mistaking its true version—was the tale
Not of Apollo ? Only, what avail
Luring her down, that Elys an he pleased,
If the man dared no further ? Has he ceased
And, lo, the people's frank applause half
done,

Sordello was beside him, had begun
(Spite of indignant twitchings from his friend
The Trouvere) the true lay with the true end,
Taking the other's names and time and place
For his. On flew the song, a giddy race,
After the flying story ; word made leap Out word, rhyme—rhyme ; the lay could barely keep

Pace with the action visibly rushing past :
Both ended. Back fell Naddo more aghast
Than some Egyptian from the harassed bull
That wheeled abrupt and, bellowing, fronted full

His plague, who spied a scarab 'neath the
tongue,

And found 'twas Apis' flank his hasty prong
Insulted. But the people—but the cries,
The crowding round, and proffering the prize !
—For he had gained some prize. He seemed to shrink

Into a sleepy couch, just at whose brink
One sight withheld him. There sat Adelaide,
Silent ; but at her knees the very maid
Of the North Chamber, her red lips as rich,
The same pure fleecy hair ; one weft of which,
Golden and great, quite touched his cheek
as o'er

She leant, speaking some six words and no
more.

He answered something, anything ; and she Unbound a scarf and laid it heavily
Upon him, her neck's warmth and all. Again
Moved the arrested magic ; in his brain

Noises grew, and a light that turned to glare,
And greater glare, until the intense flare Engulfed him, shut the whole scene from his sense.

And when he woke 'twas many a furlong
thence,

At home; the sun shining his ruddy wont;
The customary birds'-chirp; but his front
Was crowned—was crowned! Her scented scarf around

His neck! Whose gorgeous vesture heaps the ground?

A prize? He turned, and peeringly on him
Brooded the women-faces, kind and dim,
Ready to talk—"The Jongleurs in a troop
"Had brought him back, Naddo and Squarcialupe

"And Tagliafer; how strange! a childhood spent

"In taking, well for him, so brave a bent!
"Since Eglamor," they heard, "was dead with spite,

"And Palma chose him for her minstrel."
Light

Sordello rose—to think, now; hitherto
He had perceived. Sure, a discovery grew
Out of it all! Best live from first to last
The transport o'er again. A week he passed,
Sucking the sweet out of each circumstance,
From the bard's southbark to the luscious trance
Bounding his own achievement. Strange!

A man

Recounted an adventure, but began
Imperfectly; his own task was to fill
The frame-work up, sing well what he sung ill,
Supply the necessary points, set loose
As many incidents of little use —More imbecile the other, not to see
Their relative importance clear as he!
But, for a special pleasure in the act
Of singing—had he ever turned, in fact,
From Elys, to sing Elys?—from each fit
Of rapture to contrive a song of it?
True, this snatch or the other seemed to wind
Into a treasure, helped himself to find
A beauty in himself; for, see, he soared
By means of that mere snatch, to many, a hoard

Of fancies; as some falling cone bears soft
The eye along the fir-tree-spire, aloft
To a dove's nest. Then, how divine the cause

Why such performance should exact applause
From men, if they had fancies too? Did fate
Decree they found a beauty separate
In the poor snatch itself?—"Take Elys, there,
"—"Her head that's sharp and perfect like a pear,

"So close and smooth are laid the few fine
locks

"Coloured like honey oozed from topmost
rocks

"Sun-blanch'd the livelong summer"—if they heard

"Just those two rhymes, assented at my word,
"And loved them as I love them who have run

"These fingers through those pale locks, let the sun

"Into the white cool skin—who first could clutch,

"Then praise—I needs must be a god to such.
"Or what if some, above themselves, and yet

"Beneath me, like their Eglamor, have set "An impress on our gift? So, men believe

"And worship what they know not, nor receive

"Delight from. Have they fancies—slow,
perchance,

"Not at their beck, which indistinctly glance
"Until, by song, each floating part be linked "To each, and all grow palpable, distinct!"

He pondered this.

Meanwhile, sounds low and drear
Stole on him, and a noise of footsteps, near
And nearer, while the underwood was pushed Aside, the larches grazed, the dead leaves
crushed

At the approach of men. The wind seemed laid;

Only, the trees shrunk slightly and a shade
Came o'er the sky although 'twas midday yet:
You saw each half-shut downcast floweret Flutter—"a Roman bride, when they'd dispart

"Her unbound tresses with the Sabine dart,
"Holding that famous rape in memory still,
"Felt creep into her curls the iron chill,

"And looked thus," Eglamor would say—
indeed

'Tis Eglamor, no other, these precede Home hither in the woods. "'Twere surely sweet

"Far from the scene of one's forlorn defeat
"To sleep!" judged Naddo, who in person led Jongleurs and Trouveres, chanting at their
head,

A scanty company; for, sooth to say,
Our beaten Troubadour had seen his day.
Old worshippers were something shamed, old
friends

Nigh weary; still the death proposed amends.
"Let us but get them safely through my song
"And home again!" quoth Naddo.

All along,
This man (they rest the bier upon the sand)
—This calm corpse with the loose flowers in his hand,

Eglamor, lived Sordello's opposite.
For him indeed was Naddo's notion right,
And verse a temple-worship vague and vast,
A ceremony that withdrew the last
Opposing bolt, looped back the lingering veil
Which hid the holy place: should one so frail

Stand there without such effort? or repine
If much was blank, uncertain at the shrine
He knelt before, till, soothed by many a rite,
The power responded, and some sound or sight
Grew up, his own forever, to be fixed,
In rhyme, the beautiful, forever!—mixed
With his own life, unloosed when he should
please,

Having it safe at hand, ready to ease
All pain, remove all trouble; every time
He loosed that fancy from its bonds of rhyme,
(Like Perseus when he loosed his naked love)
Faltering; so distinct and far above
Himself, these fancies! He, no genius rare,
Transfiguring in fire or wave or air
At will, but a poor gnome that, cloistered up
In some rock-chamber with his agate cup,
His topaz rod, his seed-pearl, in these few
And their arrangement finds enough to do
For his best art. Then, how he loved that art!
The calling marking him a man apart

From men—one not to care, take counsel for Cold hearts, comfortless faces—(Eglamor
Was neediest of his tribe)—since verse, the gift,
Was his, and men, the whole of them, must shift Without it, e'en content themselves with wealth

And pomp and power, snatching a life by stealth.

So, Eglamor was not without his pride!
The sorriest bat which cowers throughout noontide

While other birds are jocund, has one time
When moon and stars are blinded, and the prime

Of earth is his to claim, nor find a peer;
And Eglamor was noblest poet here—

He well knew, 'mid those April woods he cast
Conceits upon in plenty as he passed,
That Naddo might suppose him not to think Entirely on the coming triumph: wink
At the one weakness! 'Twas a fervid child,
That song of his; no brother of the guild
Had e'er conceived its like. The rest you know,
The exaltation and the overthrow:

Our poet lost his purpose, lost his rank,
His life—to that it came. Yet envy sank
Within him, as he heard Sordello out,
And, for the first time, shouted—tried to shout
Like others, not from any zeal to show
Pleasure that way: the common sort did so,
What else was Eglamor? who, bending down
As they, placed his beneath Sordello's crown,
Printed a kiss on his successor's hand,
Left one great tear on it, then joined his band
—In time; for some were watching at the door:
Who knows what envy may effect? "Give
o'er,

"Nor charm his lips, nor craze him!" (here
one spied

And disengaged the withered crown)—
"Beside

"His crown? How prompt and clear those verses rang

"To answer yours! nay, sing them!" And he sang

Them calmly. Home he went; friends used to wait

His coming, zealous to congratulate;

But, to a man—so quickly runs report—
 Could do no less than leave him, and escort
 His rival. That eve, then, bred many a
 thought:

What must his future life be? was he brought
 So low, who stood so lofty this Spring morn?
 At length he said, "Best sleep now with my scorn,

"And by to-morrow I devise some plain
 "Expedient!" So, he slept, nor woke again.
 They found as much, those friends, when they returned

O'erflowing with the marvels they had learned
 About Sordello's paradise, his roves
 Among the hills and vales and plains and groves,

Wherein, no doubt, this lay was roughly cast,
 Polished by slow degrees, completed last
 To Eglamor's discomfiture and death.

Such form the chanters now, and, out of
 breath,

They lay the beaten man in his abode,
 Naddo reciting that same luckless ode,
 Doleful to hear. Sordello could explore
 By means of it, however, one step more
 In joy; and, mastering the round at length,
 Learnt how to live in weakness as in strength,
 When from his covert forth he stood, addressed
 Eglamor, bade the tender ferns invest,
 Primeval pines o'er canopy his couch,
 And, most of all, his fame—(shall I avouch
 Eglamor heard it, dead though he might look,
 And laughed as from his brow Sordello took
 The crown, and laid on the bard's breast, and said

It was a crown, now, fit for poet's head?)

—Continue. Nor the prayer quite fruitless fell.

A plant they have, yielding a three-leaved bell¹
 Which whitens at the heart ere noon, and ails
 Till evening; evening gives it to her gales
 To clear away with such forgotten things
 As are an eyesore to the morn: this brings
 Him to their mind, and bears his very name.

So much for Eglamor. My own month
 came;

'Twas a sunrise of blossoming and May.

Beneath a flowering laurel thicket lay
 Sordello; each new sprinkle of white stars
 That smell fainter of wine than Massic jars
 Dug up at Baix, when the south wind shed
 The ripest, made him happier; filleted
 And robed the same, only a lute beside Lay on the turf. Before him far and wide
 The country stretched: Goito slept behind —The castle and its covert, which confined
 Him with his hopes and fears; so fain of old
 To leave the story of his birth untold.
 At intervals, 'spite the fantastic glow
 Of his Apollo-life, a certain low
 And wretched whisper, winding through the bliss,

Admonished, no such fortune could be his,
 All was quite false and sure to fade one
 day:

The closelier drew he round him his array
 Of brilliance to expel the truth. But when
 A reason for his difference from men
 Surprised him at the grave, he took no rest
 While aught of that old life, superbly dressed
 Down to its meanest incident, remained
 A mystery: alas, they soon explained
 Away Apollo! and the tale amounts
 To this: when at Vicenza both her counts
 Banished the Vivaresi kith and kin,
 Those Maltraversi hung on Ecelin,
 Reviled him as he followed; he for spite
 Must fire their quarter, though that self-same night

Among the flames young Ecelin was born
 Of Adelaide, there too, and barely torn
 From the roused populace hard on the rear,
 By a poor archer when his chieftain's fear
 Grew high; into the thick Elcorte leapt,
 Saved her, and died; no creature left except
 His child to thank. And when the full escape
 Was known—how men impaled from chine to nape

Unlucky Prata, all to pieces spurned
 Bishop Pistore's concubines, and burned
 Taurello's entire household, flesh and fell,
 Missing the sweeter prey—such courage well
 Might claim reward. The orphan, ever since,
 Sordello, had been nurtured by his prince

Within a blind retreat where Adelaide—
(For, once this notable discovery made,
The past at every point was understood) —Might harbour easily when times were rude,

When Azzo schemed for Palma, to retrieve
That pledge of Agnes Este—loth to leave
Mantua unguarded with a vigilant eye,
While there Taurello bode ambiguously—
He who could have no motive now to moil
For his own fortunes since their utter spoil—
As it were worth while yet (went the report)
To disengage himself from her. In short,
Apollo vanished; a mean youth, just named
His lady's minstrel, was to be proclaimed —How shall I phrase it?—Monarch of the World!

For, on the day when that array was furled
Forever, and in place of one a slave
To longings, wild indeed, but longings save
In dreams as wild, suppressed—one daring

• not

Assume the mastery such dreams allot,
Until a magical equipment, strength,
Grace, wisdom, decked him too,—he chose at length,

Content with unproved wits and failing frame,
In virtue of his simple will, to claim
That mastery, no less—to do his best
With means so limited, and let the rest
Go by,—the seal was set: never again
Sordello could in his own sight remain
One of the many, one with hopes and cares
And interests powise distinct from theirs,
Only peculiar in a thriveless store
Of fancies, which were fancies and no more;
Never again for him and for the crowd
A common law was challenged and allowed
If calmly reasoned of, howe'er denied
By a mad impulse nothing justified
Short of Apollo's presence. The divorce Is clear: why needs Sordello square his course

By any known example? Men no more Compete with him than tree and flower before.

Himself, inactive, yet is greater far
Than such as act, each stooping to his star,

Acquiring thence his function; he has gained
The same result with meaner mortals trained
To strength or beauty, moulded to express
Each the idea that rules him; since no less
He comprehends that function, but can still Embrace the others, take of might his fill
With Richard as of grace with Palma, mix
Their qualities, or for a moment fix
On one; abiding free meantime, uncramped
By any partial organ, never stamped
Strong, and to strength turning all energies—
Wise, and restricted to becoming wise—
That is, he loves not, nor possesses One Idea that, star-like over, lures him on
To its exclusive purpose. "Fortunate!

"This flesh of mine ne'er strove to emulate
"A soul so various—took no casual mould
"Of the first fancy and, contracted, cold,
"Clogged her forever—soul averse to change
"As flesh: whereas flesh leaves soul free to range,

"Remains itself a blank, cast into shade,
"Encumbers little, if it cannot aid.

"So, range, free soul!—who, by self-consciousness,

"The last drop of all beauty dost express—

"The grace of seeing grace, a quintessence

"For thee: while for the world, that can dispense

"Wonder on men who, themselves, wonder
—make

"A shift to love at second-hand, and take

"For idols those who do but idolize,

"Themselves,—the world that counts men strong or wise,

"Who, themselves, court strength, wisdom,
—it shall bow

"Surely in unexampled worship now,

"Discerning me!"—

(Dear monarch, I beseech,
Notice how lamentably wide a breach
Is here: discovering this, discover too
What our poor world has possibly to do
With it! As pigmy natures as you please—
So much the better for you; take your ease,
Look on, and laugh; style yourself God
alone;

Strangle some day with a cross olive-stone!

All that is right enough : but why want us
To know that you 'yourself know thus and
thus?)

"The world shall bow to me conceiving all "Man's life, who see its blisses, great and small,

"Afar—not tasting any ; no machine

"To exercise my utmost will is mine :

"Be mine mere consciousness ! Let men perceive

"What I could do, a mastery believe,

"Asserted and established to the throng

"By their selected evidence of song

"Which now shall prove, whate'er they are, or seek

"To be, I am—whose words, not actions
speak,

"Who change no standards of perfection, vex

"With no strange forms created to perplex,

"But just perform their bidding and no more,

"At their own satiating-point give o'er,

"While each shall love in me the love that leads

"His soul to power's perfection." Song, not deeds,

(For we get tired) was chosen. Fate would brook

Mankind no other organ ; he would look

For not another channel to dispense

His own volition by, receive men's sense

Of its supremacy—would live content,

Obstructed else, with merely verse for vent.

Nor should, for instance, strength an outlet seek

And, striving, be admired : nor grace bespeak

Wonder, displayed in gracious attitudes :

Nor wisdom, poured forth, change unseemly moods ;

But he would give and take on song's one point.

Like some huge throbbing stone that, poised a-joint,

Sounds, to affect on its basaltic bed,

Must sue in just one accent ; tempests shed

Thunder, and raves the windstorm : only let

That key by any little noise be set—

The far benighted hunter's halloo pitch

On that, the hungry curlew chance to scritch

Or serpent hiss it, rustling through the rift,
However loud, however low—all lift
The groaning monster, stricken to the heart.

Lo ye, the world's concernment, for its part,
And this, for his, will hardly interfere !

Its businesses in blood and blaze this year

But wile the hour away—a pastime slight

Till he shall step upon the platform : right !

And, now thus much is settled, cast in rough,
Proved feasible, be counselled ! thought

enough,—

Slumber, Sordello ! any day will serve :

Were it a less digested plan ! how swerve

To-morrow ? Meanwhile eat these sun-dried grapes,

And watch the soaring hawk there ! Life escapes

Merrily thus.

He thoroughly read o'er

His truchman Naddo's missive six times more,

Praying him visit Mantua and supply

A famished world.

The evening star was high

When he reached Mantua, but his fame
arrived

Before him : friends applauded, foes connived,

And Naddo looked an angel, and the rest

Angels, and all these angels would be blest

Supremely by a song—the thrice-renowned

Goito-manufacture. Then he found

(Casting about to satisfy the crowd)

That lappy vehicle, so late allowed,

A sore annoyance ; 'twas the song's effect

He cared for, scarce the song itself : reflect !

In the past life, what might be singing's use ?

Just to delight his Delians, whose profuse

Praise, not the toilsome process which procured

That praise, enticed Apollo : dreams abjured,

No overleaping means for ends—take both

For granted or take neither ! I am loth

To say the rhymes at last were Eglamor's ;

But Naddo, chuckling, bade competitors

Go pine ; "the master certes meant to waste

"No effort, cautiously had probed the taste

"He'd please anon : true bard, in short,— disturb

"His title if they could ; nor spur nor curb,

"Fancy nor reason, wanting in him ; whence
 "The staple of his verses, common sense :
 "He built on man's broad nature—gift of gifts,
 "That power to build ! The world contented shifts
 "With counterfeits enough, a dreary sort
 "Of warriors, statesmen, ere it can extort
 "Its poet-soul—that's, after all, a freak
 "(The having eyes to see and tongue to
 speak)
 "With our herd's stupid sterling happiness
 "So plainly incompatible that—yes—
 "Yes—should a son of his improve the breed
 "And turn out poet, he were cursed indeed !"
 "Well, there's Goito and its woods anon,
 "If the worst happen ; best go stoutly on
 "Now !" thought Sordello.

Ay, and goes on yet !

You pother with your glossaries to get
 A notion of the Troubadour's intent
 In rondel, tenzon, virlai or sirvent—
 Much as you study arras how to twirl
 His angelot, plaything of page and girl
 Once ; but you surely reach, at last,—or, no !
 Never quite reach what struck the people so,
 As from the welter of their time he drew
 Its elements successively to view,
 Followed all actions backward on their course,
 And catching up, unmingled at the source,
 Such a strength, such a weakness, added then
 A touch or two, and turned them into men.
 Virtue took form, nor vice refused a shape ;
 Here heaven opened, there was hell agape,
 As Saint this simpered past in sanctity,
 Sinner the other flared portentous by
 A greedy people. Then why stop, surprised
 At his success ? The scheme was realized
 Too suddenly in one respect : a crowd
 Praising, eyes quick to see, and lips as loud
 To speak, delicious homage to receive,
 The woman's breath to feel upon his sleeve,
 Who said, "But Anafest—why asks he less
 "Than Lucio, in your verses ? how confess,
 "It seemed too much but yestereve !"—the youth,
 Who bade him earnestly, "Avow the truth !
 "You love Bianca, surely, from your song ;
 "I knew I was unworthy !"—soft or strong,

In poured such tributes ere he had arranged
 Ethereal ways to take them, sorted, changed,
 Digested, Courtied thus at unawares,
 In spite of his pretensions and his cares,
 He caught himself shamefully hankering
 After the obvious petty joys that spring
 From true life, fain relinquish pedestal
 And condescend with pleasures—one and all
 To be renounced, no doubt ; for, thus to chain
 Himself to single joys and so refrain
 From tasting their quintessence, frustrates,
 sure,
 His prime design ; each joy must he abjure
 Even for love of it.

He laughed : what sage

But perishes if from his magic page
 He look because, at the first line, a proof
 'Twas heard salutes him from the cavern roof ?
 "On ! Give yourself, excluding aught beside,
 "To the day's task ; compel your slave provide
 "Its utmost at the soonest ; turn the leaf
 "Thoroughly conned. These lays of yours, in brief—
 "Cannot men bear, now, something better ?
 —fly
 "A pitch beyond this unreal pageantry
 "Of essences ? the period sure has ceased
 "For such : present us with ourselves, at least,
 "Not portions of ourselves, mere loves and hates
 "Made flesh : wait not !"

Awile the poet waits

However. The first trial was enough :
 He left imagining, to try the stuff
 That held the imaged thing, and, let it writhe
 Never so fiercely, scarce allowed a tithe
 To reach the light—his Language. How he sought
 The cause, conceived a cure, and slow re-wrought
 That Language, — welding words into the crude
 Mass from the new speech round him, till a rude
 Armour was hammered out, in time to be Approved beyond the Roman panoply
 Melted to make it,—boots not. This obtained
 With some ado, no obstacle remained

To using it ; accordingly he took
 An action with its actors, quite forsook
 Himself to live in each, returned anon
 With the result—a creature, and, by one
 And one, proceeded leisurely to equip
 Its limbs in harness of his workmanship.
 “ Accomplished ! Listen, Mantuans ! ” Fond
 essay !

Piece after piece that armour broke away,
 Because perceptions whole, like that he sought
 To clothe, reject so pure a work of thought
 As language : thought may take perception’s
 place

But hardly co-exist in any case,
 Being its mere presentment—of the whole
 By parts, the simultaneous and the sole
 By the successive and the many. Lacks
 The crowd perception ? painfully it tacks Thought to thought, which Sordello, needing such,

Has rent perception into : it’s to clutch
 And reconstruct—his office to diffuse,
 Destroy : as hard, then, to obtain a Muse
 As to become Apollo. “ For the rest,
 “ E’en if some wondrous vehicle expressed
 “ The whole dream, what impertinence in me
 “ So to express it, who myself can be “ The dream ! nor, on the other hand, are those

“ I sing to, over-likely to suppose
 “ A higher than the highest I present
 “ Now, which they praise already : be content
 “ Both parties, rather—they with the old verse,
 “ And I with the old praise—far go, fare
 worse ! ”

A few adhering rivets loosed, upsprings
 The angel, sparkles off his mail, which rings
 Whirled from each delicatest limb it warps ;
 So might Apollo from the sudden corpse
 Of Hyacinth ¹ have cast his luckless quoits.
 He set to celebrating the exploits
 Of Montfort o’er the Mountaineers.

Then came
 The world’s revenge : their pleasure, now his

¹ Accidentally killed by Apollo whilst playing quoits, and changed into the flower.

Merely,—what was it ? “ Not to play the fool

“ So much as learn our lesson in your school ! ”
 Replied the world. He found that, every time
 He gained applause by any ballad-rhyme,
 His auditory recognised no jot

As he intended, and, mistaking not
 Him for his meanest hero, ne’er was dunce
 Sufficient to believe him—all, at once.

His will . . . conceive it caring for his will !
 —Mantuans, the main of them, admiring still
 How a mere singer, ugly, stunted, weak,
 Had Montfort at completely (so to speak)
 His fingers’ ends ; while past the praise-tide swept

To Montfort, either’s share distinctly kept :
 The true meed for true merit !—his abates
 Into a sort he most repudiates,
 And on them angrily he turns. Who were
 The Mantuans, after all, that he should care
 About their recognition, ay or no ?
 In spite of the convention months ago,
 (Why blink the truth ?) was not he forced to help

This same ungrateful audience, every whelp
 Of Naddo’s litter, make them pass for peers
 With the bright band of old Goito years,
 As erst he toiled for flower or tree ? Why,
 there

Sat Palma ! Adelaide’s funereal hair
 Ennobled the next corner. Ay, he strewed
 A fairy dust upon that multitude,
 Although he feigned to take them by themselves ;

His giants dignified those puny elves, Sublimed their faint applause. In short, he found

Himself still footing a delusive round,
 Remote as ever from the self-display
 He meant to compass, hampered every way
 By what he hoped assistance. Wherefore
 then

Continue, make believe to find in men
 A use he found not ?

Weeks, months, years went by,
 And lo, Sordello vanished utterly,
 Sundered in twain ; each spectral part at strife
 With each ; one jarred against another life ;

The Poet thwarting hopelessly the Man—
 Who, fooled no longer, free in fancy ran
 Here, there : let slip no opportunities
 As pitiful, forsooth, beside the prize
 To drop on him some no-time and acquit
 His constant faith (the Poet-half's to wit—
 That waiving any compromise between
 No joy and all joy kept the hunger keen Beyond most methods)—of incurring scoff
 From the Man-portion—not to be put off
 With self-reflectings by the Poet's scheme, Though ne'er so bright. Who sauntered forth in dream,

Dressed any how, nor waited mystic frames,
 Immeasurable gifts, astounding claims,
 But just his sorry self?—who yet might be Sorrier for aught he in reality
 Achieved, so pinioned Man's the Poet-part,
 Fondling, in turn of fancy, verse ; the Art
 Developing his soul a thousand ways—
 Potent, by its assistance, to amaze
 The multitude with majesties, convince Each sort of nature that the nature's prince Accosted it. Language, the makeshift, grew
 Into a bravest of expedients, too ;
 Apollo, seemed it now, perverse had thrown
 Quiver and bow away, the lyre alone Sufficed. While, out of dream, his day's work went

To tune a crazy *tenzon*¹ or *sirvent*²—
 So hampered him the Man-part, thrust to judge
 Between the bard and the bard's audience, grudge

A minute's toil that missed its due reward !
 But the complete Sordello, Man and Bard,
 John's cloud-girt angel, this foot on the land,
 That on the sea, with, open in his hand,
 A bitter-sweetling of a book—was gone.

Then, if internal struggles to be one,
 Which frittered him incessantly piecemeal,
 Referred, ne'er so obliquely, to the real
 Intruding Mantuans ! ever with some call
 To action while he pondered, once for all,

Which looked the easier effort—to pursue
 This course, still leap o'er paltry joys, yearn
 through

The present ill-appreciated stage
 Of self-revelment, and compel the age
 Know him—or else, forswearing bard-craft,
 wake

From out his lethargy and nobly shake
 Off timid habits of denial, mix
 With men, enjoy like men. Ere he could fix
 On aught, in rushed the Mantuans ; much they cared

For his perplexity ! Thus unprepared,
 The obvious if not only shelter lay
 In deeds, the dull conventions of his day
 Prescribed the like of him : why not be glad
 'Tis settled Palma's minstrel, good or bad,
 Submits to this and that established rule ?
 Let Vidal change, or any other fool,
 His murrey-coloured³ robe for flamot,⁴
 And crop his hair ; too skin-deep, is it not,
 Such vigour ? Then, a sorrow to the heart,
 His talk ! Whatever topics they might start
 Had to be groped for in his consciousness Straight, and as straight delivered them by guess.

Only obliged to ask himself, "What was,"
 A speedy answer followed ; but, alas,
 One of God's large ones, tardy to condense
 Itself into a period ; answers whence
 A tangle of conclusions must be stripped
 At any risk ere, trim to pattern clipped,
 They matched rare specimens the Mantuan flock

Regaled him with, each talker from his stock
 Of sorted-o'er opinions, every stage,
 Juicy in youth or desiccate with age,
 Fruits like the fig-tree's, rather-ripe, rotten-rich,

Sweet-sour, all tastes to take : a practice which
 He too had not impossibly attained,
 Once either of those fancy-flights restrained ;
 (For, at conjecture how might words appear

To others, playing there what happened here,

 before the Court of Love.

² Sirvent. Martial, political, and satirical songs. Both Provençal terms.

And occupied abroad by what he spurned
 At home, 'twas slipped, the occasion he returned
 To seize :) he'd strike that lyre adroitly—
 speech,
 Would but a twenty-cubit plectre¹ reach ;
 A clever hand, consummate instrument,
 Were both brought close ; each excellency
 went
 For nothing, else. The question Naddo asked,
 Had just a lifetime moderately tasked
 To answer, Naddo's fashion. More disgust
 And more : why move his soul, since move it must
 At minute's notice or as good it failed
 To move at all ? The end was, he retained
 Some ready-made opinion, put to use
 This quip, that maxim, ventured reproduce
 Gestures and tones—at any folly caught
 Serving to finish with, nor too much sought
 If false or true 'twas spoken ; praise and blame
 Of what he said grew pretty nigh the same —Meantime awards to meantime acts : his
 soul,
 Unequal to the compassing a whole,
 Saw, in a tenth part, less and less to strive
 About. And as for men in turn . . . contrive
 Who could to take eternal interest
 In them, so hate the worst, so love the best !
 Though, in pursuance of his passive plan,
 He hailed, decried, the proper way.

As Man

So figured he ; and how as Poet ? Verse
 Came only not to a stand-still. The worse,
 That his poor piece of daily work to do
 Was—not sink under any rivals ; who Loudly and long enough, without these qualms,
 Turned, from Bocafoli's stark-naked psalms,
 To Plara's sonnets spoilt by toying with,
 "As knops² that stud some almug³ to the pith

As Man

"Prickèd for gum, wry thence, and crinklèd
 worse
 "Than pursèd eyelids of a river-horse
 "Sunning himself o' the slime when whirrs the breese"—
Gad-fly, that is. He might compete with these !
 But—but—
 "Observe a pompion⁴ twine afloat ;
 "Pluck me one cup from off the castle-moat !
 "Along with cup you raise leaf, stalk and root,
 "The entire surface of the pool to boot.
 "So could I pluck a cup, put in one song
 "A single sight, did not my hand, too strong,
 "Twitch in the least the root-strings of the whole.
 "How should externals satisfy my soul ?"
 "Why that's precise the error Squarcialupe" (Hazardèd Naddo) "finds ; 'the man can't stoop
 "'To sing us out,' quoth he, 'a mere romance ;
 "'He'd fain do better than the best, enhance
 "'The subjects' rarity, work problems out "'Therewith.' Now, you're a bard, a bard past doubt,
 "And no philosopher ; why introduce
 "Crotchets like these ? fine, surely, but no use
 "In poetry—which still must be, to strike,
 "Based upon common sense ; there's nothing like
 "Appealing to our nature ! what beside
 "Was your first poetry ? No tricks were tried "In that, no hollow thrills, affected throes !
 "The man,' said we, 'tells his own joys and woes :
 "'We'll trust him.' Would you have your songs endure ?
 "Build on the human heart !—why, to be sure
 "Yours is one sort of heart—but I mean theirs,
 "Ours, every one's, the healthy heart one cares
 "To build on ! Central peace, mother of strength,
 "That's father of . . . nay, go yourself that length,

¹ An instrument for twanging the strings of a lyre.

³ Sandal-wood.

⁴ Melon.

"Ask those calm-hearted doers what they do "When they have got their calm! And is it true,

"Fire rankles at the heart of every globe?
 "Perhaps. But these are matters one may probe.

"Too deeply for poetic purposes:

"Rather select a theory that . . . yes,

"Laugh! what does that prove?—stations
 you midway

"And saves some little o'er-refining. Nay,

"That's rank injustice done me! I restrict

"The poet? Don't I hold the poet picked

"Out of a host of warriors, statesmen . . . did

"I tell you? Very like! As well you hid

"That sense of power, you have! True bards believe

"All able to achieve what they achieve—

"That is, just nothing—in one point abide

"Profounder simpletons than all beside.

"Oh, ay! The knowledge that you are a bard

"Must constitute your prime, nay sole, reward!"

So prattled Naddo, busiest of the tribe
 Of genius-haunters—how shall I describe
 What grubs or nips or rubs or rips—your louse
 For love, your flea for hate, magnanimous,
 Malignant, Pappacoda, Tagliafer,¹
 Picking a sustenance from wear and tear
 By implements it sedulous employs
 To undertake, lay down, mete out, o'er-toise
 Sordello? Fifty creepers to elude
 At once! They settled staunchly; shame ensued:

Behold the monarch of mankind succumb
 To the last fool who turned him round his thumb,

As Naddo styled it! 'Twas not worth oppose
 The matter of a moment, gainsay those
 He aimed at getting rid of; better think
 Their thoughts and speak their speech, secure to slink

Back expeditiously to his safe place,
 And chew the cud—what he and what his race
 Were really, each of them. Yet even this Conformity was partial. He would miss

Some point, brought into contact with them ere

Assured in what small segment of the sphere
 Of his existence they attended him;

Whence blunders, falsehoods rectified—a grim

List—slur it over! How? If dreams were tried,

His will swayed sicklily from side to side,
 Nor merely neutralized his waking act

But tended e'en in fancy to distract

The intermediate will, the choice of means.

He lost the art of dreaming: Mantuan scenes

Supplied a baron, say, he sang before,

Handsomely reckless, full to running-o'er

Of gallantries; "abjure the soul, content "With body, therefore!" Scarcely had he bent

Himself in dream thus low, when matter fast

Cried out, he found, for spirit to contrast

And task it duly; by advances slight,

The simple stuff becoming composite,

Count Lori grew Apollo: best recall

His fancy! Then would some rough peasant-Paul,

Like those old Ecelin confers with, glance

His gay apparel o'er; that countenance

Gathered his shattered fancies into one,

And, body clean abolished, soul alone

Sufficed the grey Paulician; by and by,

To balance the ethereality,

Passions were needed; foiled he sank again.

Meanwhile the world rejoiced ('tis time explain)

Because a sudden sickness set it free

From Adelaide. Missing the mother-bee,

Her mountain-hive Romano swarmed; at
 once

A rustle-forth of daughters and of sons

Blackened the valley. "I am sick too, old,

Half-crazed I think; what good's the Kaiser's gold

To such an one? God help me! for I catch

"My children's greedy sparkling eyes at watch—

He bears that double breastplate on,' they
 say,

"So many minutes less than yesterday!"

¹ Minstrel-knight of William the Conqueror.

"Beside, Monk Hilary is on his knees
 "Now, sworn to kneel and pray till God shall
 please
 "Exact a punishment for many things
 "You know, and some you never knew ;
 which brings
 "To memory, Azzo's sister Beatrix
 "And Richard's Giglia are my Alberic's
 "And Ecelin's betrothed ; the Count himself
 "Must get my Palma : Ghibellin and Guelph
 "Mean to embrace each other." So began
 Romano's missive to his fighting man
 Taurello—on the Tuscan's death, away
 With Friedrich sworn to sail from Naples' bay
 Next month for Syria. Never thunder-clap
 Out of Vesuvius' throat, like this mishap Startled him. "That accursed Vicenza ! I
 "Absent, and she selects this time to die !
 "Ho, fellows, for Vicenza !" Half a score
 Of horses ridden dead, he stood before
 Romano in his reeking spurs : too late—
 "Boniface urged me, Este could not wait,"
 The chieftain stammered ; "let me die in peace
 "Forget me ! Was it I who craved increase "Of rule ? Do you and Friedrich plot your worst
 "Against the Father : as you found me first
 "So leave me now. Forgive me ! Palma,
 sure,
 "Is at Goito still. Retain that lure—
 "Only be pacified !"

 The country rung
 With such a piece of news : on every tongue,
 How Ecelin's great servant, congeed off,
 Had done a long day's service, so, might doff
 The green and yellow, and recover breath
 At Mantua, whither,—since Retrude's death,
 (The girlish slip of a Sicilian bride
 From Otho's house, he carried to reside
 At Mantua till the Ferrarese should pile
 A structure worthy her imperial style,
 The gardens raise, the statues there enshrine,
 She never lived to see)—although his line
 Was ancient in her archives and she took
 A pride in him, that city, nor forsook
 Her child when he forsook himself and spent
 A prowess on Romano surely meant

For his own growth—whither he ne'er resorts
 If wholly satisfied (to trust reports)
 With Ecelin. So, forward in a trice Were shows to greet him. "Take a friend's advice," Quoth Naddo to Sordello, "nor be rash
 "Because your rivals (nothing can abash
 "Some folks) demur that we pronounced you best
 "To sound the great man's welcome ; 'tis a test,
 "Remember ! Strojavacca looks asquint,
 "The rough fat sloven ; and there's plenty hint
 "Your pinions have received of late a shock—
 "Outsoar them, cobsman of the silver flock !
 "Sing well !" A signal wonder, song's no whit
 Facilitated.

 Fast the minutes flit ;
 Another day, Sordello finds, will bring
 The soldier, and he cannot choose but sing ;
 So, a last shift, quits Mantua—slow, alone :
 Out of that aching brain, a very stone,
 Song must be struck. What occupies that front ?

Just how he was more awkward than his wont
 The night before, when Naddo, who had seen
 Taurello on his progress, praised the mien
 For dignity no crosses could affect—
 Such was a joy, and might not he detect
 A satisfaction if established joys
 Were proved imposture ? Poetry annoys
 Its utmost : wherefore fret ? Verses may
 come
 Or keep away ! And thus he wandered, dumb
 Till evening, when he paused, thoroughly
 spent,
 On a blind hill-top : down the gorge he went,
 Yielding himself up as to an embrace.
 The moon came out ; like features of a face,
 A querulous fraternity of pines,
 Sad blackthorn clumps, leafless and grovelling
 vines
 Also came out, made gradually up
 The picture ; 'twas Goito's mountain-cup
 And castle. He had dropped through one defile
 He never dared explore, the Chief erewhile

Had vanished by. Back rushed the dream, enwrapped

Him wholly. 'Twas Apollo now they lapped,
Those mountains, not a pettish minstrel meant
To wear his soul away in discontent,
Brooding on fortune's malice. Heart and brain
Swelled; he expanded to himself again,
As some thin seedling spice-tree starved and
frail,

Pushing between cat's head and ibis' tail
Crusted into the porphyry pavement smooth, —Suffered remain just as it sprung, to soothe
The Soldan's pining daughter, never yet
Well in her chilly green-glazed minaret,—
When rooted up, the sunny day she died,
And flung into the common court beside
Its parent tree. Come home, Sordello! Soon
Was he low muttering, beneath the moon,
Of sorrow saved, of quiet evermore,—
Since from the purpose, he maintained before,
Only resulted wailing and hot tears.
Ah, the slim castle! dwindled of late years,
But more mysterious; gone to ruin—trails
Of vine through every loop-hole. Nought avails

The night as, torch in hand, he must explore
The maple chamber: did I say, its floor
Was made of intersecting cedar beams?
Worn now with gaps so large, there blew cold streams

Of air quite from the dungeon; lay your ear
Close and 'tis like, one after one, you hear
In the blind darkness water drop. The nests
And nooks retain their long ranged vesturechests

Empty and smelling of the iris root
The Tuscan grated o'er them to recruit
Her wasted wits. Palma was gone that day,
Said the remaining women. Last, he lay
Beside the Carian group reserved and still.

The Body, the Machine for Acting Will,
I had been at the commencement proved unfit;
That for Demonstrating, Reflecting it,
Mankind—no fitter: was the Will Itself
In fault?

His forehead pressed the moonlit shelf
Beside the youngest marble maid awhile;
Then, raising it, he thought, with a long smile,

"I shall be king again!" as he withdrew
The envied scarf; into the font he threw
His crown.

Next day, no poet! "Wherefore?" asked

Taurello, when the dance of Jongleurs, masked

As devils, ended; "don't a song come next?"
The master of the pageant looked perplexed
Till Naddo's whisper came to his relief.

"His Highness knew what poets were: in brief,

"Had not the tetchy race prescriptive right
"To peevishness, caprice? or, call it spite,
"One must receive their nature in its length
"And breadth, expect the weakness with the strength!"

—So phrasing, till, his stock of phrases spent,
The easy-natured soldier smiled assent,
Settled his portly person, smoothed his chin,
And nodded that the bull-bait might begin.

BOOK THE THIRD.

AND the font took them: let our laurels lie!
Braid moonfern now with mystic trifoly
Because once more Goito gets, once more,
Sordello to itself! A dream is o'er,
And the suspended life begins anew;
Quiet those throbbing temples, then, subdue
That cheek's distortion! Nature's strict embrace,

Putting aside the past, shall soon efface
Its print as well—factitious humours grown
Over the true—loves, hatreds not his own—
And turn him pure as some forgotten vest
Woven of painted byssus,¹ silkiest
Tufting the Tyrrhene whelk's pearl-sheeted lip,
Left welter where a trireme let it slip

I' the sea, and vexed a satrap; so the stain
O' the world forsakes Sordello, with its pain,
Its pleasure: how the tinct loosening escapes,
Cloud after cloud! Mantua's familiar shapes
Die, fair and foul die, fading as they flit,
Men, women, and the pathos and the wit,

Wise speech and foolish, deeds to smile or sigh
 For, good, bad, seemly or ignoble, die.
 The last face glances through the eglantines,
 The last voice murmurs, 'twixt the blossomed

vines,

Of Men, of that machine supplied by thought
 To compass self-perception with, he sought
 By forcing half himself—an insane pulse
 Of a god's blood, on clay it could convulse, Never transmute—on human sights and sounds,

To watch the other half with; irksome bounds
 It ebbs from to its source, a fountain sealed
 Forever. Better sure be unrevealed

Than part revealed: Sordello well or ill
 Is finished: then what further use of Will,
 'Point in the prime idea not realized,
 An oversight? inordinately prized,
 No less, and pampered with enough of each Delight to prove the whole above its reach.

"To need become all natures, yet retain

"The law of my own nature—to remain

"Myself, yet yearn . . . as if that chestnut,
 think,

"Should yearn for this first larch-bloom crisp and pink,

"Or those pale fragrant tears where zephyrs stanch

"March wounds along the fretted pine-tree branch!

"Will and the means to show will, great and small,

"Material, spiritual,—abjure them all

"Save any so distinct, they may be left "To amuse, not tempt become! and, thus bereft,

"Just as I first was fashioned would I be!

"Nor, moon, is it Apollo now, but me

"Thou visitest to comfort and befriend!

"Swim thou into my heart, and there an end,

"Since I possess thee!—nay, thus shut mine
 eyes

"And know, quite know, by this heart's fall
 and rise,

"When thou dost bury thee in clouds, and
 when

"Out-standest: wherefore practise upon men

"To make that plainer to myself?"

Slide here

Over a sweet and solitary year

Wasted; or simply notice change in him—

How eyes, once with exploring bright, grew
 dim

And satiate with receiving. Some distress
 Was caused, too, by a sort of consciousness
 Under the imbecility,—nought kept
 That down; he slept, but was aware he slept,
 So, frustrated: as who brainsick made pact
 Erst with the overhanging cataract

To deafen him, yet still distinguished plain
 His own blood's measured clicking at his brain.

To finish. One declining Autumn day—
 Few birds about the heaven chill and grey,
 No wind that cared trouble the tacit woods—
 He sauntered home complacently, their moods
 According, his and nature's. Every spark
 Of Mantua life was trodden out; so dark
 The embers, that the Troubadour, who sung
 Hundreds of songs, forgot, its trick his tongue,
 Its craft his brain, how either brought to pass
 Singing at all; that faculty might class
 With any of Apollo's now. The year
 Began to find its early promise sere
 As well. Thus beauty vanishes; thus stone
 Outlingers flesh: nature's and his youth gone,
 They left the world to you, and wished you
 joy.

When, stopping his benevolent employ,
 A presage shuddered through the welkin;
 harsh

The earth's remonstrance followed. 'Twas the marsh

Gone of a sudden. Mincio, in its place, Laughed, a broad water, in next morning's
 face,

And, where the mists broke up immense and
 white

If the steady wind, burned like a spilth of light
 Out of the crashing of a myriad stars.

And here was nature, bound by the same bars
 Of fate with him!

"No! youth once gone is gone:
 Deeds, let escape, are never to be done.

"Leaf-fall and grass-spring for the year;
 for us—

"Oh forfeit I unalterably thus

'My chance? nor two lives wait me, this to spend,
 "Learning save that? Nature has time, may mend
 'Mistake, she knows occasion will recur;
 'Landslip or seabreach, how affects it her
 'With her magnificent resources?—I 'Must perish once and perish utterly.
 'Not any strollings now at even-close
 'Down the field-path, Sordello! by thorn-rows
 'Alive with lamp-flies, swimming spots of fire
 'And dew, outlining the black cypress' spire
 'She waits you at, Elys, who heard you first
 'Woo her, the snow-month through, but ere she durst
 'Answer 'twas April. Linden-flower-time-long
 'Here eyes were on the ground; 'tis July, strong
 'Now; and because white dust-clouds overwhelm
 'The woodside, here or by the village elm
 'That holds the moon, she meets you, somewhat pale,
 'But letting you lift up her coarse flax veil
 'And whisper (the damp little hand in yours)
 'Of love, heart's love, your heart's love that endures
 'Till death. Tush! No mad mixing with the rout
 'Of haggard ribalds wandering about
 'The hot torchlit wine-scented island-house
 'Where Friedrich holds his wickedest carouse,
 'Parading,—to the gay Palermitans,
 'Soft Messinese, dusk Saracenic clans
 'Nuocera holds,—those tall grave dazzling Norse,
 'High-cheeked, lank-haired, toothed whiter than the morse,
 'Queens of the caves of jet stalactites,
 'He sent his barks to fetch through icy seas,
 'The blind night seas without a saving star,
 'And here in snowy birdskin robes they are,
 'Sordello!—here, mollitious alcoves gilt
 'Superb as Byzant domes that devils built!
 'Ah, Byzant, there again! no chance to go
 'Ever like august cheery Dandolo,

"Worshipping hearts about him for a wall,
 "Conducted, blind eyes, hundred years and all,
 "Through vanquished Byzant where friends note for him
 "What pillar, marble massive, sardius' slim,
 "'Twere fittest he transport to Venice' Square—
 "Flattered and promised life to touch them there
 "Soon, by those fervid sons of senators!
 "No more lives, deaths, loves, hatreds, peaces, wars!
 "Ah, fragments of a whole ordained to be,
 "Points in the life I waited! what are ye
 "But roundels of a ladder which appeared
 "Awhile the very platform it was reared
 "To lift me on?—that happiness I find
 "Proofs of my faith in, even in the blind
 "Instinct which bade forego you all unless
 "Ye led me past yourselves. Ay, happiness "Awaited me; the way life should be used
 "Was to acquire, and deeds like you conducted
 "To teach it by a self-revelment, deemed "Life's very use, so long! Whatever seemed "Progress to that, was pleasure; aught that stayed
 "My reaching it—no pleasure. I have laid
 "The ladder down; I climb not; still, aloft
 "The platform stretches! Bliss strong and soft,
 "I dared not entertain, elude me; yet
 "Never of what they promised could I get "A glimpse till now! The common sort, the crowd,
 "Exist, perceive; with Being are endowed,
 "However slight, distinct from what they see,
 "However bounded; Happiness must be,
 "To feed the first by gleanings from the last,
 "Attain its qualities, and slow or fast
 "Become what they behold; such peace-in-strife,
 "By transmutation, is the Use of Life,
 "The Alien turning Native to the soul
 "Or body—which instructs me; I am whole
 "There and demand a Palma; had the world
 "Been from my soul to a like distance hurled,

"Twere Happiness to make it one with me:
 "Whereas I must, ere I begin to Be,
 "Include a world, in flesh, I comprehend
 "In spirit now; and this done, what's to blend "With? Nought is Alien in the world—my Will
 "Owns all already; yet can turn it—still
 "Less—Native, since my Mean to correspond "With Will are so unworthy, 'twas my bond
 "To tread the very joys that tantalize
 "Most now, into a grave, never to rise.
 "I die then! Will the rest agree to die?
 "Next Age or no? Shall its Sordello try
 "Clue after clue, and catch at last the clue
 "I miss?—that's underneath my finger too,
 "Twice, thrice a day, perhaps,—some yearning traced
 "Deeper, some petty consequence embraced "Closer! Why fled I Mantua, then?—complained
 "So much my Will was fettered, yet remained
 "Content within a tether half the range
 "I could assign it?—able to exchange
 "My ignorance (I felt) for knowledge, and
 "Idle because I could thus understand—
 "Could e'en have penetrated to its core
 "Our mortal mystery, yet—fool—fornore,
 "Preferred elaborating in the dark
 "My casual stuff, by any wretched spark
 "Born of my predecessors, though one stroke
 "Of mine had brought the flame forth!
 Mantua's yoke,
 "My minstrel's-trade, was to behold mankind,—
 "My own concern was just to bring my mind
 "Behold, just extricate, for my acquit,
 "Each object suffered stifle in the mist
 "Which hazard, custom, blindness interpose
 "Betwixt things and myself."

Whereat he rose.

The level wind carried above the firs
 Clouds, the irrevocable travellers, Onward.

"Pushed thus into a drowsy copse,
 "Arms twine about my neck, each eyelid drops
 "Under a humid finger; while there fleets,
 "Outside the screen, a pageant time repeats

"Never again! To be deposed, immured
 "Clandestinely—still petted, still assured
 "To govern were fatiguing work—the Sight
 "Fleeting meanwhile! 'Tis noontide: wreak ere night
 "Somehow my will upon it, rather! Slake
 "This thirst somehow, the poorest impress take
 "That serves! A blasted bud displays you, torn,
 "Faint rudiments of the full flower unborn;
 "But who divines what glory coats o'erclasp
 "Of the bulb dormant in the mummy's grasp "Taurello sent?" . . .

"Taurello? Palma sent

"Your Trouvere," (Naddo interposing leant
 Over the lost bard's shoulder)—"and, believe,
 "You cannot more reluctantly receive
 "Than I pronounce her message: we depart
 "Together. What avail a poet's heart
 "Verona's pomps and gauds? five blades of grass
 "Suffice him. News? Why, where your marsh was,
 "On its mud-banks smoke rises after smoke
 "I' the valley, like a spout of hell new-broke.
 "Oh, the world's tidings! small your thanks,
 I guess,
 "For them The father of our Patroness,
 "Has played Taurello an astounding trick,
 "Parts between Ecelin and Alberic
 "His wealth and goes into a convent: both
 "Wed Guelfs: the Count and Palma plighted troth
 "A week since at Verona: and they want
 "You doubtless to contrive the marriagechant
 "Ere Richard storms Ferrara." Then was told

The tale from the beginning—how, made bold
 By Salinguerra's absence, Guelfs had burned
 And pillaged till he unawares returned
 To take revenge: how Azzo and his friend
 Were doing their endeavour, how the end
 O' the siege was nigh, and how the Count, released
 From further care, would with his marriage-feast

Inaugurate a new and better rule,
Absorbing thus Romano.

"Shall I school

"My master," added Naddo, "and suggest
"How you may clothe in a poetic vest
"These doings, at Verona? Your response "To Palma! Wherefore jest? 'Depart at
once?'

"A good resolve! In truth, I hardly hoped
"So prompt an acquiescence. Have you groped

"Out wisdom in the wilds here?—thoughts may be

"Over-poetical for poetry.

"Pearl-white, you poets liken Palma's neck;

"And yet what spoils an orient like some speck

"Of genuine white, turning its own white grey?

"You take me? Curse the cicala!"

One more day,

One eve—appears Verona! Many a group,
(You mind) instructed of the osprey's swoop
On lynx and ounce, was gathering—Christendom

Sure to receive, whate'er the end was, from
The evening's purpose cheer or detriment,
Since Friedrich only waited some event
Like this, of Ghibellins establishing Themselves within Ferrara, ere, as King
Of Lombardy, he'd glad descend there,
wage

Old warfare with the Pontiff, disengage
His barons from the burghers, and restore
The rule of Charlemagne, broken of yore
By Hildebrand.

I' the palace, each by each,
Sordello sat and Palma: little speech
At first in that dim closet, face with face
(Despite the tumult in the market-place) Exchanging quick low laughter: now would rush

Word upon word to meet a sudden flush,
A look left off, a shifting lips' surmise—
But for the most part their two histories Ran best thro' the locked fingers and linked arms.

And so the night flew on with its alarms

VOL. I.

Till in burst one of Palma's retinue;

"Now, Lady!" gasped he. Then arose the two.

And leaned into Verona's air, dead-still.
A balcony lay black beneath until
Out, 'mid a gush of torchfire, grey-haired men
Came on it and harangued the people: then Sea-like that people surging to and fro
Shouted, "Hale forth the carroch—trumpets, ho,

"A flourish! Run it in the ancient grooves!

"Back from the bell! Hammer—that whom behoes

"May hear the League is up! Peal—learn who list,

"Verona means not first of towns break tryst

"To-morrow with the League!"

Enough. Now turn—

Over the eastern cypresses: discern!

Is any beacon set a-glimmer?

Rang

The air with shouts that overpowered the clang
Of the incessant carroch, even: "Haste—
"The candle's at the gateway! ere it waste,
"Each soldier stand beside it, armed to march
"With Tiso Sampier through the eastern arch!"

Ferrara's succoured, Palma!

Once again

They sat together; some strange thing in train
To say, so difficult was Palma's place
In taking, with a coy fastidious grace
Like the bird's flutter ere it fix and feed.
But when she felt she held her friend indeed
Safe, she threw back her curls, began implant
Her lessons; telling of another want
Goito's quiet nourished than his own;
Palma—to serve him—to be served, alone
Importing; Agnes' milk so neutralized
The blood of Ecelin. Nor be surprised
If, while Sordello fain had captive led Nature, in dream was Palma subjected
To some out-soul, which dawned not though she pined
Delaying, till its advent, heart and mind
Their life. "How dared I let expand the force

Within me, till some out-soul, whose resource

- 'It grew for, should direct it? Every law
 'Of life, its every fitness, every flaw,
 'Must One determine whose corporeal shape
 'Would be no other than the prime escape
 'And revelation to me of a Will
 'Orb-like o'ershrouded and inscrutable
 'Above, save at the point which, I should
 know,
 'Shone that myself, my powers, might overflow
 'So far, so much; as now it signified
 'Which earthly shape it henceforth chose my guide,
 'Whose mortal lip selected to declare
 'Its oracles, what fleshly garb would wear
 '—The first of intimations, whom to love;
 'The next, how love him. Seemed that orb,
 above
 'The castle-covert and the mountain-close,
 'Slow in appearing?—if beneath it rose
 'Cravings, aversions,—did our green precinct
 "Take pride in me, at unawares distinct
 'With this or that endowment,—how, repressed
 "At once, such jetting power shrank to the rest!
 "Was I to have a chance touch spoil me, leave
 "My spirit thence unfitted to receive
 "The consummating spell?—that spell so near
 'Moreover! 'Waits he not the waking
 year?
 "His almond-blossoms must be honey-ripe
 "By this; to welcome him, fresh runnels stripe
 "The thawed ravines; because of him, the wind
 "Walks like a herald. I shall surely find
 "Him now!
 "And chief, that earnest April morn
 "Of Richard's Love-court, was it time, so worn
 "And white my cheek, so idly my blood
 beat,
 "Sitting that morn beside the Lady's feet
 "And saying as she prompted; till outburst
 "One face from all the faces. Not then first
- 'I knew it; where in maple chamber glooms,
 'Crowned with what sanguine-heart pomegranate blooms,
 'Advanced it ever? Men's acknowledgment
 'Sanctioned my own: 'twas taken, Palma's
 bent,—
 'Sordello,—recognized, accepted. "Dumb
 'Sat she still scheming. Ecelin would come
 'Gaunt, scared, 'Cesano baffles me,' he'd
 say:
 "Better I fought it out, my father's way!
 "Strangle Ferrara in its drowning flats,
 "And you and your Taurello yonder!— what's "Romano's business there?' An hour's concern
 'To cure the froward Chief!—induce return
 'As heartened from those overmeaning eyes,
 'Wound up to persevere,—his enterprise
 'Marked out anew, its exigent of wit
 'Apportioned,—she at liberty to sit
 'And scheme against the next emergence, I—
 'To covet her Taurello-sprite, made fly
 'Or fold the wing—to con your horoscope
 'For leave command those steely shafts shoot ope,
 'Or straight assuage their blinding eagerness
 'In blank smooth snow. What semblance of success
 'To any of my plans for making you
 'Mine and Romano's? Break the first wall
 through,
 'Tread o'er the ruins of the Chief, supplant
 'His sons beside, still, vainest were the vaunt:
 'There, Salinguerra would obstruct me sheer,
 'And the insuperable Tuscan, here,
 'Stay me! But one wild eve that Lady died
 'In her lone chamber: only I beside:
 "Taurello far at Naples, and my sire
 "At Padua, Ecelin away in ire
 "With Alberic. She held me thus—a clutch
 "To make our spirits as our bodies touch—
 "And so began flinging the past up, heaps
 "Of uncouth treasure from their sunless sleeps

- "Within her soul; deeds rose along with dreams,
 "Fragments of many miserable schemes,
 "Secrets, more secrets, then—no, not the last—
 "Mongst others, like a casual trick o' the past,
 "How . . . ay, she told me, gathering up her face,
 "All left of it, into one arch-grimace
 "To die with . . .
 "Friend, 'tis gone! but not the fear
 "Of that fell laughing, heard as now I hear.
 "Nor faltered voice, nor seemed her heart grow weak
 "When i' the midst abrupt she ceased to speak
 "—Dead, as to serve a purpose, mark!—for in
 "Rushed o' the very instant Ecelin
 "(How summoned, who divines?)—looking as if "He understood why Adelaide lay stiff "Already in my arms; for 'Girl, how must
 "'I manage Este in the matter thrust
 "'Upon me, how unravel your bad coil?—
 "'Since' (he declared) 'tis on your brow—
 "a soil
 "'Like hers there! then in the same breath,
 'he lacked:
 "'No counsel after all, had signed no pact
 "'With devils, nor was treason here or there,
 "'Goito or Vicenza, his affair:
 "'He buried it in Adelaide's deep grave,
 "'Would begin life afresh. now,—would not slave
 "'For any Friedrich's nor Taurello's sake!
 "'What bootied him to meddle or to make "'In Lombardy?' And afterward I knew
 "The meaning of his promise to undo
 "All she had done—why marriages were made,
 "New friendships entered on, old followers paid
 "With curses for their pains,—new friends' amaze
 "At height, when, passing out by Gate Saint Blaixe,
 "He stopped short in Vicenza, bent his head
 "Over a friar's neck,—'had vowed,' he said,
 "Long since, nigh thirty years, because his wife
 "And child were saved there, to bestow his life
 "On God, his gettings on the Church.
 "Exiled
 "Within Goito, still one dream beguiled
 "My days and nights; 'twas found, the orb I sought
 "To serve, those glimpses came of Fomalhaut,
 "No other: but how serve it?—authorize
 "You and Romano mingle destinies?
 "And straight Romano's angel stood beside "Me who had else been Boniface's bride,
 "For Salinguerra 'twas, with neck low bent,
 "And voice lightened to music, (as he meant
 "To learn, not teach me,) who withdrew the pall
 "From the dead past and straight revived it all,
 "Making me see how first Romano waxed,
 "Wherefore he waned now, why, if I relaxed
 "My grasp (even I!) would drop a thing effete,
 "Frayed by itself, unequal to complete
 "Its course, and counting every step astray
 "A gain so much. Romano, every way
 "Stable, a Lombard House now—why start back "Into the very outset of its track?
 "This patching principle which late allied
 "Our House with other Houses—what beside "Concerned the apparition, the first Knight
 "Who followed Conrad hither in such plight
 "His utmost wealth was summed in his one steed?
 "For Ecelo, that prowler, was decreed
 "A task, in the beginning hazardous
 "To him as ever task can be to us;
 "But did the weather-beaten thief despair
 "When first our crystal cincture of warm air
 "That binds the Trevisan,—as its spice-belt
 "(Crusaders say) the tract where Jesus dwelt,— "Furtive he pierced, and Este was to face—
 "Despaired Saponian strength of Lombard grace?
 "Tried he at making surer aught made sure,
 "Maturing what already was mature?

"No; his heart prompted Ecelo, 'Confront
 "Este, inspect yourself. What's nature?
 Wont.

"Discard three-parts your nature, and adopt "The rest as an advantage!' Old strength propped

"The man who first grew Podestà among "The Vicentines, no less than, while there sprung

"His palace up in Padua like a threat,
 "Their noblest spied a grace, unnoticed yet
 "In Conrad's crew. Thus far the object
 gained,

"Romano was established—has remained—
 "For are you not Italian, truly peers

"With Este? Azzo better soothes our ears
 "Than Alberici? or is this lion's-crane

"From over-mounts' (this yellow hair of
 mine)

"So weak a graft on Agnes Este's stock?"

"(Thus went he on with something of a mock)
 "Wherefore recoil, then, from the very fate

"Conceded you, refuse to imitate
 "Your model farther? Este long since left

"Being mere Este: as a blade its heft,
 "Este required the Pope to further him:

"And you, the Kaiser—whom your father's whim

"Foregoes or, better, never shall forego
 "If Palma dare pursue what Ecelo

"Commenced, but Ecelin desists from: just
 "As Adelaide of Susa could intrust

"Her donative,—her Piedmont given the Pope,

"Her Alpine-pass for him to shut or ope
 "Twixt France and Italy,—to the superb

"Matilda's perfecting,—so, lest aught curb
 "Our Adelaide's great counter-project for

"Giving her Trentine to the Emperor
 "With passage here from Germany,—shall

you
 "Take it,—my slender plodding talent,
 too!"

"—Urged me Taurello with his half-smile.

"He
 "As Patron of the scattered family
 "Conveyed me to his Mantua, kept in bruit

"Azzo's alliances and Richard's suit

"Until, the Kaiser excommunicate,
 "Nothing remains,' Taurello said, 'but wait

"Some rash procedure: Palma was the link,
 "As Agnes' child, between us, and they shrink

"From losing Palma: judge if we advance,
 "Your father's method, your inheritance!"

"The day I was betrothed to Boniface
 "At Padua by Taurello's self, took place

"The outrage of the Ferrarese: again,
 "The day I sought Verona with the train

"Agreed for,—by Taurello's policy
 "Convicting Richard of the fault, since we "Were present to annul or to confirm,— "Richard, whose patience had outstayed its term,

 "Quitted Verona for the siege.

"And now
 "What glory may engird Sordello's brow

"Through this? A month since at Olierio slunk

"All that was Ecelin into a monk;
 "But how could Salinguerra so forget

"His liege of thirty years as grudge even yet
 "One effort to recover him? He sent

"Forthwith the tidings of this last event
 "To Ecelin—declared that he, despite

"The recent folly, recognized his right
 "To order Salinguerra: 'Should he wring

"Its uttermost advantage out, or fling
 "This chance away? Or were his sons now

Head
 "O' the House?' Through me Taurello's

missive sped;

"My father's answer will by me return.
 "Behold! 'For him,' he writes, 'no more concern

 "With strife than, for his children, with fresh plots

 "Of Friedrich. Old engagements out he blots

 "For aye: Taurello shall no more subserve,

"Nor Ecelin impose.' Lest this unnerve
 "Taurello at this juncture, slack his grip

"Of Richard, suffer the occasion slip,—
 "I, in his sons' default (who, mating with

"Este, forsake Romano as the frith

"Its mainsea for that firmland, sea makes head

"Against) I stand, Romano,—in their stead

"Assume the station they desert, and give

"Still, as the Kaiser's representative,

"Taurello licence he demands. Midnight—

"Morning—by noon to-morrow, making light

"Of the League's issue, we, in some gay weed

"Like yours, disguised together, may precede

"The arbitrators to Ferrara : reach

"Him, let Taurello's noble accents teach

"The rest ! Then say if I have misconceived

"Your destiny, too readily believed

"The Kaiser's cause your own !"

And Palma's fled.

Though no affirmative disturbs the head,

A dying lamp-flame sinks and rises o'er,

Like the alighted planet Pollux wore,

Until, morn breaking, he resolves to be

Gate-vein of this heart's blood of Lombardy,

Soul of this body—to wield this aggregate

Of souls and bodies, and so conquer fate

Though he should live—a centre of disgust

Even—apart, core of the outward crust

He vivifies, assimilates. For thus

I bring Sordello to the rapturous

Exclaim at the crowd's cry, because one round

Of life was quite accomplished ; and he found

Not only that a soul, whate'er its might,

Is insufficient to its own delight,

Both in corporeal organs and in skill

By means of such to body forth its Will—

And, after, insufficient to apprise

Men of that Will, oblige them recognize

The Hid by the Revealed—but that,—the last

Nor lightest of the struggles overpast,—

Will, he bade abdicate, which would not void

The throne, might sit there, suffer he enjoyed

Mankind, a varied and divine array

Incapable of homage, the first way,

Nor fit to render incidentally

Tribute connived at, taken by the by,

In joys. If thus with warrant to rescind

The ignominious exile of mankind—

Whose proper service, ascertained intact

As yet, (to be by him themselves made act,

Not watch Sordello acting each of them)

Was to secure—if the true diadem

Seemed imminent while our Sordello drank

The wisdom of that golden Palma,—thank

Verona's Lady in her citadel

Founded by Gaulish Brennus, legends tell :

And truly when she left him, the sun reared

A head like the first clamberer's who peered

A-top the Capitol, his face on flame.

With triumph, triumphing till Manlius came.

Nor slight too much my rhymes—that spring, dispread,

Dispart, disperse, lingering overhead

Like an escape of angels ! Rather say,

My transcendental platan !¹ mounting gay

(An archimage so courts a novice-queen)

With tremulous silvered trunk, whence branches sheen

Laugh out, thick-foliaged next, a-shiver soon

With coloured buds, then glowing like the moon

One mild flame,—last a pause, a burst, and all

Her ivory limbs are smothered by a fall,

Bloom-flinders and fruit-sparkles and leaf-dust,

Ending the weird work prosecuted just

For her amusement ; he decrepit, stark,

Dozes ; her uncontrolled delight may mark

Apart—

Yet not so, surely never so

Only, as good my soul were suffered go .

O'er the lagune : forth fare thee, put aside --

Entrance thy synod, as a god may glide

Out of the world he fills, and leave it mute

For myriad ages as we men compute,

Returning into it without a break

O' the consciousness ! They sleep, and I awake

O'er the lagune, being at Venice.

Note,

In just such songs as Eglamor (say) wrote

With heart and soul and strength, for he believed

Himself achieving all to be achieved

Forth as she'd plant it on a pedestal,
 Now, i' the silent city, seems to fall
 Toward me—no wreath, only a lip's unrest
 To quiet, surcharged eyelids to be pressed
 I'ry of their tears upon my bosom. Strange Such sad chance should produce in thee such
 change,
 My love! Warped souls and bodies! yet
 God spoke
 Of right-hand, foot and eye—selects our yoke,
 Sordello, as your poetship may find!
 So, sleep upon my shoulder, child, nor mind
 Their foolish talk; we'll manage reinstate Your old worth; ask moreover, when they prate
 Of evil men past hope, "Don't each contrive,
 "Despite the evil you abuse, to live?—
 "Keeping, each losel, through a maze of lies,
 "His own conceit of truth? to which he hies
 "By obscure windings, tortuous, if you will,
 "But to himself not inaccessible;
 "He sees truth, and his lies are for the crowd
 "Who cannot see; some fancied right allowed "His vilest wrong, empowered the losel
 clutch
 "One pleasure from a multitude of such
 "Denied him." Then assert, "All men appear
 "To think all better than themselves, by here
 "Trusting a crowd they wrong; but really,"
 say,
 "All men think all men stupider than they,
 "Since, save themselves, no other compre-hends
 "The complicated scheme to make amends
 "—Evil, the scheme by which, thro' Ignorance,
 "Good labours to exist." A slight ar-vance,—
 Merely to find the sickness you die through,
 And nought beside! but if one can't eschew
 One's portion in the common lot, at least
 One can avoid an ignorance increased
 Tenfold by dealing out hint after hint
 How nought were like dispensing without stint
 The water of life—so easy to dispense Beside, when one has probed the centre whence

Commotion's born—could tell you of it all!
 "—Meantime, just meditate my madrigal
 "O' the mugwort that conceals a dewdrop safe!"

What, dullard? we and you in smothery chafe,
 Babes, baldheads, stumbled thus far into Zin
 The Horrid,¹ getting neither out nor in,
 A hungry sun above us, sands that bung
 Our throats,—each dromedary lolls a tongue,
 Each camel churns a sick and frothy chap,
 And you, 'twixt tales of Potiphar's mishap,
 And sonnets on the earliest ass that spoke,
 —Remark, you wonder any one needs choke
 With founts about! Potsherd him, Gibeonites!
 While awkwardly enough your Moses smites
 The rock, though he forego his Promised Land Thereby, have Satan claim his carcass, and
 Mark ye the dim first ooings? Meribah!²
 Then, quaffing at the fount my courage gained,
 Recall—not that I prompt ye—who explained . . .

"Presumptuous!" interrupts one. You, not I

'Tis brother, marvel at and magnify
 Such office: "office," quotha? can we get
 To the beginning of the office yet?
 What do we here? simply experiment
 Each on the other's power and its intent
 When elsewhere tasked,—if this of mine were trucked

For yours to either's good,—we watch construct,

In short, an engine: with a finished one,
 What it can do, is all,—nought, how 'tis done.
 But this of ours yet in probation, dusk
 A kernel of strange wheelwork through its husk
 Grows into shape by quarters and by halves;
 Remark this tooth's spring, wonder what that valve's

Fall bodes, presume each faculty's device,
 Make out each other more or less precise—
 The scope of the whole engine's to be proved;
 We die: which means to say, the whole's removed,

² Waters of Meribah, that is, of Strife, See Exodus xvii. 7.

Dismounted wheel by wheel, this complex gin,—

To be set up anew elsewhere, begin
A task indeed, but with a clearer clime
Than the murk lodgment of our building-time.
And then, I grant you, it behoves forget
How 'tis done—all that must amuse us yet
So long: and, while you turn upon your heel,
Pray that I be not busy slitting steel
Or shredding brass, camped on some virgin
shore

Under a cluster of fresh stars, before
I name a tithe o' the wheels I trust to do !

So occupied, then, are we : hitherto,
At present, and a weary while to come,
The office of ourselves,—nor blind nor dumb,
And seeing somewhat of man's state,—has
been,

For the worst of us, to say they so have seen ;
For the better, what it was they saw ; the
best

Impart the gift of seeing to the rest :

"So that I glance," says such an one,
"around,

"And there's no face but I can read profound
"Disclosures in ; this stands for hope, that—
fear,

"And for a speech, a deed in proof, look
here !

"Stoop, else the strings of blossom, where the nuts

"O'erarch, will blind thee ! Said I not ?
She shuts

"Both eyes this time, so close the hazels meet !

"Thus, prisoned in the Piombi, I repeat

"Events one rove occasioned, o'er and o'er,

"Putting 'twixt me and madness evermore

"Thy sweet shape, Zanze ! Therefore stoop !'

"That's truth !'

"(Adjudge you) 'the incarcerated youth

"Would say that !'

"Youth ? Plara the bard ? Set down

"That Plara spent his youth in a grim town

"Whose cramped ill-featured streets huddled about

"The minster for protection, never out

"Of its black belfry's shade and its bells' roar.

"The brighter shone the suburb,—all the
more

"Ugly and absolute that shade's reproof

"Of any chance escape of joy,—some roof,

"Taller than they, allowed the rest detect,—

"Before the sole permitted laugh (suspect

"Who could, 'twas meant for laughter, that ploughed cheek's

"Repulsive gleam !) when the sun stopped
both peaks

"Of the cleft belfry like a fiery wedge,

"Then sank, a huge flame on its socket edge,

"With leavings on the grey glass oriel-pane

"Ghastly some minutes more. No fear of rain—

"The minster minded that ! in heaps the dust

"Lay everywhere. This town, the minster's
trust,

"Held Plara ; who, its denizen, bade hail

"In twice twelve sonnets, Tempe's dewy vale."

"Exact the town, the minster and the street !"

"As all mirth triumphs, sadness means defeat :

"Lust triumphs and is gay, Love's triumphed
o'er

"And sad : but Lucio's sad. I said before,

"Love's sad, not Lucio ; one who loves may be

"As gay his love has leave to hope, as he

"Downcast that lusts' desire escapes the springe :

"Tis of the mood itself I speak, what tinge

"Determines it, else colourless,—or mirth,

"Or melancholy, as from heaven or earth."

"Ay, that's the variation's gist !"

"Indeed ?

"Thus far advanced in safety then, proceed !

"And having seen too what I saw, be bold

"And next encounter what I do behold

"(That's sure) but bid you take on trust !"

Attack

The use and purpose of such sights ! Alack,

Not so unwisely does the crowd dispense

On Salinguerras praise in preference

To the Sordellos : men of action, these !

Who, seeing just as little as you please.

Yet turn that little to account,—engage
With, do not gaze at,—carry on, a stage,
The work o' the world, not merely make report
The work existed ere their day! In short,
When at some future no-time a brave band
Sees, using what it sees, then shake my hand
In heaven, my brother! Meanwhile where's the hurt

Of keeping the Makers-see on the alert,
At whose defection mortals stare aghast
As though heaven's bounteous windows were slammed fast

Incontinent? Whereas all you, beneath,
Should scowl at, bruise their lips and break
their teeth

Who ply the pullies, for neglecting you:
And therefore have I moulded, made anew
A Man, and give him to be turned and tried,
Be angry with or pleased at. On your side,
Have ye times, places, actors of your own?
Try them upon Sordello when full-grown,
And then—ah then! If Hercules first parched

His foot in Egypt only to be marched
A sacrifice for Jove with pomp to suit,
What chance have I? The demigod was mute
Till, at the altar, where time out of mind
Such guests became oblations, chaplets twined

His forehead long enough, and he began
Slaying the slayers, nor escaped a man.
Take not affront, my gentle audience! whom
No Hercules shall make his hecatomb, Believe, nor from his brows your chaplet rend—

That's your kind suffrage, yours, my patron-
friend,

Whose great verse blares unintermittent on
Like your own trumpeter at Marathon,—
You who, Platrea and Salamis being scant,
Put up with Ætna for a stimulant—
And did well, I acknowledged, as he loomed
Over the midland sea last month, presumed
Long, lay demolished in the blazing West
At eve, while towards him tilting cloudlets
pressed

Like Persian ships at Salamis. Friend, wear
A crest proud as desert while I declare

Had I a flawless ruby fit to wring
Tears of its colour from that painted king¹
Who lost it, I would, for that smile which went

To my heart, fling it in the sea, content,
Wearing your verse in place, an amulet
Sovereign against all passion, wear and fret!
My English Eyebright, if you are not glad
That, as I stopped my task awhile, the sad
Dishevelled form, wherein I put mankind
To come at times and keep my pact in mind,
Renewed me,—hear no crickets in the hedge,
Nor let a glowworm spot the river's edge
At home, and may the summer showers gush
Without a warning from the missel thrush!
So, to our business, now—the fate of such
As find our common nature—overmuch
Despised because restricted and unfit
To bear the burthen they impose on it—
Cling when they would discard it; craving
strength

To leap from the allotted world, at length
They do leap,—flounder on without a term,
Each a god's germ, doomed to remain a germ
In unexpanded infancy, unless . . .
But that's the story—dull enough, confess!
There might be fitter subjects to allure;
Still, neither misconceive my portraiture
Nor undervalue its adornments quaint:
What seems a fiend perchance may prove a saint.

Ponder a story ancient pens transmit,
Then say if you condemn me or acquit.
John the Beloved, banished Antioch
For Patmos, bade collectively his flock
Farewell, but set apart the closing eve
To comfort those his exile most would grieve,
He knew: a touching spectacle, that house
In motion to receive him! Xanthus' spouse
You missed, made panther's meat a month since; but

Xanthus himself (his nephew 'twas, they shut
'Twixt boards and sawed asunder) Polycarp,
Soft Charicle, next year no wheel could warp
To swear by Caesar's fortune, with the rest
Were ranged; thro' whom the grey disciple

Busily blessing right and left, just stopped
To pat one infant's curls, the hangman cropped
Soon after, reached the portal. On its hinge
The door turns and he enters: what quick twinge

Ruins the smiling mouth, those wide eyes fix
Whereon, why like some spectral candlestick's

Branch the disciple's arms? Dead swooned he, woke

Anon, heaved sigh, made shift to gasp, heart-broke,

"Get thee behind me, Satan! Have I toiled
"To no more purpose? Is the gospel foiled
"Here too, and o'er my son's, my Xanthus' hearth,

"Portrayed with sooty garb and features swarth—

"Ah, Xanthus, am I to thy roof beguiled
"To see the—the—the Devil domiciled?" Whereto sobbed Xanthus, "Father, 'tis yourself

"Installed, a limning which our utmost pelf
"Went to procure against to-morrow's loss;
"And that's not wy-prong, but a pastoral cross,
"You're painted with!"

His puckered brows unfold—
And you shall hear Sordello's story told.

BOOK THE FOURTH.

MEANTIME Ferrara lay in rueful case;
The lady-city, for whose sole embrace
Her pair of suitors struggled, felt their arms
A brawny mischief to the fragile charms
They tugged for—one discovering that to twist
Her tresses twice or thrice about his wrist
Secured a point of vantage—one, how best
He'd parry that by planting in her breast
His elbow spike—each party too intent
For noticing, howe'er the battle went,
The conqueror would but have a corpse to kiss.

"May Boniface be duly damned for this!"
—Howled some old Ghibellin, as up he turned,
From the wet heap of rubbish where they burned

His house, a little skull with dazzling teeth:
"A boon, sweet Christ—let Salinguerra seethe
"In hell for ever, Christ, and let myself
"Be there to laugh at him!"—moaned some young Gulf

Stumbling upon a shrivelled hand nailed fast
To the charred lintel of the doorway, last
His father stood within to bid him speed.
The thoroughfares were overrun with weed —Docks, quitchgrass, loathy mallows no man plants.

The stranger, none of its inhabitants
Crept out of doors to taste fresh air again,
And ask the purpose of a splendid train
Admitted on a morning; every town
Of the East League was come by envoy down
To treat for Richard's ransom: here you saw
The Vicentine, here snowy oxen draw
The Paduan carroch, its vermilion cross
On its white field. A-tiptoe o'er the fosse
Looked Legate Montelungo wistfully
After the flock of steeples he might spy
In Este's time, gone (doubts he) long ago
To mend the ramparts: sure the laggards know
The Pope's as good as here! They paced the streets

More soberly. At last, "Taurello greets
"The League," announced a pursuivant,—
"will match

"Its courtesies, and labours to dispatch
"At earliest Tito, Friedrich's Pretor, sent
"On pressing matters from his post at Trent,
"With Mainard Count of Tyrol,—simply waits
"Their going to receive the delegates."
"Tito!" Our delegates exchanged a glance,
And, keeping the main way, admired askance
The lazy engines of outlandish birth;
Couched like a king each on its bank of earth—
Arbalist, manganel¹ and catapult;
While stationed by, as waiting a result,
Lean silent gangs of mercenaries ceased Working to watch the strangers. "This, at least,

"Were better spared; he scarce presumes gainsay
"The League's decision! Get our friend away

¹ Engine for throwing stones.

"And profit for the future : how else teach
 "Fools 'tis not safe to stray within claw's reach
 "Ere Salinguerra's final gasp be blown?
 "Those mere convulsive scratches find the bone.
 "Who bade him bloody the spent osprey's narc¹?"

The carrochs² halted in the public square.
 Pennons of every blazon once a-flaunt,
 Men prattled, freelier that the crested gaunt
 White ostrich with a horse-shoe in her beak
 Was missing, and whoever chose might speak
 "Ecelin" boldly out : so,—"Ecelin
Needed his wife to swallow half the sin
And sickens by himself : the devil's whelp,
He styles his son, dwindles away, no help
From conserves, your fine triple-curdled froth
Of virgin's blood, your Venice viper-broth—
"Eh? Jubilate!"—"Peace! no little word
You utter here that's not distinctly heard
Up at Oliero : he was absent sick
When we besieged Bassano—who, i' the thick

"O' the work, perceived the progress Azzo
 made,
 "Like Ecelin, through his witch Adelaide?
 "She managed it so well that, night by night
 "At their bed-foot stood up a soldier-sprite,
 "First fresh, pale by-and-by without a wound,
 "And, when it came with eyes filmed as in swound,
 "They knew the place was taken."—
 "Ominous
 "That Ghibellins should get what cautious
 "Old Redbeard sought from Azzo's sire to wrench
 "Vainly; Saint George contrived his town
 a trench
 "O' the marshes, an impermeable bar."
 "—Young Ecelin is meant the tutelär
 "Of Padua, rather; veins embrace upon
 "His hand like Brenta and Bacchiglione."
 What now?—"The founts! God's bread, touch not a plank!
 "A crawling hell of carrion—every tank

"Choke-full!—found out just now to Cino's
 cost—

"The same who gave Taurello up for lost,
 "And, making no account of fortune's freaks,
 "Refused to budge from Padua then, but sneaks

"Back now with Concorezzi : 'faith! they drag
 "Their carroch to San Vitale, plant the flag
 "On his own palace, so adroitly razed
 "He knew it not; a sort of Guelf folk gazed
 "And laughed apart; Cino disliked their air—
 "Must pluck up spirit, show he does not care—

"Seats himself on the tank's edge—will begin
 "To hum, za, za, Cavalier Ecelin—
 "A silence; he gets warmer, clinks to chime,
 "Now both feet plough the ground, deeper each time,
 "At last, za, za and up with a fierce kick
 "Comes his own mother's face caught by the thick

"Grey hair about his spur!"

Which means, they lift

The covering, Salinguerra made a shift
 To stretch upon the truth; as well avoid Further disclosures; leave them thus employed.

Our dropping Autumn morning clears apace,
 And poor Ferrara puts a softened face
 On her misfortunes. Let us scale this tall
 Huge foursquare line of red brick garden-wall
 Bastioned within by trees of every sort
 On three sides, slender, spreading, long and short;

Each grew as it contrived, the poplar ramped,
 The fig-tree reared itself,—but stark and cramped,

Made fools of, like tamed lions : whence, on the edge,

Running 'twixt trunk and trunk to smooth one ledge

Ofshade, were shrubs inserted, warp and woof,
 Which smothered up that variance. Scale
 the roof

Of solid tops, and o'er the slope you slide
 Down to a grassy space level and wide,
 Here and there dotted with a tree, but trees
 Of rarer leaf, each foreigner at ease,

¹ Nostril.

² Cars of state.

Set by itself : and in the centre spreads,
Borne upon three uneasy leopards' heads,
A laver, broad and shallow, one bright spirt
Of water bubbles in. The walls begirt
With trees leave off on either hand ; pursue
Your path along a wondrous avenue
Those walls abut on, heaped of gleamy stone,
With aloes leering everywhere, grey-grown From many a Moorish summer : how they wind

Out of the fissures ! likelier to bind
The building than those rusted cramps which drop

Already in the eating sunshine. Stop, You fleeting shapes above there ! Ah, the pride

Or else despair of the whole country-side !
A range of statues, swarming o'er with wasps,
God, goddess, woman, man, the Greek rough-rasps

In crumbling Naples marble—meant to look Like those Messina marbles Constance took Delight in, or Taurello's self conveyed
To Mantua for his mistress, Adelaide,—
A certain font with caryatides
Since cloistered at Goito ; only, these
Are up and doing, not abashed, a troop
Able to right themselves—who see you, stoop
Their arms o' the instant after you ! Unplucked
By this or that, you pass ; for they conduct
To terrace raised on terrace, and, between,
Creatures of brighter mould and braver mien
Than any yet, the choicest of the Isle
No doubt. Here, left a sullen breathing-
while,

Up-gathered on himself the Fighter stood
For his last fight, and, wiping treacherous blood
Out of the eyelids just held ope beneath
Those shading fingers in their iron sheath,
Steadied his strengths amid the buzz and stir
Of the dusk hideous amphitheatre
At the announcement of his over-match
To wind the day's diversion up, dispatch
The pertinacious Gaul : while, limbs on heap,
The Slave, no breath in her round mouth, watched leap

Dart after dart forth, as her hero's car
Clove dizzily the solid of the war

—Let coil about his knees for pride in him.
We reach the farthest terrace, and the grim
San Pietro Palace stops us.

Such the state
Of Salinguerra's plan to emulate
Sicilian marvels, that his girlish wife
Retrude still might lead her ancient life
In her new home : whereat enlarged so much
Neighbours upon the novel princely touch
He took,—who here imprisons Boniface.
Here must the Envoys come to sue for grace ;
And here, emerging from the labyrinth
Below, Sordello paused beside the plinth
Of the door-pillar.

He had really left
Verona for the cornfields (a poor theft
From the morass) where Este's camp was
made ;
The Envoys' march, the Legate's cavalcade—
All had been seen by him, but scarce as
when,—

Eager for cause to stand aloof from men
At every point save the fantastic tie
Acknowledged in his boyish sophistry,— He made account of such. A crowd,—he meant

To task the whole of it ; each part's intent Concerned him therefore : and, the more he prided,
The less became Sordello satisfied
With his own figure at the moment. Sought
He respite from his task ? Descried he aught
Novel in the anticipated sight
Of all these livers upon all delight ?

This phalanx, as of myriad points combined,
Whereby he still had imaged the mankind
His youth was passed in dreams of rivalling,
His age—in plans to prove at least such thing
Had been so dreamed,—which now he must impress

With his own will, effect a happiness
By theirs,—supply a body to his soul
Thence, and become eventually whole
With them as he had hoped to be without—
Made these the mankind he once raved about ?

Because a few of them were notable,
Should all be figured worthy note ? As well

Expect to find Taurello's triple line
Of trees a single and prodigious pine.
Real pines rose here and there; but, close
among,
Thrust into and mixed up with pines, a throng
Of shrubs, he saw,—a nameless common sort
O'erpast in dreams, left out of the report
And hurried into corners, or at best
Admitted to be fancied like the rest.
Reckon that morning's proper chiefs—how few!

And yet the people grew, the people grew,
Grew ever, as if the many there indeed,
More left behind and most who should succeed,—

Simply in virtue of their mouths and eyes,
Petty enjoyments and huge miseries,—
Mingled with, and made veritably great
Those chiefs: he overlooked not Mainard's
state

Nor Concorezzi's station, but instead
Of stopping there, each dwindled to be head
Of infinite and absent Tyrolese
Or Paduans; startling all the more, that these Seemed passive and disposed of, uncared for,
Yet doubtless on the whole (like Eglamor)
Smiling; for if a wealthy man decays
And out of store of robes must wear, all days,
One tattered suit, alike in sun and shade,
'Tis commonly some tarnished gay brocade
Fit for a feast-night's flourish and no more:
Nor otherwise poor Misery from her store
Of looks is fain upgather, keep unfurled
For common wear as she goes through the
world,

The faint remainder of some worn-out smile
Meant for a feast-night's service merely.
While

Crowd upon crowd rose on Sordello thus,— (Crowds no way interfering to discuss,
Much less dispute, life's joys with one employed

In envying them,—or, if they aught enjoyed,
Where lingered something indefinable
In every look and tone, the mirth as well
As woe, that fixed at once his estimate
Of the result, their good or bad estate)—

Old memories returned with new effect:
And the new body, ere he could suspect,
Cohered, mankind and he were really fused,
The new self seemed impatient to be used
By him, but utterly another way
Than that anticipated: strange to say,
They were too much below him, more in thrall

Than he, the adjunct than the principal.
What booted scattered units?—here a mind
And there, which might repay his own to find,
And stamp, and use?—a few, howe'er august,
If all the rest were grovelling in the dust?
No: first a mighty equilibrium, sure,
Should he establish, privilege procure
For all, the few had long possessed! He felt

An error, an exceeding error melt:
While he was occupied with Mantuan chants, Behoved him think of men, and take their wants,

Such as he now distinguished every side,
As his own want which might be satisfied,—
And, after that, think of rare qualities
Of his own soul demanding exercise.
It followed naturally, through no claim
On their part, which made virtue of the aim
At serving them, on his,—that, past retrieve,
He felt now in their toils, theirs—nor could leave

Wonder how, in the eagerness to rule,
Impress his will on mankind, he (the fool!)
Had never even entertained the thought That this his last arrangement might be fraught

With incidental good to them as well,
And that mankind's delight would help to swell

His own. So, if he sighed, as formerly
Because the merry time of life must fleet,
'Twas deeper now,—for could the crowds
repeat

Their poor experiences? His hand that shook Was twice to be deplored. "The Legate,
look!

"With eyes, like fresh-blown thrush-eggs on a thread,

"Faint-blue and loosely floating in his head,

"Large tongue, moist open mouth; and this long while

"That owner of the idiotic smile

"Serves them!"

He fortunately saw in time
His fault however, and since the office prime Includes the secondary—best accept

Both offices; Taurello, its adept,
Could teach him the preparatory one,
And how to do what he had fancied done
Long previously, ere take the greater task.

How render first these people happy? Ask
The people's friends: for there must be one
good,

One way to it—the Cause! He understood
The meaning now of Palma; why the jar
Else, the ado, the trouble wide and far
Of Guefs and Ghibellins, the Lombard hope

And Rome's despair?—'twixt Emperor and
Pope

The confused shifting sort of Eden tale—
Hardihood still recurring, still to fail—
That foreign interloping fiend, this free
And native overbrooding deity:

Yet a dire fascination o'er the palms
The Kaiser ruined, troubling even the calms
Of paradise; or, on the other hand,
The Pontiff, as the Kaisers understand,
One snake-like cursed of God to love the ground,

Whose heavy length breaks in the noon profound

Some saving tree—which needs the Kaiser, dressed

As the dislodging angel of that pest:
Yet flames that pest bedropped, flat head, full fold,

With coruscating dower of dyes. "Behold
"The secret, so to speak, and master-spring
"O' the contest!—which of the two Powers shall bring

"Men good, perchance the most good: ay,
it may

"Be that!—the question, which best knows the way."

And hereupon Count Mainard strutted past
Out of San Pietro; never seemed the last

Of archers, slingers: and our friend began
To recollect strange modes of serving man—
Arbalist, catapult, brake, mangel,
And more. "This way of theirs may,—who can tell?—

"Need perfecting," said he: "let all be solved

"At once! Taurello 'tis, the task devolved
"On late: confront Taurello!"

And at last
He did confront him. Scarce an hour had
past

When forth Sordello came, older by years
Than at his entry. Unexampled fears Oppressed him, and he staggered off, blind, mute

And deaf, like some fresh-mutilated brute,
Into Ferrara—not the empty town
That morning witnessed: he went up and
down

Streets whence the veil had been stript shred
by shred,

So that, in place of huddling with their dead
Indoors, to answer Salinguerra's ends,
Townfolk make shift to crawl forth, sit like
friends

With any one. A woman gave him choice
Of her two daughters, the infantile voice
Or the dimpled knee, for half a chain, his throat

Was clasped with; but an archer knew the coat—

Its blue cross and eight lilies,—bade beware
One dogging him in concert with the pair
Though thrumming on the sleeve that hid his knife.

Night set in early, autumn dews were rife,
They kindled great fires while the Leaguers'
nass

Began at every carroch: he must pass
Between the kneeling people. Presently
The carroch of Verona caught his eye
With purple trappings; silently he bent
Over its fire, when voices violent

Began, "Affirm not whom the youth was like

"That struck me from the porch: I did not strike

"Again : I too have chestnut hair ; my kin
 "Hate Azzo and stand up for Ecelin.
 "Here, minstrel, drive bad thoughts away !
 Sing ! Take
 "My glove for guerdon ! " And for that man's sake
 He turned : "A song of Eglamor's !"— scarce named,
 When, "Our Sordello's rather !"—all exclaimed ;
 "Is not Sordello famousest for rhyme ?"
 He had been happy to deny, this time,—
 Profess as heretofore the aching head
 And failing heart,—suspect that in his stead
 Some true Apollo had the charge of them,
 Was champion to reward or to condemn,
 So his intolerable risk might shift
 Or share itself ; but Naddo's precious gift
 Of gifts, he owned, be certain ! At the close—
 "I made that," said he to a youth who rose
 As if to hear : 'twas Palma through the band
 Conducted him in silence by her hand.
 Back now for Salinguerra. Tito of Trent Gave place to Palma and her friend, who went
 In turn at Montelungo's visit : one
 After the other were they come and gone,—
 These spokesmen for the Kaiser and the Pope,
 This incarnation of the People's hope,
 Sordello,—all the say of each was said ;
 And Salinguerra sat,—himself instead
 Of these to talk with, lingered musing yet.
 'Twas a drear vast presence-chamber roughly set
 In order for the morning's use ; full face,
 The Kaiser's ominous sign-mark had first
 place,
 The crowned grim-twy-necked eagle, coarselyblackened
 With ochre on the naked wall ; nor lacked
 Romano's green and yellow either side ;
 But the new token Tito brought had tried
 The Legate's patience—nay, if Palma knew
 What Salinguerra almost meant to do
 Until the sight of her restored his lip
 A certain half-smile, three months' chieftain-
 Had banished ! Afterward, the Legate found No change in him, nor asked what badge he wound
 And unwound carelessly. Now sat the Chief
 Silent as when our couple left, whose brief
 Encounter wrought so opportune effect
 In thoughts he summoned not, nor would reject,
 Though time 'twas now if ever, to pause—fix
 On any sort of ending : wiles and tricks
 Exhausted, judge ! his charge, the crazy town,
 Just managed to be hindered crashing
 down—
 His last sound troops ranged—care observed to post
 His best of the maimed soldiers innermost—
 So much was plain enough, but somehow struck
 Him not before. And now with this strange luck
 Of Tito's news, rewarding his address
 So well, what thought he of?—how the success
 With Friedrich's rescript there, would either
 hush
 Old Ecelin's scruples, bring the manly flush
 To his young son's white cheek, or, last, exempt
 Himself from telling what there was to tempt?
 No : that this minstrel was Romano's last Servant — himself the first ! Could he contrast
 The whole !—that minstrel's thirty years just spent
 In doing nought, their notablest event
 This morning's journey hither, as I told—
 Who yet was lean, outworn and really old,
 A stammering awkward man that scarce dared raise
 His eye before the magisterial gaze—
 And Salinguerra with his fears and hopes
 Of sixty years, his Emperors and Popes,
 Cares and contrivances, yet, you would say,
 'Twas a youth nonchalantly looked away
 Through the embrasure northward o'er the sick
 Expostulating trees—so agile, quick

And graceful turned the head on the broad chest

Encased in pliant steel, his constant vest,
Whence split the sun off in a spray of fire
Across the room ; and, loosened of its tire
Of steel, that head let breathe the comely brown

Large massive locks discoloured as if a crown
Encircled them, so frayed the basnet¹ where
A sharp white line divided clean the hair ;
Glossy above, glossy below, it swept Curling and fine about a brow thus kept
Calm, laid coat upon coat, marble and sound :
This was the mystic mark the Tuscan found,
Mused of, turned over books about. Square-faced,

No lion more ; two vivid eyes, enchased
In hollows filled with many a shade and streak
Settling from the bold nose and bearded cheek.
Nor might the half-smile reach them that deformed

A lip supremely perfect else—unwarmed,
Unwidened, less or more ; indifferent
Whether on trees or men his thoughts were bent,
Thoughts rarely, after all, in trim and train
As now a period was fulfilled again :
Of such, a series made his life, compressed
In each, one story serving for the rest—
How his life-streams rolling arrived at last
At the barrier, whence, were it once overpast,
They would emerge, a river to the end,—
Gathered themselves up, paused, bade fate
befriend,

Took the leap, hung a minute at the height,
Then fell back to oblivion infinite :
Therefore he smiled. Beyond stretched garden-grounds

Where late the adversary, breaking bounds,
Had gained him an occasion, That above,
That eagle, testified he could improve Effectually. The Kaiser's symbol lay
Beside his rescript, a new badge by way
Of baldric ; while,—another thing that marred
-Alike emprise, achievement and reward,—
Ecelin's missive was conspicuous too.

What past life did those flying thoughts pursue ?

As his, few names in Mantua half so old ;
But at Ferrara, where his sires enrolled
It latterly, the Adelardi spared
No pains to rival them : both factions shared
Ferrara, so that, counted out, 'twould yield
A product very like the city's shield,
Half black and white, or Ghibellin and Guelph
As after Salinguerra styled himself
And Este who, till Marchesalla died,
(Last of the Adelardi)—never tried
His fortune there : with Marchesalla's child Would pass,—could Blacks and Whites be reconciled
And young Taurello wed Linguetta,—wealth
And sway to a sole grasp. Each treats by stealth

Already : when the Guelfs, the Ravennese
Arrive, assault the Pietro quarter, seize Linguetta, and are gone ! Men's first dismay
Abated somewhat, hurries down, to lay
The after indignation, Boniface,
This Richard's father. "Learn the full disgrace

"Averted, ere you blame us Guelfs, who rate
"Your Salinguerra, your sole potentate
"That might have been, 'mongst Este's valvassors—

"Ay, Azzo's—who, not privy to, abhors
"Our step ; but we were zealous." Azzo then
To do with ! Straight a meeting of old men :
"Old Salinguerra dead, his heir a boy,
"What if we change our ruler and decoy
"The Lombard Eagle of the azure sphere
"With Italy to build in, fix him here,
"Settle the city's troubles in a trice ?

"For private wrong, let public good suffice !"
In fine, young Salinguerra's staunchest friends
Talked of the townsmen making him amends,
Gave him a goshawk, and affirmed there was Rare sport, one morning, over the green grass
A mile or so. He sauntered through the plain,
Was restless, fell to thinking, turned again
In time for Azzo's entry with the bride ;
Count Boniface rode smirking at their side ;
"She brings him half Ferrara," whispers flew,
"And all Ancona ! If the stripling knew !"

Anon the stripling was in Sicily
Where Heinrich ruled in right of Constance ; he

Was gracious nor his guest incapable ;
 Each understood the other. So it fell,
 One Spring, when Azzo, thoroughly at ease,
 Had near forgotten by what precise degrees
 He crept at first to such a downy seat,
 The Count trudged over in a special heat
 To bid him of God's love dislodge from each
 Of Salinguerra's palaces,—a breach
 Might yawn else, not so readily to shut,
 For who was just arrived at Mantua but
 The youngster, sword on thigh and tuft on chin,
 With tokens for Celano, Ecelin,
 Pistore, and the like ! Next news,—no whit
 Do any of Ferrara's domes befit
 His wife of Heinrich's very blood : a band
 Of foreigners assemble, understand
 Garden-constructing, level and surround,
 Build up and bury in. A last news crowned
 The consternation : since his infant's birth,
 He only waits they end his wondrous girth
 Of trees that link San Pietro with Tomà,
 To visit Mantua. When the Podestà
 Ecelin, at Vicenza, called his friend
 Taurello thither, what could be their end
 But to restore the Ghibellins' late Head,
 The Kaiser helping ? He with most to dread
 From vengeance and reprisal, Azzo, there
 With Boniface beforehand, as aware
 Of plots in progress, gave alarm, expelled
 Both plotters : but the Guelfs in triumph yelled
 Too hastily. The burning and the flight,
 And how Taurello, occupied that night
 With Ecelin, lost wife and son, I told :
 —Not how he bore the blow, retained his hold,
 Got friends safe through, left enemies the worst
 O' the fray, and hardly seemed to care at first :
 But afterward men heard not constantly
 Of Salinguerra's House so sure to be !
 Though Azzo simply gained by the event
 A shifting of his plagues—the first, content
 To fall behind the second and estrange
 So far his nature, suffer such a change
 That in Romano sought he wife and child,
 And for Romano's sake seemed reconciled
 To losing individual life, which shrunk
 As the other prospered—mortised in his trunk ;

Like a dwarf palm which wanton Arabs foil
 Of bearing its own proper wine and oil,
 By grafting into it the stranger-vine,
 Which sucks its heart out, sly and serpentine,
 Till forth one vine-palm feathers to the root,
 And red drops moisten the insipid fruit.
 Once Adelaide set on,—the subtle mate
 Of the weak soldier, urged to emulate
 The Church's valiant women deed for deed,
 And paragon her namesake, win the meed
 O' the great Matilda,—soon they overbore
 The rest of Lombardy,—not as before
 By an instinctive truculence, but patched
 The Kaiser's strategy until it matched
 The Pontiff's, sought old ends by novel means
 " Only, why is it Salinguerra screens
 " Himself behind Romano ?—him we bade
 " Enjoy our shine i' the front, not seek the shade ! "

—Asked Heinrich, somewhat of the tardiest
 To comprehend. Nor Philip acquiesced
 At once in the arrangement ; reasoned, plied
 His friend with offers of another bride,
 A statelier function—fruitlessly : 'twas plain
 Taurello through some weakness must remain Obscure. And Otho, free to judge of both —Ecelin the unready, harsh and loth,
 And this more plausible and facile wight
 With every point a-sparkle—chose the right,
 Admiring how his predecessors harped
 On the wrong man : " thus," quoth he, " wits are warped
 " By outsides ! " Carelessly, meanwhile, his
 life

Suffered its many turns of peace and strife
 In many lands—you hardly could surprise
 The man ; who shamed Sordello (recognize !)
 In this as much beside, that, unconcerned
 What qualities were natural or earned,
 With no ideal of graces, as they came
 He took them, singularly well the same—
 Speaking the Greek's own language, just because

Your Greek eludes you, leave the least of flaws
 In contracts with him ; while, since Arab lore
 Holds the stars' secret—take one trouble more
 And master it ! 'Tis done, and now deter
 Who may the Tuscan, once Jove trined for her,

From Friedrich's path!—Friedrich, whose pilgrimage

The same man puts aside, whom he'll engage
To leave next year John Brienne in the lurch,

Come to Bassano, see Saint Francis' church
And judge of Guido the Bolognian's piece
Which,—lend Taurello credit,—rivals Greece—

Angels, with aureoles like golden quoits
Pitched home, applauding Ecelin's exploits.
For elegance, he strung the angelot,¹
Made rhymes thereto; for prowess, clove he not

Tiso, last siege, from crest to crupper? Why
Detail you thus a varied mastery
But to show how Taurello, on the watch
For men, to read their hearts and thereby catch

Their capabilities and purposes,
Displayed himself so far as displayed these:
While our Sordello only cared to know
About men as a means whereby he'd show
Himself, and men had much or little worth
According as they kept in or drew forth
That self; the other's choicest instruments
Surmised him shallow.

Meantime, malcontents
Dropped off, town after town grew wiser.

"How

"Change the world's face?" asked people;
"as 'tis now

"It has been, will be ever: very fine
"Subjecting things profane to things divine,

"In talk! This contumacy will fatigue
"The vigilance of Este and the League!

"The Ghibellins gain on us!"—as it happened.
Old Azzo and old Boniface, entrapped
By Ponte Alto, both in one month's space
Slept at Verona: either left a brace

Of sons—but, three years after, either's pair
Lost Guglielm and Aldobrand its heir:
Azzo remained and Richard—all the stay
Of Este and Saint Boniface, at bay
As 'twere. Then, either Ecelin grew old
Or his brain altered—not o' the proper mould

For new appliances—his old palm-stock
Endured no influx of strange strengths. He'd rock

As in a drunkenness, or chuckle low
As proud of the completeness of his woe,
Then weep real tears;—now make some mad onslaught

On Este, heedless of the lesson taught
So painfully,—now cringe for peace, sue peace
At price of past gain, bar of fresh increase
To the fortunes of Romano. Up at last
Rose Este, down Romano sank as fast.
And men remarked these freaks of peace and war

Happened while Salinguerra was afar:
Whence every friend besought him, all in vain,
To use his old adherent's wits again.
Not he!—"who had advisers in his sons,
"Could plot himself, nor needed any one's
"Advice." 'Twas Adelaide's remaining staunch

Prevented his destruction root and branch
Forthwith; but when she died, doom fell, for gay
He made alliances, gave lands away
To whom it pleased accept them, and withdrew

For ever from the world. Taurello, who
Was summoned to the convent, then refused
A word at the wicket, patience thus abused,
Promptly threw off alike his imbecile
Ally's yoke, and his own frank, foolish smile.
Soon a few movements of the happier sort
Changed matters, put himself in men's report
As heretofore; he had to fight, beside,
And that became him ever. So, in pride
And flushing of this kind of second youth,
He dealt a good-will blow. Este in truth
Lay prone—and men remembered, somewhat late,

A laughing old outrageous, stifled hate
He bore to Este—how it would outbreak
At times spite of disguise, like an earthquake
In sunny weather—as that noted day
When with his hundred friends he tried to slay

Azzo before the Kaiser's face: and how,
On Azzo's calm refusal to allow

A liegeman's challenge, straight he too was calmed :

As if his hate could bear to lie embalmed,
Bricked up, the moody Pharaoh, and survive
All intermediate crumbings, to arrive
At earth's catastrophe—'twas Este's crash
Not Azzo's he demanded, so, no rash
Procedure ! Este's true antagonist
Rose out of Ecelin : all voices whist,
All eyes were sharpened, wits predicted. He
'Twas, leaned in the embrasure absently,
Amused with his own efforts, now, to trace
With his steel-sheathed forefinger Friedrich's
face

I' the dust : but as the trees waved sere, his smile
Deepened, and words expressed its thought crewhile.

"Ay, fairly housed at last, my old com-
peer ?

"That we should stick together, all the year

"I kept Vicenza !—How old Boniface,

"Old Azzo caught us in its market-place,

"He by that pillar, I at this,—caught each

"In mid swing, more than fury of his speech,

"Egging the rabble on to disavow

"Allegiance to their Marquis—Bacchus, how "They boasted ! Ecelin must turn their drudge,

"Nor, if released, will Salinguerra grudge

"Paying arrears of tribute due long since—

"Bacchus ! My man could promise then,
nor wince :

"The bones-and-muscles ! Sound of wind and limb,

"Spoke he the set excuse I framed for him :

"And now he sits me, slaving and mute,

"Intent on chafing each starved purple foot

"Benumbed past aching with the altar slab :

"Will no vein throb there when some monk shall blab

"Spitefully to the circle of bald scalps,

"Friedrich's affirmed to be our side the Alps'

"—Eh, brother Lactance, brother Anaclet ?

"Sworn to abjure the world, its fume and fret,

"God's own now ? Drop the dormitory bar,

"Enfold the scanty grey serge scapular¹

"Twice o'er the cowl to muffle memories out !

"So ! But the midnight whisper turns a shout,

"Eyes wink, mouths open, pulses circulate

"In the stone walls : the past, the world you hate

"Is with you, ambush, open field—or see

"The surging flame—we fire Vicenza—glee !

"Follow, let Pilio and Bernardo chafe !

"Bring up the Mantuans—through San Biagio—safe !

"Ah, the mad people waken ? Ah, they writhe

"And reach us ? If they block the gate ?
No tithe

"Can pass—keep back, you Bassanese !
The edge,

"Use the edge—shear, thrust, hew, melt down the wedge,

"Let out the black of those black upturned
eyes !

"Hell—are they sprinkling fire too ? The blood fries

"And hisses on your brass gloves as they tear

"Those upturned faces choking with despair.

"Brave ! Slidder through the reeking gate !

'How now ?

"You six had charge of her ?' And then the vow

"Comes, and the foam spirts, hair's plucked, till one shriek

"(I hear it) and you fling—you cannotspeak—

"Your gold-flowered basnet to a man who haled

"The Adelaide he dared scarce view unveiled

"This morn, naked across the fire : how crown

"The archer that exhausted lays you down

"Your infant, smiling at the flame, and dies ?

"While one, while mine . . .

"Bacchus ! I think there lies

"More than one corpse there" (and he paced the room)

"—Another cinder somewhere : 'twas my doom

'Beside, my doom! If Adelaide is dead,
'I live the same, this Azzo lives instead
'Of that to me, and we pull, any how,
'Este into a heap: the matter's now
'At the true juncture slipping us so oft.
'Ay, Heinrich died and Otho, please you,
doed
'His crown at such a juncture! Still, if holds
'Our Friedrich's purpose, if this chain enfolds
'The neck of . . . who but this same Ecelin
'That must recoil when the best days begin!
'Recoil? that's nought; if the recoiler
leaves
'His name for me to fight with, no one grieves:
'But he must interfere, forsooth, unlock
'His cloister to become my stumbling-block
'Just as of old! Ay, ay, there 'tis again—
'The land's inevitable Head—explain
'The reverences that subject us! Count
'These Ecelins now! Not to say as fount,
'Originating power of thought,—from twelve
'That drop i' the trenches they joined hands to delve,
'Six shall surpass him, but . . . why men must twine
'Somehow with something! Ecelin's a fine
'Clear name! 'Twere simpler, doubtless, twine with me
'At once: our cloistered friend's capacity
'Was of a sort! I had to share myself
'In fifty portions, like an o'ertasked elf
'That's forced illume in fifty points the vast 'Rare vapour he's environed by. At last
'My strengths, though sorely frittered, e'en converge
'And crown . . . no, Bacchus, they have yet to urge
'The man be crowned!
"That aloe, an he durst,
'Would climb! Just such a bloated sprawler first
'I noted in Messina's castle-court
'The day I came, when Heinrich asked in sport
'If I would pledge my faith to win him back
'His right in Lombardy: 'for, once bid pack

'Marauders,' he continued, 'in my stead
'You rule, Taurello!' and upon this head
'Laid the silk glove of Constance—I see hei
'Too, mantled head to foot in miniver,
'Retrude following!
"I am absolved
'From further toil: the empery devolved
'On me, 'twas Tito's word: I have to lay
'For once my plan, pursue my plan my way,
'Prompt nobody, and render an account
'Taurello to Taurello! Nay, I mount
'To Friedrich: he conceives the post I kept,
'—Who did true service, able or inept,
'Who's worthy guerdon, Ecelin or I,
'Me guerdoned, counsel follows: would he vie
'With the Pope really? Azzo, Boniface
'Compose a right-arm Hohenstauffen's race
'Must break ere govern Lombardy. I point
'How easy 'twere to twist, once out of joint,
'The socket from the bone: my Azzo's stare
'Meanwhile! for I, this idle strap to wear,
'Shall—fret myself abundantly, what end
'To serve? There's left me twenty years to spend
'—How better than my old way? Had I one
'Who laboured to o'erthrow my work—a son
'Hatching with Azzo superb treachery,
'To root my pines up and then poison me,
'Suppose—'twere worth while frustrate that!
Beside
'Another life's ordained me: the world's tide
'Rolls, and what hope of parting from the press
'Of waves, a single wave through weariness
'Gently lifted aside, laid upon shore?
'My life must be lived out in foam and roar,
'No question. Fifty years the province held
'Taurello; troubles raised, and troubles quelled,
'He in the midst—who leaves this quaint stone place,
'These trees a year or two, then not a trace
'Of him! How obtain hold, fetter men's tongues
'Like this poor minstrel with the foolish songs—

- "To which, despite our bustle, he is linked ?
 "—Flowers one may tease, that never grow extinct.
 "Ay, that patch, surely, green as ever, where
 "I set Her Moorish lentisk, by the stair,
 "To overawe the aloes ; and we trod
 "Those flowers, how call you such ?—into the sod ;
 "A stately foreigner—a world of pain
 "To make it thrive, arrest rough winds—all vain !
 "It would decline ; these would not be destroyed :
 "And now, where is it ? where can you avoid
 "The flowers ? I frighten children twenty years "Longer !—which way, too, Ecelin appears "To thwart me, for his son's besotted youth
 "Gives promise of the proper tiger-tooth :
 "They feel it at Vicenza ! Fate, fate, fate,
 "My fine Taurello ! Go you, promulgate
 "Friedrich's decree, and here 's shall aggrandise
 "Young Ecelin—your Prefect's badge ! a prize
 "Too precious, certainly.
 "How now ? Compete
 "With my old comrade ? shuffle from their seat
 "His children ? Paltry dealing ! Don't I know
 "Ecelin ? now, I think, and years ago !
 "What's changed—the weakness ? did not I compound
 "For that, and undertake to keep him sound
 "Despite it ? Here's Taurello hankering
 "After a boy's preferment—this plaything,
 "To carry, Bacchus ! " And he laughed.
 Remark
 Why schemes wherein cold-blooded men embark
 Prosper, when your enthusiastic sort
 Fail : while these last are ever stopping short
 (So much they should—so little they can do !)
 The careless tribe see nothing to pursue
 If they desist ; meantime their scheme succeeds.
 Thoughts were caprices in the course of deeds
 Methodic with Taurello ; so, he turned,— Enough amused by fancies fairly earned
 Of Este's horror-struck submitted neck,
 And Richard, the cowed braggart, at his beck,—
 To his own petty but immediate doubt
 If he could pacify the League without Conceding Richard ; just to this was brought
 That interval of vain discursive thought !
 As, shall I say, some Ethiop, past pursuit
 Of all enslavers, dips a shackled foot
 Burnt to the blood, into the drowsy black
 Enormous watercourse which guides him back
 To his own tribe again, where he is king ;
 And laughs because he guesses, numbering
 The yellower poison-wattles on the pouch
 Of the first lizard wrested from its couch
 Under the slime (whose skin, the while, he strips
 To cure his nostril with, and festered lips,
 And eyeballs bloodshot through the desert-blast)
 That he has reached its boundary, at last
 May breathe ;—thinks o'er enchantments of the South
 Sovereign to plague his enemies, their mouth,
 Eyes, nails, and hair ; but, these enchantments tried
 In fancy, puts them soberly aside
 For truth, projects a cool return with friends,
 The likelihood of winning mere amends
 Ere long ; thinks that, takes comfort silently,
 Then, from the river's brink, his wrongs and he,
 Hugging revenge close to their hearts, are soon
 Off-striding for the Mountains of the Moon.
 Midnight : the watcher nodded on his spear,
 Since clouds dispersing left a passage clear
 For any meagre and discoloured moon
 To venture forth ; and such was peering soon
 Above the harassed city—her close lanes
 Closer, not half so tapering her fanes,
 As though she shrunk into herself to keep
 What little life was saved, more safely. Heap
 By heap the watch-fires mouldered, and beside
 The blackest spoke Sordello and replied
 Palma with none to listen. " 'Tis your cause :
 "What makes a Ghibellin ? There should be laws—

"(Remember how my youth escaped ! I trust
 "To you for manhood, Palma ! tell me just
 "As any child)—there must be laws at work
 "Explaining this. Assure me, good may lurk
 "Under the bad,—my multitude has part
 "In your designs, their welfare is at heart
 "With Salinguerra, to their interest
 "Refer the deeds he dwelt on,—so divest
 "Our conference of much that scared me.

Why

"Affect that heartless tone to Tito ? I
 "Esteemed myself, yes, in my inmost mind
 "This morn, a recreant to my race—mankind
 "O'erlooked till now : why boast my spirit's
 force,
 "—Such force denied its object ? why divorce
 "These, then admire my spirit's flight the same
 "As though it bore up, helped some halforb'd flame

"Else quenched in the dead void, to living space ?

"That orb cast off to chaos and disgrace,
 "Why vaunt so much my unencumbered
 dance,

"Making a feat's facilities enhance
 "Its marvel ? But I front Taurello, one
 "Of happier fate, and all I should have done,
 "He does ; the people's good being paramount
 "With him, their progress may perhaps account

"For his abiding still ; whereas you heard
 "The talk with Tito—the excuse preferred
 "For burning those five hostages,—and broached

"By way of blind, as you and I approached,
 "I do believe."

She spoke : then he, "My thought
 "Plainlier expressed ! All to your profit—
 nought

"Meantime of these, of conquests to achieve
 "For them, of wretchedness he might relieve
 "While profiting your party. Azzo, too, "Supports a cause : what cause ? Do Guelfs
 pursue

"Their ends by means like yours, or better ?"

When

The Guelfs were proved alike, men weighed with men,

And deed with deed, blaze, blood, with blood and blaze,

Morn broke : "Once more, Sordello, meet its gaze

"Proudly—the people's charge against thee
 fails

"In every point, while either party quails !

"These are the busy ones : be silent thou !

"Two parties take the world up, and allow

"No third, yet have one principle, subside

"By the same injustice ; whoso shall enlist

"With either, ranks with man's inveterate foes.

"So there is one less quarrel to compose :

"The Guelf, the Ghibellin may be to curse—

"I have done nothing, but both sides do worse

"Than nothing. Nay, to me, forgotten, reft

"Of insight, lapped by trees and flowers,
 was left

"The notion of a service—ha ? What lured

"Me here, what mighty aim was I assured

"Must move Taurello ? What if there remained

"A cause, intact, distinct from these, ordained

"For me, its true discoverer ?"

Some one pressed

Before them here, a watcher, to suggest

The subject for a ballad : "They must know

"The tale of the dead worthy, long ago

"Consul of Rome—that's long ago for us,

"Minstrels and bowmen, idly squabbling thus

"In the world's corner—but too late no doubt,

"For the brave time he sought to bring about.

"—Not know Crescentius Nomentanus ?"

Then

He cast about for terms to tell him, when

Sordello disavowed it, how they used

Whenever their Superior introduced

A novice to the Brotherhood—"for I "Was just a brown-sleeve brother, merrily

"Appointed too," quoth he, "till Innocent

"Bade me relinquish, to my small content,

"My wife or my brown sleeves")—some brother spoke

Ere nocturns of Crescentius, to revoke

The edict issued, after his demise,

Which blotted fame alike and effigies,

All out except a floating power, a name

Including, tending to produce the same

Great act. Rome, dead, forgotten, lived at least

Within that brain, though to a vulgar priest
And a vile stranger,—two not worth a slave
Of Rome's, Pope John, King Otho,—fortune gave

The rule there : so, Crescentius, haply dressed
In white, called Roman Consul for a jest,
Taking the people at their word, forth stepped
As upon Brutus' heel, nor ever kept
Rome waiting,—stood erect, and from his brain
Gave Rome out on its ancient place again,
Ay, bade proceed with Brutus' Rome, Kings styled

Themselves mere citizens of, and, beguiled
Into great thoughts thereby, would choose the gem

Out of a lapfull, spoil their diadem
—The Senate's cypher was so hard to scratch !
He flashes like a phanal, all men catch
The flame, Rome's just accomplished ! when returned

Otho, with John, the Consul's stephad spurned,
And Hugo Lord of Este, to redress

The wrongs of each. Crescentius in the stress
Of adverse fortune bent. " They crucified

" Their Consul in the Forum ; and abide " E'er since such slaves at Rome, that I—(for I

" Was once a brown-sleeve brother, merrily
" Appointed)—I had option to keep wife

" Or keep brown sleeves, and managed in
the strife

" Lose both. A song of Rome !"

And Rome, indeed,
Robed at Goito in fantastic weed,

The Mother-City of his Mantuan days,
Looked an established point of light whence rays

Traversed the world ; for, all the clustered homes

Beside of men, seemed bent on being Romes
In their degrec ; the question was, how each
Should most resemble Rome, clean out of reach.

Nor, of the Two, did either principle
Struggle to change, but to possess Rome,—still Guelf Rome or Ghibellin Rome.

Let Rome advance !
Rome, as she struck Sordello's ignorance—

How could he doubt one moment ? Rome's
the Cause !

Rome of the Pandects, all the world's new laws—

Of the Capitol, of Castle Angelo ;
New structures, that inordinately glow,
Subdued, brought back to harmony, made ripe
By many a relic of the archetype
Extant for wonder ; every upstart church
That hoped to leave old temples in the lurch,
Corrected by the Theatre forlorn
That,—as a mundane shell, its world late
born,—

Lay and o'ershadowed it. These hints combined,

Rome typifies the scheme to put mankind
Once more in full possession of their rights.

" Let us have Rome again ! On me it lights
" To build up Rome—on me, the first and last :

" For such a future was endured the past !"
And thus, in the grey twilight, forth he sprung

To give his thought consistency among
The very People—let their facts avail

Finish the dream grown from the archer's tale.

BOOK THE FIFTH.

Is it the same Sordello in the dusk
As at the dawn ?—merely a perished husk
Now, that arose a power fit to build Up Rome again ? The proud conception chilled

So soon ? Ay, watch that latest dream of thine

—A Rome indebted to no Palatine—
Drop arch by arch, Sordello ! Art possessed

Of thy wish now, rewarded for thy quest
To-day among Ferrara's squalid sons ?

Are this and this and this the shining ones
Meet for the Shining City ? Sooth to say,

Your favoured tenantry pursue their way
After a fashion ! This companion slips

On the smooth causey, t'other blinkard trips
At his smoothed sandal. " Leave to lead the brawls

" Here i' the atria ?" No, friend ! He that sprawls

On aught but a stibadium¹ . . . what his dues

Who puts the lustral vase to such an use?
Oh, huddle up the day's disasters! March,
Ye runagates, and drop thou, arch by arch,
Rome!

Yet before they quite disband—a whim—
Study mere shelter, now, for him, and him,
Nay, even the worst,—just house them!

Any cave
Suffices: throw out earth! A loophole?
Brave!

They ask to feel the sun shine, see the grass
Grow, hear the larks sing? Dead art thou,
alas,

And I am dead! But here's our son excels
At hurdle-weaving any Scythian, fells
Oak and devises rafters, dreams and shapes
His dream into a door-post, just escapes
The mystery of hinges. Lie we both Perdue another age. The goodly growth Of brick and stone! Our building-pelt was rough,

But that descendant's garb suits well enough
A portico-contriver. Speed the years—
What's time to us? At last, a city rears
Itself! nay, enter—what's the grave to us?
Lo, our forlorn acquaintance carry thus
The head! Successively sewer, forum, cirque—

Last age, an aqueduct was counted work,
But now they tire the artificer upon Blank alabaster, black obsidian,²
—Careful, Jove's face be duly fulgorant,
And mother Venus' kiss-creased nipples pant

Back into pristine pulpiness, ere fixed
Above the baths. What difference betwixt This Rome and ours—resemblance what,
between

That scurvy dumb-show and this pageant sheen—

These Romans and our rabble? Use thy wit!

The work marched: step by step,—a workman fit

² A kind of glass (volcanic).

Took each, nor too fit,—to one task, one
time,—

No leaping o'er the petty to the prime,
When just the substituting osier lithe
For brittle bulrush, sound wood for soft withe,

To further loam-and-roughcast-work a stage,—
Exacts an architect, exacts an age
No tables of the Mauritanian tree
For men whose maple log's their luxury!
That way was Rome built. "Better" (say you) "merge

"At once all workmen in the demiurge,
"All epochs in a lifetime, every task
"In one!" So should the sudden city bask
I' the day—while those we'd feast there, want the knack

Of keeping fresh-chalked gowns from speck and brack,
Distinguish not rare peacock from vile swan,
Nor Mareotic juice from Cæcuban.

"Enough of Rome! 'Twas happy to conceive

"Rome on a sudden, nor shall fate bereave
"Me of that credit: for the rest, her spite
"Is an old story—serves my folly right
"By adding yet another to the dull
"List of abortions—things proved beautiful
"Could they be done, Sordello cannot do."

He sat upon the terrace, plucked and threw
The powdery aloe-cusps away, saw shift
Rome's walls, and drop arch after arch, and drift

Mist-like afar those pillars of all stripe,
Mounds of all majesty. "Thou archetype,
"Last of my dreams and loveliest, depart!"

And then a low voice wound into his heart:
"Sordello!" (low as some old Pythoness
Conceding to a Lydian King's distress
The cause of his long error—one mistake
Of her past oracle) "Sordello, wake!

"God has conceded two sights to a man—
"One, of men's whole work, time's completed plan,

"The other, of the minute's work, man's
first

"Step to the plan's completeness: what's dispersed

- "Save hope of that supreme step which,
 descried
 "Earliest, was meant still to remain untried
 "Only to give you heart to take your own
 "Step, and there stay, leaving the rest alone?
 "Where is the vanity? Why count as one
 "The first step, with the last step? What is gone
 "Except Rome's æry magnificence,
 "That last step you'd take first?—an evidence
 "You were God: be man now! Let those glances fall!
 "The basis, the beginning step of all,
 "Which proves you just a man—is that gone
 too?
 "Pity to disconcert one versed as you
 "In fate's ill-nature! but its full extent
 "Eludes Sordello, even: the veil rent,
 "Read the black writing—that collective
 man
 "Outstrips the individual. Who began "The acknowledged greatnesses? Ay, your own art
 "Shall serve us: put the poet's mimes apart—
 "Close with the poet's self, and lo, a dim
 "Yet too plain form divides itself from him!
 "Alcamo's song enmeshes the lulled Isle,
 "Woven into the echoes left erewhile
 "By Nina, one soft web of song: no more "Turning his name, then, flower-like o'er and o'er!
 "An elder poet in the younger's place;
 "Nina's the strength, but Alcamo's the grace:
 "Each neutralizes each then! Search your fill;
 "You get no whole and perfect Poet—still
 "New Ninas, Alcamos, till time's mid-night
 "Shrouds all—or better say, the shutting light
 "Of a forgotten yesterday. Dissect
 "Every ideal workman—(to reject
 "In favour of your fearful ignorance
 "The thousand phantasms eager to advance,
 "And point you but to those within your reach)—
 "Were you the first who brought —(in modern speech)
 "The Multitude to be materialized?
 "That loose eternal unrest—who devised
- "An apparition i' the midst? The rout
 "Was checked, a breathless ring was formed
 about
 "That sudden flower: get round at any risk
 "The gold-rough pointel, silver-blazing disk
 "O' the lily! Swords across it! Reign thy reign
 "And serve thy frolic service, Charlemagne!
 "—The very child of over-joyousness,
 "Unfeeling thence, strong therefore: Strength by stress
 "Of Strength comes of that forehead confident,
 "Those widened eyes expecting heart's content,
 "A calm as out of just-quelled noise; nor swerves
 "For doubt, the ample cheek in gracious curves
 "Abutting on the upthrust nether lip:
 "He wills, how should he doubt then?
 Ages slip:
 "Was it Sordello pried into the work
 "So far accomplished, and discovered lurk
 "A company amid the other clans,
 "Only distinct in priests for castellans
 "And popes for suzerains (their rule confessed
 "Its rule, their interest its interest,
 "Living for sake of living—there an end —
 "Wrapt in itself, no energy to spend
 "In making adversaries or allies)—
 "Dived you into its capabilities
 "And dared create, out of that sect, a soul
 "Should turn a multitude, already whole,
 "Into its body? Speak plainer! Is't so sure
 "God's church lives by a King's investiture?
 "Look to last step! A staggering—a shock—
 "What's mere sand is demolished, while the rock
 "Endures: a column of black fiery dust
 "Blots heaven—that help was prematurely thrust
 "Aside, perchance!—but air clears, nought's erased
 "Of the true outline. Thus much being firm based,
 "The other was a scaffold. See him stand
 "Buttressed upon his mattock, Hildebrand

- "Of the huge brain-mask welded ply o'er ply
 "As in a forge; it buries either eye
 "White and extinct, that stupid brow; teeth clenched,
 "The neck tight-corded, too, the chin deep-trenched,
 "As if a cloud enveloped him while fought
 "Under its shade, grim prizers, thought with
 thought
 "At dead-lock, agonizing he, until
 "The victor thought leap radiant up, and Will,
 "Theslave with folded arms and drooping lids
 "They fought for, lean forth flame-like as it bids.
 "Call him no flower—a mandrake of the earth,
 "Thwarted and dwarfed and blasted in its birth,
 "Rather,—a fruit of suffering's excess,
 "Thence feeling, therefore stronger: still by stress
 "Of Strength, work Knowledge! Full three hundred years
 "Have men to wear away in smiles and tears
 "Between the two that nearly seemed to
 touch,
 "Observe you! quit one workman and you clutch
 "Another, letting both their trains go by—
 "The actors-out of either's policy,
 "Heinrich, on this hand, Otho, Barbaross,
 "Carry the three Imperial crowns across,
 "Aix' Iron, Milan's Silver, and Rome's Gold—
 "While Alexander, Innocent uphold
 "On that, each Papal key—but, link on link,
 "Why is it neither chain betrays a chink?
 "How coalesce the small and great? Alack,
 "For one thrust forward, fifty such fall back!
 "Do the popes coupled there help Gregory
 "Alone? Hark—from the hermit Peter's cry
 "At Claremont, down to the first serf that says
 "Friedrich's no liege of his while he delays "Getting the Pope's curse off him! The Crusade—
 "Or trick of breeding Strength by other aid
 "Than Strength, is safe. Hark—from the wild harangue
 "Of Vimercato, to the carroch's clang "Yonder! The League—or trick of turning
 Strength
 "Against Pernicious Strength, is safe at length.
 "Yet hark—from Mantuan Albert making cease
 "The fierce ones, to Saint Francis preaching
 peace
 "Yonder! God's Truce—or trick to supersede
 "The very Use of Strength, is safe. Indeed
 "We trench upon the future. Who is found "To take next step, next age—trail o'er the ground—
 "Shall I say, gourd-like?—not the flower's display
 "Nor the root's prowess, but the plenteous
 way
 "O' the plant—produced by joy and sorrow,
 whence
 "Unfeeling and yet feeling, strongest thence?
 "Knowledge by stress of merely Knowledge?
 No—
 "E'en were Sordello ready to forego
 "His life for this, 'twere overleaping work
 "Some one has first to do, howe'er it irk,
 "Nor stray a foot's breadth from the beaten road.
 "Who means to help must still support the load "Hildebrand lifted—'why hast Thou,' he groaned,
 "Imposed on me a burthen, Paul had moaned,
 "And Moses dropped beneath?' Much done—and yet
 "Doubtless that grandest task God ever set
 "On man, left much to do: at his arm's
 wrench,
 "Charlemagne's scaffold fell; but pillars
 blench
 Merely, start back again—perchance have been
 "Taken for buttresses: crash every screen,
 Hammer the tenons¹ better, and engage
 "A gang about your work, for the next age

¹ A word of carpentry—the projecting piece of wood fitting into framework.

"Or two, of Knowledge, part by Strength and
part

"By Knowledge ! Then, indeed, perchance may start

"Sordello on his race—would time divulge
"Such secrets ! If one step's awry, one bulge
"Calls for correction by a step we thought
"Got over long since, why, till that is wrought,

"No progress ! And the scaffold in its turn
"Becomes, its service o'er, a thing to spurn.

"Meanwhile, if your half-dozen years of life
"In store dispose you to forego the strife,

"Who takes exception ? Only bear in mind
"Ferrara's reached, Goito's left behind :

"As you then were, as half yourself, desist !
"—The warrior-part of you may, an it list,

"Finding real faulchions difficult to poise,
"Fling them afar and taste the cream of joys

"By wielding such in fancy,—what is bard
"Of you may spurn the vehicle that marred

"Elys so much, and in free fancy glut
"His sense, yet write no verses—-you have but

"To please yourself for law, and once could
please

"What once appeared yourself, by dreaming
these

"Rather than doing these, in days gone by.
"But all is changed the moment you descry

"Mankind as half yourself,—then, fancy's trade

"Ends once and always : how may half evade
"The other half ? men are found half of you.

"Out of a thousand helps, just one or two
"Can be accomplished presently : but flinch

"From these (as from the faulchion, raised an inch,

"Elys, described a couplet) and make proof
"Of fancy,—then, while one half lolls aloof

"I' the vines, completing Rome to the tip-top—

"See if, for that, your other half will stop
"A tear, begin a smile ! The rabble's woes,

"Ludicrous in their patience as they chose
"To sit about their town and quietly

"Be slaughtered,—the poor reckless soldiery,

"With their ignoble rhymes on Richard, how
"Polt-foot,' sang they, 'was in a pitfall now,'

"Cheering each other from the engine mounts,—

"That crippled spawling idiot who recounts
"How, lopped of limbs, he lay, stupid as stone,

"Till the pains crept from out him one by one,
"And wriggles round the archers on his head

"To earn a morsel of their chestnut bread,—
"And Cino, always in the self-same place

"Weeping ; beside that other wretch's case,
"Eyepits to ear, one gangrene since he plied

"The engine in his coat of raw sheep's hide
"A double watch in the noon sun ; and see

"Iacchino, beauty, with the favours free,
"Trim haqueton,¹ spruce beard and scented
hair,

"Campaigning it for the first time—cut there
"In two already, boy enough to crawl

"For latter orpine round the southern wall,
"Tomà, where Richard's kept, because that whore

"Marfisa, the fool never saw before,
"Sickened for flowers this wearisomest siege :

"And Tiso's wife—men liked their pretty
liege,

"Cared for her least of whims once,—Berta,
wed

"A twelvemonth gone, and, now poor Tiso's
dead,

"Delivering herself of his first child
"On that chance heap of wet filth, reconciled

"To fifty gazers !"—(Here a wind below
Made moody music augural of woe

From the pine barrier)—"What if, now the scene

"Draws to a close, yourself have really been
"—You, plucking purples in Goito's moss

"Like edges of a trabea² (not to cross
"Your consul-humour) or dry aloe-shafts

"For fasces, at Ferrara—he, fate wafts,
"This very age, her whole inheritance

"Of opportunities ? Yet you advance

A quilted jacket.

² A purple toga.

"Upon the last ! Since talking is your trade,
 "There's Salinguerra left you to persuade :
 "Fail ! then"—

"No—no—which latest chance secure !"

Leaped up and cried Sordello: "this made sure,
 "The past were yet redeemable ; its work
 "Was—help the Guelfs, whom I, howe'er
 it irk,

"Thus help !" He shook the foolish alcehaulm

Out of his doublet, paused, proceeded calm
 To the appointed presence. The large head Turned on its socket ; "And your spokesman," said

The large voice, "is Elcorte's happy sprout?
 "Few such"—(so finishing a speech no doubt Addressed to Palma, silent at his side)

"—My sober councils have diversified.

"Elcorte's son ! good : forward as you may,

"Our lady's minstrel with so much to say !"

The hesitating sunset floated back,

Rosily traversed in the wonted track

The chamber, from the lattice o'er the girth

Of pines, to the huge eagle blacked in earth

Opposite,—outlined sudden, spur to crest,

That solid Salinguerra, and carressed

Palma's contour ; 'twas day looped back night's pall ;

Sordello had a chance left spite of all.

And much he made of the convincing
 speech

Meant to compensate for the past and reach
 Through his youth's daybreak of unprofit, quite

To his noon's labour, so proceed till night

Leisurely ! The great argument to bind

Taurello with the Guelf Cause, body and
 mind,

—Came the consummate rhetoric to that ?

Yet most Sordello's argument dropped flat

Through his accustomed fault of breaking yoke,

Disjoining him who felt from him who spoke.

Was't not a touching incident—so prompt

A rendering the world its just account ;

Once proved its debtor ? Who'd suppose,
 before

This proof, that he, Goito's god of yore,

At duty's instance could demean himself

So memorably, dwindle to a Guelf ?

Be sure, in such delicious flattery steeped,

His inmost self at the out-portion peeped,

Thus occupied ; then stole a glance at those

Appealed to, curious if her colour rose

Or his lip moved, while he discreetly urged

The need of Lombardy becoming purged

At soonest of her barons ; the poor part

Abandoned thus, missing the blood at heart

And spirit in brain, unseasonably off

Elsewhere ! But, though his speech was worthy scoff,

Good-humoured Salinguerra, famed for tact

And tongue, who, careless of his phrase,

ne'er lacked

The right phrase, and harangued Honorius

dumb

At his accession,—looked as all fell plumb

To purpose and himself found interest

In every point his new instructor pressed —Left playing with the rescript's white wax

seal

To scrutinize Sordello head and heel.

He means to yield assent sure ? No, alas !

All he replied was, "What, it comes to pass

"That poesy, sooner than politics,

"Makes fade young hair?" To think such speech could fix

Taurello !

Then a flash of bitter truth :

So fantasies could break and fritter youth

That he had long ago lost earnestness,

Lost will to work, lost power to even express

The need of working ! Earth was turned a grave :

No more occasions now, though he should crave

Just one, in right of superhuman toil,

To do what was undone, repair such spoil,

Alter the past—nothing would give the chance !

Not that he was to die ; he saw askance

Protract the ignominious years beyond

To dream in—time to hope and time despond,

Remember and forget, be sad, rejoice .

As saved a trouble ; he might, at his choice,

One way or other, idle life out, drop

No few smooth verses by the way—for prop,

A thyrsus, these sad people, all the same,
Should pick up, and set store by,—far from
blame,
Plant o'er his hearse, convinced his better
part Survived him. "Rather tear men out the heart
"O' the truth!"—Sordello muttered, and renewed
His propositions for the Multitude.
But Salinguerra, who at this attack
Had thrown great breast and ruffling corslet
back
To hear the better, smilingly resumed
His task; beneath, the carroch's warning boomed;
He must decide with Tito; courteously
He turned then, even seeming to agree
With his admonisher—"Assist the Pope,
"Extend Guelf domination, fill the scope
"O' the Church, thus based on All, by All,
for All—
"Change Secular to Evangelical"—
Echoing his very sentence: all seemed lost,
When suddenly he looked up, laughingly almost,
To Palma: "This opinion of your friend's—
"For instance, would it answer Palma's ends?
"Best, were it not, turn Guelf, submit our Strength"—
(Here he drew out his baldric to its length) —"To the Pope's Knowledge—let our captive slip,
"Wide to the walls throw ope our gates, equip
"Azzo with . . . what I hold here! Who'll subscribe
"To a trite censure of the minstrel tribe
"Henceforward? or pronounce, as Heinrich used,
"Spear-heads for battle, burr-heads for the joust!"
"—When Constance, for his couplets, would promote
"Alcamo, from a parti-coloured coat,
"To holding her lord's stirrup in the wars,
"Not that I see where couplet-making jars

"With common sense: at Mantua I had borne
"This chanted, better than their most forlorn
"Of bull-baits,—that's indisputable!"
Brave!
Whom vanity nigh slew, contempt shall save!
All's at an end: a Troubadour suppose Mankind will class him with their friends or foes?
A puny uncouth ailing vassal think
The world and him bound in some special link?
Abrupt the visionary tether burst.
What were rewarded here, or what amerced
If a poor drudge, solicitous to dream
Deservingly, got tangled by his theme
So far as to conceit the knack or gift
Or whatsoe'er it be, of verse, might lift
The globe, a lever like the hand and head
Of—"Men of Action," as the Jongleurs said,
—"The Great Men," in the people's dialect?
And not a moment did this scorn affect Sordello: scorn the poet? They, for once,
Asking "what was," obtained a full response.
Bid Naddo think at Mantua—he had but
To look into his promptuary, put
Finger on a set thought in a set speech:
But was Sordello fitted thus for each
Conjecture? Nowise; since within his soul,
Perception brooded unexpressed and whole.
A healthy spirit like a healthy frame
Craves aliment in plenty—all the same,
Changes, assimilates its aliment.
Perceived Sordello, on a truth intent?
Next day no formularies more you saw
Than figs or olives in a sated maw.
'Tis Knowledge, whither such perceptions tend;
They lose themselves in that, means to an end,
The many old producing some one new,
A last unlike the first. If lies are true,
The Caliph's wheel-work man¹ of brass receives
A meal, munched millet grains and lettuce
leaves
Together in his stomach rattle loose;
You find them perfect next day to produce:

But ne'er expect the man, on strength of that,
Can roll an iron camel-collar flat Like Haroun's self! I tell you, what was stored

Bit by bit through Sordello's life, outpoured
That eve, was, for that age, a novel thing:
And round those three the People formed a ring,

Of visionary judges whose award
He recognized in full—faces that barred
Henceforth return to the old careless life,
In whose great presence, therefore, his first strife

For their sake must not be ignobly fought;
All these, for once, approved of him, he
thought,

Suspended their own vengeance, chose await
The issue of this strife to reinstate
Them in the right of taking it—in fact
He must be proved king ere they could exact
Vengeance for such king's defalcation. Last,
A reason why the phrases flowed so fast
Was in his quite forgetting for a time
Himself in his amazement that the rhyme
Disguised the royalty so much: he there—
And Salinguerra yet all-unaware
Who was the lord, who liegeman!

“Thus I lay

“On thine my spirit and compel obey “His lord,—my liegeman,—impotent to build

“Another Rome, but hardly so unskilled “In what such builder should have been, as brook

“One shame beyond the charge that I forsook “His function! Free me from that shame, I bend

“A brow before, suppose new years to spend,—

“Allow each chance, nor fruitlessly, recur—
“Measure thee with the Minstrel, then, demur
“At any crowd he claims! That I must cede “Shamed now, my right to my especial
meed—

“Confess thee fitter help the world than I “Ordained its champion from eternity,
“Is much: but to behold thee scorn the post
“I quit in thy behalf—to hear thee boast

“What makes my own despair!” And while he rung

The changes on this theme, the roof up-sprung,
The sad walls of the presence-chamber died
Into the distance, or embowering vied
With far-away Goito's vine-frontier;
And crowds of faces—(only keeping clear
The rose-light in the midst, his vantage-ground
To fight their battle from)—deep clustered
round

Sordello, with good wishes no mere breath,
Kind prayers for him no vapour, since, come
death

Come life, he was fresh-sinewed every joint,
Each bone new-marrowed as whom gods anoint

Though mortal to their rescue. Now let sprawl

The snaky volumes hither! Is Typhon all
For Hercules to trample—good report
From Salinguerra only to extort?

“So was I” (closed he his inculcating
A poet must be earth's essential king)

“So was I, royal so, and if I fail,

“’Tis not the royalty, ye witness quail,

“But one deposed who, caring not exert

“Its proper essence, trifled malapert

“With accidents instead—good things assigned

“As heralds of a better thing behind—

“And, worthy through display of these, put
forth

“Never the inmost all-surpassing worth

“That constitutes him king precisely since

“As yet no other spirit may evince

“Its like: the power he took most pride to test,

“Whereby all forms of life had been professed

“At pleasure, forms already on the earth,

“Was but a means to power beyond, whose birth

“Should, in its novelty, be kingship's proof.

“Now, whether he came near or kept aloof

“The several forms he longed to imitate,

“Not there the kingship lay, he sees too late.

“Those forms, unalterable first as last,

“Proved him her copier, not the protoplast

“Of nature: what would come of being free,

“By action to exhibit tree for tree,

- "Bird, beast, for beast and bird, or prove earth bore
- "One veritable man or woman more?
- "Means to an end, such proofs are: what the end?
- "Let essence, whatsoe'er it be, extend—
- "Never contract. Already you include
- "The multitude; then let the multitude
- "Include yourself; and the result were new:
- "Themselves before, the multitude turn you.
- "Thus were to live and move and have, in
them,
- "Your being, and secure a diadem
- "You should transmit (because no cycle
years
- "Beyond itself, but on itself returns)
- "When, the full sphere in wane, the world o'erlaid
- "Long since with you, shall have in turn obeyed
- "Some orb still prouder, some displayer, still
- "More potent than the last, of human will,
- "And some new king depose the old. Of such
- "Am I—whom pride of this elates too much?
- "Safe, rather say, 'mid troops of peers again;
- "I, with my words, hailed brother of the train
- "Deeds once sufficed: for, let the world roll
back,
- "Who fails, through deeds howe'er diverse,
retrack
- "My purpose still, my task? A teeming crust—
- "Air, flame, earth, wave at conflict! Then, needs must
- "Emerge some Calm embodied, these refer
- "The brawl to—yellow-bearded Jupiter?
- "No! Saturn; some existence like a pact
- "And protest against Chaos, some first fact
- "I' the faint of time. My deep of life, I know,
"Is unavailing e'en to poorly show" . . .
(For here the Chief immeasurably yawned)
. . . "Deeds in their due gradation till Song dawned—
- "The fullest effluence of the finest mind,
"All in degree, no way diverse in kind
"From minds about it, minds which, more or
less,
"Lofty or low, move seeking to impress
- "Themselves on somewhat; but one mind has climbed
- "Step after step, by just ascent sublimed.
- "Thought is the soul of act, and, stage by stage,
- "Soul is from body still to disengage
- "As tending to a freedom which rejects
- "Such help and incorporeally affects
- "The world, producing deeds but not by deeds,
- "Swaying, in others, frames itself exceeds,
"Assigning them the simpler tasks it used
- "To patiently perform till Song produced
- "Acts, by thoughts only, for the mind: divest
- "Mind of e'en Thought, and, lo, God's un-expressed
- "Will draws above us! All then is to win
- "Save that. How much for me, then? where begin
- "My work? About me, faces! and they
flock,
- "The earnest faces. What shall I unlock
- "By song? behold me prompt, whate'er it be,
- "To minister: how much can mortals see
- "Of Life? No more than so? I take the task
- "And marshal you Life's elemental masque,
- "Show Men, on evil or on good lay stress,
- "This light, this shade make prominent, suppress
- "All ordinary hues that softening blend
- "Such natures with the level. Apprehend
- "Which sinner is, which saint, if I allot
- "Hell, Purgatory, Heaven, a blaze or blot,
"To those you doubt concerning! I enwomb
- "Some wretched Friedrich with his red-hot tomb;
- "Some dubious spirit, Lombard Agilulph
- "With the black chastening river I engulph!
- "Some unapproached Matilda I enshrine
- "With languors of the planet of decline—
- "These, fail to recognize, to arbitrate
- "Between henceforth, to rightly estimate
- "Thus marshalled in the masque! Myself,
the while,
- "As one of you, am witness, shrink or smile
- "At my own showing! Next age—what's to do?
- "The men and women stationed hitherto

- "Will I unstation, good and bad, conduct
 "Each nature to its farthest, or obstruct
 "At soonest, in the world : light, thwarted, breaks
 "A limpid purity to rainbow flakes,
 "Or shadow, massed, freezes to gloom :
 behold
 "How such, with fit assistance to unfold,
 "Or obstacles to crush them, disengage
 "Their forms, love, hate, hope, fear, peace make, war wage,
 "In presence of you all ! Myself, implied
 "Superior now, as, by the platform's side,
 "I bade them do and suffer,—would last content
 "The world . . . no—that's too far ! I circumvent
 "A few, my masque contented, and to these
 "Offer unveil the last of mysteries—
 "Man's inmost life shall have yet freer play :
 "Once more I cast external things away,
 "And natures composite, so decompose
 "That" . . . Why, he writes Sordello !
 " How I rose,
 "And how have you advanced ! since ever-
 more
 "Yourselves effect what I was fain before
 "Effect, what I supplied yourselves suggest,
 "What I leave bare yourselves can now invest.
 "How we attain to talk as brothers talk,
 "In half-words, call things by half-names,
 no balk
 "From discontinuing old aids. To-day
 "Takes in account the work of Yesterday :
 "Has not the world a Past now, its adept
 "Consults ere he dispense with or accept
 "New aids ? a single touch more may enhance,
 "A touch less turn to insignificance
 "Those structures' symmetry the past has strewed
 "The world with, once so bare. Leave the mere rude
 "Explicit details ! 'tis but brother's speech
 "We need, speech where an accent's change gives each
 VOL. I.
- "The other's soul—no speech to understand
 "By former audience : need was then to expand,
 "Expatriate—hardly were we brothers !
 true—
 "Nor I lament my small remove from you,
 "Nor reconstruct what stands already. Ends
 "Accomplished turn to means : my art intends
 "New structure from the ancient : as they changed
 "The spoils of every clime at Venice, ranged
 "The horned and snouted Libyan god, upright
 "As in his desert, by some simple bright
 "Clay cinerary pitcher—Thebes as Rome,
 "Athens as Byzant rifled, till their Dome
 "From earth's reputed consummations razed
 "A seal, the all-transmuting Triad blazed "Above. Ah, whose that fortune ? Ne'ertheless
 "E'en he must stoop contented to express
 "No tithe of what's to say—the vehicle
 "Never sufficient : but his work is still "For faces like the faces that select
 "The single service I am bound effect,—
 "That bid me cast aside such fancies, bow
 "Taurello to the Guef cause, disallow
 "The Kaiser's coming—which with heart, soul, strength,
 "I labour for, this eve, who feel at length
 "My past career's outrageous vanity,
 "And would, as its amends, die, even die
 "Now I first estimate the boon of life,
 "If death might win compliance—sure, this strife
 "Is right for once—the People my support."
 My poor Sordello ! what may we extort
 By this, I wonder ? Palma's lighted eyes
 Turned to Taurello who, long past surprise, Began, " You love him—what you'd say at large
 "Let me say briefly. First, your father's charge
 "To me, his friend, peruse : I guessed indeed
 "You were no stranger to the course decreed
 "He bids me leave his children to the saints :
 "As for a certain project, he acquaints '

- "The Pope with that, and offers him the best
 "Of your possessions to permit the rest
 "Go peaceably—to Ecelin, a stripe
 "Of soil the cursed Vicentines will gripe,
 "—To Alberic, a patch the Trevisan
 "Clutches already; extricate, who can,
 "Treville, Villarazzi, Puissolo,
 "Loria and Cartiglione!—all must go,
 "And with them go my hopes. 'Tis lost, then! Lost
 "This eve, our crisis, and some pains it cost
 "Procuring; thirty years—as good I'd spent
 "Like our admonisher! But each his bent
 "Pursues: no question, one might live absurd
 "Oneself this while, by deed as he by word
 "Persisting to obtrude an influence where
 "'Tis made account of, much as . . . nay, you fare
 "With twice the fortune, youngster!—I submit,
 "Happy to parallel my waste of wit
 "With the renowned Sordello's: you decide
 "A course for me. Romano may abide "Romano,—Bacchus! After all, what dearth
 "Of Ecelins and Alberics on earth?
 "Say there's a prize in prospect, must disgrace
 "Betide competitors, unless they style
 "Themselves Romano? Were it worth my
 while
 "To try my own luck! But an obscure place
 "Suits me—there wants a youth to bustle,
 stalk
 "And attitudinize—some fight, more talk,
 "Most flaunting badges—how, I might make clear
 "Since Friedrich's very purposes lie here
 "—Here, pity they are like to lie! For me,
 "With station fixed unceremoniously
 "Long since, small use contesting; I am but
 "The liegeman—you are born the lieges: shut
 "That gentle mouth now! or resume your kin
 "In your sweet self; were Palma Ecelin
 "For me to work with! Could that neck endure
 "This bauble for a cumbrous garniture,
 "She should . . . or might one bear it for her? Stay—
 "I have not been so flattered many a day
- "As by your pale friend—Bacchus! The least help
 "Would lick the hind's fawn to a lion's whelp:
 "His neck is broad enough—a ready tongue
 "Beside: too writhled—but, the main thing, young—
 "I could . . . why, look ye!"
 And the badge was thrown Across Sordello's neck: "This badge alone
 "Makes you Romano's Head—becomes superb
 "On your bare neck, which would, on mine, disturb
 "The pauldron," said Taurello. A mad act,
 Nor even dreamed about before—in fact,
 Not when his sportive arm rose for the nonce—
 But he had dallied overmuch, this once,
 With power: the thing was done, and he,
 aware
 The thing was done, proceeded to declare—
 (So like a nature made to serve, excel
 In serving, only feel by service well!)
 —That he would make Sordello that and more.
 "As good a scheme as any. What's to pore
 "At in my face?" he asked—"ponder it stead
 "This piece of news; you are Romano's
 Head!
 "One cannot slacken pace so near the goal,
 "Suffer my Azzo to escape heart-whole
 This time! For you there's Palma to espouse—
 "For me, one crowning trouble ere I house
 "Like my compeer."
- On which ensued a strange
 And solemn visitation; there came change
 O'er every one of them; each looked on each:
 Up in the midst a truth grew, without speech.
 And when the giddiness sank and the haze
 Subsided, they were sitting, no amaze,
 Sordello with the baldrick on, his sire
 Silent, though his proportions seemed aspire
 Momently; and, interpreting the thrill,—
 Night at its ebb,—Palma was found there still Relating somewhat Adelaide confessed.
 A year ago, while dying on her breast,—
 Of a contrivance, that Vicenza night
 When Ecelin had birth. "Their convoy's
 flight,

- "Cut off a moment, coiled inside the flame
 "That wallowed like a dragon at his game
 "The toppling city through—San Biagio
 rocks!
 "And wounded lies in her delicious locks
 "Retrude, the frail mother, on her face,
 "None of her wasted, just in one embrace
 "Covering her child: when, as they lifted
 her,
 "Cleaving the tumult, mighty, mightier
 "And mightiest Taurello's cry outbroke,
 "Leapt like a tongue of fire that cleaves the smoke,
 "Midmost to cheer his Mantuans onward—drown
 "His colleague Ecelin's clamour, up and
 down
 "The disarray: failed Adelaide see then
 "Who was the natural chief, the man of men?
 "Outstripping time, her infant there burst swathe,
 "Stood up with eyes haggard beyond the scathe
 "From wandering after his heritage
 "Lost once and lost for aye: and why that rage,
 "That deprecating glance? A new shape leant
 "On a familiar shape—gloatingly bent
 "O'er his discomfiture; 'mid wreaths it wore,
 "Still one outflamed the rest—her child's
 before
 "'Twas Salinguerra's for his child: scorn,
 hate,
 "Rage now might startle her when all too late!
 "Then was the moment!—rival's foot had spurned
 "Never that House to earth else! Sense returned—
 "The act conceived, adventured and complete,
 "They bore away to an obscure retreat
 "Mother and child—Retrude's self not slain"
 (Nor even here Taurello moved) "though pain
 "Was fled; and what assured them most
 'twas fled,
 "All pain, was, if they raised the pale hushed
 head
- "'Twould turn this way and that, waver awhile,
 "And only settle into its old smile—
 "(Graceful as the disquieted water-flag
 "Steadying itself, remarked they, in the quag
 "On either side their path)—when suffered
 look
 "Down on her child. They marched: no sign once shook
 "The company's close litter of crossed spears
 "Till, as they reached Goito, a few tears
 "Slipped in the sunset from her long black lash,
 "And she was gone. So far the action rash;
 "No crime. They laid Retrude in the font,
 "Taurello's very gift, her child was wont
 "To sit beneath—constant as eve he came "To sit by its attendant girls the same "As one of them. For Palma, she would blend
 "With this magnific spirit to the end,
 "That ruled her first; but scarcely had she dared
 "To disobey the Adelaide who scared
 "Her into vowing never to disclose
 "A secret to her husband, which so froze
 "His blood at half-recital, she contrived
 "To hide from him Taurello's infant lived,
 "Lest, by revealing that, himself should mar
 "Romano's fortunes. And, a crime so far,
 "Palma received that action: she was told
 "Of Salinguerra's nature, of his cold
 "Calm acquiescence in his lot! But free
 "To impart the secret to Romano, she "Engaged to repossess Sordello of "His heritage, and hers, and that way doff
 "The mask, but after years, long years:
 while now,
 "Was not Romano's sign-mark on that brow?"
 Across Taurello's heart his arms were locked:
 And when he did speak 'twas as if he mocked
 The minstrel, "who had not to move," he "Nor stir—should fate defraud him of a shred
 Of his son's infancy? much less his youth!"
 (Laughingly all this)—"which to aid, in truth,

"Himself, reserved on purpose, had not grown

"Old, not too old—'twas best they kept alone
"Till now, and never idly met till now ;"

—Then, in the same breath, told Sordello how

All intimations of this eve's event

Werelies, for Friedrich must advance to Trent,
Thence to Verona, then to Rome, there stop,
Tumble the Church down, institute a-top
The Alps a Prefecture of Lombardy :

—"That's now ! — no prophesying what may be

"Anon, with a new monarch of the clime,

"Native of Gesi, passing his youth's prime

"At Naples. Tito bids my choice decide

"On whom . . ."

"Embrace him, madman !" Palma cried,
Who through the laugh saw sweat-drops
burst apace,

And his lips blanching : he did not embrace
Sordello, but he laid Sordello's hand

On his own eyes, mouth, forehead.

Understand,

This while Sordello was becoming flushed
Out of his whiteness ; thoughts rushed, fancies rushed ;

He pressed his hand upon his head and signed Both should forbear him. "Nay, the best's behind !"

Taurello laughed—not quite with the same
laugh :

"The truth is, thus we scatter, ay, like chaff

"These Guelfs, a despicable monk recoils

"From : nor expect a fickle Kaiser spoils

"Our triumph !—Friedrich ? Think you,
I intend

"Friedrich shall reap the fruits of blood I spend

"And brain I waste ? Think you, the people clap

"Their hands at my out-hewing this wild-gap

"For any Friedrich to fill up ? 'Tis mine—

"That's yours : I tell you, towards some such design

"Have I worked blindly, yes, and idly, yes,

"And for another, yes—but worked no less

"With instinct at my heart ; I else had swerved,

"While now—look round ! My cunning has preserved

"Samminiato—that's a central place

"Secures us Florence, boy,—in Pisa's case.

"By land as she by sea ; with Pisa ours,

"And Florence, and Pistoia, one devours

"The land at leisure ! Gloriously dispersed—

"Brescia, observe, Milan, Piacenza first

"That flanked us (ah, you know not !) in the March ;

"On these we pile, as keystone of our arch,

"Romagna and Bologna, whose first span

"Covered the Trentine and the Valsugan ;

"Sofia's Egna by Bolgiano's sure !" . . .

So he proceeded : half of all this, pure

Delusion, doubtless, nor the rest too true,

But what was undone he felt sure to do,

As ring by ring he wrung off, flung away

The pauldron-rings to give his sword-arm
play—

Need of the sword now ! That would soon adjust

Aught wrong at present ; to the sword in-
trust

Sordello's whiteness, undersize : 'twas plain

He hardly rendered right to his own brain—

Like a brave hound, men educate to pride

Himself on speed or scent nor aught beside,

As though he could not, gift by gift, match
men !

Palma had listened patiently : but when

'Twas time expostulate, attempt withdraw

Taurello from his child, she, without awe

Took off his iron arms from, one by one,

Sordello's shrinking shoulders, and, that
done,

Made him avert his visage and relieve

Sordello (you might see his corslet heave

The while) who, loose, rose—tried to speak,
then sank :

They left him in the chamber. All was blank.

And even reeling down the narrow stair

Taurello kept up, as though unaware

Palma was by to guide him, the old device

—Something of Milan—"how we muster thrice

"The Torriani's strength there ; all along
 "Our own Visconti cowed them"—thus the
 song

Continued even while she bade him stoop, Thrid somehow, by some glimpse of arrow-loop,

The turnings to the gallery below,
 Where he stopped short as Palma let him go.
 When he had sat in silence long enough
 Splintering the stone bench, braving a rebuff
 She stopped the truncheon ; only to commence

One of Sordello's poems, a pretence
 For speaking, some poor rhyme of "Elys' hair
 "And head that's sharp and perfect like a pear,

"So smooth and close are laid the few fine
 locks

"Stained like pale honey oozed from topmost
 rocks

"Sun-blanced the livelong summer"—from his worst

Performance, the Goito, as his first :
 And that at end, conceiving from the brow
 And open mouth no silence would serve now,
 Went on to say the whole world loved that
 man

And, for that matter, thought his face, tho'
 wan,

Eclipsed the Count's—he sucking in each phrase

As if an angel spoke. The foolish praise
 Ended, he drew her on his mailed knees,
 made

Her face a framework with his hands, a shade,
 A crown, an aureole : there must she remain
 (Her little mouth compressed with smiling pain

As in his gloves she felt her tresses twitch)
 To get the best look at, in fittest niche Dispose his saint. That done, he kissed her
 brow,

—"Lauded her father for his treason now,"
 He told her, "only, how could one suspect
 "The wit in him?—whose clansman, recollect,

"Was ever Salinguerra—she, the same,
 "Romano and his lady—so, might claim

"To know all, as she should"—and thus begun

Schemes with a vengeance, schemes on schemes, "not one

"Fit to be told that foolish boy," he said,
 "But only let Sordello Palma wed,
 "—Then !"

'Twas a dim long narrow place at best :
 Midway a sole grate showed the fiery West,
 As shows its corpse the world's end some split tomb—

A gloom, a rift of fire, another gloom,
 Faced Palma—but at length Taurello set
 Her free ; the grating held one ragged jet
 Of fierce gold fire : he lifted her within
 The hollow underneath—how else begin
 Fate's second marvellous cycle, else renew
 The ages than with Palma plain in view ?
 Then paced the passage, hands clenched, head erect,

Pursuing his discourse ; a grand unchecked
 Monotony made out from his quick talk
 And the recurring noises of his walk ;
 —Somewhat too much like the o'ercharged assent

Of two resolved friends in one danger blent,
 Who heartened each the other against heart ;
 Boasting there's nought to care for, when,
 apart

The boaster, all's to care for. He, beside
 Some shape not visible, in power and pride
 Approached, out of the dark, ginglyly near,
 Nearer, passed close in the broad light, his ear
 Crimson, eyeballs suffused, temples full-
 fraught,

Just a snatch of the rapid speech you caught,
 And on he strode into the opposite dark,
 Till presently the harsh heel's turn, a spark
 I' the stone, and whirl of some loose embossed thong

That crashed against the angle aye so long
 After the last, punctual to an amount Of mailed great paces you could not but count,—

Prepared you for the pacing back again.
 And by the snatches you might ascertain
 That, Friedrich's Prefecture surmounted, left
 By this alone in Italy, they cleft

Asunder, crushed together, at command
Of none, were free to break up Hildebrand,
Rebuild, he and Sordello, Charlemagne—
But garnished, Strength with Knowledge,
“if we deign

“Accept that compromise and stoop to give “Rome law, the Cæsar’s Representative.”
Enough, that the illimitable flood
Of triumphs after triumphs, understood
In its faint reflux (you shall hear) sufficed
Young Ecelin for appanage, enticed
Him on till, these long quiet in their graves,
He found ’twas looked for that a whole life’s braves

Should somehow be made good; so, weak and worn,

Must stagger up at Milan, one grey morn
Of the to-come, and fight his latest fight.
But, Salinguerra’s prophecy at height—
He voluble with a raised arm and stiff,
A blaring voice, a blazing eye, as if He had our very Italy to keep
Or cast away, or gather in a heap
To garrison the better—ay, his word
Was, “run the cucumber into a gourd,
“Drive Trent upon Apulia”—at their pitch
Who spied the continents and islands which Grew mulberry leaves and sickles, in the map—

(Strange that three such confessions so should hap

To Palma, Dante spoke with in the clear
Amorous silence of the swooning-sphere,— Cunizza, as he called her! Never ask
Of Palma more! She sat, knowing her task
Was done, the labour of it,—for, success
Concerned not Palma, passion’s votaress.)
Triumph at height, and thus Sordello crowned—

Above the passage suddenly a sound
Stops speech, stops walk: back shrinks
Taurello, bids

With large involuntary asking lids,
Palma interpret. “’Tis his own foot-stamp—“Your hand! His summons! Nay, this idle damp

“Befits not!” Out they two reeled dizzily.
“Visconti’s strong at Milan,” resumed he,

In the old, somewhat insignificant way—
(Was Palma wont, years afterward, to say)
As though the spirit’s flight, sustained thus far,
Dropped at that very instant.

Gone they are—

Palma, Taurello; Eglamor anon,
Ecelin,—only Naddo’s never gone!
—Labours, this moonrise, what the Master
meant:

“Is Squarcialupo speckled?—purulent,
“I’d say, but when was Providence put out?
“He carries somehow handily about
“His spite nor fouls himself!” Goito’s vines Stand like a cheat detected—stark rough lines,

The moon breaks through, a grey mean scale against

The vault where, this eve’s Maiden, thou remain’st

Like some fresh martyr, eyes fixed—who can tell?

As Heaven, now all’s at end, did not so well,
Spite of the faith and victory, to leave
Its virgin quite to death in the lone eve.
While the persisting hermit-bee . . . ha! wait
No longer: these in compass, forward fate!

BOOK THE SIXTH.

THE thought of Eglamor’s least like a
thought,
And yet a false one, was, “Man shrinks to
nought

“If matched with symbols of immensity;
“Must quail, forsooth, before a quiet sky
“Or sea, too little for their quietude:”
And, truly, somewhat in Sordello’s mood
Confirmed its speciousness, while eve slow sank

Down the near terrace to the farther bank,
And only one spot left from out the night
Glimmered upon the river opposite—
A breadth of watery heaven like a bay,
A sky-like space of water, ray for ray,
And star for star, one richness where they
mixed

As this and that wing of an angel, fixed,

Tumultuary splendours folded in
 To die. Nor turned he till Ferrara's din (Say, the monotonous speech from a man's lip
 Who lets some first and eager purpose slip
 In a new fancy's birth—the speech keeps on Though elsewhere its informing soul be gone)
 —Aroused him, surely offered succour. Fate
 Paused with this eve; ere she precipitate Herself,—best put off new strange thoughts
 awhile,

That voice, those large hands, that portentous
 smile,—

What help to pierce the future as the past
 Lay in the plaining city?

And at last
 The main discovery and prime concern,
 All that just now imported him to learn,
 Truth's self, like yonder slow moon to complete

Heaven, rose again, and, naked at his feet,
 Lighted his old life's every shift and change,
 Effort with counter-effort; nor the range
 Of each looked wrong except wherein it checked,

Some other—which of these could he suspect,
 Prying into them by the sudden blaze?

The real way seemed made up of all the ways—
 Mood after mood of the one mind in him;
 Tokens of the existence, bright or dim,
 Of a transcendent all-embracing sense
 Demanding only outward influence,
 A soul, in Palma's phrase, above his soul,
 Power to uplift his power,—such moon's control

Over such sea-depths,—and their mass had swept

Onward from the beginning and still kept
 Its course: but years and years the sky above
 Held none, and so, untasked of any love,
 His sensitiveness idled, now amot,
 Alive now, and, to sullenness or sport
 Given wholly up, disposed itself anew
 At every passing instigation, grew
 And dwindled at caprice, in foam-showers
 spilt,

Wedge-like insisting, quivered now a gilt
 Shield in the sunshine, now a blinding race
 Of whitest ripples o'er the reef—found place

For much display; not gathered up and,
 hurled

Right from its heart, encompassing the world.
 So had Sordello been, by consequence,
 Without a function: others made pretence
 To strength not half his own, yet had some core

Within, submitted to some moon, before Them still, superior still whate'er their force,—

Were able therefore to fulfil a course,
 Nor missed life's crown, authentic attribute.

To each who lives must be a certain fruit
 Of having lived in his degree,—a stage,
 Earlier or later in men's pilgrimage,
 To stop at; and to this the spirits tend
 Who, still discovering beauty without end,
 Amass the scintillations, make one star
 —Something unlike them, self-sustained, afar,—

And meanwhile nurse the dream of being blest
 By winning it to notice and invest

Their souls with alien glory, some one day
 Whene'er the nucleus, gathering shape away,
 Round to the perfect circle—soon or late,
 According as themselves are formed to wait;
 Whether mere human beauty will suffice

The yellow hair and the luxurious eyes,
 Or human intellect seem best, or each
 Combine in some ideal form past reach
 On earth, or else some shade of these, some
 aim,

Some love, hate even, take their place, the same,

So to be served—all this they do not lose,
 Waiting for death to live, nor idly choose
 What must be Hell—a progress thus pursued
 Through all existence, still above the food
 That's offered them, still fain to reach beyond
 The widened range, in virtue of their bond
 Of sovereignty. Not that a Palma's Love,
 A Salinguerra's Hate, would equal prove
 To swaying all Sordello: but why doubt
 Some love meet for such strength, some moon without

Would match his sea?—or fear, Good manifest,

Only the Best breaks faith?—Ah but the Best

Somehow eludes us ever, still might be
And is not ! Crave we gems ? No penury
Of their material round us ! Pliant earth
And plastic flame—what balks the mage his birth

—Jacinth in balls or lodestone by the block ?
Flinders enrich the strand, veins swell the
rock ;

Nought more ! Seek creatures ? Life's i'
the tempest, thought
Clothes the keen hill-top, mid-day woods are fraught

With fervours : human forms are well enough !
But we had hoped, encouraged by the stuff
Profuse at nature's pleasure, men beyond
These actual men !—and thus are over-fond
In arguing, from Good—the Best, from force
Divided—force combined, an ocean's course
From this our sea whose mere intestine pants
Might seem at times sufficient to our wants.

External power ! If none be adequate,
And he stand forth ordained (a prouder fate)
Himself a law to his own sphere ? "Remove "All incompleteness !" for that law, that love ?
Nay, if all other laws be feints,—truth veiled
Helpfully to weak vision that had failed
To grasp aught but its special want,—for lure,
Embodied ? Stronger vision could endure
The unbidden want : no part—the whole of
truth !

The People were himself ; nor, by the ruti
At their condition, was he less impelled
To alter the discrepancy beheld,
Than if, from the sound whole, a sickly part Subtracted were transformed, decked out with art,

Then palmed on him as alien woe—the Guelf
To succour, proud that he forsook himself.
All is himself ; all service, therefore, rates
Alike, nor serving one part, immolates
The rest : but all in time ! "That lance of
yours

"Makes havoc soon with Malek and his Moors,

"That buckler's lined with many a giant's beard

"Ere long, our champion, be the lance up-
reared,

"The buckler wielded handsomely as now !
"But view your escort, bear in mind your vow,

"Count the pale tracts of sand to pass ere
that,

"And, if you hope we struggle through the flat,

"Put lance and buckler by ! Next half-month lacks

"Mere sturdy exercise of mace and axe

"To cleave this dismal brake of prickly-pear

"Which bristling holds Cydippe by the hair,

"Lames barefoot Agathon : this felled, we'll try

"The picturesque achievements by and by—
"Next life !"

Ay, rally, mock, O People, urge Your claims !—for thus he ventured, to the verge,

Push a vain mummerly which perchance distrust

Of his fast-slipping resolution thrust
Likewise : accordingly the Crowd—(as yet
He had unconsciously contrived forget
I' the whole, to dwell o' the points . . . one might assuage

The signal horrors easier than engage
With a dim vulgar vast unobvious grief
Not to be fancied off, nor gained relief
In brilliant fits, cured by a happy quirk,
But by dim vulgar vast unobvious work
To correspond . . .) this Crowd then, forth they stood.

"And now content thy stronger vision, brood

"On thy bare want ; uncovered, turf by turf,

"Study the corpse-face thro' the taint-worms' scurf !"

Down sank the People's Then ; uprose their Now.

These sad ones render service to ! And how Piteously little must that service prove —Had surely proved in any case ! for, move
Each other obstacle away, let youth
Become aware it had surprised a truth

'Twere service to impart—can truth be seized,
Settled forthwith, and, of the captive eased,
Its captor find fresh prey, since this alit
So happily, no guesture luring it,

The earnest of a flock to follow? Vain,
Most vain! a life to spend ere this he chain
To the poor crowd's complacence: ere the crowd

Pronounce it captured, he descries a cloud
Its kin of twice the plume; which he, in turn,
If he shall live as many lives, may learn How to secure: not else. Then Mantua called

Back to his mind how certain bards were thrall'd

—Buds blasted, but of breath more like perfume

Than Naddo's staring nosegay's carrion
bloom;

Some insane rose that burnt heart out in sweets,

A spendthrift in the spring, no summer greets;
Some Dularete, drunk with truths and wine,
Grown bestial, dreaming how become divine.
Yet to surmount this obstacle, commence
With the commencement, merits crowning!
Hence

Must truth be casual truth, elicited
In sparks so mean, at intervals dispread
So rarely, that 'tis like at no one time
Of the world's story has not truth, the prime Of truth, the very truth which, loosed, had hurled

The world's course right, been really in the
world

—Content the while with some mean spark by dint

Of some chance-blow, the solitary hint
Of buried fire, which, rip earth's breast, would stream

Sky-ward!

Sordello's miserable gleam

Was looked for at the moment: he would dash
This badge, and all it brought, to earth,— abash

Taurello thus, perhaps persuade him wrest
The Kaiser from his purpose,—would attest
His own belief, in any case. Before

He dashes it however, think once more!
For, were that little, truly service? "Ay,

"I' the end, no doubt; but meantime?
Plain you spy

VOL. I.

"Its ultimate effect, but many flaws

"Of vision blur each intervening cause.

"Were the day's fraction clear as the life's sum

"Of service, Now as filled as teems To-come

"With evidence of good—nor too minute

"A share to vie with evil! No dispute,

"'Twere fittest maintain the Guelfs in rule:

"That makes your life's work: but you have to school

"Your day's work on these natures circumstanced

"Thus variously, which yet, as each advanced

"Or might impede the Guelf rule, must be moved

"Now, for the Then's sake,—hating what you loved,

"Loving old hatreds! Nor if one man bore

"Brand upon temples while his fellow wore

"The aureole, would it task you to decide:

"But, portioned duly out, the future vied

"Never with the unparcelled present! Smite

"Or spare so much on warrant all so slight?

"The present's complete sympathies to break,

"Aversions bear with, for a future's sake

"So feeble? Tito ruined through one speck,

"The Legate saved by his sole lightish fleck?

"This were work, true, but work performed at cost

"Of other work; aught gained here, elsewhere lost.

"For a new segment spoil an orb half-done?

"Rise with the People one step, and sink—
one?

"Were it but one step, less than the whole face

"Of things, your novel duty bids erase!

"Harms to abolish! What, the prophet saith,

"The minstrel singeth vainly then? Old
faith,

"Old courage, only born because of harms,

"Were not, from highest to the lowest,
charms?

"Flame may persist; but is not glare as staunch?

"Where the salt marshes stagnate, crystals
branch;

- "Blood dries to crimson; Evil's beautified
 "In every shape. Thrust Beauty then aside
 "And banish Evil! Wherefore? After all,
 "Is Evil a result less natural

 strife
 "With tree and flower,—the hideous animal
 life,
 "(Of which who seeks shall find a grinning

 Now!"
 His time of action for, against, or with
 Our world (I labour to extract the pith
 Of this his problem) grew, that even-tide,
 Gigantic with its power of joy, beside
 The world's eternity of impotence
 To profit though at his whole joy's expense.

 "But long ere then Sordello will have slept
 "Away; you teach him at Goito's crypt,
 "There's a blank issue to that fiery thrill.
 "Stirring, the few cope with the many, still:
 "So much of sand as, quiet, makes a mass

 "Have those great hands indeed hewn out a home,
 "And set me there to live? Oh life, life-
 breath,
 "Life-blood,—ere sleep, come travail, life
 ere death!
 "This life stream on my soul, direct, oblique,
 "But always streaming! Hindrances? They pique:
 "Helps? such . . . but why repeat, my soul o'ertops
 "Each height, then every depth profoundlier drops?
 "Enough that I can live, and would live!
 Wait
 "For some transcendent life reserved by Fate
 "To follow this? Oh, never! Fate, I trust
 "The same, my soul to; for, as who flings dust,
 "Perchance (so facile was the deed) she chequed
 "The void with these materials to affect

'My soul diversely : these consigned anew
 'To nought by death, what marvel if she threw
 'A second and superber spectacle
 'Before me? What may serve for sun, what
 still
 'Wander a moon above me? What else wind
 'About me like the pleasures left behind,
 'And how shall some new flesh that is not flesh
 'Cling to me? What's new laughter?
 Soothes the fresh
 'Sleep like sleep? Fate's exhaustless for my sake
 'In brave resource : but whether bids she slake
 'My thirst at this first rivulet, or count
 'No draught worth lip save from some rocky fount
 'Above i' the clouds, while here she's provident
 'Of pure loquacious pearl, the soft tree-tent
 'Guards, with its face of reate and sedge, nor fail
 'The silver globules and gold-sparkling grail
 'At bottom? Oh, 'twere too absurd to slight
 'For the hereafter the to-day's delight!
 'Quench thirst at this, then seek next wellspring : wear
 'Home-lilies ere strange lotus in my hair!
 'Here is the Crowd, whom I with freest heart
 'Offer to serve, contented for my part
 'To give life up in service,—only grant
 'That I do serve ; if otherwise, why want
 'Aught further of me? If men cannot choose
 'But set aside life, why should I refuse
 'The gift? I take it—I, for one, engage
 'Never to falter through my pilgrimage—
 'Nor end it howling that the stock or stone
 'Were enviable, truly : I, for one,
 'Will praise the world, you style mere anteroom
 'To palace—be it so ! shall I assume
 '—My foot the courtly gait, my tongue the trope,
 'My mouth the smirk, before the doors fly open
 'One moment? What? with guarders row on row,
 'Gay swarms of varletry that come and go,

'Pages to dice with, waiting-girls unlace
 'The plackets¹ of, pert claimants help dis-
 place,
 'Heart-heavy suitors get a rank for,—laugh
 'At yon sleek parasite, break his own staff
 'Cross Beetle-brows the Usher's shoulder,
 —why
 'Admitted to the presence by and by,
 'Should thought of having lost these make me grievé
 'Among new joys I reach, for joys I leave?
 'Cool citrine-crystals, fierce pyropus-stone,²
 'Are floor-work there ! But do I let alone
 'That black-eyed peasant in the vestibule
 'Once and for ever?—Floor-work? No such fool !
 'Rather, were heaven to forestall earth, I'd say
 'I, is it, must be blest? Then, my own way
 'Bless me ! Give firmer arm and fleetier foot,
 'I'll thank you : but to no mad wings trans-
 mute
 'These limbs of mine—our greensward was so soft !
 'Nor camp I on the thunder-cloud aloft :
 'We feel the bliss distinctlier, having thus
 'Engines subservient, not mixed up with us.
 'Better move palpably through heaven : nor, freed
 'Of flesh, forsooth, from space to space proceed
 'Mid flying synods of worlds ! No : in heaven's marge
 'Show Titan still, recumbent o'er his targe
 'Solid with stars—the Centaur at his game,
 'Made tremulously out in hoary flame !
 'Life ! Yet the very cup whose extreme dull
 'Dregs, even, I would quaff, was dashed,
 at full,
 'Aside so oft ; the death I fly, revealed
 'So oft a better life this life concealed,
 'And which sage, champion, martyr, through each path
 'Have hunted fearlessly—the horrid bath,
 'The crippling-irons and the fiery chair.
 'Twas well for them ; let me become aware

Under-petticoats.

"As they, and I relinquish life, too! Let
 "What masters life disclose itself! Forget "Vain ordinances, I have one appeal—
 "I feel, am what I feel, know what I feel;
 "So much is truth to me. What Is, then?
 Since
 "One object, viewed diversely, may evince
 "Beauty and ugliness—this way attract,
 "That way repel,—why gloze upon the fact?
 "Why must a single of the sides be right?
 "What bids choosethis and leave the opposite?
 "Where's abstract Right for me?—in youth endued
 "With Right still present, still to be pursued,
 "Thro' all the interchange of circles, rife
 "Each with its proper law and mode of life,
 "Each to be dwelt at ease in: where, to sway
 "Absolute with the Kaiser, or obey
 "Implicit with his serf of fluttering heart,
 "Or, like a sudden thought of God's, to start "Up, Brutus in the presence, then go shout
 "That some should pick the unstrung jewels
 out—
 "Each, well!"

And, as in moments when the past
 Gave partially enfranchisement, he cast
 Himself quite through mere secondary states
 Of his soul's essence, little loves and hates,
 Into the mid deep yearnings overlaid
 By these; as who should pierce hill, plain,
 grove, glade,
 And on into the very nucleus probe
 That first determined there exist a globe.
 As that were easiest, half the globe dissolved,
 So seemed Sordello's closing-truth evolved
 By his flesh-half's break-up; the sudden swell
 Of his expanding soul showed Ill and Well,
 Sorrow and Joy, Beauty and Ugliness,
 Virtue and Vice, the Larger and the Less,
 All qualities, in fine, recorded here,
 Might be but modes of Time and this one
 sphere,
 Urgent on these, but not of force to bind
 Eternity, as Time—as Matter—Mind,
 If Mind, Eternity, should choose assert
 Their attributes within a Life: thus girt

With circumstance, next change beholds them cinct
 Quite otherwise—with Good and Ill distinct,
 Joys, sorrows, tending to a like result—
 Contrived to render easy, difficult,
 This or the other course of . . . what new bond
 In place of flesh may stop their flight beyond Its new sphere, as that course does harm or
 good
 To its arrangements. Once this understood,
 As suddenly he felt himself alone,
 Quite out of Time and this world: all was known.
 What made the secret of his past despair?
 —Most imminent when he seemed most aware
 Of his own self-sufficiency: made mad
 By craving to expand the power he had,
 And not new power to be expanded?—just
 This made it; Soul on Matter being thrust,
 Joy comes when so much Soul is wreaked in
 Time
 On Matter: let the Soul's attempt sublime
 Matter beyond the scheme and so prevent
 By more or less that deed's accomplishment,
 And Sorrow follows: Sorrow how avoid?
 Let the employer match the thing employed,
 Fit to the finite his infinity,
 And thus proceed for ever, in degree
 Changed but in kind the same, still limited
 To the appointed circumstance and dead
 To all beyond. A sphere is but a sphere;
 Small, Great, are merely terms we bandy
 here;
 Since to the spirit's absoluteness all
 Are like. Now, of the present sphere we call Life, are conditions; take but this among Many; the body was to be so long
 Youthful, no longer: but, since no control
 Tied to that body's purposes his soul,
 She chose to understand the body's trade
 More than the body's self—had fain conveyed
 Her boundless to the body's bounded lot.
 Hence, the soul permanent, the body not,— Scarcely its minute for enjoying here,—
 The soul must needs instruct her weak
 compeer,

Run o'er its capabilities and wring
 A joy thence, she held worth experiencing :
 Which, far from half discovered even,—lo,
 The minute gone, the body's power let go
 Apportioned to that joy's acquirement !
 Broke
 Morning o'er earth, he yearned for all it woke—
 From the volcano's vapour-flag, winds hoist
 Black o'er the spread of sea,—down to the moist
 Dale's silken barley-spikes sullied with rain,
 Swayed earthwards, heavily to rise again—
 The Small, a sphere as perfect as the Great
 To the soul's absoluteness. Meditate
 Too long on such a morning's cluster-chord
 And the whole music it was framed afford,—
 The chord's might half discovered, what should pluck
 One string, his finger, was found palsy-struck.
 And then no marvel if the spirit, shown
 A saddest sight—the body lost alone
 Through her officious proffered help, deprived
 Of this and that enjoyment Fate contrived,— Virtue, Good, Beauty, each allowed slip
 hence,—
 Vain-gloriously were fain, for recompense,
 To stem the ruin even yet, protract
 The body's term, supply the power it lacked
 From her infinity, compel it learn
 These qualities were only Time's concern,
 And body may, with spirit helping, barred—Advance the same, vanquished — obtain reward,
 Reap joy where sorrow was intended grow,
 Of Wrong make Right, and turn Ill Good
 below.
 And the result is, the poor body soon
 Sinks under what was meant a wondrous boon,
 Leaving its bright accomplice all aghast.
 So much was plain then, proper in the
 past ;
 To be complete for, satisfy the whole
 Series of spheres—Eternity, his soul
 Needs must exceed, prove incomplete for, each Single sphere—Time. But does our knowledge reach
 No farther ? Is the cloud of hindrance broke
 But by the failing of the fleshly yoke,
 Its loves and hates, as now when death lets soar
 Sordello, self-sufficient as before,
 Though during the mere space that shall elapse
 'Twixt his enthrallment in new bonds perhaps?
 Must life be ever just escaped, which should Have been enjoyed ?—nay, might have been and would,
 Each purpose ordered right—the soul's no
 whit
 Beyond the body's purpose under it.
 Like yonder breadth of watery heaven, a bay,
 And that sky-space of water, ray for ray
 And star for star, one richness where they
 mixed
 As this and that wing of an angel, fixed,
 Tumultuary splendours folded in
 To die—would soul, proportioned thus, begin
 Exciting discontent, or surelier quell
 The body if, aspiring, it rebel ?
 But how so order life ? Still brutalize
 The soul, the sad world's way, with muffled
 eyes
 To all that was before, all that shall be
 After this sphere—all and each quality
 Save some sole and immutable Great, Good
 And Deauteous whither fate has loosed its hood
 To follow ? Never may some soul see All
 The Great Before and After, and the Small
 Now, yet be saved by this the simplest lore,
 And take the single course prescribed before,
 As the king-bird with ages on his plumes
 Travels to die in his ancestral glooms ?
 But where descry the Love that shall select
 That course ? Here is a soul whom, to affect, Nature has plied with all her means, from trees
 And flowers e'en to the Multitude !—and
 these,
 Decides he save or no ? One word to end !
 Ah my Sordello, I this once befriend
 And speak for you. Of a Power above you
 still
 Which, utterly incomprehensible,

Is out of rivalry, which thus you can
Love, tho' unloving all conceived by man—
What need ! And of—none the minutest duct

To that out-nature, nought that would instruct

And so let rivalry begin to live—
But of a Power its representative
Who, being for authority the same,
Communication different, should claim

A course, the first chose but this last revealed—

This Human clear, as that Divine concealed—
What utter need !

What has Sordello found ?

Or can his spirit go the mighty round,
End where poor Eglamor begun ? So, says
Old fable, the two eagles went two ways
About the world : where, in the midst, they met,

Though on a shifting waste of sand, men set Jove's temple. Quick, what has Sordello
found ?

For they approach—approach—that foot's rebound

Palma ? No, Salinguerra though in mail ;
They mount, have reached the threshold,
dash the veil

Aside—and you divine who sat there dead,
Under his foot the badge : still, Palma said,
A triumph lingering in the wide eyes,
Wider than some spent swimmer's if he spies

Help from above in his extreme despair,
And, head far back on shoulder thrust, turns
there

With short quick passionate cry : as Palma
pressed

In one great kiss, her lips upon his breast,
It beat.

By this, the hermit-bee has stopped
His day's toil at Goito : the new-cropped
Dead vine-leaf answers, now 'tis eve, he bit, Twirled so, and filed all day : the mansion's
fit,

God counselled for. As easy guess the word
That passed betwixt them, and become the third

To the soft small unfrighted bee, as tax
Him with one fault—so, no remembrance racks
Of the stone maidens and the font of stone
He, creeping through the crevice, leaves
alone.

Alas, my friend, alas Sordello, whom
Anon they laid within that old font-tomb,
And, yet again, alas !

And now is't worth

Our while bring back to mind, much less set
forth

How Salinguerra extricates himself
Without Sordello ? Ghibellin and Guelf
May fight their fiercest out ? If Richard sulked

In durance or the Marquis paid his mulct,
Who cares, Sordello gone ? The upshot, sure,
Was peace ; our chief made some frank overture

That prospered ; compliment fell thick and fast

On its disposer, and Taurello passed
With foe and friend for an outstripping soul,
Nine days at least. Then,—fairly reached the goal,—

He, by one effort, blotted the great hope
Out of his mind, nor further tried to cope
With Este, that mad evening's style, but sent Away the Legate and the League, content
No blame at least the brothers had incurred, —Dispatched a message to the Monk, he heard

Patiently first to last, scarce shivered at,
Then curled his limbs up on his wolfskin mat
And ne'er spoke more,—informed the Ferrarese

He but retained their rule so long as these Lingered in pupilage,—and last, no mode
Apparent else of keeping safe the road
From Germany direct to Lombardy .

For Friedrich,—none, that is, to guarantee
The faith and promptitude of who should next
Obtain Sofia's dowry,—sore perplexed—(Sofia being youngest of the tribe
Of daughters, Ecelin was wont to bribe
The envious magnates with—nor, since he sent

Henry of Egna this fair child, had Trent

Once failed the Kaiser's purposes—"we lost
 "Egna last year, and who takes Egna's post—
 "Opens the Lombard gate if Friedrich knock?")

Himself espoused the Lady of the Rock
 In pure necessity, and, so destroyed
 His slender last of chances, quite made void
 Old prophecy, and spite of all the schemes
 Overt and covert, youth's deeds, age's
 dreams,

Was sucked into Romano. And so hushed
 He up this evening's work that, when 'twas brushed

Somehow against by a blind chronicle
 Which, chronicling whatever woe befell
 Ferrara, noted this the obscure woe
 Of "Salinguerra's sole son Giacomo
 "Deceased, fatuous and doting, ere his sire,"
 The townsfolk rubbed their eyes, could but admire
 Which of Sofia's five was meant.

Of earth's dead hope were tardy to collapse,
 Obliterated not the beautiful
 Distinctive features at a crash: but dull
 And duller these, next year, as Guelfs withdrew

Each to his stronghold. Then (securely too
 Ecelin at Campese slept; close by,
 Who likes may see him in Solagna lie,
 With cushioned head and gloved hand to denote

The cavalier he was)—then his heart smote
 Young Ecelin at last; long since adult.
 And, save Vicenza's business, what result
 In blood and blaze? (So hard to intercept Sordello till his plain withdrawal!) Stepped Then its new lord on Lombardy. I' the nick
 Of time when Ecelin and Alberic
 Closed with Taurello, come precisely news
 That in Verona half the souls refuse
 Allegiance to the Marquis and the Count—
 Have cast them from a throne they bid him mount,

Their Podestà, thro' his ancestral worth.
 Ecelin flew there, and the town henceforth
 Was wholly his—Taurello sinking back
 From temporary station to a track

That suited. News received of this acquist, Friedrich did come to Lombardy: who missed

Taurello then? Another year: they took Vicenza, left the Marquis scarce a nook
 For refuge, and, when hundreds two or three Of Guelfs conspired to call themselves "The Free,"

Opposing Alberic,—vile Bassanese,—
 (Without Sordello!)—Ecelin at ease
 Slaughtered them so observably, that oft
 A little Salinguerra looked with soft
 Blue eyes up, asked his sire the proper age
 To get appointed his proud uncle's page.
 More years passed, and that sire had dwindled down

To a mere showy turbulent soldier, grown
 Better through age, his parts still in repute,
 Subtle—how else?—but hardly so astute
 As his contemporaneous friends professed;
 Undoubtedly a brawler: for the rest,
 Known by each neighbour, and allowed for, let
 Keep his incorrigible ways, nor fret
 Men who would miss their boyhood's bug-bear: "trap

"The ostrich, suffer our bald osprey flap
 "A battered pinion!"—was the word. In fine,

One flap too much and Venice's marine
 Was meddled with; no overlooking that!
 She captured him in his Ferrara, fat
 And florid at a banquet, more by fraud
 Than force, to speak the truth; there's slender laud

Ascribed you for assisting eighty years
 To pull his death on such a man; fate shears
 The life-cord prompt enough whose last fine thread

You fritter: so, presiding his board-head,
 The old smile, your assurance all went well
 With Friedrich (as if he were like to tell!)
 In rushed (a plan contrived before) our friends,
 Made some pretence at fighting, some amends
 For the shame done his eighty years—(apart
 The principle, none found it in his heart
 To be much angry with Taurello)—gained
 Their galleys with the prize, and what remained

But carry him to Venice for a show ?
 —Set him, as 'twere, down gently—free to go
 His gait, inspect our square, pretend observe
 The swallows soaring their eternal curve
 'Twixt Theodore and Mark, if citizens
 Gathered importunately, fives and tens,
 To point their children the Magnifico,
 All but a monarch once in firm-land, go
 His gait among them now—"it took, indeed,
 "Fully this Ecelin to supersede
 "That man," remarked theseniors. Singular !
 Sordello's inability to bar
 Rivals the stage, that evening, mainly brought About by his strange disbelief that aught
 Was ever to be done,—this thrust the Twain
 Under Taurello's tutelage,—whom, brain
 And heart and hand, he forthwith in one rod
 Indissolubly bound to baffle God
 Who loves the world—and thus allowed the thin

Grey wizened dwarfish devil Ecelin,
 And massy-muscled big-boned Alberic
 (Mere man, alas !) to put his problem quick
 To demonstration—prove wherever's will
 To do, there's plenty to be done, or ill
 Or good. Anointed, then, to rend and rip—Kings of the gag and flesh-hook, screw and whip,
 They plagued the world : a touch of Iildebrand

(So far from obsolete !) made Lombards band
 Together, cross their coats as for Christ's cause,
 And saving Milan win the world's applause.
 Ecelin perished : and I think grass grew
 Never so pleasant as in Valley Rù
 By San Zenon where Alberic in turn
 Saw his exasperated captors burn
 Seven children and their mother ; then, regaled
 So far, tied on to a wild horse, was trailed
 To death through raunce and bramble-bush.

I take
 God's part and testify that 'mid the brake
 Wild o'er his castle on the pleasant knoll,
 You hear its one tower left, a belfry, toll—
 The earthquake spared it last year, laying flat
 The modern church beneath,—no harm in
 that !

Chirrup the contumacious grasshopper,
 Rustles the lizard and the cushats chirre
 Above the ravage : there, at deep of day
 A week since, heard I the old Canon say
 He saw with his own eyes a barrow burst
 And Alberic's huge skeleton unheard
 Only five years ago. He added, "June's
 "The month for carding off our first cocoons
 "The silkworms fabricate"—a double news,
 Nor he nor I could tell the worthier. Choose !

And Naddo gone, all's gone ; not Eglamor !
 Believe, I knew the face I waited for,
 A guest my spirit of the golden courts !
 Oh strange to see how, despite ill-reports,
 Disuse, some wear of years, that face retained
 Its joyous look of love ! Suns waxed and waned,

And still my spirit held an upward flight,
 Spiral on spiral, gyres of life and light
 More and more gorgeous—ever that face there,
 The last admitted ! crossed, too, with some care
 As perfect triumph were not sure for all,
 But, on a few, enduring damp must fall,
 —A transient struggle, haply a painful sense
 Of the inferior nature's clinging—whence
 Slight starting tears easily wiped away,
 Fine jealousies soon stifled in the play
 Of irrepressible admiration—not
 Aspiring, all considered, to their lot
 Who ever, just as they prepare ascend
 Spiral on spiral, wish thee well, impend
 Thy frank delight at their exclusive track,
 That upturned fervid face and hair put back !

Is there no more to say ? He of the rhymes—

Many a tale, of this retreat betimes,
 Was born : Sordello die at once for men ?
 The Chroniclers of Mantua tired their pen
 Telling how Sordello Prince Visconti saved
 Mantua, and elsewhere notably behaved—
 Who thus, by fortune ordering events,
 Passed with posterity, to all intents,
 For just the god he never could become.
 As Knight, Bard, Gallant, men were never dumb

In praise of him : while what he should have
 been,
 Could be, and was not—the one step too mean

For him to take,—we suffer at this day
Because of: Ecelin had pushed away
Its chance ere Dante could arrive and take That step Sordello spurned, for the world's
sake:

He did much—but Sordello's chance was gone.

Thus, had Sordello dared that step alone,
Apollo had been compassed: 'twas a fit
He wished should go to him, not he to it —As one content to merely be supposed
Singing or fighting elsewhere, while he dozed
Really at home—one who was chiefly glad
To have achieved the few real deeds he had,
Because that way assured they were not worth Doing, so spared from doing them hence-
forth—

A tree that covets fruitage and yet tastes
Never itself, itself. Had he embraced Their cause then, men had plucked Hesperian fruit

And, praising that, just thrown him in to boot
All he was anxious to appear, but scarce
Solicitous to be. A sorry farce
Such life is, after all! Cannot I say
He lived for some one better thing? this
way.—

Lo, on a heathy brown and nameless hill
By sparkling Asolo, in mist and chill,
Morning just up, higher and higher runs
A child barefoot and rosy. See! the sun's
On the square castle's inner-court's low wall
Like the chine of some extinct animal

Half turned to earth and flowers; and through the haze

(Save where some slender patches of grey maize

Are to be overleaped) that boy has crossed
The whole hill-side of dew and powder-frost
Matting the balm and mountain camomile.

Up and up goes he, singing all the while
Some unintelligible words to beat
The lark, God's poet, swooning at his feet,
So worsted is he at "the few fine locks
"Stained like pale honey oozed from topmost rocks

"Sun-blached the livelong summer,"—all that's left

Of the Goito lay! And thus bereft,
Sleep and forget, Sordello! In effect
He sleeps, the feverish poet—I suspect
Not utterly companionless; but, friends,
Wake up! The ghost's gone, and the story ends

I'd fain hope, sweetly; seeing, peri or ghoul,
That spirits are conjectured fair or foul,
Evil or good, judicious authors think,
According as they vanish in a stink
Or in a perfume. Friends, be frank! ye snuff Civet, I warrant. Really? Like enough!
Merely the savour's rareness; any nose
May ravage with impunity a rose:
Rife a musk-pod and 'twill ache like yours!
I'd tell you that same pungency ensures
An after-gust, but that were overbold.
Who would has heard Sordello's story told.

PIPPA PASSES;

A DRAMA.

1841

[This drama is hinged on the chance appearance of Pippa, a poor child, at work all the year round (save one day) at the silk-mills at Asolo, in Northern Italy, at critical moments in the spiritual life-history of the leading characters in the play. Just when their emotions, passions, motives are swinging backwards and forwards Pippa passes by singing some refrain, and her voice determines the actions and fashions the destinies of men and women to whom she was unknown. It is a play of much simplicity, as well as rare charm and beauty.]

INTRODUCTION.

NEW YEAR'S DAY AT ASOLO IN THE TREVISAN.

SCENE.—A large mean airy chamber. A girl, PIPPA, from the Silk-mills; springing out of bed.

DAY!
Faster and more fast,
O'er night's brim, day boils at last

Boils, pure gold, o'er the cloud-cup's brim
Where spurting and suppressed it lay,
For not a froth-flake touched the rim
Of yonder gap in the solid gray
Of the eastern cloud, an hour away;
But forth one wavelet, then another, curled,
Till the whole sunrise, not to be suppressed,
Rose, reddened, and its seething breast
Flickered in bounds, grew gold, then overflowed the world.

Oh, Day, if I squander a wavelet of thee,
A mite of my twelve hours' treasure,
The least of thy gazes or glances,
(Be they grants thou art bound to or gifts above measure)
One of thy choices or one of thy chances, (Be they tasks God imposed thee or freaks at thy pleasure)
—My Day, if I squander such labour or leisure,
Then shame fall on Asolo, mischief on me!

Thy long blue solemn hours serenely flowing,
Whence earth, we feel, gets steady help and
good—

Thy fitful sunshine-minutes, coming, going,
As if earth turned from work in gamesome
mood—

All shall be mine ! But thou must treat me
not

As prosperous ones are treated, those who live
At hand here, and enjoy the higher lot,
In readiness to take what thou wilt give,
And free to let alone what thou refusest ;
For, Day, my holiday, if thou ill-usest
Me, who am only Pippa,—old-year's sorrow,
Cast off last night, will come again to-morrow :
Whereas, if thou prove gentle, I shall borrow Sufficient strength of thee for new-year's sorrow.

All other men and women that this earth
Belongs to, who all days alike possess,
Make general plenty cure particular dearth,
Get more joy one way, if another, less :
Thou art my single day, God lends to leaven
What were all earth else, with a feel of heaven,—

Sole light that helps me through the year, thy sun's !

Try now ! Take Asolo's Four Happiest
Ones—

And let thy morning rain on that superb
Great haughty Ottima ; can rain disturb
Her Sebald's homage ? All the while thy rain Beats fiercest on her shrub-house window-pane,

He will but press the closer, breathe more
warm

Against her cheek ; how should she mind the storm ?

And, morning past, if mid-day shed a gloom
O'er Jules and Phene,—what care bride and groom

Save for their dear selves ? 'Tis their marriage-day ;

And while they leave church and go home
their way,

Hand clasping hand, within each breast would be

Sunbeams and pleasant weather spite of thee.
Then, for another trial, obscure thy eve
With mist,—will Luigi and his mother grieve—

The lady and her child, unmatched, forsooth,

She in her age, as Luigi in his youth,
For true content ? The cheerful town, warm, close

And safe, the sooner that thou art morose, Receives them. And yet once again, outbreak

In storm at night on Monsignor, they make Such stir about,—whom they expect from
Rome

To visit Asolo, his brothers' home,
And say here masses proper to release
A soul from pain,—what storm dares hurt his peace ?

Calm would he pray, with his own thoughts to ward

Thy thunder off, nor want the angels' guard.
But Pippa—just one such mischance would spoil

Her day that lightens the next twelvemonth's toil

At wearisome silk-winding, coil on coil !

And here I let time slip for nought !

Aha, you foolhardy sunbeam, caught
With a single splash from my ewer !
You that would taock the best pursuer,
Was my basin over-deep ?

One splash of water ruins you asleep,
And up, up, fleet your brilliant bits
Wheeling and counterwheeling,
Reeling, broken beyond healing :
Now grow together on the ceiling !
That will task your wits.

Whoever it was quenched fire first, hoped to see

Morsel after morsel flee

As merrily, as giddily . . .

Meantime, what lights my sunbeam on,
Where settles by degrees the radiant cripple ?
Oh, is it surely blown, my martagon ?¹
New-blown and ruddy as St. Agnes' nipple, Plump as the flesh-bunch on some Turk bird's poll !

Be sure if corals, branching 'neath the ripple
Of ocean, bud there,—fairies watch unroll

Such turban-flowers ; I say, such lamps disperse
Thick red flame through that dusk green universe !

I am queen of thee, floweret !
And each fleshy blossom Preserve I not—(safer
Than leaves that embower it,
Or shells that embosom)
—From weevil and chafer ?
Laugh through my pane then ; solicit the bee ;
Gibe him, be sure ; and, in midst of thy glee,
Love thy queen, worship me !

—Worship whom else ? For am I not, this
day,
Whate'er I please ? What shall I please to-
day ?
My morn, noon, eve and night—how spend my day ?

To-morrow I must be Pippa who winds silk,
The whole year round, to earn just bread and milk :

But, this one day, I have leave to go,
And play out my fancy's fullest games ;
I may fancy all day—and it shall be so—
That I taste of the pleasures, am called by the names

Of the Happiest Four in our Asolo !

See ! Up the hill-side yonder, through the
morning,

Some one shall love me, as the world calls love :
I am no less than Ottima, take warning !

The gardens, and the great stone house above,
And other house for shrubs, all glass in front,
Are mine ; where Sebald steals, as he is wont,
To court me, while old Luca yet reposes :
And therefore, till the shrub-house door uncloses,

I . . . what now ?—give abundant cause for prate

About me—Ottima, I mean—of late,
Too bold, too confident she'll still face down
The spitefullest of talkers in our town.
How we talk in the little town below !

But love, love, love—there's better love,
I know !

This foolish love was only day's first offer ;
I choose my next love to defy the scoffer :
For do not our Bride and Bridegroom sally
Out of Possagno church at noon ?
Their house looks over Orcana valley :
Why should not I be the bride as soon
As Ottima ? For I saw, beside,
Arrive last night that little bride—
Saw, if you call it seeing her, one flash
Of the pale snow-pure cheek and black bright
tresses,

Blacker than all except the black eyelash ;
I wonder she contrives those lids no dresses !
—So strict was she, the veil

Should cover close her pale Pure cheeks—a bride to look at and scarce
touch,

Scarce touch, remember, Jules ! For are not such

Used to be tended, flower-like, every feature,
As if one's breath would fray the lily of a creature ?

A soft and easy life these ladies lead :
Whiteness in us were wonderful indeed.

Oh, save that brow its virgin dimness,
Keep that foot its lady primness,
Let those ankles never swerve
From their exquisite reserve,
Yet have to trip along the streets like me,
All but naked to the knee !

How will she ever grant her Jules a bliss
So startling as her real first infant kiss ?
Oh, no—not envy, this !

—Not envy, sure !—for if you gave me
Leave to take or to refuse,
In earnest, do you think I'd choose
That sort of new love to enslave me ?
Mine should have lapped me round from the beginning ;

As little fear of losing it as winning :
Lovers grow cold, men learn to hate their wives,

And only parents' love can last our lives.
At eve the Son and Mother, gentle pair,
Commune inside our turret : what prevents
My being Luigi ? While that mossy lair
Of lizards through the winter-time is stirred

With each to each imparting sweet intents
For this new-year, as brooding bird to bird—
(For I observe of late, the evening walk
Of Luigi and his mother, always ends
Inside our ruined turret, where they talk, Calmer than lovers, yet more kind than
friends)

—Let me be cared about, kept out of harm,
And schemed for, safe in love as with a charm;
Let me be Luigi! If I only knew
What was my mother's face—my father, too!
Nay, if you come to that, best love of all
Is God's; then why not have God's love befall

Myself as, in the palace by the Dome, Monsignor?—who to-night will bless the
home
Of his dead brother; and God bless in turn
That heart which beats, those eyes which mildly burn
With love for all men! I, to-night at least,
Would be that holy and beloved priest.

Now wait!—even I already seem to share
In God's love: what does New-year's hymn declare?
What other meaning do these verses bear?

*All service ranks the same with God:
If now, as formerly he trod
Paradise, his presence fills
Our earth, each only as God wills
Can work—God's puppets, best and worst,
Are we; there is no last nor first.*

*Say not "a small event!" Why "small"?
Costs it more pain that this, ye call
A "great event," should come to pass,
Than that? Untwine me from the mass
Of deeds which make up life, one deed
Power shall fall short in or exceed!*

And more of it, and more of it!—oh yes—
I will pass each, and see their happiness,
And envy none—being just as great, no doubt,
Useful to men, and dear to God, as they!
A pretty thing to care about
So mightily, this single holiday!
But let the sun shine! Wherefore repine?
—With thee to lead me, O Day of mine,

Down the grass path grey with dew,
Under the pine-wood, blind with boughs,
Where the swallow never flew
Nor yet cicala dared carouse—
No, dared carouse! [She enters the street.]

I.—MORNING.

SCENE.—Up the Hill-side, inside the Shrub-house. LUCA's wife, OTTIMA, and her paramour, the German SEBALD.

Sebald [sings].

*Let the watching lids wink!
Day's a-blaze with eyes, think!
Deep into the night, drink!*

Ottima. Night? Such may be your Rhineland nights perhaps;
But this blood-red beam through the shutter's chink

—We call such light, the morning: let us see!
Mind how you grope your way, though!
How these tall

Naked geraniums straggle! Push the lattice
Behind that frame!—Nay, do I bid you?—
Sebald,

It shakes the dust down on me! Why, of course

The slide-net catches. Well, are you content,
Or must I find you something else to spoil?
Kiss and be friends, my Sebald! Is't full morning?

Oh, don't speak then!

Sebald. Ay, thus it used to be.
Ever your house was, I remember, shut
Till mid-day; I observed that, as I strolled
On mornings through the vale here; country girls

Were noisy, washing garments in the brook,
Hinds drove the slow white oxen up the hills:
But no, your house was mute, would ope no
eye.

And wisely: you were plotting one thing there,
Nature, another outside. I looked up—
Rough white wood shutters, rusty iron bars.
Silent as death, blind in a flood of light.

Oh, I remember!—and the peasants laughed
And said, "The old man sleeps with the young wife."

This house was his, this chair, this window
—his.

Ottima. Ah, the clear morning! I can see St. Mark's;

That black streak is the belfry. Stop: Vicenza Should lie . . . there's Padua, plain enough, that blue!

Look o'er my shoulder, follow my finger!

Sebald. Morning?

It seems to me a night with a sun added.

Where's dew, where's freshness? That bruised plant, I bruised

In getting through the lattice yestereve, Droops as it did. See, here's my elbow's mark

I' the dust o' the sill.

Ottima. Oh, shut the lattice, pray!

Sebald. Let me lean out. I cannot scent blood here,

Foul as the morn may be.

There, shut the world out!

How do you feel now, Ottima? There, curse
The world and all outside! Let us throw off
This mask: how do you bear yourself? Let's out

With all of it.

Ottima. Best never speak of it.

Sebald. Best speak again and yet again of it,
Till words cease to be more than words.

"His blood,"

For instance—let those two words mean

"His blood"

And nothing more. Notice, I'll say them now,
"His blood."

Ottima. Assuredly if I repented

The deed—

Sebald. Repent? Who should repent, or why?

What puts that in your head? Did I once say
That I repented?

Ottima. No, I said the deed . . .

Sebald. "The deed" and "the event"— just now it was

"Our passion's fruit"—the devil take such cant!

Say, once and always, Luca was a wittol,
I am his cut-throat, you are . . .

Ottima. Here's the wine;

I brought it when we left the house above,
And glasses too—wine of both sorts. Black?

White then?

Sebald. But am not I his cut-throat?

What are you?

Ottima. There trudges on his business from the Duomo

Benet the Capuchin, with his brown hood
And bare feet; always in one place at church,

Close under the stone wall by the south entry,
I used to take him for a brown cold piece

Of the wall's self, as out of it he rose
To let me pass—at first, I say, I used:

Now, so has that dumb figure fastened on me,
I rather should account the plastered wall

A piece of him, so chilly does it strike.
This, Sebald?

Sebald. No, the white wine—the white wine!

Well, Ottima, I promised no new year
Should rise on us the ancient shameful way;

Nor does it rise. Pour on! To your black
eyes!

Do you remember last damned New Year's
day?

Ottima. You brought those foreign prints.

We looked at them

Over the wine and fruit. I had to scheme
To get him from the fire. Nothing but saying

His own set wants the proof-mark, roused him up

To hunt them out.

Sebald. 'Faith, he is not alive

To fondle you before my face.

Ottima. Do you

Fondle me then! Who means to take your
life

For that, my Sebald?

Sebald. Hark you, Ottima!

One thing to guard against. We'll not make much

One of the other—that is, not make more
Parade of warmth, childish officious coil,

Than yesterday: as if, sweet, I supposed
Proof upon proof were needed now, now first,

To show I love you—yes, still love you—love you

In spite of Luca and what's come to him
—Sure sign we had him ever in our thoughts,
White sneering old reproachful face and all !
We'll even quarrel, love, at times, as if
We still could lose each other, were not tied
By this : conceive you ?

Ottima. Love !

Sebald. Not tied so sure.

Because though I was wrought upon, have struck

His insolence back into him—am I
So surely yours?—therefore forever yours ?

Ottima. Love, to be wise, (one counsel pays another)

Should we have—months ago, when first we
loved,

For instance that May morning we two stole
Under the green ascent of sycamores—

If we had come upon a thing like that Suddenly . . .

Sebald. “A thing”—there again—
“a thing !”

Ottima. Then, Venus' body, had we come upon

My husband Luca Gaddi's murdered corpse
Within there, at his couch-foot, covered close—

Would you have pored upon it ? Why persist
In poring now upon it ? For 'tis here

As much as there in the deserted house :

You cannot rid your eyes of it. For me,
Now he is dead I hate him worse : I hate . . .

Dare you stay here ? I would go back and hold

His two dead hands, and say, “I hate you
worse,

“Luca, than . . .”

Sebald. Off, off—take your hands off mine,

'Tis the hot evening—off ! oh, morning is it ?

Ottima. There's one thing must be done ;
you know what thing.

Come in and help to carry. We may sleep
Anywhere in the whole wide house to-night.

Sebald. What would come, think you, if we let him lie

Just as he is ? Let him lie there until
The angels take him ! He is turned by this Off from his face beside, as you will see.

Ottima. This dusty pane might serve for looking glass.

Three, four—four grey hairs ! Is it so you said
A plait of hair should wave across my neck ?
No—this way.

Sebald. Ottima, I would give your neck,
Each splendid shoulder, both those breasts of
yours,

That this were undone ! Killing ! Kill the
world

So Luca lives again !—ay, lives to sputter
His fulsome dotage on you—yes, and feign
Surprise that I return at eve to sup,
When all the morning I was loitering here—
Bid me despatch my business and begone.

I would . . .

Ottima. See !

Sebald. No, I'll finish. Do you think

I fear to speak the bare truth once for all ?
All we have talked of, is, at bottom, fine
To suffer ; there's a recompense in guilt ;
One must be venturous and fortunate :
What is one young for, else ? In age we'll sigh

O'er the wild reckless wicked days flown
over ;

Still, we have lived : the vice was in its place.
But to have eaten Luca's bread, have worn
His clothes, have felt his money swell my purse—

Do lovers in romances sin that way ?

Why, I was starving when I used to call
And teach you music, starving while you plucked me

These flowers to smell !

Ottima. My poor lost friend !

Sebald. He gave me

Life, nothing less : what if he did reproach
My perfidy, and threaten, and do more—
Had he no right ? What was to wonder at ?
He sat by us at table quietly :

Why must you lean across till our cheeks touched ?

Could he do less than make pretence to strike ?

'Tis not the crime's sake—I'd commit ten crimes

Greater, to have this crime wiped out, undone!
And you—O how feel you? Feel you for me?

Ottima. Well then, I love you better now than ever,

And best (look at me while I speak to you)—
Best for the crime; nor do I grieve, in truth,
This mask, this simulated ignorance,
This affectation of simplicity,
Falls off our crime; this naked crime of ours
May not now be looked over: look it down!
Great? let it be great; but the joys it brought,
Pay they or no its price? Come: they or it!
Speak not! The past, would you give up the past

Such as it is, pleasure and crime together?
Give up that noon I owned my love for you?
The garden's silence: even the single bee
Persisting in his toil, suddenly stopped,
And where he hid you only could surmise
By some campanula chalice set a-swing.
Who stammered—"Yes, I love you?"

Sebald. And I drew
Back; put far back your face with both my hands

Lest you should grow too full of me—your face
So seemed athirst for my whole soul and body!

Ottima. And when I ventured to receive
you here,

Made you steal hither in the mornings—

Sebald. When
I used to look up 'neath the shrub-house here,
Till the red fire on its glazed windows spread
To a yellow haze?

Ottima. Ah—my sign was, the sun
Inflamed the sere side of yon chestnut-tree
Nipped by the first frost.

Sebald. You would always laugh
At my wet boots: I had to stride thro' grass
Over my ankles.

Ottima. Then our crowning night!

Sebald. The July night?

Ottima. The day of it too, Sebald!
When heaven's pillars seemed o'erbowed with heat,

Its black-blue canopy suffered descend
Close on us both, to weigh down each to each,

And smother up all life except our life.

So lay we till the storm came.

Sebald.

How it came!

Ottima. Buried in woods we lay, you recollect;

Swift ran the searching tempest overhead;
And ever and anon some bright white shaft
Burned thro' the pine-tree roof, here burned and there,

As if God's messenger thro' the close wood screen

Plunged and replunged his weapon at a venture,

Feeling for guilty thee and me: then broke
The thunder like a whole sea overhead—

Sebald. Yes!

Ottima. —While I stretched myself
upon you, hands

To hands, my mouth to your hot mouth, and shook

All my locks loose, and covered you with
them—

You, Sebald, the same you!

Sebald. Slower, Ottima!

Ottima. And as we lay—

Sebald. Less vehemently! Love me!
Forgive me! Take not words, mere words, to heart!

Your breath is worse than wine! Breathe slow, speak slow!

Do not lean on me!

Ottima. Sebald, as we lay,

Rising and falling only with our pants,
Who said, "Let death come now! 'Tis right to die!

"Right to be punished! Nought completes such bliss

"But woe!" Who said that?

Sebald. How did we ever rise?

Was't that we slept? Why did it end?

Ottima. I felt you

Taper into a point the ruffled ends
Of my loose locks 'twixt both your humid lips.
My hair is fallen now: knot it again!

Sebald. I kiss you now, dear Ottima, now
and now!

This way? Will you forgive me—be once more
My great queen?

Ottima. Bind it thrice about my brow ;
Crown me your queen, your spirit's arbitress,
Magnificent in sin. Say that !

Sebald. I crown you
My great white queen, my spirit's arbitress, Magnificent . . .

[From without is heard the voice of PIPPA, singing—

*The year's at the spring
And day's at the morn ;
Morning's at seven ;
The hill-side's dew-pearled ;
The lark's on the wing ;
The snail's on the thorn :
God's in his heaven—
All's right with the world !*

[PIPPA passes.

Sebald. God's in his heaven ! Do you hear that ? Who spoke ?
You, you spoke !

Ottima. Oh—that little ragged girl !
She must have rested on the step : we give
them
But this one holiday the whole year round.
Did you ever see our silk-mills—their inside ?
There are ten silk-mills now belong to you.
She stoops to pick my double heartsease
. . . Sh !

She does not hear : call you out louder !

Sebald. Leave me !
Go, get your clothes on—dress those shoulders !

Ottima. Sebald ?

Sebald. Wipe off that paint ! I hate you.

Ottima. Miserable !

Sebald. My God, and she is emptied of it
now !

Outright now !—how miraculously gone
All of the grace—had she not strange grace
once ?

Why, the blank cheek hangs listless as it likes
No purpose holds the features up together,
Only the cloven brow and puckered chin
Stay in their places : and the very hair,
That seemed to have a sort of life in it,
Drops, a dead web !

Ottima. Speak to me—not of me !

Sebald. —That round great full-orbed face, where not an angle

Broke the delicious indolence—all broken !

Ottima. To me—not of me ! Ungrateful, perjured cheat !

A coward too : but ingrate's worse than all.

Beggar—my slave—a fawning, cringing lie !

Leave me ! Betray me ! I can see your drift !

A lie that walks and eats and drinks !

Sebald. My God !
Those morbid olive faultless shoulder-blades—
I should have known there was no blood
beneath !

Ottima. You hate me then ? You hate me
then ?

Sebald. To think

She would succeed in her absurd attempt,
And fascinate by sinning, show herself
Superior—guilt from its excess superior
To innocence ! That little peasant's voice
Has righted all again. Though I be lost,
I know which is the better, never fear,
Of vice or virtue, purity or lust,
Nature or trick ! I see what I have done,
Entirely now ! Oh I am proud to feel Such torments—let the world take credit thence—

I, having done my deed, pay too its price !

I hate, hate—curse you ! God's in his heaven !

Ottima. —Me !
Me ! no, no, Sebald, not yourself—kill
me !

Mine is the whole crime. Do but kill me—
then

Yourself—then—presently—first hear me
speak !

I always meant to kill myself—wait, you !

Lean on my breast—not as a breast ; don't love me

The more because you lean on me, my
own

Heart's Sebald ! There, there, both deaths
presently !

Sebald. My brain is drowned now—quite drowned : all I feel

Is . . . is, at swift-recurring intervals,
A hurry-down within me, as of waters

Loosened to smother up some ghastly pit :
There they go—whirls from a black fiery sea !

Ottima. Not me—to him, O God, be merciful !

Talk by the way, while PIPPA is passing from the hill-side to Orcana. Foreign Students of painting and sculpture, from Venice, assembled opposite the house of JULES, a young French statuary, at Possagno.

1st Student. Attention ! My own post is beneath this window, but the pomegranate clump yonder will hide three or four of you with a little squeezing, and Schramm and his pipe must lie flat in the balcony. Four, five —who's a defaulter ? We want everybody, for Jules must not be suffered to hurt his bride when the jest's found out.

2nd Student. All here ! Only our poet's away—never having much meant to be present, moonstrike him ! The airs of that fellow, that Giovacchino ! He was in violent love with himself, and had a fair prospect of thriving in his suit, so unmolested was it,— when suddenly a woman falls in love with him, too ; and out of pure jealousy he takes himself off to Trieste, immortal poem and all : whereto is this prophetic epiphany appended already, as Bluphocks assures me, —“ Here a mammoth-poem lies, Fouled to death by butterflies.” His own fault, the simpleton ! Instead of cramp couplets, each like a knife in your entrails, he should write, says Bluphocks, both classically and intelli-gibly.—Esculapius, an Epic. Catalogue of the drugs : Hebe's plaister—One strip Cools your lip. Phæbus' emulsion—One bottle Clears your throttle. Mercury's bolus—One box Cures . . .

3rd Student. Subside, my fine fellow ! If the marriage was over by ten o'clock, Jules will certainly be here in a minute with his bride.

2nd Student. Good !—only, so should the poet's muse have been universally acceptable, says Bluphocks, et canibus nostris . . . and Delia not better known to our literary dogs than the boy Giovacchino !

1st Student. To the point, now. Where's
Gottlieb, the new-comer ? Oh,—listen,
Gottlieb, to what has called down this piece of friendly vengeance on Jules, of which we now assemble to witness the winding-up. We are all agreed, all in a tale, observe, when Jules shall burst out on us in a fury by and by : I am spokesman—the verses that are to undecieve Jules bear my name of Lutwyche
—but each professes himself alike insulted by this strutting stone-squarer, who came alone from Paris to Munich, and thence with a crowd of us to Venice and Possagno here, but proceeds in a day or two alone again
—oh, alone indubitably !—to Rome and Florence. He, forsooth, take up his portion with these dissolute, brutalized, heartless bunglers !—so he was heard to call us all :
now, is Schramm brutalized, I should like to know ? Am I heartless ?

Gottlieb. Why, somewhat heartless ; for, suppose Jules a coxcomb as much as you choose, still, for this mere coxcombry, you will have brushed off—what do folks style it ?—the bloom of his life. Is it too late to alter ? These love-letters now, you call his
—I can't laugh at them.

4th Student. Because you never read the sham letters of our inditing which drew forth
these.

Gottlieb. His discovery of the truth will be frightful.

4th Student. That's the joke. But you should have joined us at the beginning :
there's no doubt he loves the girl—loves a model he might hire by the hour !

Gottlieb. See here ! “ He has been accustomed,” he writes, “ to have Canova's ‘women about him, in stone, and the world's ‘women beside him, in flesh ; these being
‘as much below, as those above, his soul's ‘aspiration : but now he is to have the ‘reality.” There you laugh again ! I say, you wipe off the very dew of his youth.

1st Student. Schramm ! (Take the pipe out of his mouth, somebody!) Will Jules lose the bloom of his youth?

Schramm. Nothing worth keeping is ever lost in this world: look at a blossom—it drops presently, having done its service and lasted its time; but fruits succeed, and where would be the blossom's place could it continue? As well affirm that your eye is no longer in your body, because its earliest favourite, whatever it may have first loved to look on, is dead and done with—as that any affection is lost to the soul when its first object, whatever happened first to satisfy it, is superseded in due course. Keep but ever looking, whether with the body's eye or the mind's, and you will soon find something to look on! Has a man done wondering at women?—there follow men, dead and alive, to wonder at. Has he done wondering at men?—there's God to wonder at: and the faculty of wonder may be, at the same time, old and tired enough with respect to its first object, and yet young and fresh sufficiently, so far as concerns its novel one. Thus . . .

1st Student. Put Schramm's pipe into his mouth again! There, you see! Well, this Jules . . . a wretched fribble—oh, I watched his disputings at Possagno, the other day! Canova's gallery—you know: there he marches first resolutely past great works by the dozen without vouchsafing an eye: all at once he stops full at the Psiche-fanciulla—cannot pass that old acquaintance without a nod of encouragement—"In your new place, beauty? Then behave yourself as well here as at Munich—I see you!" Next he posts himself deliberately before the unfinished Pietà for half an hour without moving, till up he starts of a sudden, and thrusts his very nose into—I say, into—the group; by which gesture you are informed that precisely the sole point he had not fully mastered in Canova's practice was a certain method of using the drill in the articulation of the knee-joint—and that, likewise, has he mastered at length! Good-bye, therefore, to poor Canova—whose gallery no longer needs detain his successor Jules, the predestinated novel thinker in marble!

5th Student. Tell him about the women: go on to the women!

1st Student. Why, on that matter he could never be supercilious enough. How should we be other (he said) than the poor devils you see, with those debasing habits we cherish? He was not to wallow in that mire, at least: he would wait, and love only at the proper time, and meanwhile put up with the Psiche-fanciulla. Now, I happened to hear of a young Greek—real Greek girl at Malamocco; a true Islander, do you see, with Alciphron's "hair like sea-moss"—Schramm knows!—white and quiet as an apparition, and fourteen years old at farthest,—a daughter of Natalia, so she swears—that hag Natalia, who helps us to models at three lire an hour. We selected this girl for the heroine of our jest. So first, Jules received a scented letter—somebody had seen his Tydeus at the Academy, and my picture was nothing to it: a profound admirer bade him persevere—would make herself known to him ere long. (Paolina, my little friend of the Fenice, transcribes divinely.) And in due time, the mysterious correspondent gave certain hints of her peculiar charms—the pale cheeks, the black hair—whatever, in short, had struck us in our Malamocco model: we retained her name, too—Phene, which is, by interpretation, sea-eagle. Now, think of Jules finding himself distinguished from the herd of us by such a creature! In his very first answer he proposed marrying his mistress: and fancy us over these letters, two, three times a day, to receive and despatch! I concocted the main of it: relations were in the way—secrecy must be observed—in fine, would he wed her on trust, and only speak to her when they were indissolubly united? St—st—Here they come!

6th Student. Both of them! Heaven's love, speak softly, speak within yourselves!

5th Student. Look at the bridegroom! Half his hair in storm and half in calm,—patted down over the left temple,—like a frothy cup one blows on to cool it: and the same old blouse that he murders the marble in.

2nd Student. Not a rich vest like yours, Hannibal Scratchy!—rich, that your face may the better set it off.

6th Student. And the bride! Yes, sure enough, our Phene! Should you have known her in her clothes? How magnificently pale!

Gottlieb. She does not also take it for earnest, I hope?

1st Student. Oh, Natalia's concern, that is! We settle with Natalia.

6th Student. She does not speak—has evidently let out no word. The only thing is, will she equally remember the rest of her lesson, and repeat correctly all those verses which are to break the secret to Jules?

Gottlieb. How he gazes on her! Pity—pity!

1st Student. They go in: now, silence! You three,—not nearer the window, mind, than that pomegranate: just where the little girl, who a few minutes ago passed us singing, is seated!

II.—NOON.

SCENE.—Over Orcana. The house of JULES, who crosses its threshold with PHENE: she is silent, on which JULES begins—

Do not die, Phene! I am yours now, you are mine now; let fate reach me how she likes,

If you'll not die: so, never die! Sit here—My work-room's single seat. I over-lean This length of hair and lustrous front; they turn

Like an entire flower upward: eyes, lips, last Your chin—no, last your throat turns: 'tis their scent

Pulls down my face upon you. Nay, look ever This one way till I change, grow you—I could Change into you, beloved!

You by me,

And I by you; this is your hand in mine, And side by side we sit: all's true. Thank God!

I have spoken: speak you!

O my life to come!

My Tydeus must be carved that's there in clay;

Yet how be carved, with you about the room? Where must I place you? When I think that once

This room—full of rough block-work, seemed my heaven

Without you! Shall I ever work again, Get fairly into my old ways again, Bid each conception stand while, trait by trait, My hand transfers its lineaments to stone?

Will my mere fancies live near you, their truth—

The live truth, passing and repassing me, Sitting beside me?

Now speak!

Only first, See, all your letters! Was't not well contrived?

Their hiding-place is Psyche's robe; she keeps

Your letters next her skin: which drops out foremost?

Ah,—this that swam down like a first moon-beam

Into my world!

Again those eyes complete Their melancholy survey, sweet and slow, Of all my room holds; to return and rest On me, with pity, yet some wonder too:

As if God bade some spirit plague a world, And this were the one moment of surprise And sorrow while she took her station, pausing

O'er what she sees, finds good, and must destroy!

What gaze you at? Those? Books, I told you of;

Let your first word to me rejoice them, too:

This minion, a Coluthus, writ in red Bistre and azure by Bessarion's scribe—

Read this line . . . no, shame—Homer's be the Greek

First breathed me from the lips of my Greek girl!

This Odyssey in coarse black vivid type, With faded yellow blossoms 'twixt page and page,

To mark great places with due gratitude ;
"He said, and on Antinous directed
"A bitter shaft" . . . a flower blots out the
 rest !

Again upon your search ? My statues, then !
 —Ah, do not mind that—better that will
 look

When cast in bronze—an Almain Kaiser, that,
 Swart-green and gold, with truncheon based on hip.

This, rather, turn to ! What, unrecognized ?
 I thought you would have seen that here you sit

As I imagined you,—Hippolyta,
 Naked upon her bright Numidian horse.
 Recall you this then ? "Carve in bold relief"—

So you commanded—"carve, against I come,
 "A Greek, in Athens, as our fashion was,
 "Feasting, bay-filleted and thunder-free,
 "Who rises 'neath the lifted myrtle-branch.
 "Praise those who slew Hipparchus !' cry
 the guests,

"While o'er thy head the singer's myrtle waves
 "As erst above our champion : stand up,
 all !"

See, I have laboured to express your thought.
 (Quite round, a cluster of mere hands and arms, (Thrust in all senses, all ways, from all sides,
 Only consenting at the branch's end
 They strain toward) serves for frame to a sole
 face,

The Praiser's, in the centre : who with eyes
 Sightless, so bend they back to light inside
 His brain where visionary forms throng up,
 Sings, minding not that palpitating arch
 Of hands and arms, nor the quick drip of wine
 From the drenched leaves o'erhead, nor crowns cast off,

Violet and parsley crowns to trample on—
 Sings, pausing as the patron-ghosts approve,
 Devoutly their unconquerable hymn.

But you must say a "well" to that—say
 "well !"

Because you gaze—am I fantastic, sweet ?
 Gaze like my very life's-stuff, marble—marbly
 Even to the silence ! Why, before I found

The real flesh Phene, I inured myself
 To see, throughout all nature, varied stuff
 For better nature's birth by means of art :
 With me, each substance tended to one form
 Of beauty—to the human archetype.
 On every side occurred suggestive germs
 Of that—the tree, the flower—or take the fruit,—

Some rosy shape, continuing the peach,
 Curved beewise o'er its bough ; as rosy limbs,
 Depending, nestled in the leaves ; and just
 From a cleft rose-peach the whole Dryad
 sprang

But of the stuffs one can be master of,
 How I divined their capabilities !
 From the soft-rinded smoothening facile chalk
 That yields your outline to the air's embrace,
 Half-softened by a halo's pearly gloom ;
 Down to the crisp imperious steel, so sure
 To cut its one confided thought clean out Of all the world. But marble !—'neath my tools

More pliable than jelly—as it were Some clear primordial creature dug from depths

In the earth's heart, where itself breeds itself,
 And whence all baser substance may be worked ;

Refine it off to air, you may,—condense it
 Down to the diamond ;—is not metal there,
 When o'er the sudden speck my chisel trips ?
 —Not flesh, as flake off flake I scale, approach,
 Lay bare those bluish veins of blood asleep ?
 Lurks flame in no strange windings where, surprised

By the swift implement sent home at once,
 Flushes and glowings radiate and hover
 About its track ?

Phene ? what—why is this ?
 That whitening cheek, those still dilating
 eyes !

Ah, you will die—I knew that you would die !

PHENE begins, on his having long remained silent.

Now the end's coming ; to be sure, it must Have ended sometime ! Tush, why need I
 speak

Their foolish speech? I cannot bring to mind
 One half of it, beside; and do not care
 For old Natalia now, nor any of them
 Oh, you—what are you?—if I do not try
 To say the words Natalia made me learn,
 To please your friends,—it is to keep myself
 Where your voice lifted me, by letting that Proceed: but can it? Even you, perhaps,
 Cannot take up, now you have once let fall,
 The music's life, and me along with that—No, or you would! We'll stay, then, as we are:

Above the world.

You creature with the eyes!
 If I could look for ever up to them,
 As now you let me,—I believe, all sin,
 All memory of wrong done, suffering borne,
 Would drop down, low and lower, to the earth
 Whence all that's low comes, and there touch and stay
 —Never to overtake the rest of me,
 All that, unspotted, reaches up to you,
 Drawn by those eyes! What rises is myself,
 Not me the shame and suffering; but they sink,
 Are left, I rise above them. Keep me so,
 Above the world!

But you sink, for your eyes
 Are altering—altered! Stay—"I love you,
 love" . . .

I could prevent it if I understood:
 More of your words to me: was't in the tone
 Or the words, your power?

Or stay—I will repeat
 Their speech, if that contents you! Only
 change

No more, and I shall find it presently
 Far back here, in the brain yourself filled up.
 Natalia threatened me that harm should follow
 Unless I spoke their lesson to the end,
 But harm to me, I thought she meant, not you.
 Your friends,—Natalia said they were your
 friends

And meant you well,—because, I doubted it,
 Observing (what was very strange to see)
 On every face, so different in all else,
 The same smile girls like me are used to bear,
 But never men, men cannot stoop so low;

Yet your friends, speaking of you, used that
 smile,

That hateful smirk of boundless self-conceit
 Which seems to take possession of the world
 And make of God a tame confederate,
 Purveyor to their appetites . . . you know!
 But still Natalia said they were your friends,
 And they assented though they smiled the
 more,

And all came round me,—that thin English-
 man

With light lank hair seemed leader of the rest;
 He held a paper—"What we want," said he,
 Ending some explanation to his friends—

"Is something slow, involved and mystical,
 "To hold Jules long in doubt, yet take his taste

"And lure him on until, at innermost
 "Where he seeks sweetness' soul, he may find—this!

"—As in the apple's core, the noisome fly:
 "For insects on the rind are seen at once,
 "And brushed aside as soon, but this is found
 "Only when on the lips or loathing tongue."
 And so he read what I have got by heart:
 I'll speak it,—“Do not die, love! I am
 yours.”

No—is not that, or like that, part of words
 Yourself began by speaking? Strange to lose What cost such pains to learn! Is this more right?

*I am a painter who cannot paint;
 In my life, a devil rather than saint;
 In my brain, as poor a creature too:
 No end to all I cannot do!
 Yet do one thing at least I can—
 Love a man or hate a man
 Supremely: thus my lore began.
 Through the Valley of Love I went,
 In the loveliest spot to abide,
 And just on the verge where I pitched my tent,
 I found Hate dwelling beside.
 (Let the Bridegroom ask what the painter
 meant,
 Of his Bride, of the peerless Bride!)
 And further, I traversed Hate's grove,
 In the hatefullest nook to dwell;*

*But lo, where I flung myself prone, couched |
Love
Where the shadow threefold fell.
(The meaning—those black bride's-eye-
above,
Not a painter's lip should tell !)*

"And here," said he, "Jules probably will ask,
"You have black eyes, Love,—you are, sure enough,
"My peerless bride,—then do you tell indeed
"What needs some explanation ! What means this ?"
—And I am to go on, without a word—

*So, I grew wise in Love and Hate,
From simple that I was of late,
Once, when I loved, I would enlase
Breast, eyelids, hands, feet, form and face
Of her I loved, in one embrace—
As if by mere love I could love immensely !
Once, when I hated, I would plunge
My sword, and wipe with the first lunge
My foe's whole life out like a sponge—
As if by mere hate I could hate intensely !
But now I am wiser, know better the fashion
How passion seeks aid from its opposite passion :*

*And if I see cause to love more, hate more
Than ever man loved, ever hated before—
And seek in the Valley of Love,
The nest, or the nook in Hate's Grove,
Where my soul may surely reach
The essence, nought less, of each,
The Hate of all Hates, the Love
Of all Loves, in the Valley or Grove,—
I find them the very warders
Each of the other's borders.
When I love most, Love is disguised
In Hate ; and when Hate is surprised
In Love, then I hate most : ask How Love smiles through Hate's iron
casque,
Hate grins through Love's rose-braided
mask,—
And how, having hated thee,
I sought long and painfully
To reach thy heart, nor prick
The skin but pierce to the quick—*

*Ask this, my Jules, and be answered
straight
By thy bride—how the painter Lutwyche can hate !*

JULES interposes.

Lutwyche ! Who else ? But all of them, no doubt,
Hated me : they at Venice—presently
Their turn, however ! You I shall not meet :
If I dreamed, saying this would wake me.

Keep

What's here, the gold—we cannot meet again.
Consider ! and the money was but meant
For two years' travel, which is over now,
All chance or hope or care or need of it.
This—and what comes from selling these, my casts

And books and medals, except . . . let them go

Together, so the produce keeps you safe
Out of Natalia's clutches ! If by chance (For all's chance here) I should survive the gang

At Venice, root out all fifteen of them,
We might meet somewhere, since the world is wide.

[From without is heard the voice
of PIPPA, singing—

*Give her but a least excuse to love me !
When—where—
How—can this arm establish her above me,
If fortune fixed her as my lady there,
There already, to eternally reprove me ?
("Hist !"—said Kate the Queen ;
But "Oh !"—cried the maiden, binding her tresses,
" 'Tis only a page that carols unseen,
"Crumbling your hounds their messes !")*

*Is she wronged ?—To the rescue of her honour,
My heart !
Is she poor ?—What costs it to be styled a donor ?
Merely an earth to cleave, a sea to part.
But that fortune should have thrust all this upon her !*

("Nay, list!"—bade Kate the Queen;
And still cried the maiden, binding her
tresses,
"Tis only a page that carols unseen,
"Fitting your hawks their jesses!")
[PIPPA passes.

JULES resumes.

What name was that the little girl sang forth?
Kate? The Cornaro, doubtless, who renounced

The crown of Cyprus to be lady here
At Asolo, where still her memory stays,
And peasants sing how once a certain page
Pined for the grace of her so far above
His power of doing good to, "Kate the Queen—

"She never could be wronged, be poor," he sighed,
"Need him to help her!"

Yes, a bitter thing
To see our lady above all need of us;
Yet so we look ere we will love; not I,
But the world looks so. If whoever loves
Must be, in some sort, god or worshipper,
The blessing or the blest one, queen or page,
Why should we always choose the page's part?
Here is a woman with utter need of me,—
I find myself queen here, it seems!

How strange!
Look at the woman here with the new soul,
Like my own Psyche,—fresh upon her lips
Alit, the visionary butterfly,
Waiting my word to enter and make bright,
Or flutter off and leave all blank as first.
This body had no soul before, but slept
Or stirred, was beauteous or ungainly, free
From taint or foul with stain, as outward things
Fastened their image on its passiveness:
Now, it will wake, feel, live—or die again!
Shall to produce form out of unshaped stuff
Be Art—and further, to evoke a soul
From form be nothing? This new soul is
mine!

Now, to kill Lutwyche, what would that do?
—save
A wretched dauber, men will hoot to death

VOL. I.

Without me, from their hooting. Oh, to hear
God's voice plain as I heard it first, before They broke in with their laughter! I heard
them

Henceforth, not God.

To Ancona—Greece—some isle!
I wanted silence only; there is clay Everywhere. One may do whate'er one likes

In Art: the only thing is, to make sure
That one does like it—which takes pains to
know.

Scatter all this, my Phene—this mad
dream!

Who, what is Lutwyche, what Natalia's
friends,

What the whole world except our love—my
own,

Own Phene? But I told you, did I not,
Ere night we travel for your land—some isle
With the sea's silence on it? Stand aside—
I do but break these paltry models up
To begin Art afresh. Meet Lutwyche, I—
And save him from my statue meeting him?
Some unsuspected isle in the far seas!
Like a god going through his world, there
stands

One mountain for a moment in the dusk,
Whole brotherhoods of cedars on its brow:
And you are ever by me while I gaze
—Are in my arms as now—as now—as now!
Some unsuspected isle in the far seas!
Some unsuspected isle in far-off seas!

Talk by the way, while PIPPA is passing from Orcana to the Turret. Two or three of the Austrian Police loitering with BLUPHOCKS, an English vagabond, just in view of the Turret.

*Bluphocks.*¹ So, that is your Pippa, the little girl who passed us singing? Well, your Bishop's Intendant's money shall be honestly earned:—now, don't make me that

¹ "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."

sour face because I bring the Bishop's name into the business; we know he can have nothing to do with such horrors: we know that he is a saint and all that a bishop should be, who is a great man beside. Oh were but every worm a maggot, Every fly a grig, Every bough a Christmas faggot, Every tune a jig! In fact, I have abjured all religions; but the last I inclined to, was the Armenian: for I have travelled, do you see, and at Koenigsberg, Prussia Improper (so styled because there's a sort of bleak hungry sun there), you might remark over a venerable house-porch, a certain Chaldee inscription; and brief as it is, a mere glance at it used absolutely to change the mood of every bearded passenger. In they turned, one and all; the young and lightsome, with no irreverent pause, the aged and decrepit, with a sensible alacrity: 'twas the Grand Rabbi's abode, in short. Struck with curiosity, I lost no time in learning Syriac—(these are vowels, you dogs,—follow my stick's end in the mud—Celarent, Darii, Ferio!) and one morning presented myself, spelling-book in hand, a, b, c,—I picked it out letter by letter, and what was the purport of this miraculous posy? Some cherished legend of the past, you'll say—"How Moses hocus-poussed Egypt's land with fly and locust,"—or, "How to Jonah sounded harshish, Get thee up and go to Tarshish,"—or, "How the angel meeting Balaam, Straight his ass returned a salaam." In no wise! "Shackabrack—Boach—somebody or other—Isaach, Re-ai-ver, Pur-cha-ser and Ex-chan-ger of—Stolen Goods!" So, talk to me of the religion of a bishop! I have renounced all bishops save Bishop Beveridge—mean to live so—and die—As some Greek dog-sage, dead and merry, Hellward bound in Charon's wherry, With food for both worlds, under and upper, Lupine-seed and Hecate's supper, And never an obolus . . . (Though thanks to you, or this Intendant through you, or this Bishop through his Intendant—I possess a burning pocketful of swanzigers) . . . To pay the Stygian Ferry!

1st Policeman. There is the girl, then; go and deserve them the moment you have pointed out to us Signor Luigi¹ and his mother. [To the rest.] I have been noticing a house yonder, this long while: not a shutter unclosed since morning!

2nd Policeman. Old Luca Gaddi's, that owns the silk-mills here: he dozes by the hour, wakes up, sighs deeply, says he should like to be Prince Metternich, and then dozes again, after having bidden young Sebald, the foreigner, set his wife to playing draughts. Never molest such a household, they mean well.

Bluphocks. Only, cannot you tell me something of this little Pippa, I must have to do with? One could make something of that name. Pippa—that is, short for Felippa—rhyming to Panurge consults Hertrippa—Believest thou, King Agrippa? Something might be done with that name.

2nd Policeman. Put into rhyme that your head and a ripe musk-melon would not be dear at half a swanziger! Leave this fooling, and look out; the afternoon's over or nearly so.

3rd Policeman. Where in this passport of Signor Luigi does our Principal instruct you to watch him so narrowly? There? What's there beside a simple signature? (That English fool's busy watching.)

2nd Policeman. Flourish all round—"Put all possible obstacles in his way;" oblong dot at the end—"Detain him till further advices reach you;" scratch at bottom—"Send him back on pretence of some informality in the above;" ink-spirit on right-hand side (which is the case here)—"Arrest him at once." Why and wherefore, I don't concern myself, but my instructions amount to this: if Signor Luigi leaves home to-night for Vienna—well and good, the passport deposited with us for our visa is really for his own use, they have misinformed the Office, and he means well; but let him stay over to-night—there has been the pretence we suspect, the accounts of his corresponding and holding intelligence with the Carbonari are correct.

we arrest him at once, to-morrow comes Venice, and presently Spielberg. Bluphocks makes the signal, sure enough! That is he, entering the turret with his mother, no doubt.

III.—EVENING.

SCENE.—Inside the Turret on the Hill above Asolo. LUIGI and his Mother entering.

Mother. If there blew wind, you'd hear a long sigh, easing

The utmost heaviness of music's heart.

Luigi. Here in the archway?

Mother. Oh no, no—in farther, Where the echo is made, on the ridge.

Luigi. Here surely, then. How plain the tap of my heel as I leaped up! Hark—"Lucius Junius!" The very ghost of a voice

Whose body is caught and kept by . . . what are those?

Mere withered wallflowers, waving overhead? They seem an elvish group with thin bleached hair

That lean out of their topmost fortress—look And listen, mountain men, to what we say, Hand under chin of each grave earthy face. Up and show faces all of you!—"All of you!"

That's the king dwarf with the scarlet comb; old Franz,

Come down and meet your fate? Hark—"Meet your fate!"

Mother. Let him not meet it, my Luigi—do not Go to his City! Putting crime aside, Half of these ills of Italy are feigned: Your Pellicos and writers for effect, Write for effect.

Luigi. Hush! Say A. writes, and B.

Mother. These A.s and B.s write for effect, I say.

Then, evil is in its nature loud, while good Is silent; you hear each petty injury, None of his virtues; he is old beside, Quiet and kind, and densely stupid. Why Do A. and B. not kill him themselves?

Luigi. They teach Others to kill him—me—and, if I fail, Others to succeed; now, if A. tried and failed, I could not teach that: mine's the lesser task.

Mother. Mother, they visit night by night . . .

Mother. —You, Luigi?

Ah, will you let me tell you what you are?

Luigi. Why not? Oh, the one thing you fear to hint,

You may assure yourself I say and say Ever to myself! At times—nay, even as now We sit—I think my mind is touched, suspect All is not sound: but is not knowing that, What constitutes one sane or otherwise?

I know I am thus—so, all is right again.

I laugh at myself as through the town I walk, And see men merry as if no Italy

Were suffering; then I ponder—"I am rich, "Young, healthy; why should this fact trouble me,

"More than it troubles these?" But it does trouble.

No, trouble's a bad word: for as I walk There's springing and melody and giddiness, And old quaint turns and passages of my youth,

Dreams long forgotten, little in themselves, Return to me—whatever may amuse me:

And earth seems in a truce with me, and heaven

Accords with me, all things suspend their strife,

The very cicala laughs "There goes he, and there!

"Feast him, the time is short; he is on his way

"For the world's sake: feast him this once, our friend!"

And in return for all this, I can trip Cheerfully up the scaffold-steps. I go

This evening, mother!

Mother. But mistrust yourself—Mistrust the judgment you pronounce on him!

Luigi. Oh, there I feel—am sure that I am right!

Mother. Mistrust your judgment then, of the mere means

To this wild enterprise. Say, you are right,—

How should one in your state e'er bring to pass

What would require a cool head, a cold heart,
And a calm hand? You never will escape.

Luigi. Escape? To even wish that, would spoil all.

The dying is best part of it. Too much
Have I enjoyed these fifteen years of mine,
To leave myself excuse for longer life:
Was not life pressed down, running o'er with
joy,

That I might finish with it ere my fellows
Who, sparerier feasted, make a longer stay?
I was put at the board-head, helped to all
At first; I rise up happy and content.
God must be glad one loves his world so
much.

I can give news of earth to all the dead
Who ask me:—last year's sunsets, and great stars

Which had a right to come first and see ebb
The crimson wave that drifts the sun away—
Those crescent moons with notched and burning rims

That strengthened into sharp fire, and there stood,

Impatient of the azure—and that day
In March, a double rainbow stopped the storm—

May's warm slow yellow moonlit summer
nights—

Gone are they, but I have them in my soul!

Mother. (He will not go!)

Luigi. You smile at me?

'Tis true,—

Voluptuousness, grotesqueness, ghastliness,
Environ my devotedness as quaintly
As round about some antique altar wreath
The rose festoons, goats' horns, and oxen's skulls.

Mother. See now: you reach the city, you must cross
His threshold—how?

Luigi. Oh, that's if we conspired!
Then would come pains in plenty, as you guess—

But guess not how the qualities most fit
For such an office, qualities I have,

Would little stead me, otherwise employed,
Yet prove of rarest merit only here.

Every one knows for what his excellence
Will serve, but no one ever will consider
For what his worst defect might serve: and yet
Have you not seen me range our coppice yonder

In search of a distorted ash?—I find
The wry spoilt branch a natural perfect bow.
Fancy the thrice-sage, thrice-precautioned
man

Arriving at the palace on my errand!
No, no! I have a handsome dress packed
up—

White satin here, to set off my black hair;
In I shall march—for you may watch your life out

Behind thick walls, make friends there to betray you;

More than one man spoils everything.
March straight—

Only, no clumsy knife to fumble for.
Take the great gate and walk (not saunter)
on

Thro' guards and guards—I have rehearsed
it all

Inside the turret here a hundred times.
Don't ask the way of whom you meet, observe!

But where they cluster thickest is the door
Of doors; they'll let you pass—they'll never blab

Each to the other, he knows not the favourite,
Whence he is bound and what's his business
now.

Walk in—straight up to him; you have no
knife:

Be prompt, how should he scream? Then,
out with you!

Italy, Italy, my Italy!

You're free, you're free! Oh mother, I could
dream

They got about me—Andrea from his exile, Pier from his dungeon, Gualtier from his grave!

Mother. Well, you shall go. Yet seems this patriotism

The easiest virtue for a selfish man

To acquire : he loves himself—and next, the world—

If he must love beyond, — but nought between :

As a short-sighted man sees nought midway His body and the sun above. But you Are my adored Luigi, ever obedient To my least wish, and running o'er with love :

I could not call you cruel or unkind. Once more, your ground for killing him !— then go !

Luigi. Now do you try me, or make sport of me ?

How first the Austrians got these provinces . . .

(If that is all, I'll satisfy you soon)
—Never by conquest but by cunning, for That treaty whereby . . .

Mother. Well ?

Luigi. (Sure, he's arrived,

The tell-tale cuckoo : spring's his confidant, And he lets out her April purposes !)

(Or . . . better go at once to modern time, He has . . . they have . . . in fact, I understand

But can't restate the matter ; that's my boast : Others could reason it out to you, and prove Things they have made me feel.

Mother. Why go to-night ? Morn's for adventure. Jupiter is now

A morning-star. I cannot hear you, Luigi !

Luigi. "I am the bright and morning-star," saith God—

And, "to such an one I give the morning-star." The gift o' the morning-star ! Have I God's gift

Of the morning-star ?

Mother. Chiara will love to see That Jupiter an evening-star next June.

Luigi. True, mother. Well for those who live through June !

Great noontides, thunder-storms, all glaring pomps

That triumph at the heels of June the god Leading his revel through our leafy world. Yes, Chiara will be here.

Mother. In June : remember, Yourself appointed that month for her coming.

Luigi. Was that low noise the echo ?

Mother. The night-wind. She must be grown—with her blue eyes up-turned

As if life were one long and sweet surprise : In June she comes.

Luigi. We were to see together The Titian at Treviso. There, again !

[From without is heard the voice of PIPPA, singing—

*A king lived long ago,
In the morning of the world,
When earth was nigher heaven than now :
And the king's locks curled,
Disparting o'er a forehead full
As the milk-white space 'twixt horn and horn*

*Of some sacrificial bull—
Only calm as a babe new-born :
For he was got to a sleepy mood,
So safe from all decrepitude,
Age with its bane, so sure gone by,
(The gods so loved him while he dreamed)
That, having lived thus long, there seemed
No need the king should ever die.*

Luigi. No need that sort of king should ever die !

*Among the rocks his city was :
Before his palace, in the sun,
He sat to see his people pass,
And judge them every one
From its threshold of smooth stone.
They haled him many a valley-thief
Caught in the sheep-pens, robber-chief
Swarthy and shameless, beggar-cheat,
Spy-prowler, or rough pirate found
On the sea-sand left aground ;
And sometimes clung about his feet,
With bleeding lip and burning cheek,
A woman, bitterest wrong to speak
Of one with sullen thickset brows :
And sometimes from the prison-house
The angry priests a pale wretch brought,
Who through some chink had pushed and pressed*

*On knees and elbows, belly and breast,
Worm-like into the temple,—caught*

*He was by the very god,
Who ever in the darkness strode
Backward and forward, keeping watch
O'er his brazen bowls, such rogues to catch!
These, all and every one,
The king judged, sitting in the sun.*

Luigi. That king should still judge sitting in the sun!

*His councillors, on left and right,
Looked anxious up,—but no surprise
Disturbed the king's old smiling eyes
Where the very blue had turned to white.
'Tis said, a Python scared one day
The breathless city, till he came,
With forked tongue and eyes on flame,
Where the old king sat to judge away;
But when he saw the sweepy hair
Girt with a crown of berries rare
Which the god will hardly give to wear
To the maiden who singeth, dancing bare
In the altar-smoke by the pine-orch lights,
At his wondrous forest rites,—
Seeing this, he did not dare
Approach that threshold in the sun,
Assault the old king smiling there.
Such grace had kings when the world begun!*

[PIPPA passes.

Luigi. And such grace have they, now that the world ends!

The Python at the city, on the throne,
And brave men, God would crown for slay-ing him,

Lurk in bye-corners lest they fall his prey.
Are crowns yet to be won in this late time,
Which weakness makes me hesitate to reach?
'Tis God's voice calls: how could I stay?
Farewell!

*Talk by the way, while PIPPA is passing from the Turret to the Bishop's Brother's House, close to the Duomo S. Maria.
Four Girls sitting on the steps.*

1st Girl. There goes a swallow to Venice
—the stout seafarer!

Seeing those birds fly, makes one wish for wings.

Let us all wish; you wish first!

2nd Girl.

To finish.

3rd Girl. That old—somebody I know,
Greyer and older than my grandfather,
To give me the same treat he gave last week—
Feeding me on his knee with fig-peckers, Lampreys and red Breganze-wine, and mumbling

The while some folly about how well I fare,
Let sit and eat my supper quietly:
Since had he not himself been late this morning Detained at—never mind where,—had he
not . . .

“Eh, baggage, had I not!”—

2nd Girl. How she can lie!

3rd Girl. Look there—by the nails!

2nd Girl. What makes your fingers red!

3rd Girl. Dipping them into wine to write bad words with

On the bright table: how he laughed!

1st Girl. My turn.

Spring's come and summer's coming. I would wear

A long loose gown, down to the feet and
hands,

With plaits here, close about the throat, all
day;

And all night lie, the cool long nights, in bed;

And have new milk to drink, apples to eat,
Deuzans and junetings, leather-coats . . .

ah, I should say,

This is away in the fields—miles!

3rd Girl. Say at once

You'd be at home: she'd always be at home!
Now comes the story of the farm among

The cherry orchards, and how April snowed
White blossoms on her as she ran. Why,
fool,

They've rubbed the chalk-mark out, how tall
you were,

Twisted your starling's neck, broken his cage,
Made a dung-hill of your garden!

1st Girl.

They, destroy
My garden since I left them? well—perhaps!
I would have done so: so I hope they have!
A fig-tree curled out of our cottage wall;

They called it mine, I have forgotten why,
It must have been there long ere I was born :
Cric—cric—I think I hear the wasps o'erhead
Pricking the papers strung to flutter there
And keep off birds in fruit-time—coarse long papers,
And the wasps eat them, prick them through and through.

3rd Girl. How her mouth twitches! Where was I?—before

She broke in with her wishes and long gowns
And wasps—would I be such a fool!—Oh,
here!

This is my way : I answer every one
Who asks me why I make so much of him—(If you say, “you love him”—straight “he’ll not be gulled!”)

“He that seduced me when I was a girl “Thus high—had eyes like yours, or hair like yours,

“Brown, red, white,”—as the case may be :
that pleases!

See how that beetle burnishes in the path!
There sparkles he along the dust : and, there—
Your journey to that maize-tuft spoiled at least!

1st Girl. When I was young, they said if you killed one

Of those sunshiny beetles, that his friend
Up there, would shine no more that day nor next.

2nd Girl. When you were young? Nor are you young, that’s true.

How your plump arms, that were, have dropped away!

Why, I can span them. Cecco beats you still?
No matter, so you keep your curious hair.
I wish they’d find a way to dye our hair
Your colour—any lighter tint, indeed,
Than black : the men say they are sick of black,
Black eyes, black hair!

4th Girl. Sick of yours, like enough.

Do you pretend you ever tasted lampreys
And ortolans? Giovita, of the palace,
Engaged (but there’s no trusting him) to slice
me

Polenta with a knife that had cut up
An ortolan.

2nd Girl. Why, there! Is not that Pippa
We are to talk to, under the window,— quick,—

Where the lights are?

1st Girl. That she? No, or she would sing,

For the Intendant said . . .
3rd Girl. Oh, you sing first!

Then, if she listens and comes close . . .
I’ll tell you,—

Sing that song the young English noble made,
Who took you for the purest of the pure,
And meant to leave the world for you—what fun!

2nd Girl [sings].

You’ll love me yet!—and I can tarry.

Your love’s protracted growing:

*June reared that bunch of flowers you carry,
From seeds of April’s sowing.*

I plant a heartfelt now: some seed

At least is sure to strike,

*And yield—what you’ll not pluck indeed,
Not love, but, may be, like.*

You’ll look at least on love’s remains,

A grave’s one violet;

Your look?—that pays a thousand pains.

What’s death? You’ll love me yet!

3rd Girl [to PIPPA who approaches]. Oh, you may come closer—we shall not eat you!
Why, you seem the very person that the great rich handsome Englishman has fallen so violently in love with. I’ll tell you all about it.

IV.—NIGHT.

SCENE.—Inside the Palace by the Duomo.
MONSIGNOR, dismissing his Attendants.

Monsignor. Thanks, friends, many thanks!
I chiefly desire life now, that I may recompense every one of you. Most I know something of already. What, a repast prepa-
Benedictio benedicatur . . . ugh, ugh!
Where was I? Oh, as you were remarking,
Ugo, the weather is mild, very unlike winter.

weather: but I am a Sicilian, you know, and shiver in your Julys here. To be sure, when 'twas full summer at Messina, as we priests used to cross in procession the great square on Assumption Day, you might see our thickest yellow tapers twist suddenly in two, each like a falling star, or sink down on themselves in a gore of wax. But go, my friends, but go! [To the Intendant.] Not you, Ugo! [The others leave the apartment.] I have long wanted to converse with you, Ugo.

Intendant. Uguccio—

Monsignor. . . . 'guccio Stefani, man! of Ascoli, Fermo and Fossombruno;—what I do need instructing about, are these accounts of your administration of my poor brother's affairs. Ugh! I shall never get through a third part of your accounts: take some of these dainties before we attempt it, however. Are you bashful to that degree? For me, a crust and water suffice.

Intendant. Do you choose this especial night to question me?

Monsignor. This night, Ugo. You have managed my late brother's affairs since the death of our elder brother: fourteen years and a month, all but three days. On the Third of December, I find him . . .

Intendant. If you have so intimate an acquaintance with your brother's affairs, you will be tender of turning so far back: they will hardly bear looking into, so far back.

Monsignor. Ay, ay, ugh, ugh,—nothing but disappointments here below! I remark a considerable payment made to yourself on this Third of December. Talk of disappointments! There was a young fellow here, Jules, a foreign sculptor I did my utmost to advance, that the Church might be a gainer by us both: he was going on hopefully enough, and of a sudden he notifies to me some marvellous change that has happened in his notions of Art. Here's his letter, "He never had a clearly conceived Ideal within his brain till to-day. Yet since his hand could manage a chisel, he has practised expressing other men's Ideals; and, in the very perfection he has attained to, he foresees an ultimate failure: his unconscious hand will pursue its prescribed course of old years, and will reproduce with a fatal expertness the ancient types, let the novel one appear never so palpably to his spirit. There is but one method of escape: confiding the virgin type to as chaste a hand, he will turn painter instead of sculptor, and paint, not carve, its characteristics,"—strike out, I dare say, a school like Correggio: how think you, Ugo? Intendant. Is Correggio a painter?

Monsignor. Foolish Jules! and yet, after all, why foolish? He may—probably will—fail egregiously; but if there should arise a new painter, will it not be in some such way, by a poet now, or a musician (spirits who have conceived and perfected an Ideal through some other channel), transferring it to this, and escaping our conventional roads by pure ignorance of them; eh, Ugo? If you have no appetite, talk at least, Ugo!

Intendant. Sir, I can submit no longer to this course of yours. First, you select the group of which I formed one,—next you thin it gradually,—always retaining me with your smile,—and so do you proceed till you have fairly got me alone with you between four stone walls. And now then? Let this farce, this chatter end now: what is it you want with me?

Monsignor. Ugo!

Intendant. From the instant you arrived, I felt your smile on me as you questioned me about this and the other article in those papers—why your brother should have given me this villa, that podere,—and your nod at the end meant,—what?

Monsignor. Possibly that I wished for no loud talk here. If once you set me coughing, Ugo!—

Intendant. I have your brother's hand and seal to all I possess: now ask me what for! what service I did him—ask me!

Monsignor. I would better not: I should rip up old disgraces, let out my poor brother's weaknesses. By the way, Maffeo of Forli (which, I forgot to observe, is your true name), was the interdict ever taken off you, for robbing that church at Cesena?

Intendant. No, nor needs be: for when I murdered your brother's friend, Pasquale, for him . . .

Monsignor. Ah, he employed you in that business, did he? Well, I must let you keep, as you say, this villa and that podere, for fear the world should find out my relations were of so indifferent a stamp? Maffeo, my family is the oldest in Messina, and century after century have my progenitors gone on polluting themselves with every wickedness under heaven: my own father . . . rest his soul! —I have, I know, a chapel to support that it may rest: my dear two dead brothers were, —what you know tolerably well; I, the youngest, might have rivalled them in vice, if not in wealth: but from my boyhood I came out from among them, and so am not partaker of their plagues. My glory springs from another source; or if from this, by contrast only,—for I, the bishop, am the brother of your employers, Ugo. I hope to repair some of their wrong, however; so far as my brother's ill-gotten treasure reverts to me, I can stop the consequences of his crime: and not one soldo shall escape me. Maffeo, the sword we quiet men spurn away, you shrewd knaves pick up and commit murders with; what opportunities the virtuous forego, the villanous seize. Because, to pleasure myself apart from other considerations, my food would be millet-cake, my dress sackcloth, and my couch straw,—am I therefore to let you, the offscouring of the earth, seduce the poor and ignorant by appropriating a pomp these will be sure to think lessens the abominations so unaccountably and exclusively associated with it? Must I let villas and poderi go to you, a murderer and thief, that you may beget by means of them other murderers and thieves? No—if my cough would but allow me to speak!

Intendant. What am I to expect? You are going to punish me?

Monsignor. —Must punish you, Maffeo. I cannot afford to cast away a chance. I have whole centuries of sin to redeem, and only a month or two of life to do it in. How should I dare to say . . .

Intendant. "Forgive us our trespasses"?

Monsignor. My friend, it is because I avow myself a very worm, sinful beyond measure, that I reject a line of conduct you would applaud perhaps. Shall I proceed, as it were, a-pardoning?—I?—who have no symptom of reason to assume that aught less than my strenuous efforts will keep myself out of mortal sin, much less keep others out. No: I do trespass, but will not double that by allowing you to trespass.

Intendant. And suppose the villas are not your brother's to give, nor yours to take? Oh, you are hasty enough just now!

Monsignor. 1, 2—N^o 3!—ay, can you read the substance of a letter, N^o 3, I have received from Rome? It is precisely on the ground there mentioned, of the suspicion I have that a certain child of my late elder brother, who would have succeeded to his estates, was murdered in infancy by you, Maffeo, at the instigation of my late younger brother—that the Pontiff enjoins on me not merely the bringing that Maffeo to condign punishment, but the taking all pains, as guardian of the infant's heritage for the Church, to recover it parcel by parcel, howsoever, whensoever, and wheresoever. While you are now gnawing those fingers, the police are engaged in sealing up your papers, Maffeo, and the mere raising my voice brings my people from the next room to dispose of yourself. But I want you to confess quietly, and save me raising my voice. Why, man, do I not know the old story? The heir between the succeeding heir, and this heir's ruffianly instrument, and their complot's effect, and the life of fear and bribes and ominous smiling silence? Did you throttle or stab my brother's infant? Come now!

Intendant. So old a story, and tell it no better? When did such an instrument ever produce such an effect? Either the child smiles in his face; or, most likely, he is not fool enough to put himself in the employer's power so thoroughly: the child is always ready to produce—as you say—howsoever, wheresoever, and whensoever.

Monsignor. Liar!

Intendant. Strike me? Ah, so might a father chastise! I shall sleep soundly to-night at least, though the gallows await me to-morrow; for what a life did I lead! Carlo of Cesena reminds me of his connivance, every time I pay his annuity; which happens commonly thrice a year. If I remonstrate, he will confess all to the good bishop—you!

Monsignor. I see through the trick, catiff! I would you spoke truth for once. All shall be sifted, however—seven times sifted.

Intendant. And how my absurd riches encumbered me! I dared not lay claim to above half my possessions. Let me but once unbosom myself, glorify Heaven, and die!

Sir, you are no brutal dastardly idiot like your brother I frightened to death: let us understand one another. Sir, I will make away with her for you—the girl—here close at hand; not the stupid obvious kind of killing; do not speak—know nothing of her nor of me! I see her every day—saw her this morning: of course there is to be no killing; but at Rome the courtesans perish off every three years, and I can entice her thither—have indeed begun operations already. There's a certain lusty blue-eyed florid-complexioned English knave, I and the Police employ occasionally. You assent, I perceive—no, that's not it—assent I do not say—but you will let me convert my present havings and holdings into cash, and give me time to cross the Alps? 'Tis but a little black-eyed pretty singing Felippa, gay silk-winding girl. I have kept her out of harm's way up to this present; for I always intended to make your life a plague to you with her. 'Tis as well settled once and for ever. Some women I have procured will pass Bluphocks, my handsome scoundrel, off for somebody; and once Pippa entangled!—you conceive? Through her singing? Is it a bargain?

[From without is heard the voice of PIPPA, singing—

*Overhead the tree-tops meet,
Flowers and grass spring 'neath one's feet;
There was nought above me, nought below,
My childhood had not learned to know:
For, what are the voices of birds
—Ay, and of beasts,—but words, our words
Only so much more sweet?
The knowledge of that with my life begun,
But I had so near made out the sun,
And counted your stars, the seven and one,
Like the fingers of my hand:
Nay, I could all but understand
Wherefore through heaven the white moon ranges;
And just when out of her soft fifty changes
No unfamiliar face might overlook me—
Suddenly God took me.*

[PIPPA passes.

Monsignor [springing up]. My people—one and all—all—within there! Gag this villain—tie him hand and foot! He dares
. . . I know not half he dares—but remove him—quick! Miserere mei, Domine! Quick,
I say!

SCENE.—PIPPA'S chamber again. She enters it.

The bee with his comb,
The mouse at her dray,
The grub in his tomb,
Wile winter away;
But the fire-fly and hedge-shrew and lob-worm, I pray,
How fare they?
Ha, ha, thanks for your counsel, my Zanze!
“Feast upon lampreys, quaff Breganze”—
The summer of life so easy to spend,
And care for to-morrow so soon put away!
But winter hastens at summer's end,
And fire-fly, hedge-shrew, lob-worm, pray,
How fare they?
No bidding me then to . . . what did Zanze
say?

"Pare your nails pearlwise, get your small feet shoes

"More like" . . . (what said she?)—"and less like canoes!"

How pert that girl was!—would I be those pert

Impudent staring women! It had done me,
However, surely no such mighty hurt
To learn his name who passed that jest upon
me:

No foreigner, that I can recollect,
Came, as she says, a month since, to inspect
Our silk-mills—none with blue eyes and thick rings

Of raw-silk-coloured hair, at all events.
Well, if old Luca keep his good intents,
We shall do better, see what next year brings.

I may buy shoes, my Zanze, not appear
More destitute than you perhaps next year!
Bluph . . . something! I had caught the uncouth name

But for Monsignor's people's sudden clatter
Above us—bound to spoil such idle chatter
As ours: it were indeed a serious matter
If silly talk like ours should put to shame
The pious man, the man devoid of blame,
The . . . ah but—ah but, all the same,
No mere mortal has a right
To carry that exalted air;

Best people are not angels quite:
While—not the worst of people's doings scare

The devil; so there's that proud look to spare!

Which is mere counsel to myself, mind! for
I have just been the holy Monsignor:
And I was you too, Luigi's gentle mother,
And you too, Luigi!—how that Luigi started
Out of the turret—doubtlessly departed
On some good errand or another,
For he passed just now in a traveller's trim,
And the sullen company that prowled
About his path, I noticed, scowled
As if they had lost a prey in him.
And I was Jules the sculptor's bride,
And I was Ottima beside,
And now what am I?—tired of fooling.

Day for folly, night for schooling!
New Year's day is over and spent,
Ill or well, I must be content.

Even my lily's asleep, I vow:
Wake up—here's a friend I've plucked
you:

Call this flower a heart's-ease now!
Something rare, let me instruct you,
Is this, with petals triply swollen,
Three times spotted, thrice the pollen;
While the leaves and parts that witness
Old proportions and their fitness,
Here remain unchanged, unmoved now;
Call this pampered thing improved now!
Suppose there's a king of the flowers
And a girl-show held in his bowers—
"Look ye, buds, this growth of ours,"
Says he, "Zanze from the Brenta,
"I have made her gorge polenta
"Till both cheeks are near as bouncing
"As her . . . name there's no pronouncing!

"See this heightened colour too,
"For she swilled Breganze wine
"Till her nose turned deep carmine;
"Twas but white when wild she grew.
"And only by this Zanze's eyes
"Of which we could not change the size,
"The magnitude of all achieved
"Otherwise, may be perceived."

Oh what a drear dark close to my poor
day!

How could that red sun drop in that black cloud?

Ah Pippa, morning's rule is moved away,
Dispensed with, never more to be allowed!
Day's turn is over, now arrives the night's.
Oh lark, be day's apostle
To mavis, merle and throstle,
Bid them their betters jostle
From day and its delights!
But at night, brother howlet, over the woods,
Toll the world to thy chantry;
Sing to the bats' sleek sisterhood
Full complines with gallantry:
Then, owls and bats,
Cows and twats,

Monks and nuns, in a cloister's moods,
Adjourn to the oak-stump pantry !

[After she has begun to undress herself.]
Now, one thing I should like to really
know :

How near I ever might approach all these

I only fancied being, this long day :

—Approach, I mean, so as to touch them, so

As to . . . in some way . . . move them—

if you please,

Do good or evil to them some slight way.

For instance, if I wind

Silk to-morrow, my silk may bind

[Sitting on the bedside.]

And border Ottima's cloak's hem.

Ah me, and my important part with them,

This morning's hymn half promised when I rose !

True in some sense or other, I suppose.

[As she lies down.]

God bless me ! I can pray no more to-night.

No doubt, some way or other, hymns say
right.

All service ranks the same with God—

With God, whose puppets, best and worst,

Are we : there is no last nor first.

[She sleeps.]

KING VICTOR AND KING CHARLES;

A TRAGEDY.

1842.

[Victor Amadeus II., originally Duke of Savoy, obtained the title of King of Sardinia in 1720. He was a powerful and self-willed man, and a sagacious sovereign. Saddened by the death of his eldest and favourite son, and of his daughter, the Queen of Spain, he began to meditate abdication in favour of his son Charles. In 1728, after the death of his first wife, and upon his marriage with a second, he carried out his design and withdrew with his lady to his castle at Chambéry, where they both soon began to repent their conduct and to be sick of ennui. In 1731 King Charles was told that his father was on his way to Turin to take up his old post as king; but when father and son met, the former repudiated the notion, and alleged health as the sole ground of his return to the capital. King Charles placed the castle of Moncagliè at his father's disposal, where, however, King Victor resumed his intrigues, and at last demanded that his deed of resignation should be delivered up to be cancelled. King Charles felt the position very keenly, and vacillated a good deal; but finally he concurred in the opinion of his Council that there was nothing for it but to put the old king under arrest, which was done under the direction of the Marquis D'Ormea. King Victor died shortly afterwards, namely, in October 1732.]

NOTE.

So far as I know, this Tragedy is the first artistic consequence of what Voltaire termed "a terrible event without consequences;" and although it professes to be historical, I have taken more pains to arrive at the history than most readers would thank me for particularizing: since acquainted, as I will hope them to be, with the chief circumstances of Victor's remarkable European career—nor quite ignorant of the sad and surprising facts I am about to reproduce (a tolerable account of which is to be found, for instance, in Abbé Roman's Récit, or even the fifth of Lord Orrery's Letters from Italy)—I cannot expect them to be versed, nor desirous of becoming so, in all the detail of the memoirs, correspondence, and relations of the time. From these only may be obtained a knowledge of the fiery and audacious temper, unscrupulous selfishness, profound dissimulation, and singular fertility in resources, of Victor—the extreme and painful sensibility, prolonged immaturity of powers, earnest good purpose and vacillating will of Charles—the noble and right woman's manliness of his wife—and the ill-considered rascality and subsequent better-advised rectitude of D'Ormea. When I say, therefore, that I cannot but believe my statement (combining as it does what appears correct in Voltaire and plausible in Condorcet) more true to person and thing than any it has hitherto been my fortune to meet with, no doubt my word will be taken, and my evidence spared as readily. R. B.

LONDON: 1842.

KING VICTOR AND KING CHARLES.

PERSONS.

VICTOR AMADEUS, first King of Sardinia.
CHARLES EMMANUEL, his son, Prince of Piedmont.

D'ORMEA, minister.

TIME, 1730-1732.

FIRST YEAR, 1730.—KING VICTOR.

PART I.

CHARLES, POLYXENA.

Charles. You think so? Well, I do not.
Polyxena. My beloved,

All must clear up; we shall be happy yet :
This cannot last for ever—oh, may change
To-day or any day !

Charles. —May change? Ah yes—
May change !

Polyxena. Endure it, then.

Charles. No doubt, a life
Like this drags on, now better and now worse.
My father may . . . may take to loving me ;
And he may take D'Ormea closer yet
To counsel him ;—may even cast off her —That bad Sebastian ; but he also may . . . Or no, Polyxena, my only friend,
He may not force you from me ?

Polyxena. Now, force me
From you !—me, close by you as if there gloomed

No Sebastians, no D'Ormeas on our path—
At Rivoli or Turin, still at hand, Arch-counsellor, prime confidant . . . force
me !

Charles. Because I felt as sure, as I feel sure
We clasp hands now, of being happy once.
Young was I, quite neglected, nor concerned
By the world's business that engrossed so
much

My father and my brother : if I peered
From out my privacy,—amid the crash
And blaze of nations, domineered those two.
'Twas war, peace—France our foe, now—
England, friend—

In love with Spain—at feud with Austria !
Well—

I wondered, laughed a moment's laugh for pride

In the chivalrous couple, then let drop
My curtain—"I am out of it," I said—
When . . .

Polyxena. You have told me, Charles.

Charles. Polyxena—
When suddenly,—a warm March day, just
that !

Just so much sunshine as the cottage child
Basks in delighted, while the cottager
Takes off his bonnet, as he ceases work,
To catch the more of it—and it must fall
Heavily on my brother ! Had you seen
Philip—the lion-featured ! not like me !

Polyxena. I know—

Charles. And Philip's mouth
yet fast to mine,

His dead cheek on my cheek, his arm still
round

My neck,—they bade me rise, "for I was heir
"To the Duke," they said, "the right hand of the Duke :"

Till then he was my father, not the Duke.
So . . . let me finish . . . the whole intricate World's-business their dead boy was born to, I Must conquer,—ay, the brilliant thing he was,
I, of a sudden must be : my faults, my follies,
—All bitter truths were told me, all at once,
To end the sooner. What I simply styled
Their overlooking me, had been contempt :
How should the Duke employ himself, for-
sooth,

With such an one, while lordly Philip rode By him their Turin through? But he was punished,

And must put up with—me ! 'Twas sad
enough

To learn my future portion and submit.
And then the wear and worry, blame on
blame !

For, spring-sounds in my ears, spring-smells
about,

How could I but grow dizzy in their pent
Dim palace-rooms at first? My mother's look
As they discussed my insignificance,
She and my father, and I sitting by,—

I bore ; I knew how brave a son they missed :
Philip had gaily run state-papers through,
While Charles was spelling at them painfully !
But Victor was my father spite of that.

"Duke Victor's entire life has been," I said,
"Innumerable efforts to one end ;

"And on the point now of that end's success,
"Our Ducal turning to a Kingly crown,

"Where's time to be reminded 'tis his child
"He spurns?" And so I suffered—scarcely suffered,

Since I had you at length !

Polyxena. —To serve in place
Of monarch, minister, and mistress, Charles.

Charles. But, once that crown obtained, then wasn't not like

Our lot would alter? "When he rests, takes breath,
"Glances around, sees who there's left to
love—

"Now that my mother's dead, sees I am left—
"Is it not like he'll love me at the last?"
Well, Savoy turns Sardinia; the Duke's King:
Could I—precisely then—could you expect
His harshness to redouble? These few months
Have been . . . have been . . . Polyxena, do you

And God conduct me, or I lose myself!
What would he have? What is't they want
with me?

Him with this mistress and this minister,
—You see me and you hear him; judge us both!
Pronounce what I should do, Polyxena!

Polyxena. Endure, endure, beloved! Say
you not

He is your father? All's so incident
To novel sway! Beside, our life must change:
Or you'll acquire his kingcraft, or he'll find
Harshness a sorry way of teaching it.
I bear this—not that there's so much to bear.

Charles. You bear? Do not I know that you, tho' bound

To silence for my sake, are perishing
Piecemeal beside me? And how otherwise
When every creephole from the hideous Court
Is stopped: the Minister to dog me, here—
The Mistress posted to entrap you, there!
And thus shall we grow old in such a life;
Not careless, never estranged,—but old: to alter

Our life, there is so much to alter!

Polyxena. Come—

Is it agreed that we forego complaint
Even at Turin, yet complain we here
At Rivoli? 'Twere wiser you announced
Our presence to the King. What's now afoot
I wonder? Not that any more's to dread
Than every day's embarrassment: but guess
For me, why train so fast succeeded train
On the high-road, each gayer still than each!
I noticed your Archbishop's pursuivant,
The sable cloak and silver cross; such pomp Bodes . . . what now, Charles? Can you
conceive?

Charles. Not I.
Polyxena. A matter of some moment.

Charles. There's our life!
Which of the group of loiterers that stare
From the lime-avenue, divines that I—
About to figure presently, he thinks,
In face of all assembled—am the one
Who knows precisely least about it?

Polyxena. Tush!
D'Ormea's contrivance!

Charles. Ay, how otherwise
Should the young Prince serve for the old King's foil?

—So that the simplest courtier may remark
'Twere idle raising parties for a Prince
Content to linger the Court's laughing-stock.
Something, 'tis like, about that weary business

[Pointing to papers he has laid down, and which POLYXENA examines.

—Not that I comprehend three words, of
course,

After all last night's study.

Polyxena. The faint heart!
Why, as we rode and you rehearsed just now
Its substance . . . (that's the folded speech
I mean,

Concerning the Reduction of the Fiefs) —What would you have?—I fancied while
you spoke,
Some tones were just your father's.

Charles. Flattery!

Polyxena. I fancied so:—and here lurks, sure enough,
My note upon the Spanish Claims! You've mastered

The fief-speech thoroughly: this other, mind,
Is an opinion you deliver,—stay,
Best read it slowly over once to me;
Read—there's bare time; you read it firmly —loud

—Rather loud, looking in his face,—don't sink
Your eye once—ay, thus! "If Spain claims
. . ." begin

—Just as you look at me!

Charles. At you! Oh truly!
You have I seen, say, marshalling your troops,
Dismissing councils, or, through doors ajar,

Head sunk on hand, devoured by slow chagrins

—Then radiant, for a crown had all at once
Seemed possible again! I can behold
Him, whose least whisper ties my spirit fast,
In this sweet brow, nought could divert me from

Save objects like Sebastian's shameless lip,
Or worse, the clipped grey hair and dead
white face

And dwindling eye as if it ached with guile, D'Ormea wears . . .

[As he kisses her, enter from the KING's apartment D'ORMEA.

I said he would divert

My kisses from your brow!

D'Ormea [aside]. Here! So, King
Victor

Spoke truth for once: and who's ordained, but I

To make that memorable? Both in call,
As he declared. Were't better gnash the teeth,

Or laugh outright now?

Charles [to POLYXENA]. What's his visit
for?

D'Ormea [aside]. I question if they even speak to me.

Polyxena [to CHARLES]. Face the man!
He'll suppose you fear him, else.

[Aloud.] The Marquis bears the King's command, no doubt?

D'Ormea [aside]. Precisely!—If I threatened him, perhaps?

Well, this at least is punishment enough!
Men used to promise punishment would come.

Charles. Deliver the King's message,
Marquis!

D'Ormea [aside]. Ah—

So anxious for his fate? [Aloud.] A word,
my Prince,

Before you see your father—just one word
Of counsel!

Charles. Oh, your counsel certainly!

Polyxena, the Marquis counsels us!

Well, sir? Be brief, however!

D'Ormea. What? You know

As much as I?—preceded me, most like,

In knowledge! So! ('Tis in his eye, beside—

His voice: he knows it, and his heart's on flame

Already.) You surmise why you, myself,
Del Borgo, Spava, fifty nobles more,
Are summoned thus?

Charles. Is the Prince used to know,
At any time, the pleasure of the King,
Before his minister?—Polyxena,
Stay here till I conclude my task: I feel
Your presence (smile not) through the walls, and take

Fresh heart. The King's within that chamber?

D'Ormea [passing the table whereon a paper lies, exclaims, as he glances at it]. "Spain!"

Polyxena [aside to CHARLES]. Tarry awhile:
what ails the minister?

D'Ormea. Madam, I do not often trouble
you.

The Prince loathes, and you scorn me—let that pass!

But since it touches him and you, not me,
Bid the Prince listen!

Polyxena [to CHARLES]. Surely you will listen!

—Deceit?—those fingers crumpling up his vest?

Charles. Deceitful to the very fingers' ends!

D'Ormea [who has approached them, overlooks the other paper CHARLES continues to hold]. My project for the Fiefs! As I supposed!

Sir, I must give you light upon those measures —For this is mine, and that I spied of Spain,
Mine too!

Charles. Release me! Do you gloze on me
Who bear in the world's face (that is, the world
You make for me at Turin) your contempt?

—Your measures?—When was not a hateful task

D'Ormea's imposition? Leave my robe!

What post can I bestow, what grant concede?
Or do you take me for the King?

D'Ormea. Not I!

Not yet for King,—not for, as yet, thank God,
One who in . . . shall I say a year, a month?

Ay!—shall be wretcheder than e'er was slave
In his Sardinia.—Europe's spectacle
And the world's bye-word! What? The Prince aggrieved

That I excluded him our counsels? Here

[Touching the paper in CHARLES's hand.]

Accept a method of extorting gold
From Savoy's nobles, who must wring its worth
In silver first from tillers of the soil,
Whose hinds again have to contribute brass
To make up the amount: there's counsel, sir,
My counsel, one year old; and the fruit,
this—

Savoy's become a mass of misery
And wrath, which one man has to meet—
the King:

You're not the King! Another counsel, sir!
Spain entertains a project (here it lies)
Which, guessed, makes Austria offer that same King

Thus much to baffle Spain; he promises;
Then comes Spain, breathless lest she be forestalled,

Her offer follows; and he promises . . .

Charles. —Promises, sir, when he has just agreed

To Austria's offer?

D'Ormea. That's a counsel, Prince!

But past our foresight, Spain and Austria (choosing

To make their quarrel up between themselves
Without the intervention of a friend)

Produce both treaties, and both promises . . .

Charles. How?

D'Ormea. Prince, a counsel! And the fruit of that?

Both parties covenant afresh, to fall

Together on their friend, blot out his name,
Abolish him from Europe. So, take note,
Here's Austria and here's Spain to fight against:

And what sustains the King but Savoy here,
A miserable people mad with wrongs?

You're not the King!

Charles. Polyxena, you said

All would clear up: all does clear up to me.

D'Ormea. Clear up! 'Tis no such thing to envy, then?

You see the King's state in its length and breadth?

You blame me now for keeping you aloof
From counsels and the fruit of counsels?
Wait

Till I explain this morning's business!

Charles [aside]. No—

Stoop to my father, yes,—D'Ormea, no:
—The King's son, not to the King's counsellor!

I will do something, but at least retain
The credit of my deed. [Aloud.] Then it is
this

You now expressly come to tell me?

D'Ormea. This

To tell! You apprehend me?

Charles. Perfectly.

Further, D'Ormea, you have shown yourself,
For the first time these many weeks and months,

Disposed to do my bidding?

D'Ormea. From the heart!

Charles. Acquaint my father, first, I wait his pleasure:

Next . . . or, I'll tell you at a fitter time.

Acquaint the King!

D'Ormea [aside]. If I 'scape Victor yet!

First, to prevent this stroke at me: if not,—
Then, to avenge it! [To CHARLES.] Gracious sir, I go. [Goes.]

Charles. God, I forbore! Which more offends, that man

Or that man's master? Is it come to this?
Have they supposed (the sharpest insult yet)
I needed e'en his intervention? No!
No—dull am I, conceded,—but so dull,
Scarcely! Their step decides me.

Polyxena. How decides?

Charles. You would be freed D'Ormea's eye and hers?

—Could fly the court with me and live content?

So, this it is for which the knights assemble!
The whispers and the closeting of late;

The savageness and insolence of old,

—For this!

Polyxena. What mean you?

Charles. How? You fail to catch

Their clever plot? I missed it, but could you? These last two months of care to inculcate How dull I am,—D'Ormea's present visit To prove that, being dull, I might be worse Were I a King—as wretched as now dull— You recognize in it no winding up Of a long plot?

Polyxena. Why should there be a plot?

Charles. The crown's secure now; I should shame the crown—

An old complaint; the point is, how to gain My place for one, more fit in Victor's eyes, His mistress the Sebastian's child.

Polyxena. In truth?

Charles. They dare not quite dethrone Sardinia's Prince:

But they may descant on my dulness till They sting me into even praying them Grant leave to hide my head, resign my state, And end the coil. Not see now? In a word, They'd have me tender them myself my rights As one incapable;—some cause for that, Since I delayed thus long to see their drift! I shall apprise the King he may resume My rights this moment.

Polyxena. Pause! I dare not think So ill of Victor.

Charles. Think no ill of him!

Polyxena.—Nor think him, then, so shallow as to suffer

His purpose be divined thus easily. And yet—you are the last of a great line; There's a great heritage at stake; new days Seemed to await this newest of the realms Of Europe:—Charles, you must withstand this!

Charles. Ah—

You dare not then renounce the splendid Court For one whom all the world despises? Speak!

Polyxena. My gentle husband, speak I will, and truth.

Were this as you believe, and I once sure Your duty lay in so renouncing rule, I could . . . could? Oh what happiness it were—

To live, my Charles, and die, alone with you!

Charles. I grieve I asked you. To the presence, then!

By this, D'Ormea acquaints the King, no doubt,

He fears I am too simple for mere hints, And that no less will serve than Victor's mouth Demonstrating in council what I am.

I have not breathed, I think, these many years!

Polyxena. Why, it may be!—if he desire to wed

That woman, call legitimate her child.

Charles. You see as much? Oh, let his will have way!

You'll not repent confiding in me, love? There's many a brighter spot in Piedmont, far, Than Rivoli. I'll seek him: or, suppose

You hear first how I mean to speak my mind?—Loudly and firmly both, this time, be sure!

I yet may see your Rhine-land, who can tell? Once away, ever then away! I breathe.

Polyxena. And I too breathe.

Charles. Come, my Polyxena!

KING VICTOR.

PART II.

Enter King VICTOR, bearing the Regalia on a cushion, from his apartment. He calls loudly.

Victor. D'Ormea!—for patience fails me, treading thus

Among the obscure trains I have laid,—my knights

Safe in the hall here—in that anteroom, My son,—D'Ormea, where? Of this, one touch—

[Laying down the crown.]
This fireball to these mute black cold trains—then

Outbreak enough!

[Contemplating it.] To lose all, after all! This, glancing o'er my house for ages—shaped,

Brave meteor, like the crown of Cyprus now, Jerusalem, Spain, England, every change

The braver,—and when I have clutched a prize

My ancestry died wan with watching for,

To lose it!—by a slip, a fault, a trick
 Learnt to advantage once and not unlearned
 When past the use,—“just this once more”

(I thought)

“Use it with Spain and Austria happily,
 “And then away with trick!” An oversight
 I'd have repaired thrice over, any time
 These fifty years, must happen now! There's peace

At length; and I, to make the most of peace,
 Ventured my project on our people here,
 As needing not their help: which Europe
 knows,

And means, cold-blooded, to dispose herself
 (Apart from plausibilities of war)
 To crush the new-made King—who ne'er till now

Feared her. As Duke, I lost each foot of earth

And laughed at her: my name was left, my sword

Left, all was left! But she can take, she knows,

This crown, herself conceded . . . That's to try,

Kind Europe! My career's not closed as yet!
 This boy was ever subject to my will,

Timid and tame—the fitter! D'Ormea, too—
 What if the sovereign also rid himself
 Of thee, his prime of parasites?—I delay!

D'Ormea! [As D'ORMEA enters, the KING seats himself.

My son, the Prince—attends he?

D'Ormea. Sir,

He does attend. The crown prepared!—it seems

That you persist in your resolve.

Victor. Who's come?

The chancellor and the chamberlain? My knights?

D'Ormea. The whole Annunziata. If, my
 liege,

Your fortune had not tottered worse than
 now . . .

Victor. Del Borgo has drawn up the schedules? mine—

My son's, too? Excellent! Only, beware
 Of the least blunder, or we look but fools.

First, you read the Annulment of the Oaths;
 Del Borgo follows . . . no, the Prince shall sign;

Then let Del Borgo read the Instrument:

On which, I enter.

D'Ormea. Sir, this may be truth;

You, sir, may do as you affect—may break
 Your engine, me, to pieces: try at least
 If not a spring remain worth saving! Take
 My counsel as I've counselled many times!
 What if the Spaniard and the Austrian threat?
 There's England, Holland, Venice—which ally

Select you?

Victor. Aha! Come, D'Ormea,—
 “truth”

Was on your lip a minute since: Allies?
 I've broken faith with Venice, Holland,
 England

—As who knows if not you?

D'Ormea. But why with me

Break faith—with one ally, your best, break
 faith?

Victor. When first I stumbled on you,
 Marquis—'twas

At Mondovi—a little lawyer's clerk . . .

D'Ormea. Therefore your soul's ally!— who brought you through

Your quarrel with the Pope, at pains enough—
 Who simply echoed you in these affairs—

On whom you cannot therefore visit these Affairs' ill-fortune—whom you trust to guide
 You safe (yes, on my soul) through these affairs!

Victor. I was about to notice, had you not Prevented me, that since that great town kept
 With its chicane D'Ormea's satchel stuffed
 And D'Ormea's self sufficiently recluse,
 He missed a sight,—my naval armament
 When I burned Toulon. How the skiff exults

Upon the galliot's¹ wave!—rises its height,
 O'ertops it even; but the great wave bursts,
 And hell-deep in the horrible profound
 Buries itself the galliot: shall the skiff

 for speed.

Think to escape the sea's black trough in turn?

Apply this : you have been my minister

—Next me, above me possibly ;—sad post,
Huge care, abundant lack of peace of mind ;

Who would desiderate the eminence?

You gave your soul to get it ; you'd yet give

Your soul to keep it, as I mean you shall,

D'Ormea ! What if the wave ebbed with me?

Whereas it cants you to another crest ;

I toss you to my son ; ride out your ride !

D'Ormea. Ah, you so much despise me?

Victor. You, D'Ormea?

Nowise : and I'll inform you why. A king

Must in his time have many ministers,

And I've been rash enough to part with mine

When I thought proper. Of the tribe, not one '... Or wait, did Pianezze?—ah, just the same !)

Not one of them, ere his remonstrance reached

The length of yours, but has assured me

(commonly

Standing much as you stand,—or nearer, say,

The door to make his exit on his speech)

—I should repent of what I did. D'Ormea,

Be candid, you approached it when I bade you

Prepare the schedules ! But you stopped in time,

You have not so assured me : how should I

Despise you then?

Enter CHARLES.

Victor [changing his tone]. Are you instructed? Do

My order, point by point ! About it, sir !

D'Ormea. You so despise me ! [Aside.]

One last stay remains—

The boy's discretion there.

[To CHARLES.] For your sake, Prince,

I pleaded, wholly in your interest,

To save you from this fate !

Charles [aside]. Must I be told

The Prince was supplicated for—by him?

Victor [to D'ORMEA]. Apprise Del Borgo,

Spava, and the rest,

Our son attends them ; then return.

D'Ormea.

One word !

Charles [aside]. A moment's pause and they would drive me hence,

I do believe !

D'Ormea [aside]. Let but the boy be firm !

Victor. You disobey?

Charles [to D'ORMEA]. You do not disobey

Me, at least? Did you promise that or no?

D'Ormea. Sir, I am yours : what would you?

Yours am I !

Charles. When I have said what I shall say, 'tis like

Your face will ne'er again disgust me. Go !

Through you, as through a breast of glass, I see.

And for your conduct, from my youth till now,

Take my contempt ! You might have spared me much,

Secured me somewhat, nor so harmed yourself :

That's over now. Go, ne'er to come again !

D'Ormea. As son, the father—father as, the son !

My wits ! My wits !

[Goes.]

Victor [seated]. And you, what meant you, pray,

Speaking thus to D'Ormea?

Charles.

Let us not

Waste words upon D'Ormea ! Those I spent

Have half unsettled what I came to say.

His presence vexes to my very soul.

Victor. One called to manage a kingdom,

Charles, needs heart

To bear up under worse annoyances

Than seems D'Ormea—to me, at least.

Charles [aside]. Ah, good !

He keeps me to the point. Then be it so.

[Aloud.] Last night, sir, brought me certain papers—these—

To be reported on,—your way of late.

Is it last night's result that you demand?

Victor. For God's sake, what has night brought forth? Pronounce

The . . . what's your word?—result !

Charles.

Sir, that had proved

Quite worthy of your sneer, no doubt :—a few

Lame thoughts, regard for you alone could wring,

Lame as they are, from brains like mine, believe !

As 'tis, sir, I am spared both toil and sneer.
These are the papers.

Victor. Well, sir? I suppose You hardly burned them. Now for your result!

Charles. I never should have done great things of course,
But . . . oh my father, had you loved me
more!

Victor. Loved? [Aside.] Has D'Ormea played me false, I wonder?

[Aloud.] Why, Charles, a king's love is diffused—yourself

May overlook, perchance, your part in it.
Our monarchy is absolutest now

In Europe, or my trouble's thrown away.
I love, my mode, that subjects each and all
May have the power of loving, all and each,
Their mode: I doubt not, many have their sons
To trifle with, talk soft to, all day long:

I have that crown, this chair, D'Ormea,
Charles!

Charles. 'Tis well I am a subject then, not
you.

Victor [aside]. D'Ormea has told him everything.

[Aloud.] Aha!

I apprehend you: when all's said, you take
Your private station to be prized beyond
My own, for instance?

Charles. —Do and ever did
So take it: 'tis the method you pursue
That grieves . . .

Victor. These words! Let me express, my friend,
Your thoughts. You penetrate what I supposed

Secret. D'Ormea plies his trade betimes!
I purpose to resign my crown to you.

Charles. To me?

Victor. Now,—in that chamber.

Charles. You resign
The crown to me?

Victor. And time enough, Charles,
sure?

Confess with me, at four-and-sixty years
A crown's a load. I covet quiet once
Before I die, and summoned you for that.

Charles. 'Tis I will speak: you ever hated
me.

I bore it,—have insulted me, borne too—
Now you insult yourself; and I remember
What I believed you, what you really are,
And cannot bear it. What! My life has passed

Under your eye, tormented as you know,—
Your whole sagacities, one after one,
At leisure brought to play on me—to prove me
A fool, I thought and I submitted; now
You'd prove . . . what would you prove me?

Victor. This to me?

I hardly know you!

Charles. Know me? Oh indeed
You do not! Wait till I complain next time
Of my simplicity!—for here's a sage Knows the world well, is not to be deceived,
And his experience and his Macchiavels, D'Ormeas, teach him—what?—that I this
while

I have envied him his crown! He has not smiled,

I warrant,—has not eaten, drunk, nor slept,
For I was plotting with my Princess yonder!
Who knows what we might do or might not do?

Go now, be politic, astound the world!
That sentry in the antechamber—nay,
The varlet who disposed this precious trap

[Pointing to the crown.]

That was to take me—ask them if they think
Their own sons envy them their posts!—Know
me!

Victor. But you know me, it seems: so,
learn in brief,

My pleasure. This assembly is convened . . .

Charles. Tell me, that woman put it in your head!

You were not sole contriver of the scheme,
My father!

Victor. Now observe me, sir! I jest
Seldom—on these points, never. Here, I say,
The knights assemble to see me concede,
And you accept, Sardinia's crown.

Charles. Farewell!
'Twere vain to hope to change this: I can end it.

Not that I cease from being yours, when sunk
Into obscurity : I'll die for you,
But not annoy you with my presence. Sir,
Farewell ! Farewell !

Enter D'ORMEA.

D'Ormea [aside]. Ha, sure he's changed
again—
Means not to fall into the cunning trap !
Then Victor, I shall yet escape you, Victor !
Victor [suddenly placing the crown upon the head of CHARLES]. D'Ormea, your
King !

[To CHARLES.] My son, obey me !
Charles,
Your father, clearer-sighted than yourself,
Decides it must be so. 'Faith, this looks real !
My reasons after ; reason upon reason
After : but now, obey me ! Trust in me !
By this, you save Sardinia, you save me !
Why, the boy swoons ! [To D'ORMEA.]
Come this side !

D'Ormea [as CHARLES turns from him to VICTOR]. You persist ?
Victor. Yes, I conceive the gesture's meaning. 'Faith,
He almost seems to hate you : how is that ?
Be re-assured, my Charles ! Is't over now ?
Then, Marquis, tell the new King what remains

To do ! A moment's work. Del Borgo reads
The Act of Abdication out, you sign it,
Then I sign ; after that, come back to me.

D'Ormea. Sir, for the last time, pause !
Victor. Five minutes longer
I am your sovereign, Marquis. Hesitate—
And I'll so turn those minutes to account
That . . . Ay, you recollect me ! [Aside.]

Could I bring
My foolish mind to undergo the reading
That Act of Abdication !

[As CHARLES motions D'ORMEA to precede him.
Thanks, dear Charles !
[CHARLES and D'ORMEA retire.]

Victor. A novel feature in the boy,—indeed Just what I feared he wanted most. Quite
right,

This earnest tone : your truth, now, for effect !
It answers every purpose : with that look,
That voice,—I hear him : "I began no treaty,"

(He speaks to Spain), "nor ever dreamed of
this

"You show me ; this I from my soul regret ;
"But if my father signed it, bid not me
"Dishonour him—who gave me all, beside :"
And, "True," says Spain, "'twere harsh to visit that
"Upon the Prince." Then come the nobles trooping :

"I grieve at these exactions—I had cut
"This hand off ere impose them ; but shall I
"Undo my father's deed?"—and they confer :
"Doubtless he was no party, after all ;
"Give the Prince time !"

Ay, give us time, but time !
Only, he must not, when the dark day comes,
Refer our friends to me and frustrate all.
We'll have no child's play, no desponding fits,
No Charles at each cross turn entreating
Victor

To take his crown again. Guard against that !

Enter D'ORMEA.

Long live King Charles !

No—Charles's counsellor !
Well, is it over, Marquis ? Did I jest ?

D'Ormea. "King Charles !" What then may you be ?

Victor. Anything !
A country gentleman that, cured of bustle,
Now beats a quick retreat toward Chambery,
Would hunt and hawk and leave you noisy folk
To drive your trade without him. I'm Count
Remont—

Count Tende—any little place's Count !
D'Ormea. Then Victor, Captain against Catinat

At Staffarde, where the French beat you ; and Duke
At Turin, where you beat the French ; King
late

Of Savoy, Piedmont, Montferrat, Sardinia, —Now, "any little place's Count"—

Victor. Proceed !

D'Ormea. Breaker of vows to God, who crowned you first ;

Breaker of vows to man, who kept you since ;
Most profligate to me who outraged God
And man to serve you, and am made pay crimes

I was but privy to, by passing thus
To your imbecile son—who, well you know,
Must—(when the people here, and nations there,

Clamour for you the main delinquent, slipped
From King to—"Count of any little place")
Must needs surrender me, all in his reach,—
I, sir, forgive you : for I see the end—
See you on your return—(you will return)—
To him you trust, a moment . . .

Victor. Trust him? How?
My poor man, merely a prime-minister,
Make me know where my trust errs !

D'Ormea. In his fear,
His love, his—but discover for yourself
What you are weakest, trusting in !

Victor. Aha,
D'Ormea, not a shrewder scheme than this
In your repertory? You know old Victor— Vain, choleric, inconstant, rash—(I've heard Talkers who little thought the King so close)
Felicitous now, were't not, to provoke him
To clean forget, one minute afterward,
His solemn act, and call the nobles back
And pray them give again the very power
He has abjured?—for the dear sake of what?
Vengeance on you, D'Ormea! No: such am I,

Count Tende or Count anything you please,
—Only, the same that did the things you say,
And, among other things you say not, used
Your finest fibre, meanest muscle,—you
I used, and now, since you will have it so,
Leave to your fate—mere lumber in the midst,
You and your works. Why, what on earth
beside

Are you made for, you sort of ministers?

D'Ormea. Not left, though, to my fate !

Your witless son

Has more wit than to load himself with lumber :

He foils you that way, and I follow you.

Victor. Stay with my son—protect the weaker side !

D'Ormea. Ay, to be tossed the people like a rag,
And flung by them for Spain and Austria's
sport,

Abolishing the record of your part
In all this perfidy !

Victor. Prevent, beside,
My own return !

D'Ormea. That's half prevented now !
'Twill go hard but you find a wondrous charm
In exile, to discredit me. The Alps,
Silk-mills to watch, vines asking vigilance—
Hounds open for the stag, your hawk's
a-wing—

Brave days that wait the Louis of the South,
Italy's Janus !

Victor. So, the lawyer's clerk
Won't tell me that I shall repent !

D'Ormea. You give me
Full leave to ask if you repent ?

Victor. Whene'er
Sufficient time's elapsed for that, you judge !
[Shouts inside "King CHARLES !"]

D'Ormea. Do you repent?

Victor [after a slight pause]. . . I've kept them waiting? Yes !

Come in, complete the Abdication, sir !

[They go out.]

Enter POLYXENA.

Polyxena. A shout ! The sycophants are free of Charles !

Oh is not this like Italy? No fruit
Of his or my distempered fancy, this,
But just an ordinary fact ! Beside,
Here they've set forms for such proceedings ;

Victor
Imprisoned his own mother : he should know,
If any, how a son's to be deprived
Of a son's right. Our duty's palpable.
Ne'er was my husband for the wily king
And the unworthy subjects : be it so !
Come you safe out of them, my Charles ! Our
life

Grows not the broad and dazzling life, I dreamed

Might prove your lot ; for strength was shut And I, alone, tend upward, more and more in you

None guessed but I—strength which, un- Tend upward : I am grown Sardinia's King.
trammelled once, Polyxena. Now stop : was not this Victor,

Had little shamed your vaunted ancestry— Duke of Savoy
Patience and self-devotion, fortitude, At ten years old?

Simplicity and utter truthfulness Charles. He was.
—All which, they shout to lose ! Polyxena. And the Duke spent

So, now my work Since then, just four-and-fifty years in toil Begins — to save him from regret. Save To be—what?

Charles. King.
Regret?—the noble nature ! He's not made Polyxena. Then why unking himself?
Like these Italians : 'tis a German soul. Charles. Those years are cause enough.

CHARLES enters crowned.

Oh, where's the King's heir? Gone !—the Polyxena. The only cause?
Crown Prince? Gone !— Charles. Some new perplexities.
Where's Savoy? Gone !—Sardinia? Gone ! Polyxena. Which you can solve

But Charles. Although he cannot?
Charles. He assures me so.

Is left ! And when my Rhine-land bowers Polyxena. And this he means shall last—arrive, how long?

If he looked almost handsome yester-twilight Charles. How long?
As his grey eyes seemed widening into Think you I fear the perils I confront?
black He's praising me before the people's face—
Because I praised him, then how will he My people !

look ? Polyxena. Then he's changed — grown kind, the King?

Farewell, you stripped and whited mulberry- Where can the trap be?
trees Charles. Heart and soul I pledge !

Bound each to each by lazy ropes of vine ! My father, could I guard the crown you gained,
Now I'll teach you my language : I'm not Transmit as I received it,—all good else forced Would I surrender !

To speak Italian now, Charles ? Polyxena. Ah, it opens then [She sees the crown.] What is this? Before you, all you dreaded formerly?

Answer me—who has done this? Answer ! You are rejoiced to be a king, my Charles ?

Charles. He ! —much to dread?
I am King now.

Polyxena. Oh worst, worst, worst of all ! The better. I'll adventure though alone.
Tell me ! What, Victor? He has made you Triumph or die, there's Victor still to witness

King? Who dies or triumphs—either way, alone !
What's he then? What's to follow this? Polyxena. Once I had found my share in You, King? triumph, Charles,

Charles. Have I done wrong? Yes, for Or death.
you were not by ! Charles. But you are I ! But you I call Polyxena. Tell me from first to last. To take, Heaven's proxy, vows I tendered Charles. Hush—a new world Heaven

Brightens before me ; he is moved away A moment since. I will deserve the crown !
—The dark form that eclipsed it, he subsides Polyxena. You will. [Aside.] No doubt
Into a shape supporting me like you, it were a glorious thing

For any people, if a heart like his Ruled over it. I would I saw the trap.

Enter VICTOR.

'Tis he must show me.

Victor. So, the mask falls off
An old man's foolish love at last. Spare thanks!

I know you, and Polyxena I know.
Here's Charles—I am his guest now—does he bid me

Be seated? And my light-haired blue-eyed
child

Must not forget the old man far away
At Chambery, who dozes while she reigns.

Polyxena. Most grateful shall we now be, talking least

Of gratitude—indeed of anything
That hinders what yourself must need to say To Charles.

Charles. Pray speak, sir!

Victor. 'Faith, not much to say:
Only what shows itself, you once i' the point Of sight. You're now the King: you'll comprehend

Much you may oft have wondered at—the
shifts,

Dissimulation, wiliness I showed.

For what's our post? Here's Savoy and here's Piedmont,

Here's Montferrat—a breadth here, a space
there—

To o'ersweep all these, what's one weapon worth?

I often think of how they fought in Greece:
(Or Rome, which was it? You're the scholar, Charles!)

You made a front-thrust? But if your shield
too

Were not adroitly planted, some shrewd knave
Reached you behind; and him foiled, straight if thong

And handle of that shield were not cast loose,
And you enabled to outstrip the wind,

Fresh foes assailed you, either side; 'scape
these,

And reach your place of refuge—e'en then, odds
If the gate opened unless breath enough

Were left in you to make its lord a speech.

Oh, you will see!

Charles. No: straight on shall I go,
Truth helping; win with it or die with it,

Victor. 'Faith, Charles, you're not made
Europe's fighting-man!

The barrier-guarder, if you please. You clutch
Hold and consolidate, with envious France

This side, with Austria that, the territory
I held—ay, and will hold . . . which you shall hold

Despite the couple! But I've surely earned Exemption from these weary politics,

—The privilege to prattle with my son
And daughter here, though Europe wait the while.

Polyxena. Nay, sir,—at Chambery, away
for ever,

As soon you will be, 'tis farewell we bid
you:

Turn these few fleeting moments to account!
'Tis just as though it were a death.

Victor. Indeed!
Polyxena [aside]. Is the trap there?

Charles. Ay, call this parting—death!
The sacred your memory becomes.

If I misrule Sardinia, how bring back
My father?

Victor. I mean . . .
Polyxena [who watches VICTOR narrowly this while]. Your father does not mean

You should be ruling for your father's sake:
It is your people must concern you wholly Instead of him. You mean this, sir? (He drops

My hand!)

Charles. That people is now part of me.
Victor. About the people! I took certain measures

Some short time since . . . Oh, I know well, you know

But little of my measures! These affect
The nobles; we've resumed some grants, imposed

A tax or two: prepare yourself, in short,
For clamour on that score. Mark me: you yield

No jot of aught entrusted you!

Polyxena.
You yield!

Charles. My father, when I took the oath, Although my eye might stray in search of yours, I heard it, understood it, promised God What you require. Till from this eminence He move me, here I keep, nor shall concede The meanest of my rights.

Victor [aside]. The boy's a fool!
—Or rather, I'm a fool: for, what's wrong here?

To-day the sweets of reigning: let to-morrow Be ready with its biters.

Enter D'ORMEA.

There's beside Somewhat to press upon your notice first.

Charles. Then why delay it for an instant, sir?

That Spanish claim perchance? And, now you speak,

—This morning, my opinion was mature, Which, boy-like, I was bashful in producing To one I ne'er am like to fear in future! My thought is formed upon that Spanish claim.

Victor. Betimes indeed. Not now, Charles! You require

A host of papers on it.

D'Ormea [coming forward]. Here they are.
[To CHARLES.] I, sir, was minister and much beside

Of the late monarch; to say little, him I served: on you I have, to say e'en less, No claim. This case contains those papers: with them

I tender you my office.

Victor [hastily]. Keep him, Charles! There's reason for it—many reasons: you Distrust him, nor are so far wrong there,—but He's mixed up in this matter—he'll desire To quit you, for occasions known to me: Do not accept those reasons: have him stay!

Polyxena [aside]. His minister thrust on us!
Charles [to D'ORMEA]. Sir, believe,

In justice to myself, you do not need E'en this commending: howso'er might seem My feelings toward you, as a private man, They quit me in the vast and untried field

No jot

Of action. Though I shall myself (as late In your own hearing I engaged to do) Preside o'er my Sardinia, yet your help Is necessary. Think the past forgotten And serve me now!

D'Ormea. I did not offer you My service—would that I could serve you, sir! As for the Spanish matter . . .

Victor. But despatch At least the dead, in my good daughter's phrase,

Before the living! Help to house me safe Ere with D'Ormea you set the world a-gape! Here is a paper—will you overlook What I propose reserving for my needs? I get as far from you as possible; Here's what I reckon my expenditure.

Charles [reading]. A miserable fifty thousand crowns—

Victor. Oh, quite enough for country gentlemen!

Beside the exchequer happens . . . but find out

All that, yourself!

Charles [still reading]. "Count Tende"—what means this?

Victor. Me: you were but an infant when I burst

Through the defile of Tende upon France. Had only my allies kept true to me!

No matter. Tende's, then, a name I take Just as . . .

D'Ormea. —The Marchioness Sebastian takes

The name of Spigno.

Charles. How, sir?

Victor [to D'ORMEA]. Fool! All that Was for my own detailing. [To CHARLES:] That anon!

Charles [to D'ORMEA]. Explain what you have said, sir!

D'Ormea. I supposed The marriage of the King to her I named, Profoundly kept a secret these few weeks, Was not to be one, now he's Count.

Polyxena [aside]. With us The minister—with him the mistress!

Charles [to VICTOR]. No—

Tell me you have not taken her—that woman
To live with, past recall!

Victor. And where's the crime . . .

Polyxena [to CHARLES]. True, sir, this is a matter past recall

And past your cognizance. A day before,
And you had been compelled to note this:
now,—

Why note it? The King saved his House from shame:

What the Count did, is no concern of yours.

Charles [after a pause]. The Spanish claim, D'Ormea!

Victor. Why, my son,
I took some ill-advised . . . one's age, in fact,

Spoils everything: though I was overreached,
A younger brain, we'll trust, may extricate
Sardinia readily. To-morrow, D'Ormea, Inform the King!

D'Ormea [without regarding VICTOR, and leisurely]. Thus stands the case with Spain:

When first the Infant Carlos claimed his proper Succession to the throne of Tuscany . . .

Victor. I tell you, that stands over! Let that rest!

There is the policy!

Charles [to D'ORMEA]. Thus much I know,
And more—too much: the remedy?

D'Ormea. Of course!

No glimpse of one.

Victor. No remedy at all!

It makes the remedy itself—time makes it.

D'Ormea [to CHARLES]. But if . . .

Victor [still more hastily]. In fine, I shall take care of that:

And, with another project that I have . . .

D'Ormea [turning on him]. Oh, since

Count Tende means to take again

King Victor's crown!—

Polyxena [throwing herself at VICTOR'S feet]. E'en now retake it, sir!

Oh speak! We are your subjects both, once
more!

Say it—a word effects it! You meant not,
Nor do mean now, to take it: but you must!

'Tis in you—in your nature—and the shame's
Not half the shame 'twould grow to afterwards!

Charles. Polyxena!

Polyxena. A word recalls the knights—

Say it! What's promising and what's the past?

Say you are still King Victor!

D'Ormea.

Better say

The Count repents, in brief! [VICTOR rises.]

Charles.

With such a crime

I have not charged you, sir!

Polyxena. (Charles turns from me!)

SECOND YEAR, 1731.—KING CHARLES.

PART I.

*Enter Queen POLYXENA and D'ORMEA.—
A pause.*

Polyxena. And now, sir, what have you to
say?

D'Ormea. Count Tende . . .

Polyxena. Affirm not I betrayed you; you resolve

On uttering this strange intelligence

—Nay, post yourself to find me ere I reach

The capital, because you know King Charles

Tarries a day or two at Evian baths

Behind me:—but take warning,—here and thus [Seating herself in the royal seat.]

I listen, if I listen—not your friend.

Explicitly the statement, if you still

Persist to urge it on me, must proceed:

I am not made for aught else.

D'Ormea. Good! Count Tende . . .

Polyxena. I, who mistrust you, shall acquaint King Charles

Who even more mistrusts you.

D'Ormea.

Does he so?

Polyxena. Why should he not?

D'Ormea.

Ay, why not?

Motives, seek

You virtuous people, motives! Say, I serve

God at the devil's bidding—will that do?

I'm proud: our people have been pacified,

Really I know not how—

- Polyxena.* By truthfulness. That's not this year's care-burthened voice and step:
D'Ormea. Exactly; that shows I had 'Tis last year's step, the Prince's voice!
 nought to do D'Ormea. I know.
 With pacifying them. Our foreign perils
 Also exceed my means to stay: but here
 'Tis otherwise, and my pride's piqued. Count
 Tende
 Completes a full year's absence: would you, Charles. Now wish me joy, Polyxena!
 madam, Wish it me
 Have the old monarch back, his mistress The old way! [She embraces him.
 back, There was too much cause for that!
 His measures back? I pray you, act upon But I have found myself again. What news
 My counsel, or they will be. 'At Turin? Oh, if you but felt the load Polyxena. When? I'm free of—free! I said this year would end D'Ormea. Let's think. Or it, or me—but I am free, thank God!
 Home-matters settled—Victor's coming now; Polyxena. How, Charles?
 Let foreign matters settle—Victor's here Charles. You do not Unless I stop him; as I will, this way. guess? The day I found Polyxena [reading the papers he presents]. Sardinia's hideous coil, at home, abroad,
 If 'this should prove a plot 'twixt you And how my father was involved in it,— and Victor? Of course, I vowed to rest and smile no more
 You seek annoyances to give the pretext Until I cleared his name from obloquy.
 For what you say you fear. We did the people right—'twas much to gain D'Ormea. Oh, possibly! That point, redress our nobles' grievance, too—
 I go for nothing. Only show King Charles But that took place here, was no crying shame:
 That thus Count Tende purposes return, All must be done abroad,—if I abroad
 And style me his inviter, if you please! Appeased the justly-angered Powers, de-Polyxena. Half of your tale is true; most stroyed like, the Count The scandal, took down Victor's name at last Seeks to return: but why stay you with us? From a bad eminence, I then might breathe
 To aid in such emergencies. And rest! No moment was to lose. Behold D'Ormea. Keep safe The proud result—a Treaty, Austria, Spain Those papers: or, to serve me, leave no Agree to—proof D'Ormea [aside]. I shall merely stipulate I thus have counselled! When the Count For an experienced headsman.
 returns, Charles. Not a soul
 And the King abdicates, 'twill stead me little Is compromised: the blotted past's a blank:
 To have thus counselled. Even D'Ormea escapes unquestioned. See!
Polyxena. The King abdicate! It reached me from Vienna; I remained D'Ormea. He's good, we knew long since At Evian to despatch the Count his news;
 —wise, we discover— 'Tis gone to Chambery a week ago—
 Firm, let us hope:—but I'd have gone to work And here am I: do I deserve to feel 'With him away. Well! Your warm white arms around me?
 [CHARLES without]. In the Council D'Ormea [coming forward]. He knows Chamber? that?
D'Ormea. All's lost! Charles. What, in Heaven's name, means Polyxena. Oh, surely not King this?
 Charles! He's changed— D'Ormea. He knows that matters

Are settled at Vienna? Not too late!
Plainly, unless you post this very hour
Some man you trust (say, me) to Chambery
And take precautions I acquaint you with,
Your father will return here.

Charles. Are you crazed,
D'Ormea? Here? For what? As well return
To take his crown!

D'Ormea. He will return for that.

Charles [to POLYXENA]. You have not listened to this man?

Polyxena. He spoke
About your safety—and I listened.

[He disengages himself from her arms.]

Charles [to D'ORMEA]. What
Apprised you of the Count's intentions?

D'Ormea. Me?
His heart, sir; you may not be used to read

Such evidence however; therefore read
[Pointing to POLYXENA's papers.]
My evidence.

Charles [to POLYXENA]. Oh, worthy this of you!

And of your speech I never have forgotten,
Though I professed forgetfulness; which haunts me

As if I did not know how false it was;
Which made me toil unconsciously thus long
That there might be no least occasion left
For aught of its prediction coming true!

And now, when there is left no least occasion
To instigate my father to such crime—
When I might venture to forget (I hoped)
That speech and recognize Polyxena—
Oh worthy, to revive, and tenfold worse,
That plague! D'Ormea at your ear, his slanders

Still in your hand! Silent?

Polyxena. As the wronged are.

Charles. And you, D'Ormea, since when have you presumed

To spy upon my father? I conceive
What that wise paper shows, and easily.
Since when?

D'Ormea. The when and where and how belong

To me. 'Tis sad work, but I deal in such.

You oftimes serve yourself; I'd serve you
here:

Use makes me not so squeamish. In a word,
Since the first hour he went to Chambery,
Of his seven servants, five have I suborned.

Charles. You hate my father?

D'Ormea. Oh, just as you will!

[Looking at POLYXENA.]

A minute since, I loved him—hate him, now!
What matter?—if you ponder just one thing:
Has he that treaty?—he is setting forward
Already. Are your guards here?

Charles. Well for you
They are not! [To POLYXENA.] Him I knew of old, but you—

To hear that pickthank, further his designs!
[To D'ORMEA.]

Guards?—were they here, I'd bid them, for your trouble,

Arrest you.

D'Ormea. Guards you shall not want.

I lived

The servant of your choice, not of your need.
You never greatly needed me till now
That you discard me. This is my arrest.
Again I tender you my charge—its duty
Would bid me press you read those documents.

Here, sir! [Offering his badge of office.]

Charles [taking it]. The papers also! Do you think

I dare not read them?

Polyxena. Read them, sir!

Charles. They prove,

My father, still a month within the year
Since he so solemnly consigned it me, Means to resume his crown? They shall prove that,

Or my best dungeon . . .

D'Ormea. Even say, Chambery!
'Tis vacant, I surmise, by this.

Charles. You prove
Your words or pay their forfeit, sir. Go
there!

Polyxena, one chance to rend the veil
Thickening and blackening 'twixt us two!
Do say,

You'll see the falsehood of the charges proved!

Do say, at least, you wish to see them proved
False charges—my heart's love of other times!

Polyzena. Ah, Charles!

Charles [to D'ORMEA]. Precede me, sir!

D'Ormea. And I'm at length

A martyr for the truth! No end, they say,
Of miracles. My conscious innocence!

[As they go out, enter—by the middle door, at which he pauses—VICTOR.]

Victor. Sure I heard voices? No. Well,
I do best

To make at once for this, the heart o' the
place.

The old room! Nothing changed! So near my seat,

D'Ormea? [Pushing away the stool which is by the KING's chair.]

I want that meeting over first,
I know not why. Tush, he, D'Ormea, slow

To hearten me, the supple knave? That burst

Of spite so eased him! He'll inform me...

What?

Why come I hither? All's in rough: let
all

Remain rough. There's full time to draw back—nay,

There's nought to draw back from, as yet;
whereas,

If reason should be, to arrest a course

Of error—reason good, to interpose

And save, as I have saved so many times,

Our House, admonish my son's giddy youth,

Relieve him of a weight that proves too much—

Now is the time,—or now, or never.

'Faith,

This kind of step is pitiful, not due

To Charles, this stealing back—hither, because

He's from his capital! Oh Victor! Victor!

But thus it is. The age of crafty men

Is loathsome; youth contrives to carry off

Dissimulation; we may intersperse

Extenuating passages of strength,

Ardour, vivacity, and wit—may turn

E'en guile into a voluntary grace:

But one's old age, when graces drop away

And leave guile the pure staple of our lives—
Ah, loathsome!

Not so—or why pause I? Turin
Is mine to have, were I so minded, for The asking; all the army's mine—I've witnessed

Each private fight beneath me; all the Court's Mine too; and, best of all, D'Ormea's still D'Ormea and mine. There's some grace clinging yet.

Had I decided on this step, ere midnight
I'd take the crown.

No. Just this step to rise
Exhausts me. Here am I arrived: the rest
Must be done for me. Would I could sit here
And let things right themselves, the masque unmasque

Of the old King, crownless, grey hair and hot
blood,—

The young King, crowned, but calm before his time,

They say,—the eager mistress with her taunts,—

And the sad earnest wife who motions me
Away—ay, there she knelt to me! E'en yet
I can return and sleep at Chambery
A dream out.

Rather shake it off at Turin,
King Victor! Say: to Turin—yes, or no?

'Tis this relentless noonday-lighted chamber,
Lighted like life but silent as the grave,
That disconcerts me. That's the change must strike.

No silence last year! Some one flung doors
wide

(Those two great doors which scrutinize me
now)

And out I went 'mid crowds of men—men talking,

Men watching if my lip fell or brow knit,
Men saw me safe forth, put me on my road:
That makes the misery of this return.

Oh had a battle done it! Had I dropped,
Haling some battle, three entire days old,
Hither and thither by the forehead—dropped
In Spain, in Austria, best of all, in France—
Spurned on its horns or underneath its hooves,
When the spent monster went upon its knees

To pad and pash the prostrate wretch—I,
Victor,
Sole to have stood up against France, beat
down

By inches, brayed to pieces finally
In some vast unimaginable charge,
A flying hell of horse and foot and guns
Over me, and all's lost, for ever lost,
There's no more Victor when the world
wakes up!

Then silence, as of a raw battle-field,
Throughout the world. Then after (as whole

After, you catch at intervals faint noise
Through the stiff crust of frozen blood)— there creeps

A rumour forth, so faint, no noise at all,
That a strange old man, with face outworn
for wounds,

Is stumbling on from frontier town to town,
Begging a pittance that may help him find
His Turin out; what scorn and laughter
follow

The coin you fling into his cap! And last,
Some bright morn, how men crowd about the midst

O' the market-place, where takes the old king breath

Ere with his crutch he strike the palace-gate Wide ope!

To Turin, yes or no—or no?

Re-enter CHARLES with papers.

Charles. Just as I thought! A miserable
falsehood

Of hirelings discontented with their pay
And longing for enfranchisement! A few
Tasty expressions of old age that thinks
To keep alive its dignity o'er slaves
By means that suit their natures!

[Tearing them.] Thus they shake
My faith in Victor!

[Turning, he discovers VICTOR.

Victor [after a pause]. Not at Evian,
Charles?

What's this? Why do you run to close the doors?

No welcome for your father?

Charles [aside]. Not his voice!
What would I give for one imperious tone
Of the old sort! That's gone for ever.

Victor. Must

I ask once more . . .

Charles. No—I concede it, sir!

You are returned for . . . true, your health declines;

True, Chambery's a bleak unkindly spot;
You'd choose one fitter for your final lodge—
Veneria, or Moncagliè—ay, that's close

And I concede it.

Victor. I received advices
Of the conclusion of the Spanish matter,
Dated from Evian Baths . . .

Charles. And you forbore
To visit me at Evian, satisfied

The work I had to do would fully task
The little wit I have, and that your presence
Would only disconcert me—

Victor. Charles?

Charles. —Me, set

For ever in a foreign course to yours,
And . . .

Sir, this way of wile were good to catch,
But I have not the sleight of it. The truth!
Though I sink under it! What brings you
here?

Victor. Not hope of this reception, certainly,
From one who'd scarce assume a stranger mode
Of speech, did I return to bring about
Some awfulest calamity!

Charles. —You mean,
Did you require your crown again! Oh yes,
I should speak otherwise! But turn not that
To jesting! Sir, the truth! Your health declines?

Is aught deficient in your equipage?
Wisely you seek myself to make complaint,
And foil the malice of the world which laughs
At petty discontents; but I shall care
That not a soul knows of this visit. Speak!

Victor [aside]. Here is the grateful muchprofessing son

Prepared to worship me, for whose sole sake
I think to waive my plans of public good!

[Aloud.] Nay, Charles, if I did seek to take once more

My crown, were so disposed to plague myself,
What would be warrant for this bitterness?

I gave it—grant I would resume it—well?

Charles. I should say simply—leaving out the why

And how—you made me swear to keep that crown :

And as you then intended . . .

Victor. Fool ! What way
Could I intend or not intend ? As man,
With a man's will, when I say "I intend,"
I can intend up to a certain point,
No farther. I intended to preserve
The crown of Savoy and Sardinia whole :
And if events arise demonstrating
The way, I hoped should guard it, rather like
To lose it . . .

Charles. Keep within your sphere and mine !

It is God's province we usurp on, else .

Here, blindfold through the maze of things we walk

By a slight clue of false, true, right and
wrong ;

All else is rambling and presumption. I Have sworn to keep this kingdom : there's my truth.

Victor. Truth, boy, is here, within my breast ; and in

† Your recognition of it, truth is, too ;
And in the effect of all this tortuous dealing With falsehood, used to carry out the truth,
—In its success, this falsehood turns, again,
Truth for the world. But you are right :
these themes

Are over-subtle. I should rather say
In such a case, frankly,—it fails, my scheme :
I hoped to see you bring about, yourself,
What I must I ring about. I interpose
On your behalf—with my son's good in sight—

To hold what he is nearly letting go,
Confirm his title, add a grace perhaps.
There's Sicily, for instance,—granted me
And taken back, some years since : till I give That island with the rest, my work's half
done.

For hissake, therefore, as of those he rules . . .

Charles. Our sakes are one ; and that, you could not say,

Because my answer would present itself
Forthwith :—a year has wrought an age's
change.

This people's not the people now, you once
Could benefit ; nor is my policy
Your policy.

Victor [with an outburst]. I know it ! You undo

All I have done—my life of toil and care !
I left you this the absolutest rule
In Europe : do you think I sit and smile,
Bid you throw power to the populace—
See my Sardinia, that has kept apart,
Join in the mad and democratic whirl
Whereto I see all Europe haste full tide ?
England casts off her kings ; France mimics
England :

This realm I hoped was safe. Yet here I talk,

When I can save it, not by force alone,
But bidding plagues, which follow sons like
you,

Fasten upon my disobedient . . .

[Recollecting himself.] Surely
I could say this—if minded so—my son ?

Charles. You could not. Bitterer curses than your curse

Have I long since denounced upon myself
If I misused my power. In fear of these
I entered on those measures—will abide
By them : so, I should say, Count Tende . . .

Victor. No !
But no ! But if, my Charles, your—more than old—

Half-foolish father urged these arguments,
And then confessed them futile, but said plainly

That he forgot his promise, found his strength
Fail him, had thought at savage Chambery
Too much of brilliant Turin, Rivoli here,
And Susa, and Veneria, and Superga—
Pined for the pleasant places he had built
When he was fortunate and young—

Charles. My father !

Victor. Stay yet !—and if he said he could not die

Deprived of baubles he had put aside,
He deemed, for ever—of the Crown that binds
Your brain up, whole, sound and impregnable,

Creating kingliness—the Sceptre too,
Whose mere wind, should you wave it, back would beat

Invaders—and the golden Ball which throbs
As if you grasped the palpitating heart
Indeed o' the realm, to mould as choose you
may !

—If I must totter up and down the streets
My sires built, where myself have introduced
And fostered laws and letters, sciences,
The civil and the military arts !
Stay, Charles ! I see you letting me pretend
To live my former self once more—King
Victor,

The venturesome yet politic : they style me
Again, the Father of the Prince : friends wink
Good-humouredly at the delusion you
So sedulously guard from all rough truths
That else would break upon my dotage !—
You—

Whom now I see preventing my old shame—
I tell not, point by cruel point, my tale—
For is't not in your breast my brow is hid ?
Is not your hand extended ? Say you not . . .

Enter D'ORMEA, leading in POLYXENA.

*Polyxena [advancing and withdrawing
CHARLES—to VICTOR].* In this conjuncture even, he would say (Though with a moistened eye and quivering lip)

The suppliant is my father. I must save
A great man from himself, nor see him fling
His well-earned fame away : there must not follow

Ruin so utter, a break-down of worth
So absolute : no enemy shall learn,
He thrust his child 'twixt danger and himself,
And, when that child somehow stood danger
out,

Stole back with serpent wiles to ruin Charles —Body, that's much,—and soul, that's more
—and realm,

That's most of all ! No enemy shall say . . .

VOL. I.

D'Ormea. Do you repent, sir ?

Victor [resuming himself]. D'Ormea ?

This is well !

Worthily done, King Charles, craftily done !
Judiciously you post these, to o'erhear
The little your importunate father thrusts
Himself on you to say !—Ah, they'll correct
The amiable blind facility
You show in answering his peevish suit.
What can he need to sue for ? Thanks,
D'Ormea !

You have fulfilled your office : but for you,
The old Count might have drawn some few more lives

To swell his income ! Had you, lady, missed
The moment, a permission might be granted
To buttress up my ruinous old pile !
But you remember properly the list
Of wise precautions I took when I gave Nearly as much away—to reap the fruits
I should have looked for !

Charles. Thanks, sir : degrade me,
So you remain yourself ! Adieu !

Victor. I'll not Forget it for the future, nor presume
Next time to slight such mediators ! Nay—
Had I first moved them both to intercede,
I might secure a chamber in Moncagliar
—Who knows ?

Charles. Adieu !

Victor. You bid me this adieu
With the old spirit ?

Charles. Adieu !

Victor. Charles—Charles !
Charles. Adieu !

[VICTOR goes.]

Charles. You were mistaken, Marquis, as you hear.

'Twas for another purpose the Count came.
The Count desires Moncagliar. Give the order !

D'Ormea [leisurely]. Your minister has lost your confidence,

Asserting late, for his own purposes,
Count Tende would . . .

Charles [flinging his badge back]. Be still the minister !

And give a loose to your insulting joy ;

KING VICTOR AND KING CHARLES

It irks me more thus stifled than expressed :
Loose it !

D'Ormea. There's none to loose, alas !

I see

I never am to die a martyr.

Polyxena. Charles !

Charles. No praise, at least, Polyxena—no
praise !

KING CHARLES.

PART II.

D'ORMEA, seated, folding papers he has been examining.

This at the last effects it : now, King Charles Or else King Victor—that's a balance : but
now,

D'Ormea the arch-culprit, either turn
O' the scale,—that's sure enough. A point to solve,

My masters, moralists, whate'er your style !
When you discover why I push myself
Into a pitfall you'd pass safely by,
Impart to me among the rest ! No matter.
Prompt are the righteous ever with their rede
To us the wrongful ; lesson them this once !
For safe among the wicked are you set,
D'Ormea ! We lament life's brevity,
Yet quarter e'en the threescore years and ten,
Nor stick to call the quarter roundly "life."
D'Ormea was wicked, say, some twenty years ;
A tree so long was stunted ; afterward,
What if it grew, continued growing, till
No fellow of the forest equalled it ?

'Twas a stump then ; a stump it still must be :
While forward saplings, at the outset checked,
In virtue of that first sprout keep their style
Amid the forest's green fraternity.
Thus I shoot up to surely get lopped down
And bound up for the burning. Now for it !

Enter CHARLES and POLYXENA with Attendants.

D'Ormea [rises]. Sir, in the due discharge of this my office—

This enforced summons of yourself from Turin,
And the disclosure I am bound to make

To-night,—there must already be, I feel,
So much that wounds . . .

Charles. Well, sir ?

D'Ormea. —That I, perchance,

May utter also what, another time,
Would irk much,—it may prove less irksome
now.

Charles. What would you utter ?

D'Ormea. That I from my soul
Grieve at to-night's event : for you I grieve, E'en grieve for . . .

Charles. Tush, another time for talk !
My kingdom is in imminent danger ?

D'Ormea. Let

The Count communicate with France—its
King,

His grandson, will have Fleury's aid for
this,

Though for no other war.

Charles. First for the levies :
What forces can I muster presently ?

[D'ORMEA delivers papers which

CHARLES inspects.

Charles. Good—very good. Montorio . . .
how is this ?

—Equips me double the old complement
Of soldiers ?

D'Ormea. Since his land has been relieved
From double imposts, this he manages :
But under the late monarch . . .

Charles. Peace ! I know.

Count Spava has omitted mentioning
What proxy is to head these troops of his.

D'Ormea. Count Spava means to head his troops himself.

Something to fight for now ; "Whereas,"
says he,

"Under the sovereign's father" . . .

Charles. It would seem
That all my people love me.

D'Ormea. Yes.

[To POLYXENA while CHARLES continues to inspect the papers.

A temper

Like Victor's may avail to keep a state ;
He terrifies men and they fall not off ;
Good to restrain : best, if restraint were all.
But, with the silent circle round him, ends

Such sway : our King's begins precisely there.
For to suggest, impel and set at work,
Is quite another function. Men may slight,
In time of peace, the King who brought them peace :

In war,—his voice, his eyes, help more than
fear.

They love you, sir !

Charles [to Attendants]. Bring the regalia
forth !

Quit the room ! And now, Marquis, answer me !
Why should the King of France invade my realm ?

D'Ormea. Why ? Did I not acquaint your Majesty

An hour ago ?

Charles. I choose to hear again
What then I heard.

D'Ormea. Because, sir, as I said,
Your father is resolved to have his crown
At any risk ; and, as I judge, calls in
The foreigner to aid him.

Charles. And your reason
For saying this ?

D'Ormea [aside]. Ay, just his father's way !
[To CHARLES.] The Count wrote yesterday to your forces' Chief,

Rhebinder—made demand of help—

Charles. To try
Rhebinder—he's of alien blood : aught else ?

D'Ormea. Receiving a refusal,—some hours
after,

The Count called on Del Borgo to deliver
The Act of Abdication : he refusing,

Or hesitating, rather—

Charles. What ensued ?

D'Ormea. At midnight, only two hours
since, at Turin,

He rode in person to the citadel
With one attendant, to Soccorso gate,
And bade the governor, San Remi, open—
Admit him.

Charles. For a purpose I divine.
These three were faithful, then ?

D'Ormea. They told it me.
And I—

Charles. Most faithful—

D'Ormea. Tell it you—with this

Moreover of my own : if, an hour hence,
You have not interposed, the Count will be
O' the road to France for succour.

Charles. Very good !

You do your duty now to me your monarch
Fully, I warrant ?—have, that is, your project
For saving both of us disgrace, no doubt ?

D'Ormea. I give my counsel,—and the only one.

A month since, I besought you to employ
Restraints which had prevented many a pang :
But now the harsher course must be pursued.
These papers, made for the emergency,
Will pain you to subscribe : this is a list
Of those suspected merely—men to watch ;
This—of the few of the Count's very household

You must, however reluctantly, arrest ;
While here's a method of remonstrance—sure
Not stronger than the case demands—to take
With the Count's self.

Charles. Deliver those three papers.

Polyxena [while CHARLES inspects them—to D'ORMEA]. Your measures are not over-harsh, sir : France

Will hardly be deterred from her intents
By these.

D'Ormea. If who proposes might dispose,
I could soon satisfy you. Even these,
Hear what he'll say at my presenting !

Charles [who has signed them]. There !
About the warrants ! You've my signature.
What turns you pale ? I do my duty by you
In acting boldly thus on your advice.

D'Ormea [reading them separately]. Arrest the people I suspected merely ?

Charles. Did you suspect them ?

D'Ormea. Doubtless : but—but—sir,
This Forquiere's governor of Turin,
And Rivarol and he have influence over Half of the capital ! Rabella, too ?
Why, sir—

Charles. Oh, leave the fear to me !

D'Ormea [still reading]. You bid me
Incarcerate the people on this list ?

Sir—

Charles. But you never bade arrest those
men,

So close related to my father too,
On trifling grounds?

D'Ormea. Oh, as for that, St. George,
President of Chambery's senators,
's hatching treason ! still—

[More troubled.] Sir, Count Cumiane
Is brother to your father's wife ! What's
here ?

Arrest the wife herself ?

Charles. You seem to think
A venial crime this plot against me. Well ?
D'Ormea [who has read the last paper].

Wherefore am I thus ruined ? Why not take

My life at once ? This poor formality
Is, let me say, unworthy you ! Prevent it You, madam ! I have served you, am prepared

For all disgraces : only, let disgrace
Be plain, be proper—proper for the world
To pass its judgment on 'twixt you and me !
Take back your warrant, I will none of it !

Charles. Here is a man to talk of fickleness !

He stakes his life upon my father's falsehood ;
I bid him . . .

D'Ormea. Not you ! Were he trebly false,

You do not bid me . . .

Charles. Is't not written there ?
I thought so : give—I'll set it right.

D'Ormea. Is it there ?
Oh yes, and plain—arrest him now—drag here
Your father ! And were all six times as plain,
Do you suppose I trust it ?

Charles. Just one word !
You bring him, taken in the act of flight,
Or else your life is forfeit.

D'Ormea. Ay, to Turin
I bring him, and to-morrow ?

Charles. Here and now !
The whole thing is a lie, a hateful lie,
As I believed and as my father said.

I knew it from the first, but was compelled
To circumvent you ; and the great D'Ormea,
That baffled Alberoni and tricked Coscia,
The miserable sower of such discord
'Twixt sire and son, is in the toils at last.

Oh I see ! you arrive—this plan of yours,
Weak as it is, torments sufficiently
A sick old peevish man—wings hasty speech,
An ill-considered threat from him ; that's noted ;

Then out you ferret papers, his amusement
In lonely hours of lassitude—examine
The day-by-day report of your paid spies—
And back you come : all was not ripe, you
find,

And, as you hope, may keep from ripening yet,
But you were in bare time ! Only, 'twere
best

I never saw my father—these old men
Are potent in excuses : and meanwhile,
D'Ormea's the man I cannot do without !

Polyxena. Charles—

Charles. Ah, no question !
You against me too !

You'd have me eat and drink and sleep, live,
die

With this lie coiled about me, choking me !
No, no, D'Ormea ! You venture life, you say,
Upon my father's perfidy : and I
Have, on the whole, no right to disregard
The chains of testimony you thus wind
About me ; though I do—from my soul
Discredit them : still I must authorize
These measures, and I will. Perugia !

[Many Officers enter.] Count—
You and Solar, with all the force you have,
Stand at the Marquis' orders : what he bids,
Implicitly perform ! You are to bring

A traitor here ; the man that's likest one
At present, fronts me ; you are at his beck
For a full hour ! he undertakes to show
A fouler than himself,—but, failing that,
Return with him, and, as my father lives,
He dies this night ! The clemency you blame
So oft, shall be revoked—rights exercised,
Too long abjured.

[To D'ORMEA.] Now sir, about the work !
To save your king and country ! Take the warrant !

D'Ormea. You hear the sovereign's mandate, Count Perugia ?

Obeys me ! As your diligence, expect
Reward ! All follow to Moncagliar !

Charles [in great anguish]. D'Ormea [D'ORMEA goes.
He goes, lit up with that appalling smile !

[To POLYXENA, after a pause.
At least you understand all this ?

Polyxena. These means
Of our defence—these measures of precaution ?

Charles. It must be the best way ; I should have ~~the~~
Withered beneath his scorn.

Polyxena. What would you say ?

Charles. Why, do you think I mean to keep the crown,
Polyxena ?

Polyxena. You then believe the story
In spite of all—that Victor comes ?

Charles. Believe it ?
I know that he is coming—feel the strength
That has upheld me leave me at his coming !
'Twas mine, and now he takes his own again.
Some kinds of strength are well enough to
have ;

But who's to have that strength ? Let my crown go !

I meant to keep it ; but I cannot—cannot !
Only, he shall not taunt me—he, the first . . .
See if he would not be the first to taunt me
With having left his kingdom at a word.
With letting it be conquered without stroke,
With . . . no—no—'tis no worse than when he left !

I've just to bid him take it, and, that over,
We'll fly away—fly, for I loathe this Turin,
This Rivoli, all titles loathe, all state.
We'd best go to your country—unless God
Send I die now !

Polyxena. Charles, hear me !

Charles. And again
Shall you be my Polyxena—you'll take me Out of this woe ! Yes, do speak, and keep speaking !

I would not let you speak just now, for fear
You'd counsel me against him : but talk, now,
As we two used to talk in blessed times :
Bid me endure all his caprices ; take me
From this mad post above him !

Polyxena. I believe
We are undone, but from a different cause.

All your resources, down to the least guard,
Are at D'Ormea's beck. What if, the while,
He act in concert with your father ? We Indeed were lost. This lonely Rivoli—
Where find a better place for them ?

Charles [pacing the room]. And why Does Victor come ? To undo all that's done,
Restore the past, prevent the future ! Seat
His mistress in your seat, and place in mine
. . . Oh, my own people, whom will you find there,

To ask of, to consult with, to care for,
To hold up with your hands ? Whom ? One that's false—

False—from the head's crown to the foot's sole, false !

The best is, that I knew it in my heart
From the beginning, and expected this,
And hated you, Polyxena, because You saw thro' him, though I too saw thro'
him,

Saw that he meant this while he crowned me, while
He prayed for me,—nay, while he kissed my
brow,

I saw—
Polyxena. But if your measures take effect,
D'Ormea true to you ?

Charles. Then worst of all !
I shall have loosed that callous wretch on him !
Well may the woman taunt him with his
child—

I, eating here his bread, clothed in his clothes,
Seated upon his seat, let slip D'Ormea
To outrage him ! We talk—perchance he tears

My father from his bed ; the old hands feel
For one who is not, but who should be there,
He finds D'Ormea ! D'Ormea too finds him !
The crowded chamber when the lights go
out—

Closed doors—the horrid scuffle in the dark—
The accursed prompting of the minute ! My guards !

To horse—and after, with me—and prevent !
Polyxena [seizing his hand]. King Charles !

Pause here upon this strip of time
Allotted you out of eternity !

Crowns are from God: you in his name hold
yours.

Your life's no least thing, were it fit your life
Should be abjured along with rule; but now,
Keep both! Your duty is to live and rule—
You, who would vulgarly look fine enough
In the world's eye, deserting your soul's
charge,—

Ay, you would have men's praise, this Rivoli
Would be illumined! While, as 'tis, no doubt,
Something of stain will ever rest on you;
No one will rightly know why you refused
To abdicate; they'll talk of deeds you could Have done, no doubt,—nor do I much expect
Future achievement will blot out the past,
Envelope it in haze—nor shall we two Live happy any more. 'Twill be, I feel,
Only in moments that the duty's seen
As palpably as now: the months, the years
Of painful indistinctness are to come,
While daily must we tread these palace-rooms Pregnant with memories of the past: your eye

May turn to mine and find no comfort there,
Through fancies that beset me, as yourself,
Of other courses, with far other issues,
We might have taken this great night: such bear,

As I will bear! What matters happiness?
Duty! There's man's one moment: this is
yours!

[Putting the crown on his head, and the sceptre in his hand, she places him on his seat: a long pause and silence.]

Enter D'ORMEA and VICTOR, with Guards.

Victor. At last I speak; but once—that once, to you!

'Tis you I ask, not these your varletry,
Who's King of us?

Charles [from his seat]. Count Tende . . .

Victor. What your spies

Assert I ponder in my soul, I say—

Here to your face, amid your guards! I choose

To take again the crown whose shadow I gave—

For still its potency surrounds the weak
White locks their felon hands have discomposed.

Or I'll not ask who's King, but simply, who Withholds the crown I claim? Deliver it!
I have no friend in the wide world: nor
France

Nor England cares for me: you see the sum
Of what I can avail. Deliver it!

Charles. Take it, my father!

And now say in turn,

Was it done well, my father—sure not well,
To try me thus! I might have seen much
cause

For keeping it—too easily seen cause!

But, from that moment, e'en more woefully

My life had pined away, than pine it will.

Already you have much to answer for.

My life to pine is nothing,—her sunk eyes

Were happy once! No doubt, my people
think

I am their King still . . . but I cannot strive!

Take it!

Victor [one hand on the crown CHARLES offers, the other on his neck]. So few years giv' it quietly,

My son! It will drop from me. See you
not?

A crown's unlike a sword to give away—

That, let a strong hand to a weak hand give!

But crowns should slip from palsied brows to heads

Young as this head: yet mine is weak enough,

E'en weaker than I knew. I seek for phrases

To vindicate my right. 'Tis of a piece!

All is alike gone by with me—who beat

Once D'Orleans in his lines—his very lines!

To have been Eugene's comrade, Louis's rival,

And now . . .

Charles [putting the crown on him, to the rest]. The King speaks, yet none kneels, I think!

Victor. I am then King! As I became a
King

Despite the nations, kept myself a King,
So I die King, with Kingship dying too

Around me. I have lasted Europe's time.
What wants my story of completion? Where Must needs the damning break show? Who mistrusts

My children here—tell they of any break
'Twixt my day's sunrise and its fiery fall?
And who were by me when I died but they?
D'Ormea there!

Charles. What means he?

Victor. Ever there!

Charles—how to save your story! Mine must go.

Say—say that you refused the crown to me!
Charles, yours shall be my story! You im-mured

Me, say, at Rivoli. A single year
I spend without a sight of you, then die.
That will serve every purpose—tell that tale
The world!

Charles. Mistrust me? Help!

Victor. Past help, past reach!

'Tis in the heart—you cannot reach the heart:
This broke mine, that I did believe, you,

Charles,
Would have denied me and disgraced me.

Polyxena. Charles

Has never ceased to be your subject, sir!

He reigned at first through setting up yourself

As pattern: if he e'er seemed harsh to you,

'Twas from a too intense appreciation

Of your own character: he acted you—

Ne'er for an instant did I think it real,

Nor look for any other than this end.
I hold him worlds the worse on that account;
But so it was.

Charles [to POLYXENA]. I love you now
indeed.

[To VICTOR.] You never knew me.

Victor. Hardly till this moment,

When I seem learning many other things
Because the time for using them is past.

If 'twere to do again! That's idly wished.
Truthfulness might prove policy as good
As guile. Is this my daughter's forehead?

Yes:

I've made it fitter now to be a queen's
Than formerly: I've ploughed the deep lines
there

Which keep too well a crown from slipping off.
No matter. Guile has made me King
again.

*Louis—'twas in King Victor's time:—long
since,*

When Louis reigned and, also, Victor reigned.

How the world talks already of us two!

God of eclipse and each discoloured star,

Why do I linger then?

Ha! Where lurks he?

D'Ormea! Nearer to your King! Now
stand!

[Collecting his strength as D'ORMEA approaches.

You lied, D'Ormea! I do not repent.

[Dies.

DRAMATIC LYRICS.

184— 185—

CAVALIER TUNES.

I. MARCHING ALONG.

I.

KENTISH Sir Byng stood for his King,
Bidding the crop-headed Parliament swing :
And, pressing a troop unable to stoop
And see the rogues flourish and honest folk droop,
Marched them along, fifty-score strong,
Great-hearted gentlemen, singing this song.

II.

God for King Charles ! Pym and such carles
To the Devil that prompts 'em their treasonous parles !
Cavaliers; up ! Lips from the cup,
Hands from the pasty, nor bite take nor sup Till you're—

CHORUS. — *Marching along, fifty - score
strong,
Great-hearted gentlemen, singing this song.*

III.

Hampden to hell, and his obsequies' knell Serve Hazelrig, Fiennes, and young Harry as well !
England, good cheer ! Rupert is near !
Kentish and loyalists, keep we not here

CHORUS. — *Marching along, fifty - score
strong,
Great-hearted gentlemen, singing this song ?*

IV.

Then, God for King Charles ! Pym and his snarls
To the Devil that pricks on such pestilent carles !

Hold by the right, you double your might ;
So, onward to Nottingham, fresh for the fight,

CHORUS. — *March we along, fifty - score
strong,
Great-hearted gentlemen, singing this song !*

II. GIVE A ROUSE.

I.

King Charles, and who'll do him right now ?
King Charles, and who's ripe for fight now ?
Give a rouse : here's, in hell's despite now,
King Charles !

II.

Who gave me the goods that went since ?
Who raised me the house that sank once ?
Who helped me to gold I spent since ?
Who found me in wine you drank once ?

CHORUS.—*King Charles, and who'll do
him right now ?
King Charles, and who's ripe
for fight now ?
Give a rouse : here's, in hell's
despite now,
King Charles !*

III.

To whom used my boy George quaff else,
By the old fool's side that begot him ?
For whom did he cheer and laugh else,
While Noll's damned troopers shot him ?

CHORUS.—*King Charles, and who'll do
him right now ?
King Charles, and who's ripe
for fight now ?
Give a rouse : here's, in hell's
despite now,
King Charles !*

III. BOOT AND SADDLE.

I.

Boot, saddle, to horse, and away !
Rescue my castle before the hot day
Brightens to blue from its silvery grey,

CHORUS.—Boot, saddle, to horse, and away !

II.

Ride past the suburbs, asleep as you'd say ;
Many's the friend there, will listen and pray
"God's luck to gallants that strike up the lay—

CHORUS.—" Boot, saddle, to horse, and away !"

III.

Forty miles off, like a roebuck at bay,
Flouts Castle Brancepeth the Roundheads' array :
Who laughs, " Good fellows ere this, by my fay,

CHORUS.—" Boot, saddle, to horse, and away !"

IV.

Who ? My wife Gertrude ; that, honest and gay,
Laughs when you talk of surrendering,
"Nay !
"I've better counsellors ; what counsel they ?

CHORUS.—" Boot, saddle, to horse, and away !"

THE LOST LEADER.

I.

JUST for a handful of silver he left us,
Just for a riband to stick in his coat—
Found the one gift of which fortune bereft us,
Lost all the others she lets us devote ;
They, with the gold to give, doled him out silver,

So much was theirs who so little allowed :

VOL. I.

How all our copper had gone for his service !

Rags—were they purple, his heart had been proud !

We that had loved him so, followed him,
honoured him,

Lived in his mild and magnificent eye,
Learned his great language, caught his clear accents,

Made him our pattern to live and to die !
Shakespeare was of us, Milton was for us,
Burns, Shelley, were with us,—they watch from their graves !

He alone breaks from the van and the free-
men,

—He alone sinks to the rear and the slaves !

II.

We shall march prospering,—not thro' his presence ;

Songs may inspirit us,—not from his lyre ;
Deeds will be done,—while he boasts his quiescence,

Still bidding crouch whom the rest bade aspire :

Blot out his name, then, record one lost soul
more,

One task more declined, one more footpath untrod,

One more devils' triumph and sorrow for angels,

One wrong more to man, one more insult to God !

Life's night begins : let him never come back to us !

There would be doubt, hesitation and
pain,

Forced praise on our part—the glimmer of twilight,

Never glad confident morning again !

Best fight on well, for we taught him—strike gallantly,

Menace our heart ere we master his own ;
Then let him receive the new knowledge and wait us,

Pardoned in heaven, the first by the
throne !

"HOW THEY BROUGHT THE GOOD

[16—.]

I.

I SPRANG to the stirrup, and Joris, and he ;
I galloped, Dirck galloped, we galloped all three ;
" Good speed ! " cried the watch, as the gate-bolts undrew ;
" Speed ! " echoed the wall to us galloping
through ;
Behind shut the postern, the lights sank to
rest,
And into the midnight we galloped abreast.

II.

Not a word to each other ; we kept the great pace
Neck by neck, stride by stride, never changing our place ;
I turned in my saddle and made its girths
tight,
Then shortened each stirrup, and set the pique right,
Rebuckled the cheek-strap, chained slacker
the bit,
Nor galloped less steadily Roland a whit.

III.

'Twas moonset at starting ; but while we drew near Lokeren, the cocks crew and twilight dawned
clear ;
At Boom, a great yellow star came out to see ;
At Düffeld, 'twas morning as plain as could be ;
And from Mecheln church-steeple we heard the half-chime,
So, Joris broke silence with, " Yet there is time ! "

IV.

At Aershot, up leaped of a sudden the sun,
And against him the cattle stood black every
one,
To stare thro' the mist at us galloping past,
And I saw my stout galloper Roland at last,

With resolute shoulders, each butting away
The haze, as some bluff river headland its spray :

V.

And his low head and crest, just one sharp ear bent back
For my voice, and the other pricked out on his track ;
And one eye's black intelligence,—ever that glance
O'er its white edge at me, his own master, askance !
And the thick heavy spume-flakes which aye
and anon
His fierce lips shook upwards in galloping on.

VI.

By Hasselt, Dirck groaned ; and cried Joris,
" Stay spur !
" Your Roos galloped bravely, the fault's not in her,
" We'll remember at Aix "—for one heard the quick wheeze
Of her chest, saw the stretched neck and staggering knees,
And sunk tail, and horrible heave of the flank,
As down on her haunches she shuddered and sank.

VII.

So, we were left galloping, Joris and I,
Past Looz and past Tongres, no cloud in the sky ;
The broad sun above laughed a pitiless laugh,
'Neath our feet broke the brittle bright stubble like chaff ;
Till over by Dalhem a dome-spiresprang white,
And " Gallop," gasped Joris, " for Aix is in sight ! "

VIII.

" How they'll greet us ! "—and all in a moment his roan
Rolled neck and croup over, lay dead as a stone ;
And there was my Roland to bear the whole weight
Of the news which alone could save Aix from her fate,

With his nostrils like pits full of blood to the brim,
And with circles of red for his eye-sockets'
rim.

IX.

Then I cast loose my buffcoat, each holster
let fall,
Shook off both my jack-boots, let go belt
and all,
Stood up in the stirrup, leaned, patted his ear,
Called my Roland his pet-name, my horse without peer ;
Clapped my hands, laughed and sang, any noise, bad or good,
Till at length into Aix Roland galloped and stood.

X.

And all I remember is—friends flocking round
As I sat with his head 'twixt my knees on the ground ;
And no voice but was praising this Roland
of mine,
As I poured down his throat our last measure of wine,
Which (the burgesses voted by common consent)
Was no more than his due who brought good news from Ghent.

THROUGH THE METIDJA TO ABD-EL-KADR.

[Abd-el-Kadr was an Arab Chief of Algiers who resisted the French in 1833.]

I.

As I ride, as I ride,
With a full heart for my guide,
So its tide rocks my side,
As I ride, as I ride,
That, as I were double-eyed,
He, in whom our Tribes confide,
Is descried, ways untried
As I ride, as I ride.

II.

As I ride, as I ride
To our Chief and his Allied,

Who dares chide my heart's pride
As I ride, as I ride?
Or are witnesses denied—
Through the desert waste and wide
Do I glide unespied
As I ride, as I ride?

III.

As I ride, as I ride,
When an inner voice has cried,
The sands slide, nor abide
(As I ride, as I ride)
O'er each visioned homicide
That came vaunting (has he lied?)
To reside—where he died,
As I ride, as I ride.

IV.

As I ride, as I ride,
Ne'er has spur my swift horse plied,
Yet his hide, streaked and pied,
As I ride, as I ride,
Shows where sweat has sprung an dried,
—Zebra-footed, ostrich-thighed—
How has vied stride with stride
As I ride, as I ride !

V.

As I ride, as I ride,
Could I loose what Fate has tied,
Ere I pried, she should hide
(As I ride, as I ride)
All that's meant me—satisfied
When the Prophet and the Bride
Stop veins I'd have subside
As I ride, as I ride !

NATIONALITY IN DRINKS.

I.

My heart sank with our Claret-flask,
Just now, beneath the heavy sedges
That serve this pond's black face for mask
And still at yonder broken edges
O' the hole, where up the bubbles glisten,
After my heart I look and listen.

II.

Our laughing little flask, compelled
Thro' depth to depth more bleak and shady;
As when, both arms beside her held,
Feet straightened out, some gay French lady
Is caught up from life's light and motion,
And dropped into death's silent ocean!

Up jumped Tokay on our table,
Like a pygmy castle-warder,
Dwarfish to see, but stout and able,
Arms and accoutrements all in order;
And fierce he looked North, then, wheeling
South,
Blew with his bugle a challenge to Drouth,
Cocked his flap-hat with the tosspot-feather,
Twisted his thumb in his red moustache,
Jingled his huge brass spurs together,
Tightened his waist with its Buda sash,
And then, with an impudence nought could
abash,
Shrugged his hump-shoulder, to tell the beholder,
For twenty such knaves he should laugh but the bolder:
And so, with his sword-hilt gallantly jutting,
And dexter-hand on his haunch abutting,
Went the little man, Sir Ausbruch, strutting!

Here's to Nelson's memory!
'Tis the second time that I, at sea,
Right off Cape Trafalgar here,
Have drunk it deep in British Beer.
Nelson for ever—any time
Am I his to command in prose or rhyme!
Give me of Nelson only a touch,
And I save it, be it little or much:
Here's one our Captain gives, and so
Down at the word, by George, shall it go!
He says that at Greenwich they point the beholder
To Nelson's coat, "still with tar on the shoulder:
"For he used to lean with one shoulder digging,
"Jigging, as it were, and zig-zag-zigging
"Up against the mizen-rigging!"

GARDEN FANCIES.

I. THE FLOWER'S NAME

HERE's the garden she walked across,
Arm in my arm, such a short while since:
Hark, now I push its wicket, the moss
Hinders the hinges and makes them wince!
She must have reached this shrub ere she turned,
As back with that murmur the wicket swung;
For she laid the poor snail, my chance foot
spurned,
To feed and forget it the leaves among.

Down this side of the gravel-walk
She went while her robe's edge brushed the box:
And here she paused in her gracious talk
To point me a moth on the milk-white phlox.
Roses, ranged in valiant row,
I will never think that she passed you by!
She loves you noble roses, I know;
But yonder, see, where the rock-plants lie

This flower she stopped at, finger on lip,
Stooped over, in doubt, as settling its claim;
Till she gave me, with pride to make no slip,
Its soft meandering Spanish name:
What a name! Was it love or praise?
Speech half-asleep or song half-awake?
I must learn Spanish, one of these days,
Only for that slow sweet name's sake.

Roses, if I live and do well,
I may bring her, one of these days,
To fix you fast with as fine a spell,
Fit you each with his Spanish phrase;
But do not detain me now; for she lingers
There, like sunshine over the ground,
And ever I see her soft white fingers
Searching after the bud she found,

V.

Flower, you Spaniard, look that you grow
not,

Stay as you are and be loved for ever !
Bud, if I kiss you 'tis that you blow not :
Mind, the shut pink mouth opens never !
For while it pouts, her fingers wrestle,
Twinkling the audacious leaves between,
Till round they turn and down they nestle—
Is not the dear mark still to be seen ?

VI.

Where I find her not, beauties vanish ;
Whither I follow her, beauties flee ;
Is there no method to tell her in Spanish June's twice June since she breathed it with
me ?
Come, bud, show me the least of her traces,
Treasure my lady's lightest footfall !
—Ah, you may flout and turn up your faces—
Roses, you are not so fair after all !

II. SIBRANDUS SCHAFNABURGENSIS.

Plague take all your pedants, say I !
He who wrote what I hold in my hand,
Centuries back was so good as to die,
Leaving this rubbish to cumber the land ;
This, that was a book in its time,
Printed on paper and bound in leather,
Last month in the white of a matin-prime
Just when the birds sang all together.

II.

Into the garden I brought it to read,
And under the arbutue and laurustine
Read it, so help me grace in my need,
From title-page to closing line.
Chapter on chapter did I count,
As a curious traveller counts Stonehenge ;
Added up the mortal amount ;
And then proceeded to my revenge.

Yonder's a plum-tree with a crevice
An owl would build in, were he but sage ;

For a lap of moss, like a fine pont-levis
In a castle of the Middle Age,
Joins to a lip of gum, pure amber ;
When he'd be private, there might he spend
Hours alone in his lady's chamber :
Into this crevice I dropped our friend.

IV.

Splash, went he, as under he ducked,
—At the bottom, I knew, rain-drippings stagnate :
Next, a handful of blossoms I plucked
To bury him with, my bookshelf's magnate ;
Then I went in-doors, brought out a loaf,
Half a cheese, and a bottle of Chablis ;
Lay on the grass and forgot the oaf
Over a jolly chapter of Rabelais.

V.

Now, this morning, betwixt the moss
And gum that locked our friend in limbo,
A spider had spun his web across,
And sat in the midst with arms akimbo :
So, I took pity, for learning's sake,
And, de profundis, accentibus letis,
Cantate! quoth I, as I got a rake ;
And up I fished his delectable treatise.

VI.

Here you have it, dry in the sun,
With all the binding all of a blister,
And great blue spots where the ink has run,
And reddish streaks that wink and glister
O'er the page so beautifully yellow :
Oh, well have the droppings played their tricks !
Did he guess how toadstools grow, this fellow ?
Here's one stuck in his chapter six !

VII.

How did he like it when the live creatures
Tickled and toused and browsed him all
over,
And worm, slug, eel, with serious features,
Came in, each one, for his right of trover ?

—When the water-beetle with great blind deaf face
Made of her eggs the stately deposit,
And the newt borrowed just so much of the preface
As tiled in the top of his black wife's closet?

VIII.

All that life and fun and romping,
All that frisking and twisting and coupling,
While slowly our poor friend's leaves were swamping
And clasps were cracking and covers supplying !
As if you had carried sour John Knox
To the play-house at Paris, Vienna or Munich,
Fastened him into a front-row box,
And danced off the ballet with trousers and tunic.

IX.

Come, old martyr ! What, torment enough is it ?
Back to my room shall you take your sweet
self.
Good-bye, mother-beetle ; husband-eft, sufficient !
See the snug niche I have made on my shelf !
A.'s book shall prop you up, B.'s shall cover
you,
Here's C. to be grave with, or D. to be gay,
And with E. on each side, and F. right over
you,
Dry-rot at ease till the Judgment-day !

SOLILOQUY OF THE SPANISH CLOISTER.

I.

GR-R-R—there go, my heart's abhorrence !
Water your damned flower-pots, do !
If hate killed men, Brother Lawrence,
God's blood, would not mine kill you !
What ? your myrtle-bush wants trimming ?
Oh, that rose has prior claims—
Needs its leaden vase filled brimming ?
Hell dry you up with its flames !

II.

At the meal we sit together :
Salve tibi ! I must hear
Wise talk of the kind of weather,
Sort of season, time of year :
Not a plenteous cork-crop ; scarcely Dare we hope oak-galls, I doubt :
What's the Latin name for "parsley" ?
What's the Greek name for Swine's Snout ?

III.

Whew ! We'll have our platter burnished,
Laid with care on our own shelf !
With a fire-new spoon we're furnished,
And a goblet for ourself,
Rinsed like something sacrificial
Ere 'tis fit to touch our chaps—
Marked with L. for our initial !
(He-he ! There his lily snaps !)

IV.

Saint, forsooth ! While brown Dolores
Squats outside the Convent bank
With Sanchicha, telling stories,
Steeping tresses in the tank,
Blue-black, lustrous, thick like horsehairs,
—Can't I see his dead eye glow,
Bright as 'twere a Barbary corsair's ?
(That is, if he'd let it show !)

V.

When he finishes refection,
Knife and fork he never lays
Cross-wise, to my recollection,
As do I, in Jesu's praise.
I the Trinity illustrate,
Drinking watered orange-pulp—
In three sips the Arian frustrate ;
While he drains his at one gulp.

VI.

Oh, those melons ? If he's able
We're to have a feast ! so nice !
One goes to the Abbot's table,
All of us get each a slice.
How go on your flowers ? None double
Not one fruit-sort can you spy ?
Strange !—And I, too, at such trouble,
Keep them close-nipped on the sly !

VII.

There's a great text in Galatians,
 Once you trip on it, entails
 Twenty-nine distinct damnations,
 One sure, if another fails :
 If I trip him just a-dying,
 Sure of heaven as sure can be,
 Spin him round and send him flying
 Off to hell, a Manichee?

Or, my scrofulous French novel
 On grey paper with blunt type !
 Simply glance at it, you grovel
 Hand and foot in Belial's gripe :
 If I double down its pages
 At the woeful sixteenth print,
 When he gathers his greengages,
 Ope a sieve and slip it in't?

IX.

Or, there's Satan !—one might venture
 Pledge one's soul to him, yet leave
 Such a flaw in the indenture
 As he'd miss till, past retrieve,
 Blasted lay that rose-acacia
 We're so proud of ! Hy, Zy, Hine . . .
 'St, there's Vespers ! Plena gratia
Ave, Virgo ! Gr-r-r—you swine !

THE LABORATORY.

ANCIEN RÉGIME.

Now that I, tying thy glass mask tightly,
 May gaze thro' these faint smokes curling whitely,
 As thou pliest thy trade in this devil's-smithy—
 Which is the poison to poison her, prithee?

II.

He is with her, and they know that I know
 Where they are, what they do : they believe my tears flow

While they laugh, laugh at me, at me fled to the drear
 Empty church, to pray God in, for them !—I am here.

III.

Grind away, moisten and mash up thy paste,
 Pound at thy powder,—I am not in haste !
 Better sit thus, and observe thy strange
 things,
 Than go where men wait me and dance at the King's.

IV.

That in the mortar—you call it a gum ?
 Ah, the brave tree whence such gold oozings
 come !
 And yonder soft phial, the exquisite blue,
 Sure to taste sweetly,—is that poison too ?

V.

Had I but all of them, thee and thy treasures,
 What a wild crowd of invisible pleasures !
 To carry pure death in an earring, a casket,
 A signet, a fan-mount, a filigree basket !

VI.

Soon, at the King's, a mere lozenge to give,
 And Pauline should have just thirty minutes to live !
 But to light a pastile, and Elise, with her
 head
 And her breast and her arms and her hands, should drop dead !

VII.

Quick—is it finished? The colour's too grim !
 Why not soft like the phial's, enticing and
 dim?
 Let it brighten her drink, let her turn it and stir,
 And try it and taste, ere she fix and prefer !

VIII.

What a drop ! She's not little, no minion like me !
 That's why she ensnared him : this never will free
 The soul from those masculine eyes,—say,
 “no !”
 To that pulse's magnificent come-and-go.

IX.

For only last night, as they whispered, I brought
My own eyes to bear on her so, that I thought Could I keep them one half minute fixed,
she would fall
Shrivelled; she fell not; yet this does it all!

X.

Not that I bid you spare her the pain;
Let death be felt and the proof remain:
Brand, burn up, bite into its grace—
He is sure to remember her dying face!

XI.

Is it done? Take my mask off! Nay, be not morose;
It kills her, and this prevents seeing it close:
The delicate droplet, my whole fortune's fee!
If it hurts her, beside, can it ever hurt me?

XII.

Now, take all my jewels, gorge gold to your fill,
You may kiss me, old man, on my mouth if you will!
But brush this dust off me, lest horror it brings Ere I know it—next moment I dance at the King's!

THE CONFESSIONAL.

[SPAIN.]

I.

It is a lie—their Priests, their Pope,
Their Saints, their . . . all they fear or hope
Are lies, and lies—there! through my door
And ceiling, there! and walls and floor,
There, lies, they lie—shall still be hurled
Till spite of them I reach the world!

II.

You think Priests just and holy men!
Before they put me in this den
I was a human creature too,
With flesh and blood like one of you,
A girl that laughed in beauty's pride
Like lilies in your world outside.

III.

I had a lover—shame avault!
This poor wrenched body, grim and gaunt,
Was kissed all over till it burned,
By lips the truest, love e'er turned
His heart's own tint: one night they kissed
My soul out in a burning mist.

IV.

So, next day when the accustomed train
Of things grew round my sense again,
"That is a sin," I said: and slow
With downcast eyes to church I go,
And pass to the confession-chair,
And tell the old mild father there.

V.

But when I falter Beltran's name,
"Ha?" quoth the father; "much I blame
"The sin; yet wherefore idly grieve?
"Despair not—strenuously retrieve!
"Nay, I will turn this love of thine
"To lawful love, almost divine;

VI.

"For he is young, and led astray,
"This Beltran, and he schemes, men say,
"To change the laws of church and state;
"So, thine shall be an angel's fate,
"Who, ere the thunder breaks, should roll
"Its cloud away and save his soul.

VII.

"For, when he lies upon thy breast,
"Thou mayst demand and be possessed
"Of all his plans, and next day steal
"To me, and all those plans reveal,
"That I and every priest, to purge
"His soul, may fast and use the scourge."

VIII.

That father's beard was long and white,
With love and truth his brow seemed bright;
I went back, all on fire with joy,
And, that same evening, bade the boy
Tell me, as lovers should, heart-free,
Something to prove his love of me.

IX.

He told me what he would not tell
 For hope of heaven or fear of hell ;
 And I lay listening in such pride !
 And, soon as he had left my side,
 Tripped to the church by morning-light
 To save his soul in his despire.

X.

I told the father all his schemes,
 Who were his comrades, what their dreams ;
 "And now make haste," I said, "to pray
 "The one spot from his soul away ;
 "To-night he comes, but not the same
 "Will look !" At night he never came.

XI.

Nor next night : on the after-morn,
 I went forth with a strength new-born.
 The church was empty ; something drew
 My steps into the street ; I knew
 It led me to the market-place :
 Where, lo, on high, the father's face !

XII.

That horrible black scaffold dressed,
 That stapled block . . . God sink the rest !
 That head strapped back, that blinding vest,
 Those knotted hands and naked breast,
 Till near one busy hangman pressed,
 And, on the neck these arms caressed . . .

XIII.

No part in aught they hope or fear !
 No heaven with them, no hell !—and here,
 No earth, not so much space as pens
 My body in their worst of dens
 But shall bear God and man my cry,
 Lies—lies, again—and still, they lie !

CRISTINA.

I.

SHE should never have looked at me
 If she meant I should not love her !
 There are plenty . . . men, you call such,
 I suppose . . . she may discover

All her soul to, if she pleases,
 And yet leave much as she found them :
 But I'm not so, and she knew it
 When she fixed me, glancing round them.

II.

What? To fix me thus meant nothing?
 But I can't tell (there's my weakness) . . .
 What her look said !—no vile cant, sure,
 About "need to strew the bleakness
 "Of some lone shore with its pearl-seed.
 "That the sea feels"—no "strange yearning
 "That such souls have, most to lavish
 "Where there's chance of least returning."

III.

Oh, we're sunk enough here, God knows !
 But not quite so sunk that moments,
 Sure tho' seldom, are denied us,
 When the spirit's true endowments
 Stand out plainly from its false ones,
 And apprise it if pursuing
 Or the right way or the wrong way,
 To its triumph or undoing.

IV.

There are flashes struck from midnights,
 There are fire-flames noondays kindle,
 Whereby piled-up honours perish,
 Whereby swollen ambitions dwindle,
 While just this or that poor impulse,
 Which for once had play unstified,
 Seems the sole work of a life-time
 That away the rest have trifled.

V.

Doubt you if, in some such moment,
 As she fixed me, she felt clearly,
 Ages past the soul existed,
 Here an age 'tis resting merely,
 And hence fleets again for ages,
 While the true end, sole and single,
 It stops here for is, this love-way,
 With some other soul to mingle?

VI.

Else it loses what it lived for,
 And eternally must lose it ;
 Better ends may be in prospect,
 Deeper blisses (if you choose it),
 But this life's end and this love-bliss
 Have been lost here. Doubt you whether
 This she felt as, looking at me,
 Mine and her souls rushed together ?

VII.

Oh, observe ! Of course, next moment,
 The world's honours, in derision,
 Trampled out the light for ever :
 Never fear but there's provision
 Of the devil's to quench knowledge
 Lest we walk the earth in rapture !
 —Making those who catch God's secret
 Just so much more prize their capture !

VIII.

Such am I : the secret's mine now !
 She has lost me, I have gained her ;
 Her soul's mine : and thus, grown perfect,
 I shall pass my life's remainder.
 Life will just hold out the proving
 Both our powers, alone and blended :
 And then, come next life quickly !
 This world's use will have been ended.

THE LOST MISTRESS.

I.

ALL's over, then : does truth sound bitter
 As one at first believes ?
 Hark, 'tis the sparrows' good-night twitter
 About your cottage eaves !

II.

And the leaf-buds on the vine are woolly,
 I noticed that, to-day ;
 One day more bursts them open fully
 —You know the red turns grey.

III.

To-morrow we meet the same then, dearest ?
 May I take your hand in mine ?
 Mere friends are we,—well, friends the merest
 Keep much that I resign :

IV.

For each glance of the eye so bright and black,
 Though I keep with heart's endeavour,—
 Your voice, when you wish the snowdrops
 back,
 Though it stay in my soul for ever !—

V.

Yet I will but say what mere friends say,
 Or only a thought stronger ;
 I will hold your hand but as long as all may,
 Or so very little longer !

EARTH'S IMMORTALITIES.

FAME.

SEE, as the prettiest graves will do in time,
 Our poet's wants the freshness of its prime ;
 Spite of the sexton's browsing horse, the sods
 Have struggled through its binding osier rods ;
 Headstone and half-sunk footstone lean awry,
 Wanting the brick-work promised by-and-by ;
 How the minute grey lichens, plate o'er plate,
 Have softened down the crisp-cut name and date !

LOVE.

So, the year's done with !
 (Love me for ever !)
 All March begun with,
 April's endeavour ;
 May-wreaths that bound me
 June needs must sever ;
 Now snows fall round me,
 Quenching June's fever—
 (Love me for ever !)

MEETING AT NIGHT.

I.

THE grey sea and the long black land ;
 And the yellow half-moon large and low ;
 And the startled little waves that leap
 In fiery ringlets from their sleep,
 As I gain the cove with pushing prow,
 And quench its speed i' the slushy sand.

II.

Then a mile of warm sea-scented beach ;
 Three fields to cross till a farm appears ;
 A tap at the pane, the quick sharp scratch
 And blue spurt of a lighted match,
 And a voice less loud, thro' its joys and fears,
 Than the two hearts beating each to each !

PARTING AT MORNING.

ROUND the cape of a sudden came the sea,
 And the sun looked over the mountain's rim :
 And straight was a path of gold for him,
 And the need of a world of men for me.

SONG.

I.

NAY but you, who do not love her,
 Is she not pure gold, my mistress ?
 Holds earth aught—speak truth—above her ?
 Aught like this tress, see, and this tress,
 And this last fairest tress of all,
 So fair, see, ere I let it fall ?

II.

Because, you spend your lives in praising ;
 To praise, you search the wide world over :
 Then why not witness, calmly gazing,
 If earth holds aught—speak truth—above
 her ?
 Above this tress, and this, I touch
 But cannot praise, I love so much !

A WOMAN'S LAST WORD.

I.

LET's contend no more, Love,
 Strive nor weep :
 All be as before, Love,
 —Only sleep !

II.

What so wild as words are ?
 I and thou
 In debate, as birds are,
 Hawk on bough !

III.

See the creature stalking
 While we speak !
 Hush and hide the talking,
 Check on check !

IV.

What so false as truth is,
 False to thee ?
 Where the serpent's tooth is Shun the tree—

V.

Where the apple reddens
 Never pry—
 Lest we lose our Edens,
 Eve and I.

VI.

Be a god and hold me
 With a charm !
 Be a man and fold me
 With thine arm !

VII.

Teach me, only teach, Love !
 As I ought
 I will speak thy speech, Love,
 Think thy thought—

VI.

But he looked upon the city, every side,
 Far and wide,
 All the mountains topped with temples, all the glades'
 Colonnades,
 All the causeys, bridges, aqueducts,—and
 then,
 All the men !
 When I do come, she will speak not, she will stand,
 Either hand
 On my shoulder, give her eyes the first embrace
 Of my face,
 Ere we rush, ere we extinguish sight and speech
 Each on each.

VII.

In one year they sent a million fighters forth
 South and North,
 And they built their gods a brazen pillar high
 As the sky,
 Yet reserved a thousand chariots in full force—
 Gold, of course.
 Oh heart ! oh blood that freezes, blood that burns !
 Earth's returns
 For whole centuries of folly, noise and sin !
 Shut them in,
 With their triumphs and their glories and the rest !
 Love is best.

A LOVERS' QUARREL.

I.

Oh, what a dawn of day !
 How the March sun feels like May !
 All is blue again
 After last night's rain,
 And the South dries the hawthorn-spray.
 Only, my Love's away !
 I'd as lief that the blue were grey,

II.

Runnels, which rillels swell,
 Must be dancing down the dell,
 With a foaming head
 On the beryl bed
 Paven smooth as a hermit's cell ;
 Each with a tale to tell,
 Could my Love but attend as well.

III.

Dearest, three months ago !
 When we lived blocked-up with snow,—
 When the wind would edge
 In and in his wedge,
 In, as far as the point could go—
 Not to our ingle, though,
 Where we loved each the other so !

IV.

Laughs with so little cause !
 We devised games out of straws,
 We would try and trace
 One another's face
 In the ash, as an artist draws ;
 Free on each other's flaws,
 How we chattered like two church daws !

V.

What's in the "Times" ?—a scold
 At the Emperor deep and cold ;
 He has taken a bride
 To his gruesome side,
 That's as fair as himself is bold :
 There they sit ermine-stoled,
 And she powders her hair with gold.

VI.

Fancy the Pampas' sheen !
 Miles and miles of gold and green
 Where the sunflowers blow
 In a solid glow,
 And — to break now and then the screen—
 Black neck and eyeballs keen,
 Up a wild horse leaps between !

VII.

Try, will our table turn?
 Lay your hands there light, and yearn
 Till the yearning slips
 Thro' the finger-tips
 In a fire which a few discern,
 And a very few feel burn,
 And the rest, they may live and learn!

VIII.

Then we would up and pace,
 For a change, about the place,
 Each with arm o'er neck:
 'Tis our quarter-deck,
 We are seamen in woeful case.
 Help in the ocean-space!
 Or, if no help, we'll embrace.

IX.

See, how she looks now, dressed
 In a sledging-cap and vest!
 'Tis a huge fur cloak—
 Like a reindeer's yoke
 Falls the lappet along the breast:
 Sleeves for her arms to rest,
 Or to hang, as my Love likes best.

X.

Teach me to flirt a fan
 As the Spanish ladies can,
 Or I tint your lip
 With a burnt stick's tip
 And you turn into such a man!
 Just the two spots that span
 Half the bill of the young male swan.

XI.

Dearest, three months ago
 When the mesmerizer Snow
 With his hand's first sweep
 Put the earth to sleep:
 'Twas a time when the heart could show
 All—how was earth to know,
 'Neath the mute hand's to-and-fro?

XII.

Dearest, three months ago
 When we loved each other so,
 Lived and loved the same
 Till an evening came
 When a shaft from the devil's bow
 Pierced to our ingle-glow,
 And the friends were friend and foe!

XIII.

Not from the heart beneath—
 'Twas a bubble born of breath,
 Neither sneer nor vaunt,
 Nor reproach nor taunt.
 See a word, how it severeth!
 Oh, power of life and death
 In the tongue, as the Preacher saith!

XIV.

Woman, and will you cast
 For a word, quite off at last
 Me, your own, your You,—
 Since, as truth is true,
 I was You all the happy past—
 Me do you leave aghast
 With the memories We amassed?

XV.

Love, if you knew the light
 That your soul casts in my sight,
 How I look to you
 For the pure and true
 And the beauteous and the right,—
 Bear with a moment's spite
 When a mere mote threatens the white!

XVI.

What of a hasty word?
 Is the fleshly heart not stirred
 By a worm's pin-prick
 Where its roots are quick?
 See the eye, by a fly's foot blurred—
 Ear, when a straw is heard
 Scratch the brain's coat of curd!

XVII.

Foul be the world or fair
 More or less, how can I care?
 'Tis the world the same
 For my praise or blame,
 And endurance is easy there.
 Wrong in the one thing rare—
 Oh, it is hard to bear!

XVIII.

Here's the spring back or close,
 When the almond-blossom blows:
 We shall have the word
 In a minor third
 There is none but the cuckoo knows
 Heaps of the guelder-rose!
 I must bear with it, I suppose.

XIX.

Could but November come,
 Were the noisy birds struck dumb
 At the warning slash
 Of his driver's-lash—
 I would laugh like the valiant Thumb
 Facing the castle glum
 And the giant's fee-faw-fum!

XX.

Then, were the world well stripped
 Of the gear wherein equipped
 We can stand apart,
 Heart dispense with heart
 In the sun, with the flowers unrippd,—
 Oh, the world's hangings ripped,
 We were both in a bare-walled crypt!

XXI.

Each in the crypt would cry
 "But one freezes here! and why?"
 "When a heart, as chill,
 "At my own would thrill
 "Back to life, and its fires out-fly?
 "Heart, shall we live or die?
 "The rest, . . . settle by-and-by!"

XXII.

So, she'd efface the score,
 And forgive me as before.
 It is twelve o'clock:
 I shall hear her knock
 In the worst of a storm's uproar,
 I shall pull her through the door,
 I shall have her for evermore!

UP AT A VILLA—DOWN IN THE CITY.

(AS DISTINGUISHED BY AN ITALIAN PERSON OF QUALITY.)

I.

HAD I but plenty of money, money enough and to spare,
 The house for me, no doubt, were a house in the city-square;
 Ah, such a life, such a life, as one leads at the window there!

II.

Something to see, by Bacchus, something to hear, at least!
 There, the whole day long, one's life is a perfect feast;
 While up at a villa one lives, I maintain it,
 no more than a beast.

III.

Well now, look at our villa! stuck like the horn of a bull
 Just on a mountain-edge as bare as the creature's skull,
 Save a mere shag of a bush with hardly a leaf to pull!
 —I scratch my own, sometimes, to see if the hair's turned wool.

IV.

But the city, oh the city—the square with the houses! Why?
 They are stone-faced, white as a curd, there's something to take the eye!

Houses in four straight lines, not a single front awry ;
 You watch who crosses and gossips, who saunters, who hurries by ;
 Green blinds, as a matter of course, to draw when the sun gets high ;
 And the shops with fanciful signs which are painted properly.

V.

What of a villa ? Though winter be over in March by rights,
 'Tis May perhaps ere the snow shall have withered well off the heights :
 You've the brown ploughed land before, where the oxen steam and wheeze,
 And the hills over-smoked behind by the faint grey olive-trees.

VI.

Is it better in May, I ask you ? You've summer all at once ;
 In a day he leaps complete with a few strong April suns.
 'Mid the sharp short emerald wheat, scarce risen three fingers well,
 The wild tulip, at end of its tube, blows out its great red bell
 Like a thin clear bubble of blood, for the children to pick and sell.

VII.

Is it ever hot in the square ? There's a fountain to spout and splash !
 In the shade it sings and springs ; in the shine such foam-bows flash
 On the horses with curling fish-tails, that prance and paddle and pash
 Round the lady atop in her conch—fifty gazers do not abash,
 Though all that she wears is some weeds round her waist in a sort of sash.

All the year long at the villa, nothing to see though you linger,
 Except yon cypress that points like death's lean lifted forefinger.

Some think fireflies pretty, when they mix i' the corn and mingle,
 Or thrud the stinking hemp, till the stalks of it seem a-tingle.
 Late August or early September, the stunning cicala is shrill,
 And the bees keep their tiresome whine round the resinous firs on the hill.
 Enough of the seasons,—I spare you the months of the fever and chill.

IX.

Ere you open your eyes in the city, the blessed church-bells begin :
 No sooner the bells leave off than the diligence rattles in :
 You get the pick of the news, and it costs you never a pin.
 By-and-by there's the travelling doctor gives pills, lets blood, draws teeth ;
 Or the Pulcinello-trumpet breaks up the market beneath.
 At the post-office such a scene-picture—the new play, piping hot !
 And a notice how, only this morning, three liberal thieves were shot.
 Above it, behold the Archbishop's most fatherly of rebukes,
 And beneath, with his crown and his lion, some little new law of the Duke's !
 Or a sonnet with flowery marge, to the Reverend Don So-and-so
 Who is Dante, Boccaccio, Petrarca, Saint Jerome and Cicero,
 "And moreover," (the sonnet goes rhyming,) "the skirts of Saint Paul has reached,
 "Having preached us those six Lent-lectures more unctuous than ever he preached."
 Noon strikes,—here sweeps the procession ! our Lady borne smiling and smart
 With a pink gauze gown all spangles, and seven swords stuck in her heart !
Bang-whang-whang goes the drum, tootle-tootlle the fife ;
 No keeping one's haunches still : it's the greatest pleasure in life.

X.

But bless you, it's dear—it's dear ! fowls,
wine, at double the rate.

They have clapped a new tax upon salt, and what oil pays passing the gate

It's a horror to think of. And so, the villa for me, not the city !

Beggars can scarcely be choosers : but still—ah, the pity, the pity !

Look, two and two go the priests, then the monks with cowls and sandals,

And the penitents dressed in white shirts,
a-holding the yellow candles ;

One, he carries a flag up straight, and another a cross with handles,

And the Duke's guard brings up the rear, for the better prevention of scandals :

Bang-whang-whang goes the drum, tootle-te-tootle the fife.

Oh, a day in the city-square, there is no such pleasure in life !

A TOCCATA¹ OF GALUPPI'S.

[Galuppi was a famous Italian composer of the eighteenth century. He was in London from 1741 to 1744.]

I.

OH Galuppi, Baldassaro, this is very sad to
find !

I can hardly misconceive you ; it would prove me deaf and blind ;

But although I take your meaning, 'tis with such a heavy mind !

II.

Here you come with your old music, and here's all the good it brings.

What, they lived once thus at Venice where the merchants were the kings,

Where Saint Mark's is, where the Doges used to wed the sea with rings ?

¹ An overture—a touch piece.

III.

Ay, because the sea's the street there ; and
'tis arched by . . . what you call

. . . Shylock's bridge with houses on it, where they kept the carnival :

I was never out of England—it's as if I saw it all.

IV.

Did young people take their pleasure when the sea was warm in May ?

Balls and masks begun at midnight, burning ever to mid-day,

When they made up fresh adventures for the morrow, do you say ?

V.

Was a lady such a lady, cheeks so round and lips so red,—

On her neck the small face buoyant, like a bell-flower on its bed,

O'er the breast's superb abundance where a man might base his head ?

VI.

Well, and it was graceful of them—they'd break talk off and afford

—She, to bite her mask's black velvet—he,
to finger on his sword,

While you sat and played Toccatas, stately at the clavichord ?

VII.

What ? Those lesser thirds so plaintive, sixths diminished, sigh on sigh,

Told them something ? Those suspensions, those solutions—"Must we die ?"

Those commiserating sevenths—"Life might last ! we can but try !"

VIII.

"Were you happy ?"—"Yes."—"And are you still as happy ?"—"Yes. And you ?"

—"Then, more kisses !"—"Did I stop them, when a million seemed so few ?"

Hark, the dominant's persistence till it must be answered to !

IX.

So, an octave struck the answer. Oh, they praised you, I dare say !
"Brave Galuppi ! that was music ! good alike at grave and gay !
"I can always leave off talking when I hear a master play !"

X.

Then they left you for their pleasure : till in due time, one by one,
Some with lives that came to nothing, some with deeds as well undone,
Death stepped tacitly and took them where they never see the sun.

XI.

But when I sit down to reason, think to take my stand nor swerve,
While I triumph o'er a secret wrung from nature's close reserve,
In you come with your cold music till I creep thro' every nerve.

XII.

Yes, you, like a ghostly cricket, creaking where a house was burned :
"Dust and ashes, dead and done with,
Venice spent what Venice earned.
"The soul, doubtless, is immortal—where a soul can be discerned.

"Yours for instance : you know physics,
something of geology,
"Mathematics are your pastime ; souls shall rise in their degree ;
"Butterflies may dread extinction,—you'll not die, it cannot be !

"As for Venice and her people, merely born to bloom and drop,
"Here on earth they bore their fruitage,
mirth and folly were the crop :
"What of soul was left, I wonder, when the kissing had to stop ?

XV.

"Dust and ashes !" So you creak it, and I want the heart to scold.
Dear dead women, with such hair, too—what's become of all the gold Used to hang and brush their bosoms ? I feel chilly and grown old.

OLD PICTURES IN FLORENCE.

THE morn when first it thunders in March,
The eel in the pond gives a leap, they say :
As I leaned and looked over the aloed arch
Of the villa-gate this warm March day,
No flash snapped, no dumb thunder rolled
In the valley beneath where, white and wide
And washed by the morning water-gold,
Florence lay out on the mountain-side.

II.

River and bridge and street and square
Lay mine, as much at my beck and call,
Through the live translucent bath of air,
As the sights in a magic crystal ball.
And of all I saw and of all I praised,
The most to praise and the best to see
Was the startling bell-tower Giotto raised :
But why did it more than startle me ?

Giotto, how, with that soul of yours,
Could you play me false who loved you so ?
Some slights if a certain heart endures
Yet it feels, I would have your fellows
know !
I' faith, I perceive not why I should care
To break a silence that suits them best,
But the thing grows somewhat hard to bear
When I find a Giotto join the rest.

IV.

On the arch where olives overhead
Print the blue sky with twig and leaf,
(That sharp-curved leaf which they never shed)
'Twixt the aloes, I used to lean in chief,

And mark through the winter afternoons,
By a gift God grants me now and then,
In the mild decline of those suns like moons,
Who walked in Florence, besides her men.

V.

They might chirp and chaffer, come and go
For pleasure or profit, her men alive—
My business was hardly with them, I trow,
But with empty cells of the human hive ;
—With the chapter-room, the cloister-porch,
The church's apsis, aisle or nave,
Its crypt, one fingers along with a torch,
Its face set full for the sun to shave.

VI.

Wherever a fresco peels and drops,
Wherever an outline weakens and wanes
Till the latest life in the painting stops,
Stands One whom each fainter pulse-tick pains :
One, wishful each scrap should clutch the brick,
Each tinge not wholly escape the plaster,
—A lion who dies of an ass's kick,
The wronged great soul of an ancient Master.

VII.

For oh, this world and the wrong it does !
They are safe in heaven with their backs
to it,
The Michaels and Rafaels, you hum and buzz
Round the works of, you of the little wit !
Do their eyes contract to the earth's old scope,
Now that they see God face to face,
And have all attained to be poets, I hope ?
'Tis their holiday now, in any case.

Much they reckon of your praise and you !
But the wronged great souls—can they be quit
Of a world where their work is all to do,
Where you style them, you of the little wit,
Old Master This and Early the Other,
Not dreaming that Old and New are fellows :
A younger succeeds to an elder brother,
Da Vincis derive in good time from Dellos.

And here where your praise might yield returns,
And a handsome word or two give help,
Here, after your kind, the mastiff grins
And the puppy pack of poodles yelp.
What, not a word for Stefano there,
Of brow once prominent and starry,
Called Nature's Ape and the world's despair
For his peerless painting? (See Vasari.)

X.

There stands the Master. Study, my friends,
What a man's work comes to ! So he plans it,
Performs it, perfects it, makes amends
For the toiling and moiling, and then, sic transit !
Happier the thrifty blind-folk labour,
With upturned eye while the hand is busy,
Not sidling a glance at the coin of their neighbour !
'Tis looking downward that makes one dizzy.

XI.

"If you knew their work you would deal your dole."
May I take upon me to instruct you ?
When Greek Art ran and reached the goal,
Thus much had the world to boast in fructu—
The Truth of Man, as by God first spoken,
Which the actual generations garble,
Was re-uttered, and Soul (which Limbs betoken)
And Limbs (Soul informs) made new in marble.

XII.

So, you saw yourself as you wished you were,
As you might have been, as you cannot be ;
Earth here, rebuked by Olympus there :
And grew content in your poor degree
With your little power, by those statues'
godhead,
And your little scope, by their eyes' full sway,
And your little grace, by their grace embodied,
And your little date, by their forms that stay.

XIII.

You would fain be kinglier, say, than I am?
 Even so, you will not sit like Theseus.
 You would prove a model? The Son of Priam
 Has yet the advantage in arms' and knees' use.
 You're wroth—can you slay your snake like Apollo?
 You're grieved—still Niobe's the grander!
 You live—there's the Racers' frieze to follow:
 You die—there's the dying Alexander.

XIV.

So, testing your weakness by their strength,
 Your meagre charms by their rounded
 beauty,
 Measured by Art in your breadth and length,
 You learned—to submit is a mortal's duty.
 —When I say "you" 'tis the common soul,
 The collective, I mean: the race of Man
 That receives life in parts to live in a whole,
 And grow here according to God's clear plan.

XV.

Growth came when, looking your last on them all,
 You turned your eyes inwardly one fine day
 And cried with a start—What if we so small
 Be greater and grander the while than they?
 Are they perfect of lineament, perfect of stature?
 In both, of such lower types are we
 Precisely because of our wider nature;
 For time, theirs—ours, for eternity.

XVI.

To-day's brief passion limits their range;
 It seethes with the morrow for us and more.
 They are perfect—how else? they shall never
 change:
 We are faulty—why not? we have time in store.
 The Artificer's hand is not arrested
 With us; we are rough-hewn, nowise polished:
 They stand for our copy, and, once invested
 With all they can teach, we shall see them abolished.

XVII.

'Tis a life-long toil till our lump be leaven—
 The better! What's come to perfection perishes.
 Things learned on earth, we shall practise
 in heaven:
 Works done least rapidly, Art most cherishes.
 Thyself shalt afford the example, Giotto!
 Thy one work, not to decrease or diminish,
 Done at a stroke, was just (was it not?) "O!"
 Thy great Campanile is still to finish.

XVIII.

Is it true that we are now, and shall be hereafter,
 But what and where depend on life's minute?
 Hails heavenly cheer or infernal laughter
 Our first step out of the gulf or in it?
 Shall Man, such step within his endeavour,
 Man's face, have no more play and action
 Than joy which is crystallized for ever,
 Or grief, an eternal petrification?

XIX.

On which I conclude, that the early painters,
 To cries of "Greek Art and what more wish you?"—
 Replied, "To become now self-acquainters,
 "And paint man man, whatever the issue!
 "Make new hopes shine through the flesh they fray,
 "New fears aggrandize the rags and tatters:
 "To bring the invisible full into play!"
 "Let the visible go to the dogs—what matters?"

XX.

Give these, I exhort you, their guerdon and glory
 For daring so much, before they well did it.
 The first of the new, in our race's story,
 Beats the last of the old; 'tis no idle quiddit.
 The worthies began a revolution,
 Which if on earth you intend to acknowledge,
 Why, honour them now! (ends my allocution)
 Nor confer your degree when the folk leave college.

XXI.

There's a fancy some lean to and others hate—
That, when this life is ended, begins
New work for the soul in another state,
Where it strives and gets weary, loses and wins :

Where the strong and the weak, this world's congeries,

Repeat in large what they practised in small,
Through life after life in unlimited series ;
Only the scale's to be changed, that's all.

XXII.

Yet I hardly know. When a soul has seen
By the means of Evil that Good is best,
And, through earth and its noise, what is heaven's serene,—

When our faith in the same has stood the test—

Why, the child grown man, you burn the rod,
The uses of labour are surely done ;
There remaineth a rest for the people of
God :
And I have had troubles enough, for one.

XXIII.

But at any rate I have loved the season
Of Art's spring-birth so dim and dewy ;
My sculptor is Nicolo¹ the Pisan,
My painter—who but Cimabue ?
Nor ever was man of them all indeed,
From these to Ghiberti² and Ghirlandajo,³
Could say that he missed my critic-meed.
So, now to my special grievance—heigh ho !

XXIV.

Their ghosts still stand, as I said before,
Watching each fresco flaked and rasped,
Blocked up, knocked out, or whitewashed
o'er :
—No getting again what the church has grasped !

² Died 1455. Designed the bronze gates of the Baptistry at Florence.
³ A painter, died 1498.

The works on the wall must take their chance ;
“ Works never conceded to England's thick clime ! ”

(I hope they prefer their inheritance
Of a bucketful of Italian quick-lime.)

When they go at length, with such a shaking
Of heads o'er the old delusion, sadly
Each master his way through the black streets taking,

Where many a lost work breathes though badly—

Why don't they bethink them of who has merited ?

Why not reveal, while their pictures dree
Such doom, how a captive might be outferreted ?

Why is it they never remember me ?

XXVI.

Not that I expect the great Bigordi,
Nor Sandro to hear me, chivalric, bellicose ;
Nor the wronged Lippino ;⁴ and not a word I Say of a scrap of Frà Angelico's :
But are you too fine, Taddeo Gaddi,⁵
To grant me a taste of your intonaco,⁶
Some Jerome that seeks the heaven with a sad eye ?
Not a churlish saint, Lorenzo Monaco ?

XXVII.

Could not the ghost with the close red cap,
My Pollajolo,⁷ the twice a craftsman,
Save me a sample, give me the hap
Of a muscular Christ that shows the draughtsman ?
No Virgin by him the somewhat petty,
Of finical touch and tempera⁸ crumbly—
Could not Alesso Baldovinetti
Contribute so much, I ask him humbly ?

⁴ The son of Frà Lippo Lippi. Wronged, because some of his pictures have been attributed to others.

⁵ Died 1366. One of Giotto's pupils and assistants.

⁶ Rough cast.

⁷ Painter, sculptor, and goldsmith.

⁸ Distemper—mixture of water and egg yolk.

XXVIII.

Margheritone of Arezzo,¹
 With the grave-clothes garb and swaddling barret
 (Why purse up mouth and beak in a pet so,
 You bald old saturnine poll-clawed parrot?)
 Not a poor glimmering Crucifixion,
 Where in the foreground kneels the donor?
 If such remain, as is my conviction,
 The hoarding it does you but little honour.

XXIX.

They pass; for them the panels may thrill,
 The tempera grow alive and tinglyish;
 Their pictures are left to the mercies still
 Of dealers and stealers, Jews and the English,
 Who, seeing mere money's worth in their
 prize,
 Will sell it to somebody calm as Zeno
 At naked High Art, and in ecstasies
 Before some clay-cold vile Carlino!

XXX.

No matter for these! But Giotto, you,
 Have you allowed, as the town-tongues babble it,—
 Oh, never! it shall not be counted true—
 That a certain precious little tablet
 Which Buonarroto eyed like a lover,—
 Was buried so long in oblivion's womb
 And, left for another than I to discover,
 Turns up at last! and to whom?—to whom?

XXXI.

I, that have haunted the dim San Spirito,
 (Or was it rather the Ognissanti?)
 Patient on altar-step planting a weary toe!
 Nay, I shall have it yet! Detur amanti!
 My Koh-i-noor—or (if that's a platitude)
 Jewel of Giamschid, the Persian Sofi's eye;
 So, in anticipative gratitude,
 What if I take up my hope and prophesy?

¹ Sculptor and architect, died 1313.

² All Saints.

XXXII.

When the hour grows ripe, and a certain dotard
 Is pitched, no parcel that needs invoicing,
 To the worse side of the Mont Saint Gothard,
 We shall begin by way of rejoicing;
 None of that shooting the sky (blank cartridge),
 Nor a civic guard, all plumes and lacquer,
 Hunting Radetzky's soul like a partridge
 Over Morello with squib and cracker.

XXXIII.

This time we'll shoot better game and bag
 'em hot—
 No mere display at the stone of Dante,
 But a kind of sober Witanagemot
 (Ex: "Casa Guidi," quod vi-teas ante)
 Shall ponder, once Freedom restored to
 Florence,
 How Art may return that departed with her.
 Go, hated house, go each trace of the Loraine's,
 And bring us the days of Orgagna³ hither!

XXXIV.

How we shall prologize, how we shall perorate,
 Utter fit things upon art and history,
 Feel truth at blood-heat and falsehood at zero rate,
 Make of the want of the age no mystery;
 Contrast the fructuous and sterile eras,
 Show—monarchy ever its uncouth cub licks
 Out of the bear's shape into Chimæra's,
 While Pure Art's birth is still the republic's.

XXXV.

Then one shall propose in a speech (curt Tuscan,
 Expurgate and sober, with scarcely an
 "issimo,")
 To end now our half-told tale of Cambuscan,⁴
 And turn the bell-tower's alt to altissimo:

³ A Florentine painter, died 1376.

⁴ Tartar king.

And fine as the beak of a young beccaccia¹
 The Campanile, the Duomo's fit ally,
 Shall soar up in gold full fifty braccia,
 Completing Florence, as Florence Italy.

XXXVI.

Shall I be alive that morning the scaffold
 Is broken away, and the long-pent fire,
 Like the golden hope of the world, unbaffled
 Springs from its sleep, and up goes the spire
 While "God and the People" plain for its motto,
 Thence the new tricolour flaps at the sky?
 At least to foresee that glory of Giotto
 And Florence together, the first am I!

"DE GUSTIBUS——"

I.

YOUR ghost will walk, you lover of trees,
 (If our loves remain)
 In an English lane,
 By a cornfield-side a-flutter with poppies.
 Hark, those two in the hazel coppice—
 A boy and a girl, if the good fates please,
 Making love, say,—
 The happier they!
 Draw yourself up from the light of the moon,
 And let them pass, as they will too soon,
 With the bean-flowers' boon,
 And the blackbird's tune,
 And May, and June!

II.

What I love best in all the world
 Is a castle, precipice-encurled,
 In a gash of the wind-grieved Apennine
 Or look for me, old fellow of mine,
 (If I get my head from out the mouth
 O' the grave, and loose my spirit's bands,
 And come again to the land of lands)—
 In a sea-side house to the farther South,
 Where the baked cicala dies of drouth,
 And one sharp tree—'tis a cypress—stands.

By the many hundred years red-rusted,
 Rough iron-spiked, ripe fruit-o'ercrusted,
 My sentinel to guard the sands
 To the water's edge. For, what expands
 Before the house, but the great opaque
 Blue breadth of sea without a break?
 While, in the house, for ever crumbles
 Some fragment of the frescoed walls,
 From blisters where a scorpion sprawls.
 A girl bare-footed brings, and tumbles
 Down on the pavement, green-flesh melons,
 And says there's news to-day—the king
 Was shot at, touched in the liver-wing,
 Goes with his Bourbon arm in a sling:
 —She hopes they have not caught the felons.

Italy, my Italy!

Queen Mary's saying serves for me—
 (When fortune's malice Lost her—Calais)—

Open my heart and you will see
 Graved inside of it, "Italy."
 Such lovers old are I and she:
 So it always was, so shall ever be!

HOME-THOUGHTS, FROM ABROAD.

I.

OH, to be in England
 Now that April's there,
 And whoever wakes in England
 Sees, some morning, unaware,
 That the lowest boughs and the brushwood sheaf
 Round the elm-tree hole are in tiny leaf,
 While the chaffinch sings on the orchard bough
 In England—now!

And after April, when May follows,
 And the whitethroat builds, and all the swallows!
 Hark, where my blossomed pear-tree in the hedge
 Leans to the field and scatters on the clover

Blossoms and dewdrops—at the bent spray's edge—

That's the wise thrush ; he sings each song twice over,

Lest you should think he never could recapture

The first fine careless rapture !

And though the fields look rough with hoary
dew,

All will be gay when noontide wakes anew

The buttercups, the little children's dower

—Far brighter than this gaudy melon-flower !

HOME-THOUGHTS, FROM THE SEA.

NOBLY, nobly Cape Saint Vincent to the North-west died away ;

Sunset ran, one glorious blood-red, reeking into Cadiz Bay ;

Bluish 'mid the burning water, full in face
Trafalgar lay ;

In the dimmest North-east distance dawned
Gibraltar grand and gray ;

"Here and here did England help me : how can I help England ?"—say,

Whoso turns as I, this evening, turn to God
to praise and pray,

While Jove's planet rises yonder, silent over Africa.

SAUL.

I.

SAID Abner, "At last thou art come ! Ere
I tell, ere thou speak,

"Kiss my cheek, wish me well !" Then I wished it, and did kiss his cheek.

And he, "Since the King, O my friend, for thy countenance sent,

"Neither drunken nor eaten have we ; nor until from his tent

"Thou return with the joyful assurance the King liveth yet,

"Shall our lip with the honey be bright,
with the water be wet.

VOL. I.

"For out of the black mid-tent's silence, a space of three days,

"Not a sound hath escaped to thy servants,
of prayer nor of praise,

"To betoken that Saul and the Spirit have ended their strife,

"And that, faint in his triumph, the monarch
sinks back upon life.

II.

"Yet now my heart leaps, O beloved ! God's child with his dew

"On thy gracious gold hair, and those lilies still living and blue

"Just broken to twine round thy harp-strings, as if no wild heat

"Were now raging to torture the desert !"

III.

Then I, as was meet,
Knelt down to the God of my fathers, and rose on my feet,

And ran o'er the sand burnt to powder. The tent was unlooped ;

I pulled up the spear that obstructed, and under I stooped ;

Hands and knees on the slippery grass-patch,
all withered and gone,

That extends to the second enclosure, I groped my way on

Till I felt where the foldskirts fly open.
Then once more I prayed,

And opened the foldskirts and entered, and was not afraid

But spoke, "Here is David, thy servant !" And no voice replied.

At the first I saw nought but the blackness ;
but soon I descried

A something more black than the blackness
—the vast, the upright

Main prop which sustains the pavilion : and slow into sight

Grew a figure against it, gigantic and blackest
of all.

Then a sunbeam, that burst thro' the tent-roof, showed Saul.

IV.

He stood as erect as that tent-prop, both arms stretched out wide
On the great cross-support in the centre, that goes to each side ;
He relaxed not a muscle, but hung there as,
caught in his pangs
And waiting his change, the king-serpent all heavily hangs,
Far away from his kind, in the pine, till deliverance come
With the spring-time,—so agonized Saul, drear and stark, blind and dumb.

V.

Then I tuned my harp,—took off the lilies
we twine round its chords
Lest they snap 'neath the stress of the noon-tide—those sunbeams like swords !
And I first played the tune all our sheep know, as, one after one,
So docile they come to the pen-door till folding be done.
They are white and untorn by the bushes, for lo, they have fed
Where the long grasses stifle the water within the stream's bed ;
And now one after one seeks its lodging, as star follows star
Into eve and the blue far above us,—so blue and so far !

VI.

—Then the tune, for which quails on the cornland will each leave his mate
To fly after the player ; then, what makes the crickets elate
Till for boldness they fight one another : and then, what has weight
To set the quick jerboa¹ a-musing outside his sand house—
There are none such as he for a wonder, half bird and half mouse !
God made all the creatures and gave them
our love and our fear,
To give sign, we and they are his children,
one family here.

¹ The jumping hare.

VII.

Then I played the help-tune of our reapers, their wine-song, when hand
Grasps at hand, eye lights eye in good friendship, and great hearts expand
And grow one in the sense of this world's life.—And then, the last song
When the dead man is praised on his journey
—"Bear, bear him along "With his few faults shut up like dead flowerets ! Are balm-seeds not here "To console us ? The land has none left such as he on the bier.
"Oh, would we might keep thee, my brother !"—And then, the glad chaunt
Of the marriage,—first go the young maidens, next, she whom we vaunt
As the beauty, the pride of our dwelling.—
And then, the great march Wherein man runs to man to assist him and buttress an arch
Nought can break ; who shall harm them, our friends ?—Then, the chorus intoned
As the Levites go up to the altar in glory enthroned.
But I stopped here : for here in the darkness
Saul groaned.

And I paused, held my breath in such silence,
and listened apart ;
And the tent shook, for mighty Saul shuddered :
and sparkles 'gan dart
From the jewels that woke in his turban, at once with a start,
All its lordly male-sapphires, and rubies courageous at heart.
So the head : but the body still moved not,
still hung there erect.
And I bent once again to my playing, pursued it unchecked,
As I sang,—

IX.

"Oh, our manhood's prime vigour !
No spirit feels waste,
"Not a muscle is stopped in its playing nor sinew unbraced.

- "Oh, the wild joys of living! the leaping from rock up to rock,"
- "The strong rending of boughs from the fir-tree, the cool silver shock
- "Of the plunge in a pool's living water, the hunt of the bear,
- "And the sultriness showing the lion is couched in his lair.
- "And the meal, the rich dates yellowed over with gold dust divine,
- "And the locust-flesh steeped in the pitcher,
the full draught of wine,
- "And the sleep in the dried river-channel where bulrushes tell
- "That the water was wont to go warbling
so softly and well.
- "How good is man's life, the mere living!
how fit to employ
- "All the heart and the soul and the senses for ever in joy!
- "Hast thou loved the white locks of thy father, whose sword thou didst guard
- "When he trusted thee forth with the armies, for glorious reward?
- "Didst thou see the thin hands of thy mother,
held up as men sung
- "The low song of the nearly-departed, and hear her faint tongue
- "Joining in while it could to the witness,
'Let one more attest,
- "'I have lived, seen God's hand thro' a lifetime, and all was for best'?
- "Then they sung thro' their tears in strong triumph, not much, but the rest.
- "And thy brothers, the help and the contest, the working whence grew
- "Such result as, from seething grape-bundles,
the spirit strained true:
- "And the friends of thy boyhood—that boy-hood of wonder and hope,
- "Present promise and wealth of the future beyond the eye's scope,—
- "Till lo, thou art grown to a monarch; a people is thine;
- "And all gifts, which the world offers singly,
on one head combine!
- "On one head, all the beauty and strength, love and rage (like the throe
- "That, a-work in the rock, helps its labour and lets the gold go)
- "High ambition and deeds which surpass it, fame crowning them,—all
- "Brought to blaze on the head of one creature—King Saul!"

X.

- And lo, with that leap of my spirit,—heart,
hand, harp and voice,
- Each lifting Saul's name out of sorrow, each bidding rejoice
- Saul's fame in the light it was made for—as when, dare I say,
- The Lord's army, in rapture of service, strains through its array,
- And upsoareth the cherubim-chariot—"Saul!"
cried I, and stopped,
- And waited the thing that should follow.
Then Saul, who hung propped
- By the tent's cross-support in the centre, was struck by his name.
- Have ye seen when Spring's arrowy summons goes right to the aim,
- And some mountain, the last to withstand her, that held (he alone,
- While the vale laughed in freedom and flowers) on a broad bust of stone
- A year's snow bound about for a breastplate,
—leaves grasp of the sheet?
- Fold on fold all at once it crowds thunderously down to his feet,
- And there fronts you, stark, black, but alive
yet, your mountain of old,
- With his rents, the successive bequeathings of ages untold—
- Yea, each harm got in fighting your battles, each furrow and scar
- Of his head thrust 'twixt you and the tempest
—all hail, there they are!
- Now again to be softened with verdure, again hold the nest
- Of the dove, tempt the goat and its young to the green on his crest
- For their food in the arduous of summer:
One long shudder thrilled
- All the tent till the very air tingled, then sank and was stilled

At the King's self left standing before me, released and aware.

What was gone, what remained? All to traverse, 'twixt hope and despair;

Death was past, life not come: so he waited.
Awhile his right hand

Held the brow, helped the eyes left too vacant forthwith to remand

To their place what new objects should enter:
'twas Saul as before.

I looked up and dared gaze: at those eyes, nor was hurt any more

Than by slow pallid sunsets in autumn, ye watch from the shore,

At their sad level gaze o'er the ocean—a sun's slow decline

Over hills which, resolved in stern silence, o'erlap and entwine

Base with base to knit strength more intensely: so, arm folded arm

O'er the chest whose slow heavings subsided.

XI.

What spell or what charm,
(For, awhile there was trouble within me) what next should I urge

To sustain him where song had restored him?
—Song filled to the verge

His cup with the wine of this life, pressing all that it yields

Of mere fruitage, the strength and the beauty:
beyond, on what fields,

Glean a vintage more potent and perfect to brighten the eye

And bring blood to the lip, and commend them the cup they put by?

He saith, "It is good;" still he drinks not:
he lets me praise life,

Gives assent, yet would die for his own part.

XII.

Then fancies grew rife
Which had come long ago on the pasture, when round me the sheep

Fed in silence—above, the one eagle wheeled slow as in sleep;

And I lay in my hollow and mused on the world that might lie

'Neath his ken, though I saw but the strip
'twixt the hill and the sky:

And I laughed—"Since my days are ordained to be passed with my flocks,

"Let me people at least, with my fancies,
the plains and the rocks,

"Dream the life I am never to mix with, and image the show

"Of mankind as they live in those fashions
I hardly shall know!

"Schemes of life, its best rules and right uses, the courage that gains,

"And the prudence that keeps what men strive for." And now these old trains

Of vague thought came again; I grew surer;
so, once more the string

Of my harp made response to my spirit, as
thus—

XIII.

"Yea, my King,"
I began—"thou dost well in rejecting mere comforts that spring

"From the mere mortal life held in common by man and by brute:

"In our flesh grows the branch of this life,
in our soul it bears fruit.

"Thou hast marked the slow rise of the tree,
—how its stem trembled first

"Till it passed the kid's lip, the stag's antler;
then safely outburst

"The fan-branches all round; and thou mindest when these too, in turn

"Broke a-bloom and the palm-tree seemed perfect: yet more was to learn,

"E'en the good that comes in with the palm-fruit. Our dates shall we slight,

"When their juice brings a cure for all sorrow?
or care for the plight

"Of the palm's self whose slow growth produced them? Not so! stem and branch

"Shall decay, nor be known in their place, while the palm-wine shall staunch

"Every wound of man's spirit in winter. I pour thee such wine.

"Leave the flesh to the fate it was fit for!
the spirit be thine!

- "By the spirit, when age shall o'ercome thee, thou still shalt enjoy
"More indeed, than at first when unconscious, the life of a boy.
"Crush that life, and behold its wine running!
Each deed thou hast done
"Dies, revives, goes to work in the world;
until e'en as the sun
"Looking down on the earth, though clouds spoil him, though tempests efface,
"Can find nothing his own deed produced not, must everywhere trace
"The results of his past summer-prime,—so,
each ray of thy will,
"Every flash of thy passion and prowess,
long over, shall thrill
"Thy whole people, the countless, with ardour, till they too give forth
"A like cheer to their sons, who in turn, fill the South and the North
"With the radiance thy deed was the germ
of. Carouse in the past!
"But the license of age has its limit; thou diest at last:
"As the lion when age dims his eyeball, the rose at her height
"So with man—so his power and his beauty for ever take flight.
"No! Again a long draught of my soul-wine! Look forth o'er the years!
"Thou hast done now with eyes for the actual; begin with the seer's!
"Is Saul dead? In the depth of the vale make his tomb—bid arise
"A grey mountain of marble heaped foursquare, till, built to the skies,
"Let it mark where the great First King slumbers: whose fame would ye
know?
"Up above see the rock's naked face, where the record shall go
"In great characters cut by the scribe,—Such was Saul, so he did;
"With the sages directing the work, by the populace chid,—
"For not half, they'll affirm, is comprised there! Which fault to amend,
- "In the grove with his kind grows the cedar,
whereon they shall spend
"(See, in tablets 'tis level before them) their praise, and record
"With the gold of the graver, Saul's story,
—the statesman's great word
"Side by side with the poet's sweet comment. The river's a-wave
"With smooth paper-reeds grazing each other when prophet-winds rave:
"So the pen gives unborn generations their due and their part
"In thy being! Then, first of the mighty, thank God that thou art!"

XIV.

And behold while I sang . . . but O Thou who didst grant me that day,
And before it not seldom hast granted thy help to essay,
Carry on and complete an adventure,—my shield and my sword
In that act where my soul was thy servant,
thy word was my word,—
Still be with me, who then at the summit of human endeavour
And scaling the highest, man's thought could, gazed hopeless as ever
On the new stretch of heaven above me—till,
mighty to save,
Just one lift of thy hand cleared that distance
—God's throne from man's grave!
Let me tell out my tale to its ending—my voice to my heart
Which can scarce dare believe in what mar-vels last night I took part,
As this morning I gather the fragments, alone with my sheep,
And still fear lest the terrible glory vanish
like sleep!
For I wake in the grey dewy covert, while Hebron¹ upheaves
The dawn struggling with night on his shoulder, and Kidron² retrieves
Slow the damage of yesterday's sunshine.

xv.

I say then,—my song
While I sang thus, assuring the monarch, and ever more strong
Made a proffer of good to console him—he slowly resumed
His old motions and habitudes kingly. The right-hand replumed
His black locks to their wonted composure, adjusted the swathes
Of his turban, and see—the huge sweat that his countenance bathes,
He wipes off with the robe; and he girds
now his loins as of yore,
And feels slow for the armlets of price, with the clasp set before.
He is Saul, ye remember in glory,—ere error had bent
The broad brow from the daily communion;
and still, though much spent
Be the life and the bearing that front you,
the same, God did choose,
To receive what a man may waste, desecrate,
never quite lose.
So sank he along by the tent-prop till, stayed by the pile
Of his armour and war-cloak and garments,
he leaned there awhile,
And sat out my singing,—one arm round the tent-prop, to raise
His bent head, and the other hung slack—till I touched on the praise
I foresaw from all men in all time, to the man patient there;
And thus ended, the harp falling forward.
Then first I was 'ware
That he sat, as I say, with my head just above his vast knees
Which were thrust out on each side around me, like oak-roots which please To encircle a lamb when it slumbers. I looked up to know
If the best I could do had brought solace:
he spoke not, but slow Lifted up the hand slack at his side, till he laid it with care
Soft and grave, but in mild settled will, on my brow: thro' my hair

The large fingers were pushed, and he bent back my head, with kind power—
All my face back, intent to peruse it, as men do a flower.
Thus held he me there with his great eyes that scrutinized mine—
And oh, all my heart how it loved him! but where was the sign?
I yearned—"Could I help thee, my father,
inventing a bliss,
"I would add, to that life of the past, both the future and this;
"I would give thee new life altogether, as good, ages hence,
"As this moment,—had love but the warrant, love's heart to dispense!"

xvi.

Then the truth came upon me. No harp more—no song more! outbroke—

xvii.

"I have gone the whole round of creation:
I saw and I spoke:
"I, a work of God's hand for that purpose, received in my brain
"And pronounced on the rest of his handwork—returned him again
"His creation's approval or censure: I spoke as I saw:
"I report, as a man may of God's work—
all's love, yet all's law.
"Now I lay down the judgeship he lent me.
Each faculty tasked
"To perceive him, has gained an abyss, where a dewdrop was asked.
"Have I knowledge? confounded it shrivels at Wisdom laid bare.
"Have I forethought? how purblind, how blank, to the Infinite Care!
"Do I task any faculty highest, to image success?
"I but open my eyes,—and perfection, no more and no less,
"In the kind I imagined, full-fronts me, and God is seen God
"In the star, in the stone, in the flesh, in the soul and the clod.

- "And thus looking within and around me, I ever renew
- "(With that stoop of the soul which in bending upraises it too)
- "The submission of man's nothing-perfect to God's all-complete,
- "As by each new obeisance in spirit, I climb to his feet.
- "Yet with all this abounding experience,
this deity known,
- "I shall dare to discover some province, some gift of my own.
- "There's a faculty pleasant to exercise, hard to hoodwink,
- "I am fain to keep still in abeyance, (I laugh
as I think)
- "Lest, insisting to claim and parade in it,
wot ye, I worst
- "E'en the Giver in one gift.—Behold, I could love if I durst !
- "But I sink the pretension as fearing a man may o'ertake
- "God's own speed in the one way of love : I abstain for love's sake.
- "—What, my soul? see thus far and no farther? when doors great and small,
- "Nine-and-ninety flew ope at our touch, should the hundredth appal?
- "In the least things have faith, yet distrust in the greatest of all?
- "Do I find love so full in my nature, God's ultimate gift,
- "That I doubt his own love can compete with it? Here, the parts shift?
- "Here, the creature surpass the Creator,— the end, what Began?
- "Would I fain in my impotent yearning do all for this man,
- "And dare doubt he alone shall not help him, who yet alone can?
- "Would it ever have entered my mind, the bare will, much less power,
- "To bestow on this Saul what I sang of, the marvellous dower
- "Of the life he was gifted and filled with? to make such a soul,
- "Such a body, and then such an earth for insphering the whole?
- "And doth it not enter my mind (as my warm tears attest)
- "These good things being given, to go on,
and give one more, the best?
- "Ay, to save and redeem and restore him, maintain at the height
- "This perfection,—succeed with life's day-spring, death's minute of night?
- "Interpose at the difficult minute, snatch
Saul the mistake,
- "Saul the failure, the ruin he seems now,— and bid him awake
- "From the dream, the probation, the prelude, to find himself set
- "Clear and safe in new light and new life,— a new harmony yet
- "To be run, and continued, and ended—who knows?—or endure !
- "The man taught enough, by life's dream, of the rest to make sure ;
- "By the pain-throb, triumphantly winning intensified bliss,
- "And the next world's reward and repose,
by the struggles in this.

XVIII.

- "I believe it ! 'Tis thou, God, that givest,
'tis I who receive :
- "In the first is the last, in thy will is my power to believe.
- "All's one gift : thou canst grant it moreover,
as prompt to my prayer
- "As I breathe out this breath, as I open these arms to the air.
- "From thy will, stream the worlds, life and nature, thy dread Sabaoth :
- "I will?—the mere atoms despise me ! Why am I not loth
- "To look that, even that in the face too?
Why is it I dare
- "Think but lightly of such impuissance?
What stops my despair?
- "This ;—'tis not what man Does which exalts him, but what man Would do !
- "See the King—I would help him but cannot, the wishes fall through.

"Could I wrestle to raise him from sorrow, And the stars of night beat with emotion, grow poor to enrich, and tingled and shot
 "To fill up his life, starve my own out, I Out in fire the strong pain of pent knowledge :
 would—knowing which, but I fainted not,
 "I know that my service is perfect. Oh, For the Hand still impelled me at once and speak through me now ! supported, suppressed
 "Would I suffer for him that I love? So All the tumult, and quenched it with quiet, wouldst thou—so wilt thou ! and holy behest,
 "So shall crown thee the topmost, ineffablest, Till the rapture was shut in itself, and the uttermost crown— earth sank to rest.
 "And thy love fill infinitude wholly, nor Anon at the dawn, all that trouble had leave up nor down withered from earth—
 "One spot for the creature to stand in ! It Not so much, but I saw it die out in the day's is by no breath, tender birth ;
 "Turn of eye, wave of hand, that salvation In the gathered intensity brought to the grey joins issue with death ! of the hills ;
 "As thy Love is discovered almighty, al- In the shuddering forests' held breath ; in mighty he proved the sudden wind-thrills ;
 "Thy power, that exists with and for it, of In the startled wild beasts that bore off, each being Beloved ! with eye sidling still
 "He who did most, shall bear most ; the Though averted with wonder and dread ; in strongest shall stand the most weak. the birds stiff and chill
 "'Tis the weakness in strength, that I cry That rose heavily, as I approached them, for ! my flesh, that I seek made stupid with awe :
 "In the Godhead ! I seek and I find it. O E'en the serpent that slid away silent,—he Saul, it shall be felt the new law.
 "A Face like my face that receives thee ; a The same stared in the white humid faces Man like to me, upturned by the flowers ;
 "Thou shalt love and be loved by, for ever : The same worked in the heart of the cedar a Hand like this hand and moved the vine-bowers :
 "Shall throw open the gates of new life to And the little brooks witnessing murmured, thee ! See the Christ stand !" persistent and low,
 With their obstinate, all but hushed voices—
 "E'en so, it is so !"

XIX.

I know not too well how I found my way home in the night.
 There were witnesses, cohorts about me, to left and to right,
 Angels, powers, the unuttered, unseen, the alive, the aware :
 I repressed, I got through them as hardly,
 as strugglingly there,
 As a runner beset by the populace famished for news—
 Life or death. The whole earth was awakened, hell loosed with her crews ;

MY STAR.

ALL that I know
 Of a certain star
 Is, it can throw
 (Like the angled spar)
 Now a dart of red,
 Now a dart of blue ;
 Till my friends have said
 They would fain see, too,
 My star that dartles the red and the blue !

Then it stops like a bird ; like a flower,
hangs furled :

They must solace themselves with the Saturn above it.

What matter to me if their star is a world ?

Mine has opened its soul to me ; therefore
I love it.

BY THE FIRE-SIDE.

I.

How well I know what I mean to do

When the long dark autumn-evenings
come :

And where, my soul, is thy pleasant hue ?

With the music of all thy voices, dumb
In life's November too !

II.

I shall be found by the fire, suppose,

O'er a great wise book as beseemeth age,
While the shutters flap as the cross-wind blows

And I turn the page, and I turn the page,
Not verse now, only prose !

III.

Till the young ones whisper, finger on lip,

"There he is at it, deep in Greek :

"Now then, or never, out we slip

"To cut from the hazels by the creek

"A mainmast for our ship !"

IV.

I shall be at it indeed, my friends :

Greek puts already on either side

Such a branch-work forth as soon extends

To a vista opening far and wide,

And I pass out where it ends.

V.

The outside-frame, like your hazel-trees :

But the inside-archway widens fast,

And a rarer sort succeeds to these,

And we slope to Italy at last

And youth, by green degrees.

VOL. I.

VI.

I follow wherever I am led,

Knowing so well the leader's hand ;

Oh woman-country, wooed not wed,

Loved all the more by earth's male-lands,
Laid to their hearts instead !

VII.

Look at the ruined chapel again

Half-way up in the Alpine gorge !

Is that a tower, I point you plain,

Or is it a mill, or an iron-forge

Breaks solitude in vain ?

VIII.

A turn, and we stand in the heart of things ;

The woods are round us, heaped and dim ;

From slab to slab how it slips and springs,

The thread of water single and slim,

Through the ravage some torrent brings !

IX.

Does it feed the little lake below ?

That speck of white just on its marge

Is Pella ; see, in the evening-glow,

How sharp the silver spear-heads charge

When Alp meets heaven in snow !

X.

On our other side is the straight-up rock ;

And a path is kept 'twixt the gorge and it

By boulder-stones where lichens mock

The marks on a moth, and small ferns fit

Their teeth to the polished block.

XI.

Oh the sense of the yellow mountain-flowers,

And thorny balls, each three in one,

The chestnuts throw on our path in showers !

For the drop of the woodland fruit's begun,

These early November hours,

XII.

That crimson the creeper's leaf across

Like a splash of blood, intense, abrupt,

O'er a shield else gold from rim to boss,

And lay it for show on the fairy-cupped

Elf-needed mat of moss,

K 2

XIII.

By the rose-flesh mushrooms, undivulged
 Last evening—nay, in to-day's first dew
 Yon sudden coral nipple bulged,
 Where a freaked fawn-coloured flaky crew
 Of toadstools peep indulged.

XIV.

And yonder, at foot of the fronting ridge
 That takes the turn to a range beyond,
 Is the chapel reached by the one-arched bridge
 Where the water is stopped in a stagnant pond
 Danced over by the midge.

XV.

The chapel and bridge are of stone alike,
 Blackish-grey and mostly wet ;
 Cut hemp-stalks steep in the narrow dyke.
 See here again, how the lichens fret
 And the roots of the ivy strike !

XVI.

Poor little place, where its one priest comes
 On a festa-day, if he comes at all,
 To the dozen folk from their scattered homes,
 Gathered within that precinct small
 By the dozen ways one roams—

XVII.

To drop from the charcoal-burners' huts,
 Or climb from the hemp-dressers' low shed,
 Leave the grange where the woodman stores
 his nuts,
 Or the wattled cote where the fowlers spread
 Their gear on the rock's bare juts.

XVIII.

It has some pretension too, this front,
 With its bit of fresco half-moon-wise
 Set over the porch, Art's early wont :
 'Tis John in the Desert, I surmise,
 But has borne the weather's brunt—

XIX.

Not from the fault of the builder, though,
 For a pent-house properly projects
 Where three carved beams make a certain show,
 Dating—good thought of our architect's—
 'Five, six, nine, he lets you know.

XX.

And all day long a bird sings there,
 And a stray sheep drinks at the pond at times ;
 The place is silent and aware ;
 It has had its scenes, its joys and crimes,
 But that is its own affair.

XXI.

My perfect wife, my Leonor,
 Oh heart, my own, oh eyes, mine too,
 Whom else could I dare look backward for,
 With whom beside should I dare pursue
 The path grey heads abhor ?

XXII.

For it leads to a crag's sheer edge with them ;
 Youth, flowery all the way, there stops—
 Not they ; age threatens and they contemn,
 Till they reach the gulf wherein youth
 drops,
 One inch from life's safe hem !

XXIII.

With me, youth led . . . I will speak now,
 No longer watch you as you sit
 Reading by fire-light, that great brow
 And the spirit-small hand propping it,
 Mutely, my heart knows how—

XXIV.

When, if I think but deep enough,
 You are wont to answer, prompt as rhyme ;
 And you, too, find without rebuff
 Response your soul seeks many a time
 Piercing its fine flesh-stuff.

XXV.

My own, confirm me ! If I tread
This path back, is it not in pride
To think how little I dreamed it led
To an age so blest that, by its side,
Youth seems the waste instead ?

XXVI.

My own, see where the years conduct !
At first, 'twas something our two souls
Should mix as mists do ; each is sucked
In each now : on, the new stream rolls,
Whatever rocks obstruct.

XXVII.

Think, when our one soul understands
The great Word which makes all things new,
When earth breaks up and heaven expands,
How will the change strike me and you
In the house not made with hands ?

XXVIII.

Oh I must feel your brain prompt mine,
Your heart anticipate my heart,
You must be just before, in fine,
See and make me see, for your part,
New depths of the divine !

XXIX.

But who could have expected this
When we two drew together first
Just for the obvious human bliss,
To satisfy life's daily thirst
With a thing men seldom miss ?

XXX.

Come back with me to the first of all,
Let us lean and love it over again,
Let us now forget and now recall,
Break the rosary in a pearly rain,
And gather what we let fall !

XXXI.

What did I say ?—that a small bird sings
All day long, save when a brown pair
Of hawks from the wood float with wide wings
Strained to a bell : 'gainst noon-day glare
You count the streaks and rings.

XXXII.

But at afternoon or almost eve
'Tis better ; then the silence grows
To that degree, you half believe
It must get rid of what it knows,
Its bosom does so heave.

XXXIII.

Hither we walked then, side by side,
Arm in arm and cheek to cheek,
And still I questioned or replied,
While my heart, convulsed to really speak,
Lay choking in its pride.

XXXIV.

Silent the crumbling bridge we cross,
And pity and praise the chapel sweet,
And care about the fresco's loss,
And wish for our souls a like retreat,
And wonder at the moss.

XXXV.

Stoop and kneel on the settle under,
Look through the window's grated square :
Nothing to see ! For fear of plunder,
The cross is down and the altar bare,
As if thieves don't fear thunder.

XXXVI.

We stoop and look in through the grate,
See the little porch and rustic door,
Read duly the dead builder's date ;
Then cross the bridge that we crossed
before,
Take the path again—but wait !

XXXVII.

Oh moment, one and infinite !
The water slips o'er stock and stone ;
The West is tender, hardly bright :
How grey at once is the evening grown—
One star, its chrysolite !

XXXVIII.

We two stood there with never a third,
But each by each, as each knew well :
The sights we saw and the sounds we heard,
The lights and the shades made up a spell
Till the trouble grew and stirred.

XXXIX.

Oh, the little more, and how much it is !
 And the little less, and what worlds away !
 How a sound shall quicken content to bliss,
 Or a breath suspend the blood's best
 play,
 And life be a proof of this !

XL.

Had she willed it, still had stood the screen
 So slight, so sure, 'twixt my love and
 her :
 I could fix her face with a guard between,
 And find her soul as when friends confer,
 Friends—lovers that might have been.

XLI.

For my heart had a touch of the woodland-
 time,
 Wanting to sleep now over its best.
 Shake the whole tree in the summer-prime,
 But bring to the last leaf no such test !
 "Hold the last fast !" runs the rhyme.

XLII.

For a chance to make your little much,
 To gain a lover and lose a friend,
 Venture the tree and a myriad such,
 When nothing you mar but the year can
 mend :
 But a last leaf—fear to touch !

XLIII.

Yet should it unfasten itself and fall
 Eddying down till it find your face
 At some slight wind—best chance of all !
 Be your heart henceforth its dwelling-
 place
 You trembled to forestall !

XLIV.

Worth how well, those dark grey eyes,
 That hair so dark and dear, how worth
 That a man should strive and agonize,
 And taste a veriest hell on earth
 For the hope of such a prize !

You might have turned and tried a man,
 Set him a space to weary and wear,
 And prove which suited more your plan,
 His best of hope or his worst despair,
 Yet end as he began.

XLVI.

But you spared me this, like the heart you are,
 And filled my empty heart at a word.
 If two lives join, there is oft a scar,
 They are one and one, with a shadowy third ;
 One near one is too far.

XLVII.

A moment after, and hands unseen
 Were hanging the night around us fast ;
 But we knew that a bar was broken between Life and life : we were mixed at last
 In spite of the mortal screen.

XLVIII.

The forests had done it ; there they stood ;
 We caught for a moment the powers at play :
 They had mingled us so, for once and good,
 Their work was done—we might go or stay,
 They relapsed to their ancient mood.

XLIX.

How the world is made for each of us !
 How all we perceive and know in it
 Tends to some moment's product thus,
 When a soul declares itself—to wit,
 By its fruit, the thing it does !

L.

Be hate that fruit or love that fruit,
 It forwards the general deed of man,
 And each of the Many helps to recruit
 The life of the race by a general plan ;
 Each living his own, to boot.

LI.

I am named and known by that moment's feat ;
 There took my station and degree ;
 So grew my own small life complete,
 As nature obtained her best of me—
 One born to love you, sweet !

LII.

And to watch you sink by the fire-side now
Back again, as you mutely sit
Musing by fire-light, that great brow
And the spirit-small hand propping it,
Yonder, my heart knows how !

LIII.

So, earth has gained by one man the more,
And the gain of earth must be heaven's gain too ;
And the whole is well worth thinking o'er
When autumn comes : which I mean to do
One day, as I said before.

ANY WIFE TO ANY HUSBAND.

I.

My love, this is the bitterest, that thou—
Who art all truth, and who dost love me now
As thine eyes say, as thy voice breaks to
say—
Shouldst love so truly, and couldst love me still
A whole long life through, had but love its will,
Would death that leads me from thee brook delay.

II.

I have but to be by thee, and thy hand
Will never let mine go, nor heart withstand
The beating of my heart to reach its place.
When shall I look for thee and feel thee gone ?
When cry for the old comfort and find none ?
Never, I know ! Thy soul is in thy face.

III.

Oh, I should fade—'tis willed so ! Might I
save,
Gladly I would, whatever beauty gave
Joy to thy sense, for that was precious too.
It is not to be granted. But the soul Whence the love comes, all ravage leaves that whole ;
Vainly the flesh fades ; soul makes all things new.

IV.

It would not be because my eye grew dim
Thou couldst not find the love there, thanks to Him
Who never is dishonoured in the spark
He gave us from his fire of fires, and bade
Remember whence it sprang, nor be afraid
While that burns on, though all the rest grow dark.

V.

So, how thou wouldst be perfect, white and clean
Outside as inside, soul and soul's demesne
Alike, this body given to show it by !
Oh, three-parts through the worst of life's abyss,
What plaudits from the next world after this,
Couldst thou repeat a stroke and gain the sky !

VI.

And is it not the bitterer to think
That, disengage our hands and thou wilt sink
Although thy love was love in very deed ?
I know that nature ! Pass a festive day,
Thou dost not throw its relic-flower away
Nor bid its music's loitering echo speed.

VII.

Thou let'st the stranger's glove lie where it fell ;
If old things remain old things all is well,
For thou art grateful as becomes man best :
And hadst thou only heard me play one tune,
Or viewed me from a window, not so soon
With thee would such things fade as with the rest.

VIII.

I seem to see ! We meet and part ; 'tis brief ;
The book I opened keeps a folded leaf,
The very chair I sat on, breaks the rank ;
That is a portrait of me on the wall—
Three lines, my face comes at so slight a call :
And for all this, one little hour to thank !

IX.

But now, because the hour through years was fixed,
Because our inmost beings met and mixed,
Because thou once hast loved me—wilt thou dare
Say to thy soul and Who may list beside,
"Therefore she is immortally my bride;
"Chance cannot change my love, nor time impair.

X.

"So, what if in the dusk of life that's left,
"I, a tired traveller of my sun bereft,
"Look from my path when, mimicking
the same,
"The fire-fly glimpses past me, come and
gone?
"—Where was it till the sunset? where anon
"It will be at the sunrise! What's to blame?"

XI.

Is it so helpful to thee? Canst thou take
The mimic up, nor, for the true thing's sake,
Put gently by such efforts at a beam?
Is the remainder of the way so long,
Thou need'st the little solace, thou the strong?
Watch out thy watch, let weak ones doze and dream!

XII.

—Ah, but the fresher faces! "Is it true," Thou'lt ask, "some eyes are beautiful and new?
"Some hair,—how can one choose but grasp such wealth?
"And if a man would press his lips to lips
"Fresh as the wilding hedge-rose-cup there slips
"The dew-drop out of, must it be by stealth?

XIII.

"It cannot change the love still kept for Her,
"More than if such a picture I prefer
"Passing a day with, to a room's bare side:
The painted form takes nothing she possessed,
Yet, while the Titian's Venus lies at rest,
A man looks. Once more, what is there to chide?"

XIV.

So must I see, from where I sit and watch,
My own self sell myself, my hand attach
Its warrant to the very thefts from me—
Thy singleness of soul that made me proud,
Thy purity of heart I loved aloud,
Thy man's-truth I was bold to bid God see!

XV.

Love so, then, if thou wilt! Give all thou canst
Away to the new faces—disentranced,
(Say it and think it) obdurate no more:
Re-issue looks and words from the old mint,
Pass them afresh, no matter whose the print
Image and superscription once they bore!

XVI.

Re-coin thyself and give it them to spend,—
It all comes to the same thing at the end,
Since mine thou wast, mine art and mine shalt be,
Faithful or faithless, sealing up the sum
Or lavish of my treasure, thou must come Back to the heart's place here I keep for thee!

XVII.

Only, why should it be with stain at all?
Why must I, 'twixt the leaves of coronal,
Put any kiss of pardon on thy brow?
Why need the other women know so much,
And talk together, "Such the look and
such
"The smile he used to love with, then as now!"

XVIII.

Might I die last and show thee! Should I
find
Such hardship in the few years left behind,
If free to take and light my lamp, and go
Into thy tomb, and shut the door and sit,
Seeing thy face on those four sides of it
The better that they are so blank, I
know!

XIX.

Why, time was what I wanted, to turn o'er
 Within my mind each look, get more and more
 By heart each word, too much to learn at
 first ;
 And join thee all the fitter for the pause
 'Neath the low doorway's lintel. That were
 cause

For lingering, though thou calledst, if I durst !

XX.

And yet thou art the nobler of us two :
 What dare I dream of, that thou canst not do,
 Outstripping my ten small steps with one stride ?

I'll say then, here's a trial and a task—
 Is it to bear ?—if easy, I'll not ask :
 Though love fail, I can trust on in thy pride.

XXI.

Pride ?—when those eyes forestall the life
 behind
 The death I have to go through !—when I
 find,

Now that I want thy help most, all of thee !
 What did I fear ? Thy love shall hold me
 fast

Until the little minute's sleep is past
 And I wake saved.—And yet it will not be

TWO IN THE CAMPAGNA.

I.

I WONDER do you feel to-day
 As I have felt since, hand in hand,
 We sat down on the grass, to stray
 In spirit better through the land,
 This morn of Rome and May ?

II.

For me, I touched a thought, I know,
 Has tantalized me many times,
 (Like turns of thread the spiders throw Mocking across our path) for rhymes
 To catch at and let go.

III.

Help me to hold it ! First it left
 The yellowing fennel,¹ run to seed
 There, branching from the brickwork's cleft,
 Some old tomb's ruin : yonder weed
 Took up the floating weft,

IV.

Where one small orange cup amassed
 Five beetles,—blind and green they grope
 Among the honey-meal : and last,
 Everywhere on the grassy slope
 I traced it. Hold it fast !

V.

The champaign with its endless fleece
 Of feathery grasses everywhere !
 Silence and passion, joy and peace,
 An everlasting wash of air—
 Rome's ghost since her decease.

VI.

Such life here, through such lengths of hours,
 Such miracles performed in play,
 Such primal naked forms of flowers,
 Such letting nature have her way
 While heaven looks from its towers !

VII.

How say you ? Let us, O my dove,
 Let us be unashamed of soul,
 As earth lies bare to heaven above !
 How is it under our control
 To love or not to love ?

VIII.

I would that you were all to me,
 You that are just so much, no more.
 Nor yours nor mine, nor slave nor free !
 Where does the fault lie ? What the core
 O' the wound, since wound must be ?

¹ Herb with yellow flowers and seeds supposed to be medicinal.

IX.

I would I could adopt your will,
 See with your eyes, and set my heart
 Beating by yours, and drink my fill
 At your soul's springs,—your part my part
 In life, for good and ill.

X.

No. I yearn upward, touch you close,
 Then stand away. I kiss your cheek,
 Catch your soul's warmth,—I pluck the rose
 And love it more than tongue can speak—
 Then the good minute goes.

XI.

Already how am I so far
 Out of that minute? Must I go
 Still like the thistle-ball, no bar,
 Onward, whenever light winds blow,
 Fixed by no friendly star?

XII.

Just when I seemed about to learn!
 Where is the thread now? Off again!
 The old trick! Only I discern—
 Infinite passion, and the pain
 Of finite hearts that yearn.

MISCONCEPTIONS.

I.

THIS is a spray the Bird clung to,
 Making it blossom with pleasure,
 Ere the high tree-top she sprung to,
 Fit for her nest and her treasure.
 Oh, what a hope beyond measure
 Was the poor spray's, which the flying feet hung to,—
 So to be singled out, built in, and sung to!

This is a heart the Queen leant on,
 Thrilled in a minute erratic,

Ere the true bosom she bent on,
 Meet for love's regal dalmatic.¹
 Oh, what a fancy ecstatic
 Was the poor heart's, ere the wanderer went
 on—
 Love to be saved for it, proffered to, spent on!

A SERENADE AT THE VILLA.

I.

THAT was I, you heard last night,
 When there rose no moon at all,
 Nor, to pierce the strained and tight
 Tent of heaven, a planet small:
 Life was dead and so was light.

II.

Not a twinkle from the fly,
 Not a glimmer from the worm;
 When the crickets stopped their cry,
 When the owls forbore a term,
 You heard music; that was I.

III.

Earth turned in her sleep with pain,
 Sultrily suspired for proof:
 In at heaven and out again,
 Lightning!—where it broke the roof,
 Bloodlike, some few drops of rain.

IV.

What they could my words expressed,
 O my love, my all, my one!
 Singing helped the verses best,
 And when singing's best was done,
 To my lute I left the rest.

V.

So wore night; the East was gray,
 White the broad-faced hemlock-flowers:
 There would be another day;
 Ere its first of heavy hours
 Found me, I had passed away.

¹ A vestment used by ecclesiastics, and formerly by senators and persons of high rank.

VI.

What became of all the hopes,
 Words and song and lute as well ?
 Say, this struck you—"When life gropes
 "Feebly for the path where fell
 "Light last on the evening slopes,

VII.

"One friend in that path shall be,
 "To secure my step from wrong ;
 "One to count night day for me,
 "Patient through the watches long,
 "Serving most with none to see."

VIII.

Never say—as something bodes—
 "So, the worst has yet a worse !
 "When life halts 'neath double loads,
 "Better the taskmaster's curse
 "Than such music on the roads !

IX.

"When no moon succeeds the sun,
 "Nor can pierce the midnight's tent
 "Any star, the smallest one,
 "While some drops, where lightning rent,
 "Show the final storm begun—

X.

"When the fire-fly hides its spot,
 "When the garden-voices fall
 "In the darkness thick and hot,—
 "Shall another voice avail,
 "That shape be where these are not ?

XI.

"Has some plague a longer lease,
 "Proffering its help uncouth ?
 "Can't one even die in peace ?
 "As one shuts one's eyes on youth,
 "Is that face the last one sees ?"

XII.

Oh how dark your villa was,
 Windows fast and obdurate !
 How the garden grudged me grass
 Where I stood—the iron gate
 Ground its teeth to let me pass !

ONE WAY OF LOVE.

I.

ALL June I bound the rose in sheaves.
 Now, rose by rose, I strip the leaves
 And strew them where Pauline may pass.
 She will not turn aside ? Alas !
 Let them lie. Suppose they die ?
 The chance was they might take her eye.

II.

How many a month I strove to suit
 These stubborn fingers to the lute !
 To-day I venture all I know.
 She will not hear my music ? So !
 Break the string ; fold music's wing :
 Suppose Pauline had bade me sing !

III.

My whole life long I learned to love.
 This hour my utmost art I prove
 And speak my passion—heaven or hell ?
 She will not give me heaven ? 'Tis
 well !
 Lose who may—I still can say,
 Those who win heaven, blest are they !

ANOTHER WAY OF LOVE.

I.

JUNE was not over
 Though past the full,
 And the best of her roses
 Had yet to blow,
 When a man I know
 (But shall not discover,
 Since ears are dull,
 And time discloses)
 Turned him and said with a man's true
 air,
 Half sighing a smile in a yawn, as 'twere,—
 "If I tire of your June, will she greatly
 care?"

Well, dear, in-doors with you !

True ! serene deadness

Tries a man's temper.

What's in the blossom

June wears on her bosom ?

Can it clear scores with you ?

Sweetness and redness.

Eadem semper !

Go, let me care for it greatly or slightly !

If June mend her bower now, your hand left unsightly

By plucking the roses,—my June will do rightly.

III.

And after, for pastime,

If June be refulgent

With flowers in completeness,

All petals, no prickles,

Delicious as trickles

Of wine poured at mass-time,—

And choose One indulgent

To redness and sweetness :

Or if, with experience of man and of spider,
June use my June-lightning, the strong insect-rider,

And stop the fresh film-work,—why, June will consider.

A PRETTY WOMAN.

I.

THAT fawn-skin-dappled hair of hers,

And the blue eye

Dear and dewy,

And that infantine fresh air of hers !

To think men cannot take you, Sweet,

And enfold you,

Ay, and hold you,

And so keep you what they make you, Sweet !

III.

You like us for a glance, you know—

For a word's sake.

Or a sword's sake,

All's the same, whate'er the chance, you know.

IV.

And in turn we make you ours, we say—

You and youth too,

Eyes and mouth too,

All the face composed of flowers, we say.

V.

All's our own, to make the most of, Sweet—

Sing and say for,

Watch and pray for,

Keep a secret or go boast of, Sweet !

VI.

But for loving, why, you would not, Sweet,

Though we prayed you,

Paid you, brayed you

In a mortar—for you could not, Sweet !

VII.

So, we leave the sweet face fondly there :

Be its beauty

Its sole duty !

Let all hope of grace beyond, lie there !

VIII.

And while the face lies quiet there,

Who shall wonder

That I ponder

A conclusion ? I will try it there.

IX.

As,—why must one, for the love foregone,

Scout mere liking ?

Thunder-striking

Earth,—the heaven, we looked above for, gone !

X.

Why, with beauty, needs there money be,

Love with liking ?

Crush the fly-king

In his gauze, because no honey-bee ?

XI.

May not liking be so simple-sweet,

If love grew there

'Twould undo there

All that breaks the cheek to dimples sweet ?

XII.

Is the creature too imperfect, say?
 Would you mend it
 And so end it?
 Since not all addition perfects aye!

XIII.

Or is it of its kind, perhaps,
 Just perfection—
 Whence, rejection
 Of a grace not to its mind, perhaps?

XIV.

Shall we burn up, tread that face at once
 Into tinder,
 And so hinder
 Sparks from kindling all the place at once?

XV.

Or else kiss away one's soul on her?
 Your love-fancies!
 —A sick man sees
 Truer, when his hot eyes roll on her!

XVI.

Thus the craftsman thinks to grace the rose,—
 Plucks a mould-flower
 For his gold flower,
 Uses fine things that efface the rose:

XVII.

Rosy rubies make its cup more rose,
 Precious metals
 Ape the petals,—
 Last, some old king locks it up, morose!

XVIII.

Then how grace a rose? I know a way!
 Leave it, rather.
 Must you gather?
 Smell, kiss, wear it—at last, throw away!

RESPECTABILITY.

I.

DEAR, had the world in its caprice
 Deigned to proclaim "I know you both,
 "Have recognized your plighted troth,
 "Am sponsor for you: live in peace!"—
 How many precious months and years
 Of youth had passed, that speed so fast,
 Before we found it out at last,
 The world, and what it fears?

II.

How much of priceless life were spent
 With men that every virtue decks,
 And women models of their sex,
 Society's true ornament,—
 Ere we dared wander, nights like this,
 Thro' wind and rain, and watch the Seine,
 And feel the Boulevard break again
 To warmth and light and bliss?

III.

I know! the world proscribes not love;
 Allows my finger to caress
 Your lips' contour and downiness,
 Provided it supply a glove.
 The world's good word!—the Institute!
 Guizot receives Montalembert!
 Eh? Down the court three lampions flare:
 Put forward your best foot!

LOVE IN A LIFE.

I.

ROOM after room,
 I hunt the house through
 We inhabit together.
 Heart, fear nothing, for, heart, thou shalt find her—
 Next time, herself!—not the trouble behind
 her
 Left in the curtain, the couch's perfume!

As she brushed it, the cornice-wreath
blossomed anew :
Y'on looking-glass gleamed at the wave of her feather.

II.

Yet the day wears,
And door succeeds door ;
I try the fresh fortune—
Range the wide house from the wing to the centre.

Still the same chance! she goes out as I enter.

Spend my whole day in the quest,—who cares?

But 'tis twilight, you see,—with such suites to explore,

Such closets to search, such alcoves to impor-
tune !

LIFE IN A LOVE.

ESCAPE me ?

Never—
Beloved !

While I am I, and you are you,

So long as the world contains us both,

Me the loving and you the loth,

While the one eludes, must the other pursue.

My life is a fault at last, I fear :

It seems too much like a fate, indeed !

Though I do my best I shall scarce succeed.

But what if I fail of my purpose here ?

It is but to keep the nerves at strain,

To dry one's eyes and laugh at a fall,

And, baffled, get up and begin again,—

So the chace takes up one's life, that's all.

While, look but once from your farthest
bound

At me so deep in the dust and dark,

No sooner the old hope goes to ground

Than a new one, straight to the self-same mark,

I shape me—

Ever

Removed !

IN THREE DAYS.

I.

So, I shall see her in three days
And just one night, but nights are short,
Then two long hours, and that is morn.
See how I come, unchanged, unworn !
Feel, where my life broke off from thine,
How fresh the splinters keep and fine,—
Only a touch and we combine !

II.

Too long, this time of year, the days !
But nights, at least the nights are short.
As night shows where her one moon is,
A hand's-breadth of pure light and bliss,
So life's night gives my lady birth
And my eyes hold her ! What is worth
The rest of heaven, the rest of earth ?

III.

O loaded curls, release your store
Of warmth and scent, as once before
The tingling hair did, lights and darks
Outbreaking into fairy sparks,
When under curl and curl I pried
After the warmth and scent inside,
Thro' lights and darks how manifold—
The dark inspired, the light controlled !
As early Art embrowns the gold.

IV.

What great fear, should one say, "Threedays
"That change the world might change as well
"Your fortune ; and if joy delays,
"Be happy that no worse befell !"
What small fear, if another says,
"Three days and one short night beside
"May throw no shadow on your ways ;
"But years must teem with change untried,
"With chance not easily defied,
"With an end somewhere undescried."
No fear !—or if a fear be born
This minute, it dies out in scorn.
Fear ? I shall see her in three days
And one night, now the nights are short,
Then just two hours, and that is morn.

IN A YEAR.

I.

NEVER any more,
While I live,
Need I hope to see his face
As before.
Once his love grown chill,
Mine may strive :
Bitterly we re-embrace,
Single still.

II.

Was it something said,
Something done,
Vexed him ? was it touch of hand,
Turn of head ?
Strange ! that very way
Love begun :
I as little understand
Love's decay.

III.

When I sewed or drew,
I recall
How he looked as if I sung,
—Sweetly too.
If I spoke a word,
First of all
Up his cheek the colour sprung,
Then he heard.

IV.

Sitting by my side,
At my feet,
So he breathed but air I breathed,
Satisfied !
I, too, at love's brim
Touched the sweet :
I would die if death bequeathed
Sweet to him.

V.

"Speak, I love thee best !"
He exclaimed :
"Let thy love my own foretell !"
I confessed ;

"Clasp my heart on thine
"Now unblamed,
"Since upon thy soul as well
"Hangeth mine !"

VI.

Was it wrong to own,
Being truth ?
Why should all the giving prove
His alone ?
I had wealth and ease,
Beauty, youth :
Since my lover gave me love,
I gave these.

VII.

That was all I meant,
—To be just,
And the passion I had raised,
To content.
Since he chose to change
Gold for dust,
If I gave him what he praised
Was it strange ?

VIII.

Would he loved me yet,
On and on,
While I found some way undreamed
—Paid my debt !
Gave more life and more,
Till, all gone,
He should smile "She never seemed
"Mine before.

IX.

"What, she felt the while,
"Must I think ?
"Love's so different with us men !"
He should smile :
"Dying for my sake—
"White and pink !
"Can't we touch these bubbles then
"But they break ?"

X.

Dear, the pang is brief,
 Do thy part,
 Have thy pleasure ! How perplexed
 Grows belief !
 Well, this cold clay clod
 Was man's heart :
 Crumble it, and what comes next ?
 Is it God ?

WOMEN AND ROSES.

I.

I DREAM of a red-rose tree.
 And which of its roses three
 Is the dearest rose to me ?

II.

Round and round, like a dance of snow
 In a dazzling drift, as its guardians, go
 Floating the women faded for ages,
 Sculptured in stone, on the poet's pages.
 Then follow women fresh and gay,
 Living and loving and loved to-day.
 Last, in the rear, flee the multitude of maidens,
 Beauties yet unborn. And all, to one cadence,
 They circle their rose on my rose tree.

III.

Dear rose, thy term is reached,
 Thy leaf hangs loose and bleached :
 Bees pass it unimpeached.

IV.

Stay then, stoop, since I cannot climb,
 You, great shapes of the antique time !
 How shall I fix you, fire you, freeze you,
 Break my heart at your feet to please you ?
 Oh, to possess and be possessed !
 Hearts that beat 'neath each pallid breast !
 Once but of love, the poesy, the passion,
 Drink but once and die !—In vain, the same fashion,
 They circle their rose on my rose tree.

V.

Dear rose, thy joy's undimmed,
 Thy cup is ruby-rimmed,
 Thy cup's heart nectar-brimmed.

VI.

Deep, as drops from a statue's plinth
 The bee sucked in by the hyacinth,
 So will I bury me while burning,
 Quench like him at a plunge my yearning,
 Eyes in your eyes, lips on your lips !
 Fold me fast where the cincture slips,
 Prison all my soul in eternities of pleasure,
 Girdle me for once ! But no—the old measure,
 They circle their rose on my rose tree.

VII.

Dear rose without a thorn,
 Thy bud's the babe unborn :
 First streak of a new morn.

VIII.

Wings, lend wings for the cold, the clear !
 What is far conquers what is near.
 Roses will bloom nor want beholders,
 Sprung from the dust where our flesh moulders.
 What shall arrive with the cycle's change ?
 A novel grace and a beauty strange.
 I will make an Eve, be the artist that began
 her,
 Shaped her to his mind !—Alas ! in like manner
 They circle their rose on my rose tree.

BEFORE.

LET them fight it out, friend ! things have gone too far.
 God must judge the couple : leave them as they are
 —Whichever one's the guiltless, to his glory,
 And whichever one the guilt's with, to my story !

II.

Why, you would not bid men, sunk in such a slough,
Strike no arm out further, stick and stink as
now,
Leaving right and wrong to settle the embroilment,
Heaven with snaky hell, in torture and entailment?

III.

Who's the culprit of them? How must he
conceive
God—the queen he caps to, laughing in his sleeve,
"Tis but decent to profess oneself beneath
her:
"Still, one must not be too much in earnest, either!"

IV.

Better sin the whole sin, sure that God observes;
Then go live his life out! Life will try his nerves,
When the sky, which noticed all, makes no disclosure,
And the earth keeps up her terrible composure.

V.

Let him pace at pleasure, past the walls of
rose,
Pluck their fruits when grape-trees graze him as he goes!
For he 'gins to guess the purpose of the garden,
With the sly mute thing, beside there, for a warden.

VI.

What's the leopard-dog-thing, constant at his side,
A leer and lie in every eye of its obsequious hide?
When will come an end to all the mock obsequance,
And the price appear that pays for the misfeasance?

VII.

So much for the culprit. Who's the martyred
man?
Let him bear one stroke more, for be sure he can!
He that strove thus evil's lump with good to leaven,
Let him give his blood at last and get his heaven!

VIII.

All or nothing, stake it! Trusts he God or no?
Thus far and no farther? farther? be it so!
Now, enough of your chicane of prudent pauses,
Sage provisos, sub-intents and saving-clauses!

Ah, "forgive" you bid him? While God's champion lives,
Wrong shall be resisted: dead, why, he forgives.
But you must not end my friend ere you begin him;
Evil stands not crowned on earth, while breath is in him.

Once more—Will the wronger, at this last
of all,
Dare to say, "I did wrong," rising in his fall?
No?—Let go, then! Both the fighters to their places!
While I count three, step you back as many paces!

AFTER.

TAKE the cloak from his face, and at first
Let the corpse do its worst!

How he lies in his rights of a man!
Death has done all death can.
And, absorbed in the new life he leads,
He recks not, he heeds
Nor his wrong nor my vengeance; both strike
On his senses alike,
And are lost in the solemn and strange
Surprise of the change.

Ha, what avails death to erase
 His offence, my disgrace?
 I would we were boys as of old
 In the field, by the fold:
 His outrage, God's patience, man's scorn
 Were so easily borne!

I stand here now, he lies in his place:
 Cover the face!

THE GUARDIAN-ANGEL.

A PICTURE AT FANO.

I.

DEAR and great Angel, wouldst thou only
 leave
 That child, when thou hast done with him,
 for me!
 Let me sit all the day here, that when eve
 Shall find performed thy special ministry,
 And time come for departure, thou, suspending
 Thy flight, mayst see another child for tending,
 Another still, to quiet and retrieve.

II.

Then I shall feel thee step one step, no more,
 From where thou standest now, to where
 I gaze,
 —And suddenly my head is covered o'er
 With those wings, white above the child who prays
 Now on that tomb—and I shall feel thee guarding
 Me, out of all the world; for me, discarding
 Yon heaven thy home, that waits and opes its door.

III.

I would not look up thither past thy head
 Because the door opes, like that child, I
 know,
 For I should have thy gracious face instead,
 Thou bird of God! And wilt thou bend me low

Like him, and lay, like his, my hands together,
 And lift them up to pray, and gently tether
 Me, as thy lamb there, with thy garment's spread?

IV.

If this was ever granted, I would rest
 My head beneath thine, while thy healing
 hands
 Close-covered both my eyes beside thy breast,
 Pressing the brain, which too much thought expands,
 Back to its proper size again, and smoothing
 Distortion down till every nerve had soothing,
 And all lay quiet, happy and suppressed.

V.

How soon all worldly wrong would be repaired!
 I think how I should view the earth and skies
 And sea, when once again my brow was bared
 After thy healing, with such different eyes.
 O world, as God has made it! All is beauty:
 And knowing this, is love, and love is duty.
 What further may be sought for or declared?

VI.

Guercino drew this angel I saw teach (Alfred, dear friend!)—that little child to pray,
 Holding the little hands up, each to each Pressed gently,—with his own head turned away
 Over the earth where so much lay before him
 Of work to do, though heaven was opening o'er him,
 And he was left at Fano by the beach.

VII.

We were at Fano, and three times we went
 To sit and see him in his chapel there,
 And drink his beauty to our soul's content
 —My angel with me too: and since I care
 For dear Guercino's fame (to which in power
 And glory comes this picture for a dower, Fraught with a pathos so magnificent)—

VIII.

And since he did not work thus earnestly
 At all times, and has else endured some wrong—

I took one thought his picture struck from me,
 And spread it out, translating it to song.
 My love is here. Where are you, dear old friend?
 How rolls the Wairoa at your world's far end?
 This is Ancona, yonder is the sea.

MEMORABILIA.

I.

AH, did you once see Shelley plain,
 And did he stop and speak to you
 And did you speak to him again?
 How strange it seems and new!

II.

But you were living before that,
 And also you are living after;
 And the memory I started at—
 My starting moves your laughter.

III.

I crossed a moor, with a name of its own
 And a certain use in the world no doubt
 Yet a hand's-breadth of it shines alone
 'Mid the blank miles round about:

IV.

For there I picked up on the heather
 And there I put inside my breast
 A moulted feather, an eagle-feather!
 Well, I forget the rest.

POPULARITY.

I.

STAND still, true poet that you are!
 I know you; let me try and draw you.
 Some night you'll fail us: when afar
 You rise, remember one man saw you,
 Knew you, and named a star!

II.

My star, God's glow-worm! Why extend
 That loving hand of his which leads you
 Yet locks you safe from end to end
 Of this dark world, unless he needs you,
 Just saves your light to spend?

III.

His clenched hand shall unclothe at last,
 I know, and let out all the beauty:
 My poet holds the future fast,
 Accepts the coming ages' duty,
 Their present for this past.

IV.

That day, the earth's feast-master's brow
 Shall clear, to God the chalice raising;
 "Others give best at first, but thou
 "Forever set'st our table praising,
 "Keep'st the good wine till now!"

V.

Meantime, I'll draw you as you stand,
 With few or none to watch and wonder:
 I'll say—a fisher, on the sand
 By Tyre the old, with ocean-plunder,
 A netful, brought to land.

VI.

Who has not heard how Tyrian shells
 Enclosed the blue, that dye of dyes
 Whereof one drop worked miracles,
 And coloured like Astarte's¹ eyes
 Raw silk the merchant sells?

VII.

And each bystander of them all
 Could criticize, and quote tradition
 How depths of blue sublimed some pall
 —To get which, pricked a king's ambition;
 Worth sceptre, crown and ball.

VIII.

Yet there's the dye, in that rough mesh,
 The sea has only just o'erwhispered!
 Live whelks, each lip's beard dripping fresh,
 As if they still the water's lip heard
 Through foam the rock-weeds thresh.

IX.

Enough to furnish Solomon
 Such hangings for his cedar-house,
 That, when gold-robed he took the throne
 In that abyss of blue, the Spouse
 Might swear his presence shone

X.

Most like the centre-spike of gold
Which burns deep in the blue-bell's womb,
What time, with ardours manifold,
The bee goes singing to her groom,
Drunk and overbold.

XI.

Mere conchs ! not fit for warp or woof !
Till cunning come to pound and squeeze
And clarify,—refine to proof
The liquor filtered by degrees,
While the world stands aloof.

XII.

And there's the extract, flasked and fine,
And priced and saleable at last !
And Hobbs, Nobbs, Stokes and Nokes combine
To paint the future from the past,
Put blue into their line.

XIII.

Hobbs hints blue,—straight he turtle eats :
Nobbs prints blue,—claret crowns his cup :
Nokes outdares Stokes in azure feats,—
Both gorge. Who fished the murex¹ up ?
What porridge had John Keats ?

MASTER HUGUES OF SAXE- GOTIIA.

[An imaginary composer.]

I.

HIST, but a word, fair and soft !
Forth and be judged, Master Hugues !
Answer the question I've put you so oft :
What do you mean by your mountainous fugues ?²
See, we're alone in the loft,—

¹ Molluscs from which the famous Tyrian purple dye was obtained.

² A fugue is a short melody.

II.

I, the poor organist here,
Hugues, the composer of note,
Dead though, and done with, this many a year;
Let's have a colloquy, something to quote,
Make the world prick up its ear !

III.

See, the church empties apace :
Fast they extinguish the lights.
Hallo there, sacristan ! Five minutes' grace !
Here's a crank pedal wants setting to rights,
Baulks one of holding the base.

IV.

See, our huge house of the sounds,
Hushing its hundreds at once,
Bids the last loiterer back to his bounds !
—O you may challenge them, not response
Get the church-saints on their rounds !

V.

(Saints go their rounds, who shall doubt ?
—March, with the moon to admire,
Up nave, down chancel, turn transept about
Supervise all betwixt pavement and spire
Put rats and mice to the rout—

VI.

Aloys and Jurien and Just—
Order things back to their place,
Have a sharp eye lest the candlesticks rust,
Rub the church-plate, darn the sacramenlace,
Clear the desk-velvet of dust.)

VII.

Here's your book, younger folks shelve !
Played I not off-hand and runningly,
Just now, your masterpiece, hard number twelve ?
Here's what should strike, could one handle
it cunningly,
Help the axe, give it a helve !

VIII.

Page after page as I played,
Every bar's rest, where one wipes
Sweat from one's brow, I looked up and surveyed,
O'er my three claviers,¹ yon forest of pipes
Whence you still peeped in the shade.

IX.

Sure you were wishful to speak?
You, with brow ruled like a score,
Yes, and eyes buried in pits on each cheek,
Like two great breves,² as they wrote them
of yore,
Each side that bar, your straight beak!

X.

Sure you said—"Good, the mere notes!
"Still, couldst thou take my intent,
"Know what procured me our Company's votes—
"A master were lauded and sciolists shent,
"Parted the sheep from the goats!"

XI.

Well then, speak up, never flinch!
Quick, ere my candle's a snuff
—Burnt, do you see? to its uttermost inch—
I believe in you, but that's not enough:
Give my conviction a clinch!

XII.

First you deliver your phrase
—Nothing propound, that I see,
Fit in itself for much blame or much praise—
Answered no less, where no answer needs
be:
Off start the Two on their ways.

XIII.

Straight must a Third interpose,
Volunteer needlessly help;
In strikes a Fourth, a Fifth thrusts in his nose,
So the cry's open, the kennel's a-yelp,
Argument's hot to the close.

² A note in music.

XIV.

One dissertates, he is candid;
Two must discept,—has distinguished;
Three helps the couple, if ever yet man
did;
Four protests; Five makes a dart at the thing wished:
Back to One, goes the case banded.

XV.

One says his say with a difference;
More of expounding, explaining!
All now is wrangle, abuse, and vociferance;
Now there's a truce, all's subdued, self-restraining:
Five, though, stands out all the stiffer hence.

XVI.

One is incisive, corrosive;
Two retorts, nettled, curt, crepitant;
Three makes rejoinder, expansive, explosive;
Four overbears them all, strident and strepitant:
Five . . . O Danaides,³ O Sieve!

XVII.

Now, they ply axes and crowbars;
Now, they prick pins at a tissue
Fine as a skein of the casuist Escobar's⁴ Worked on the bone of a lie. To what issue?
Where is our gain at the Two-bars?

XVIII.

Est fuga, voluitur rota.
On we drift: where looms the dim port?
One, Two, Three, Four, Five, contribute their quota;
Something is gained, if one caught but the import—
Show it us, Hugues of Saxe-Gotha!

³ The daughters of Danaus, condemned to pour water into a sieve.

⁴ The Spanish casuist, so severely mauled by Pascal.

XIX.

What with affirming, denying,
Holding, risposting,¹ subjoining,
All's like . . . it's like . . . for an instance

I'm trying . . .

There! See our roof, its gilt moulding and groining
Under those spider-webs lying!

XX.

So your fugue broadens and thickens,
Greatens and deepens and lengthens,
Till we exclaim—"But where's music, the dickens?

"Blot ye the gold, while your spider-web strengthens

"—Blacked to the stoutest of tickens?"²

XXI.

I for man's effort am zealous:

Prove me such censure unfounded!

Seems 't surprising a lover grows jealous—

Hopes 'twas for something, his organ-pipes sounded,

Tiring three boys at the bellows?

XXII.

Is it your moral of Life?

Such a web, simple and subtle,

Weave we on earth here in impotent strife,

Backward and forward each throwing his shuttle,

Death ending all with a knife?

XXIII.

Over our heads truth and nature—

Still our life's zigzags and dodges,

Ins and outs, weaving a new legislature—

God's gold just shining its last where that lodges,

Palled beneath man's usurpature.

XXIV.

So we o'ershroud stars and roses,

Cherub and trophy and garland;

² A closely woven fabric.

Nothings grow something which quietly closes Heaven's earnest eye: not a glimpse of the far land

Gets through our comments and glozes.

XXV.

Ah but traditions, inventions,

(Say we and make up a visage)

So many men with such various intentions,

Down the past ages, must know more than this age!

Leave we the web its dimensions!

XXVI.

Who thinks Hugues wrote for the deaf,

Proved a mere mountain in labour?

Better submit; try again; what's the clef?

'Faith, 'tis no trifle for pipe and for tabor—

F'our flats, the minor in F.

XXVII.

Friend, your fugue taxes the finger:

Learning it once, who would lose it?

Yet all the while a misgiving will linger,

Truth's golden o'er us although we refuse it—

Nature, thro' cobwebs we string her.

XXVIII.

Hugues! I advise meâ pœnâ

(Counterpoint glares like a Gorgon)

Bid One, Two, Three, Four, Five, clear the arena!

Say the word, straight I unstop the full-organ,

Blare out the mode Palestrina.³

XXIX.

While in the roof, if I'm right there,

. . . Lo you, the wick in the socket!

Hallo, you sacristan, show us a light there!

Down it dips, gone like a rocket.

What, you want, do you, to come unawares,
Sweeping the church up for first morning-prayers,

And find a poor devil has ended his cares

At the foot of your rotten-runged rat-riddled stairs?

Do I carry the moon in my pocket?

³ Giovanni P. da Palestrina, celebrated musician (1524-1594).

THE RETURN OF THE DRUSES;

A TRAGEDY.

1843.

[The Druses still exist on Mount Lebanon, and entertain opinions said to have been first promulgated at the beginning of the eleventh century by an Egyptian caliph who styled himself Hakeem Biamrallah; that is, He who judges by the order of God. See Holland's "Stories from Browning," p. 172.]

THE RETURN OF THE DRUSES.

PERSONS.

The Grand-Master's Prefect.

The Patriarch's Nuncio.

The Republic's Admiral.

LOYS DE DREUX, Knight-Novice.

Initiated Druses—DJABAL, KHALIL, ANAEL, MAANI, KARSHOOK, RAGHIB, AYOOB, and others.

Uninitiated Druses.

Prefect's Guard. Nuncio's Attendants. Admiral's Force.

TIME, 14—.

PLACE.—An Islet of the Southern Sporades, colonized by Druses of Lebanon, and garrisoned by the Knights-Hospitallers of Rhodes.

SCENE.—A Hall in the Prefect's Palace.

ACT I.

Enter stealthily KARSHOOK, RAGHIB, AYOOB and other initiated Druses, each as he enters casting off a robe that conceals his distinctive black vest and white turban; then, as giving a loose to exultation,— Karshook. The moon is carried off in purple fire:

Day breaks at last! Break glory, with the day,

On Djabal's dread incarnate mystery
Now ready to resume its pristine shape

Of Hakeem, as the Khalif vanished erst
In what seemed death to uninstructed eyes,
On red Mokattam's verge—our Founder's
flesh,

As he resumes our Founder's function!

Raghib. —Death

Sweep to the Christian Prefect that enslaved
So long us sad Druse exiles o'er the sea!

Ayoub. Most joy be thine, O Mother-mount! Thy brood

Returns to thee, no outcasts as we left,
But thus—but thus! Behind, our Prefect's corse;

Before, a presence like the morning—thine,
Absolute Djabal late,—God Hakeem now
That day breaks!

Karshook. Off then, with disguise
at last!

As from our forms this hateful garb we strip,
Lose every tongue its glozing accent too,
Discard each limb the ignoble gesture! Cry,
'Tis the Druse Nation, warders on our Mount
Of the world's secret, since the birth of time,
—No kindred slips, no offsets from thy stock,
No spawn of Christians are we, Prefect, we Who rise . . .

Ayoub. Who shout . . .

Raghib. Who seize, a first-fruits, ha—
Spoil of the spoiler! Brave!

[They begin to tear down, and to dispute for, the decorations of the hall.

Karshook. Hold!

Ayoub. —Mine, I say;

And mine shall it continue!

Karshook. Just this fringe !
Take anything beside ! Lo, spire on spire,
Curl serpentwise wreathed columns to the top
O' the roof, and hide themselves mysteriously
Among the twinkling lights and darks that haunt

Yon cornice ! Where the huge veil, they suspend

Before the Prefect's chamber of delight,
Floats wide, then falls again as if its slave,
The scented air, took heart now, and anon
Lost heart to buoy its breadths of gorgeousness
Above the gloom they droop in—all the porch
Is jewelled o'er with frostwork character ;
And, see, yon eight-point cross of white flame, winking

Hoar-silvery like some fresh-broke marble
stone :

Raze out the Rhodian cross there, so thou leav'st me

This single fringe !

Ayoob. Ha, wouldst thou, dog-fox ? Help !

—Three hand-breadths of gold fringe, my son was set

To twist, the night he died !

Karshook. Nay, hear the knave !
And I could witness my one daughter borne,
A week since, to the Prefect's couch, yet fold
These arms, be mute, lest word of mine should mar

Our Master's work, delay the Prefect here
A day, prevent his sailing hence for Rhodes—
How know I else ?—Hear me denied my right
By such a knave !

Raghib [interposing]. Each ravage for himself !

Booty enough ! On, Druses ! Be there found
Blood and a heap behind us ; with us, Djabal
Turned Hakeem ; and before us, Lebanon !
Yields the porch ? Spare not ! There his minions dragged

Thy daughter, Karshook, to the Prefect's
couch !

Ayoob ! Thy son, to soothe the Prefect's
pride,

Bent o'er that task, the death-sweat on his
brow,

Carving the spice-tree's heart in scroll-work
there !

Onward in Djabal's name !

As the tumult is at height, enter KHALIL.
A pause and silence.

Khalil. Was it for this,
Djabal hath summoned you ? Deserve you thus
A portion in to-day's event ? What, here—
When most behoves your feet fall soft, your
eyes

Sink low, your tongues lie still,—at Djabal's
side,

Close in his very hearing, who, perchance,
Assumes e'en now God Hakeem's dreaded
shape,—

Dispute you for these gauds ?

Ayoob. How say'st thou, Khalil ?
Doubtless our Master prompts thee ! Take the fringe,

Old Karshook ! I supposed it was a day . . .

Khalil. For pillage ?

Karshook. Harken, Khalil !
Never spoke

A boy so like a song-bird ; we avouch thee
Prettiest of all our Master's instruments

Except thy bright twin-sister ; thou and Aneel
Challenge his prime regard : but we may crave
(Such nothings as we be) a portion too
Of Djabal's favour ; in him we believed,
His bound ourselves, him moon by moon
obeyed,

Kept silence till this daybreak—so, may claim
Reward : who grudges me my claim ?

Ayoob. To-day
Is not as yesterday !

Raghib. Stand off !

Khalil. Rebel you ?

Must I, the delegate of Djabal, draw
His wrath on you, the day of our Return ?

Other Druses. Wrench from their grasp the fringe ! Hounds ! must the earth

Vomit her plagues on us thro' thee ?—and
thee ?

Plague me not, Khalil, for their fault !

Khalil. Oh, shame !

Thus breaks to-day on you, the mystic tribe
Who, flying the approach of Osman, bore

Our faith, a merest spark, from Syria's ridge
Its birthplace, hither ! "Let the sea divide
"These hunters from their prey," you said ;
"and safe

"In this dim islet's virgin solitude
"Tend we our faith, the spark, till happier
time

"Fan it to fire ; till Hakeem rise again,
"According to his word that, in the flesh
"Which faded on Mokattam ages since,
"He, at our extreme need, would interpose,
"And, reinstating all in power and bliss,
"Lead us himself to Lebanon once more."
Was't not thus you departed years ago,
Ere I was born ?

Druses. 'Twas even thus, years ago.

Khalil. And did you call—(according to old laws

Which bid us, lest the sacred grow profane,
Assimilate ourselves in outward rites
With strangers fortune makes our lords, and
live

As Christian with the Christian, Jew with Jew, Druse only with the Druses)—did you call
Or no, to stand 'twixt you and Osman's rage (Mad to pursue e'en hither thro' the sea
The remnant of our tribe), a race self-vowed
To endless warfare with his hordes and him,
The White-cross Knights of the adjacent Isle ?

Karshook. And why else rend we down, wrench up, rase out ?

These Knights of Rhodes we thus solicited
For help, bestowed on us a fiercer pest
Than aught we fled—their Prefect ; who began
His promised mere paternal governance
By a prompt massacre of all our Sheikhs
Able to thwart the Order in its scheme
Of crushing, with our nation's memory,
Each chance of our return, and taming us
Bondslaves to Rhodes for ever—all, he thinks
To end by this day's treason.

Khalil. Say I not ?

You, fitted to the Order's purposes,
Your Sheikhs cut off, your rites, your garb
proscribed,

Must yet receive one degradation more ;
The Knights at last throw off the mask—transfer,

As tributary now and appanage,
This islet they are but protectors of,
To their own ever-craving liege, the Church,
Who licenses all crimes that pay her thus.
You, from their Prefect, were to be consigned
(Pursuant of I know not what vile pact)
To the Knights' Patriarch, ardent to outvie
His predecessor in all wickedness.
When suddenly rose Djabal in the midst,
Djabal, the man in semblance, but our God
Confessed by signs and portents. Ye saw fire
Bicker round Djabal, heard strange music flit
Bird-like about his brow ?

Druses. We saw—we heard !

Djabal is Hakeem, the incarnate Dread,
The phantasm Khalif, King of Prodigies !

Khalil. And as he said has not our Khalif
done,

And so disposed events (from land to land
Passing invisibly) that when, this morn,
The pact of villany complete, there comes
This Patriarch's Nuncio with this Master's Prefect

Their treason to consummate,—each will face
For a crouching handful, an uplifted nation :
For simulated Christians, confessed Druses :
And, for slaves past hope of the Mother-mount,
Freedmen returning there 'neath Venice' flag ;
That Venice which, the Hospitallers' foe,
Grants us from Candia escort home at price
Of our relinquished isle, Rhodes counts her
own—

Venice, whose promised argosies should stand
Toward harbour : is it now that you, and you,
And you, selected from the rest to bear
The burthen of the Khalif's secret, further
To-day's event, entitled by your wrongs,
And witness in the Prefect's hall his fate—
That you dare clutch these gauds ? Ay, drop
them !

Karshook. True,

Most true, all this ; and yet, may one dare hint,
Thou art the youngest of us ?—though employed
Abundantly as Djabal's confidant,
Transmitter of his mandates, even now.
Much less, when'er beside him Anael graces
The cedar throne, his queen-bride, art thou like
To occupy its lowest step that day !

Now, Khalil, wert thou checked as thou aspirest,

Forbidden such or such an honour,—say,
Would silence serve so amply?

Khalil. Karshook thinks
I covet honours? Well, nor idly thinks.
Honours? I have demanded of them all
The greatest.

Karshook. I supposed so.

Khalil. Judge, yourselves!
Turn, thus: 'tis in the alcove at the back
Of yonder columned porch, whose entrance now
The veil hides, that our Prefect holds his state, Receives the Nuncio, when the one, from Rhodes,
The other lands from Syria; there they meet.
Now, I have sued with earnest prayers . . .

Karshook. For what Shall the Bride's brother vainly sue?

Khalil. That mine—
Avenging in one blow a myriad wrongs
—Might be the hand to slay the Prefect there!
Djabal reserves that office for himself.

[A silence.]

Thus far, as youngest of you all, I speak —Scarce more enlightened than yourselves;
since, near

As I approach him, nearer as I trust
Soon to approach our Master, he reveals
Only the God's power, not the glory yet.
Therefore I reasoned with you: now, as servant

To Djabal, bearing his authority,
I hear me appoint your several posts! Till noon
None see him save myself and Anael: once
The deed achieved, our Khalif, casting off
The embodied Awe's tremendous mystery,
The weakness of the flesh disguise, resumes
His proper glory, ne'er to fade again.

Enter a Druse.

The Druse. Our Prefect lands from Rhodes!
—without a sign
That he suspects aught since he left our Isle;
Nor in his train a single guard beyond
The few he sailed with hence: so have we learned
From Loys.

Karshook. Loys? Is not Loys gone
For ever?

Ayoob. Loys, the Frank Knight, returned?

The Druse. Loys, the boy, stood on the leading prow

Conspicuous in his gay attire, and leapt
Into the surf the foremost. Since day-dawn
I kept watch to the Northward; take but note
Of my poor vigilance to Djabal!

Khalil. Peace!

Thou, Karshook, with thy company, receive
The Prefect as appointed: see, all keep
The wonted show of servitude: announce
His entry here by the accustomed peal
Of trumpets, then await the further pleasure
Of Djabal! (Loys back, when Djabal sent
To Rhodes that we might spare the single Knight
Worth sparing!)

Enter a second Druse.

The Druse. I espied it first! Say, I
First spied the Nuncio's galley from the South!

Said'st thou a Crossed-keys' flag would flap
the mast?

It nears apace! One galley and no more.
If Djabal chance to ask who spied the flag,
Forget not, I it was!

Khalil. Thou, Ayoob, bring
The Nuncio and his followers hither! Break
One rule prescribed, ye wither in your blood,
Die at your fault!

Enter a third Druse.

The Druse. I shall see home, see home!
—Shall banquet in the sombre groves again!
Hail to thee, Khalil! Venice looms afar;
The argosies of Venice, like a cloud,
Bear up from Candia in the distance!

Khalil. Joy!
Summon our people, Raghib! Bid all forth!
Tell them the long-kept secret, old and young!

Set free the captive, let the trampled raise
Their faces from the dust, because at length
The cycle is complete, God Hakeem's reign
Begins anew! Say, Venice for our guard,

THE night we steer for Syria! Hear you,
Druses?

Hear you this crowning witness to the claims
Of Djabal? Oh, I spoke of hope and fear,
Reward and punishment, because he bade
Who has the right; for me, what should I say
But, mar not those imperial lineaments,
No majesty of all that rapt regard
Vex by the least omission! Let him rise
Without a check from you!

Druses. Let Djabal rise!

Enter LOYS.—The Druses are silent.

Loys. Who speaks of Djabal?—for I seek him, friends!

[Aside.] Tu Dieu! 'Tis as our Isle broke out in song

For joy, its Prefect-incubus drops off
To-day, and I succeed him in his rule!
But no—they cannot dream of their good fortune!

[Aloud.] Peace to you, Druses! I have tidings for you

But first for Djabal: where's your tall
bewitcher,

With that small Arab thin-lipped silver-mouth?

Khalil [aside to KARSHOOK]. Loys, in truth! Yet Djabal cannot err!

Karshook [to KHALIL]. And who takes charge of Loys? That's forgotten,
Despite thy wariness! Will Loys stand
And see his comrades slaughtered?

Loys [aside]. How they shrink
And whisper, with those rapid faces! What?
The sight of me in their oppressors' garb
Strike terror to the simple tribe? God's shame
On those that bring our Order ill repute!
But all's at end now; better days begin
For these mild mountaineers from over-sea:
The timidest shall have in me no Prefect
To cower at thus! [Aloud.] I asked for Djabal—

Karshook [aside]. Better
One lured him, ere he can suspect, inside
The corridor; 'twere easy to despatch
A youngster. [To LOYS.] Djabal passed some minutes since
Thro' yonder porch, and . . .

VOL. I.

Khalil [aside].
him despatch?

Hold! What,

The only Christian of them all we charge
No tyranny upon? Who,—noblest Knight
Of all that learned from time to time their trade

Of lust and cruelty among us,—heir
To Europe's pomp, a truest child of pride,—
Yet stood between the Prefect and ourselves
From the beginning? Loys, Djabal makes Account of, and precisely sent to Rhodes
For safety? I take charge of him!

[To LOYS.] Sir Loys,—

Loys. There, cousins! Does Sir Loys strike you dead?

Khalil [advancing]. Djabal has intercourse with few or none

Till noontide: but, your pleasure?

Loys. "Intercourse "With few or none?"—(Ah, Khalil, when
you spoke

I saw not your smooth face! All health!— and health

To Anael! How fares Anael?)—"Inter-
course

"With few or none?" Forget you, I've been friendly

With Djabal long ere you or any Druse?

—Enough of him at Rennes, I think, beneath
The Duke my father's roof! He'd tell by the hour,

With fixed white eyes beneath his swarthy
brow,

Plausiblest stories . . .

Khalil. Stories, say you?—Ah,
The quaint attire!

Loys. My dress for the last time!
How sad I cannot make you understand,
This ermine, o'er a shield, betokens me
Of Bretagne, ancientest of provinces
And noblest; and, what's best and oldest
there,

See, Dreux', our house's blazon, which the Nuncio

Tacks to an Hospitaller's vest to-day!

Khalil. The Nuncio we await? What brings you back

From Rhodes, Sir Loys?

Loys. How you island-tribe
Forget the world's awake while here you drowse!

What brings me back? What should not bring me, rather!

Our Patriarch's Nuncio visits you to-day—
Is not my year's probation out? I come to take the knightly vows.

Khalil. What's that you wear?

Loys. This Rhodian cross? The cross your Prefect wore.

You should have seen, as I saw, the full Chapter
Rise, to a man, while they transferred this cross
From that unworthy Prefect's neck to . . .
(fool—

My secret will escape me!) In a word,
My year's probation passed, a Knight ere eve
Am I; bound, like the rest, to yield my wealth
To the common stock, to live in chastity,
(We Knights espouse alone our Order's fame)
—Change this gay weed for the back white-crossed gown,

And fight to death against the Infidel —Not, therefore, against you, you Christians
with

Such partial difference only as befits
The peace-fullest of tribes. But Khalil, prithee,
Is not the Isle brighter than wont to-day?

Khalil. Ah, the new sword!

Loys. See now! You handle sword
As 'twere a camel-staff. Pull! That's my motto,

Annealed "Pro fide," on the blade in blue.

Khalil. No curve in it? Surely a blade should curve.

Loys. Straight from the wrist! Loose—it should poise itself!

Khalil [waving with irrepressible exultation the sword]. We are a nation, Loys, of old fame

Among the mountains! Rights have we to keep
With the sword too!

[Remembering himself.] But I forget—you bid me

Seek Djabal?

Loys. What! A sword's sight scares
you not?

(The People I will make of him and them!

Oh let my Prefect-sway begin at once!)
Bring Djabal—say, indeed, that come he must!

Khalil. At noon seek Djabal in the Prefect's Chamber,

And find . . . [Aside.] Nay, 'tis thy cursed race's token,

Frank pride, no special insolence of thine!

[Aloud.] Tarry, and I will do your bidding,
Loys!

[To the rest aside.] Now, forth you! I proceed to Djabal straight.

Leave this poor boy, who knows not what he says!

Oh will it not add joy to even thy joy,
Djabal, that I report all friends were true?

[KHALIL goes, followed by the Druses.]

Loys. Tu Dieu! How happy I shall make these Druses!

Was't not surpassingly contrived of me
To get the long list of their wrongs by heart,
Then take the first pretence for stealing off
From these poor islanders, present myself
Sudden at Rhodes before the noble Chapter,
And (as best proof of ardour in its cause
Which ere to-night will have become, too,
mine)

Acquaint it with this plague-sore in its body,
This Prefect and his villainous career?
The princely Synod! All I dared request
Was his dismissal; and they graciously
Consigned his very office to myself—
Myself may cure the Isle diseased!

And well

For them, they did so! Since I never felt
How lone a lot, tho' brilliant, I embrace,
Till now that, past retrieval, it is mine.
To live thus, and thus die! Yet, as I leapt
On shore, so home a feeling greeted me
That I could half believe in Djabal's story,
He used to tempt my father with, at Rennes—
And me, too, since the story brought me
here—

Of some Count Dreux and ancestor of ours
Who, sick of wandering from Bouillon's war,
Left his old name in Lebanon.

Long days

At least to spend in the Isle! and, my news
known

An hour hence, what if Anael turn on me
The great black eyes I must forget?

Why, fool,
Recall them, then? My business is with
Djabal,

Not Anael! Djabal tarries: if I seek him?—
The Isle is brighter than its wont to-day.

ACT II.

Enter DJABAL.

Djabal. That a strong man should think himself a God!

I—Hakeem? To have wandered through
the world,

Sown falsehood, and thence reaped now
scorn, now faith,

For my one chant with many a change, my tale

Of outrage, and my prayer for vengeance—
this

Required, forsooth, no mere man's faculty, Nought less than Hakeem's? The persuading Loys

To pass probation here; the getting access
By Loys to the Prefect; worst of all,
The gaining my tribe's confidence by fraud
That would disgrace the very Frank,—a few
Of Europe's secrets which subdue the flame,
The wave,—to ply a simple tribe with these,
Took Hakeem?

And I feel this first to-day!
Does the day break, is the hour imminent
When one deed, when my whole life's deed, my deed

Must be accomplished? Hakeem? Why the God?

Shout, rather, "Djabal, Youssof's child, thought slain

"With his whole race, the Druses' Sheikhs, this Prefect

"Endeavoured to extirpate—saved, a child,
"Returns from traversing the world, a man,

"Able to take revenge, lead back the march
"To Lebanon"—so shout, and who gainsays?

But now, because delusion mixed itself

Insensibly with this career, all's changed!
Have I brought Venice to afford us convoy?
"True—but my jugglings wrought that!"

Put I heart
Into our people where no heart lurked?—

"Ah,
"What cannot an impostor do!"

Not this!
Not do this which I do! Not bid avaunt Falsehood! Thou shalt not keep thy hold on me!

—Nor even get a hold on me! 'Tis now—
This day—hour—minute—'tis as here I stand

On the accursed threshold of the Prefect,
That I am found deceiving and deceived!

And now what do I?—hasten to the few Deceived, ere they deceived the many—shout,

"As I professed, I did believe myself!
"Say, Druses, had you seen a butchery—

"If Ayoub, Karshook saw—Maani there
"Must tell you how I saw my father sink;

"My mother's arms twine still about my neck;
"I hear my brother shriek, here's yet the scar

"Of what was meant for my own death-blow
—say,

"If you had woke like me, grown year by year
"Out of the tumult in a far-off clime,

"Would it be wondrous such delusion grew?
"I walked the world, asked help at every

hand;
"Came help or no? Not this and this?

Which helps
"When I returned with, found the Prefect
here,

"The Druses here, all here but Hakeem's self,
"The Khalif of the thousand prophecies,

"Reserved for such a juncture,—could I call
"My mission aught but Hakeem's? Promised

Hakeem
"More than performs the Djabal—you absolve?

"—Me, you will never shame before the crowd

"Yet happily ignorant?—Me, both throngs surround,

"The few deceived, the many unabused,
"—Who, thus surrounded, slay for you and

them

"The Prefect, lead to Lebanon? No Khalif,
 "But Sheikh once more! Mere Djabal—
 not" . . .

Enter KHALIL hastily.

Khalil. —God Hakeem!

'Tis told! The whole Druse nation knows thee, Hakeem,

As we! and mothers lift on high their babes
Who seem aware, so glisten their great eyes, Thou hast not failed us; ancient brows are proud;

Our elders could not earlier die, it seems,
 Than at thy coming! The Druse heart is thine!

Take it! my lord and theirs, be thou adored!
Djabal [aside]. Adored!—but I renounce it utterly!

Khalil. Already are they instituting choirs
 And dances to the Khalif, as of old
 'Tis chronicled thou bad'st them.

Djabal [aside]. I abjure it!
 'Tis not mine—not for me!

Khalil. Why pour they wine Flavoured like honey and bruised mountain-herbs,

Or wear those strings of sun-dried cedar-fruit?
 Oh, let me tell thee—Esaad, we supposed
 Doting, is carried forth, eager to see
 The last sun rise on the Isle: he can see now!
 The shamed Druse women never wept before:
 They can look up when we reach home, they
 say.

Smell!—sweet cane, saved in Lilith's breast
 thus long—

Sweet!—it grows wild in Lebanon. And I
 Alone do nothing for thee! 'Tis my office
 Just to announce what well thou know'st—but thus

Thou bidst me. At this self-same moment tend

The Prefect, Nuncio and the Admiral
 Hither by their three sea-paths: nor forget
Who were the trusty watchers!—thou forget?
 Like me, who do forget that Anael bade . . .

Djabal [aside]. Ay, Anael, Anael—is that said at last?

Louder than all, that would be said, I knew!

What does abjuring mean, confessing mean,
 To the people? Till that woman crossed my path,

On went I, solely for my people's sake:
 I saw her, and I then first saw myself,
 And slackened pace: "if I should prove indeed

"Hakeem—with Anael by!"

Khalil [aside]. Ah, he is rapt!
 Dare I at such a moment break on him
 Even to do my sister's bidding? Yes:

The eyes are Djabal's and not Hakeem's yet,
 Though but till I have spoken this, perchance.

Djabal [aside]. To yearn to tell her, and yet have no one

Great heart's word that will tell her! I could gasp

Doubtless one such word out, and die.

[Aloud.] You said

That Anael . . .

Khalil. . . . Fain would see thee,
 speak with thee,

Before thou change, discard this Djabal's shape
 She knows, for Hakeem's shape she is to know.
 Something to say that will not from her mind!
 I know not what—"Let him but come!"
 she said.

Djabal [half-apart]. My nation—all my Druses—how fare they?

Those I must save, and suffer thus to save,
 Hold they their posts? Wait they their Khalif too?

Khalil. All at the signal pant to flock around

That banner of a brow!

Djabal [aside]. And when they flock,
 Confess them this: and after, for reward,
 Be chased with howlings to her feet perchance!
 —Have the poor outraged Druses, deaf and
 blind,

Precede me there, forestall my story there,
 Tell it in mocks and jeers!

I lose myself.

Who needs a Hakeem to direct him now?
 I need the veriest child—why not this child?

[Turning abruptly to KHALIL.

You are a Druse too, Khalil; you were nourished

Like Anael with our mysteries : if she Could vow, so nourished, to love only one
 Who should avenge the Druses, whence proceeds

Your silence? Wherefore made you no essay,
 Who thus implicitly can execute
 My bidding? What have I done, you could not?

Who, knowing more than Anael the prostration

Of our once lofty tribe, the daily life
 Of this detested . . .

Does he come, you say,
 This Prefect? All's in readiness?

Khalil. The sword,
 The sacred robe, the Khalif's mystic tiar,
 Laid up so long, are all disposed beside
 The Prefect's chamber.

Djabal. -- Why did you despair?

Khalil. I know our nation's state? Too surely know,
 As thou who speak'st to prove me! Wrongs like ours

Should wake revenge: but when I sought the wronged

And spoke,—"The Prefect stabbed your son—arise!

"Your daughter, while you starve, eats shameless bread

"In his pavilion—then arise!"—my speech
 Fell idly: 'twas, "Be silent, or worse fare!

"Endure till time's slow cycle prove complete!

"Who mayst thou be that takest on thee to thrust

"Into this peril—art thou Hakeem?" No!
 Only a mission like thy mission renders
 All these obedient at a breath, subduces
 Their private passions, brings their wills to one.

Djabal. You think so?

Khalil. Even now—when they have witnessed
 Thy miracles—had I not threatened all
 With Hakeem's vengeance, they would mar the work,

And couch ere this, each with his special prize,
 Safe in his dwelling, leaving our main hope

To perish. No! When these have kissed thy feet

At Lebanon, the past purged off, the present
 Clear,—for the future, even Hakeem's mission
 May end, and I perchance, or any youth,
 Shall rule them thus renewed.—I tutor thee!

Djabal. And wisely. (He is Anael's brother, pure

As Anael's self.) Go say, I come to her.
 Haste! I will follow you. [KHALIL goes.

Oh, not confess

To these, the blinded multitude—confess,
 Before at least the fortune of my deed
 Half-authorize its means! Only to her
 Let me confess my fault, who in my path
 Curled up like incense from a Mage-king's tomb

When he would have the wayfarer descend
 Through the earth's rift and bear hid treasure forth!

How should child's-carelessness prove manhood's crime

Till now that I, whose lone youth hurried past,
 Letting each joy 'scape for the Druses' sake,
 At length recover in one Druse all joy?

Were her brow brighter, her eyes richer, still
 Would I confess. On the gulf's verge I pause.
 How could I slay the Prefect, thus and thus?
 Anael, be mine to guard me, not destroy!

[Goes.

Enter ANAEL, and MAANI who is assisting to array her in the ancient dress of the Druses.

Anael. Those saffron vestures of the tabret-girls!

Comes Djabal, think you?

Maani. Doubtless Djabal comes.

Anael. Dost thou snow-swathe thee king-lie, Lebanon,

Than in my dreams?—Nay all the tresses off
 My forehead! Look I lovely so? He says
 That I am lovely.

Maani. Lovely nay, that hangs Awry.

Anael. You tell me how a khandjar hangs?
 The sharp side, thus, along the heart, see,
 marks

The maiden of our class. Are you content
For Djabal as for me?

Maani. Content, my child.

Anael. Oh mother, tell me more of him !
He comes

Even now—tell more, fill up my soul with
him !

Maani. And did I not . . . yes, surely
. . . tell you all ?

Anael. What will be changed in Djabal when the Change

Arrives ? Which feature ? Not his eyes !

Maani. 'Tis writ
Our Hakeem's eyes rolled fire and clove the dark Superbly.

Anael. Not his eyes ! His voice perhaps ?
Yet that's no change ; for a grave current lived

—Grandly beneath the surface ever lived,
That, scattering, broke as in live silver spray
While . . . ah, the bliss . . . he would discourse to me

In that enforced still fashion, word on word !
'Tis the old current which must swell thro'
that,

For what least tone, Maani, could I lose ?

'Tis surely not his voice will change !

—If Hakeem

Only stood by ! If Djabal, somehow, passed
Out of the radiance as from out a robe ;
Possessed, but was not it !

He lived with you ?

Well—and that morning Djabal saw me first
And heard me vow never to wed but one Whosaved my People—on that day . . . proceed !

Maani. Once more, then : from the time of his return

In secret, changed so since he left the Isle
That I, who screened our Emir's last of sons,
This Djabal, from the Prefect's massacre —Who bade him ne'er forget the child he was,

—Who dreamed so long the youth he might become—

I knew not in the man that child ; the man
Who spoke alone of hope to save our tribe,

How he had gone from land to land to save
Our tribe—allies were sure, nor foes to dread ;
And much he mused, days, nights, alone he mused :

But never till that day when, pale and worn
As by a persevering woe, he cried
“ Is there not one Druse left me ? ”—and I showed

The way to Khalil's and your hiding-place
From the abhorred eye of the Prefect here,
So that he saw you, heard you speak—till
then,

Never did he announce—(how the moon
seemed

To ope and shut, the while, above us both !)
—His mission was the mission promised us ;
The cycle had revolved ; all things renewing,
He was lost Hakeem clothed in flesh to lead
His children home anon, now veiled to work Great purposes : the Druses now would
change !

Anael. And they have changed ! And obstacles did sink,

And furtherances rose ! And round his form
Played fire, and music beat her angel wings !
My people, let me more rejoice, oh more
For you than for myself ! Did I but watch
Afar the pageant, feel our Khalif pass,
One of the throng, how proud were I—tho'
ne'er

Singled by Djabal's glance ! But to be chosen

His own from all, the most his own of all,
To be exalted with him, side by side,
Lead the exulting Druses, meet . . . ah, how Worthily meet the maidens who await Ever beneath the cedars—how deserve
This honour, in their eyes ? So bright are they

Who saffron-vested sound the tabret there,
The girls who throng there in my dream !
One hour

And all is over : how shall I do aught
That may deserve next hour's exalting ?—

How ?— [Suddenly to MAANI.

Mother, I am not worthy him ! I read it Still in his eyes ! He stands as if to tell me
I am not, yet forbears. Why else revert

To one theme ever?—how mere human gifts
Suffice him in myself—whose worship fades,
Whose awe goes ever off at his approach,
As now, who when he comes . . .

[DJABAL enters.] Oh why is it
I cannot kneel to you?

Djabal. Rather, 'tis I

Should kneel to you, my Anael!

Anael. Even so!

For never seem you—shall I speak the
truth?—

Never a God to me! 'Tis the Man's hand, Eye, voice! Oh do you veil these to our people,

Or but to me? To them, I think, to them!
And brightness is their veil, shadow—my
truth!

You mean that I should never kneel to you

—So, thus I kneel!

Djabal [preventing her]. No—no!

[Feeling the khandjar as he raises her.

Ha, have you chosen . . .

Anael. The khandjar with our ancient garb.

But, Djabal,

Change not, be not exalted yet! Give time
That I may plan more, perfect more! My blood

Beats, beats!

[Aside.] Oh must I then—since

Loys leaves us

Never to come again, renew in me

These doubts so near effaced already—must

I needs confess them now to Djabal?—own

That when I saw that stranger, heard his
voice,

My faith fell, and the woeful thought flashed
first

That each effect of Djabal's presence, taken
For proof of more than human attributes

In him, by me whose heart at his approach
Beat fast, whose brain while he was by swam
round,

Whose soul at his departure died away,
—That every such effect might have been
wrought

In other frames, tho' not in mine, by Loys
Or any merely mortal presence? Doubt is fading fast; shall I reveal it now?

How shall I meet the rapture presently,
With doubt unexpiated, undisclosed?

Djabal [aside]. Avow the truth? I cannot!

In what words

Avow that all she loved in me was false?

—Which yet has served that flower-like love of hers

To climb by, like the clinging gourd, and clasp

With its divinest wealth of leaf and bloom.

Could I take down the prop-work, in itself

So vile, yet interlaced and overlaid

With painted cups and fruitage—might these
still

Bask in the sun, unconscious their own
strength

Of matted stalk and tendril had replaced

The old support thus silently withdrawn!

But no; the beauteous fabric crushes too.

'Tis not for my sake but for Anael's sake

I leave her soul this Hakeem where it leans.

Oh could I vanish from her, quit the Isle!

And yet—a thought comes: here my work is
done

At every point; the Druses must return—

Have convoy to their birth-place back, whose'er

The leader be, myself or any Druse—

Venice is pledged to that: 'tis for myself,

For my own vengeance in the Prefect's death,

I stay now, not for them: to slay or spare

The Prefect, whom imports it save myself?

He cannot bar their passage from the Isle;

What would his death be but my own reward?

Then, mine I will forego. It is foregone!

Let him escape with all my House's blood!

Ere he can reach land, Djabal disappears,

And Hakeem, Anael loved, shall, fresh as
first,

Live in her memory, keeping her sublime

Above the world. She cannot touch that
world

By ever knowing what I truly am,

Since Loys,—of mankind the only one

Able to link my present with my past,

My life in Europe with my Island life,

Thence, able to unmask me,—I've disposed Safely at last at Rhodes, and . . .

Enter KHALIL.

Khalil. Loys greets thee !
Djabal. Loys ? To drag me back ? It cannot be !
Anael [aside]. Loys ! Ah, doubt may not be stifled so !

Khalil. Can I have erred that thou so gazest ? Yes,
 I told thee not in the glad press of tidings
 Of higher import, Loys is returned
 Before the Prefect, with, if possible, Twice the light-heartedness of old. As though

On some inauguration he expects,
 To-day, the world's fate hung !

Djabal. —And asks for me ?
Khalil. Thou knowest all things. Thee in chief he greets,

But every Druse of us is to be happy
 At his arrival, he declares : were Loys
 Thou, Master, he could have no wider soul
 To take us in with. How I love that Loys !
Djabal [aside]. Shame winds me with her tether round and round.

Anael [aside]. Loys ? I take the trial ! it is meet,

The little I can do, be done ; that faith,
 All I can offer, want no perfecting
 Which my own act may compass. Ay, this
 way

All may go well, nor that ignoble doubt
 Be chased by other aid than mine. Advance
 Close to my fear, weigh Loys with my Lord,
 The mortal with the more than mortal gift !

Djabal [aside]. Before, there were so few deceived ! and now

There's doubtless not one least Druse in the Isle

But, having learned my superhuman claims,
 And calling me his Khalif-God, will clash
 The whole truth out from Loys at first word !
 While Loys, for his part, will hold me up,
 With a Frank's unimaginable scorn
 Of such imposture, to my people's eyes !
 Could I but keep him longer yet awhile
 From them, amuse him here until I plan
 How he and I at once may leave the Isle !

Khalil I cannot part with from my side—
 My only help in this emergency :
 There's Anael !

Anael. Please you ?
Djabal. Anael—none but she !

[To ANAEL.] I pass some minutes in the chamber there,

Ere I see Loys : you shall speak with him
 Until I join you. Khalil follows me.

Anael [aside]. As I divined : he bids me save myself,

Offers me a probation—I accept.

Let me see Loys !

Loys [without]. Djabal !
Anael [aside]. 'Tis his voice.

The smooth Frank trifler with our people's wrongs,

The self-complacent boy-inquirer, loud
 On this and that inflicted tyranny,
 —Aught serving to parade an ignorance
 Of how wrong feels, inflicted ! Let me close
 With what I viewed at distance : let myself
 Probe this delusion to the core !

Djabal. He comes.
 Khalil, along with me ! while Anael waits
 Till I return once more—and but once more.

ACT III.

ANAEL and LOYS.

Anael. Here leave me ! Here I wait another. 'Twas

For no mad protestation of a love
 Like this you say possesses you, I came.

Loys. Love ? how protest a love I dare not feel ?

Mad words may doubtless have escaped me :
 you

Are here—I only feel you here !

Anael. No more !

Loys. But once again, whom could you love ? I dare,

Alas, say nothing of myself, who am
 A Knight now, for when Knighthood we embrace,

Love we abjure : so, speak on safely : speak,

[lest I speak, and betray my faith ! And yet To say your breathing passes through me, changes

My blood to spirit, and my spirit to you,
As Heaven the sacrificer's wine to it—
This is not to protest my love ! You said
You could love one . . .

Anael. One only ! We are bent
To earth—who raises up my tribe, I love ;
The Prefect bows us—who removes him ; we Have ancient rights—who gives them back to us,
I love. Forbear me ! Let my hand go !

Loys. Him
You could love only ? Where is Djabal ? Stay !
[Aside.] Yet wherefore stay ? Who does this but myself ?

Had I apprised her that I come to do
Just this, what more could she acknowledge ?
No,

She sees into my heart's core ! What is it
Feeds either cheek with red, as Junesome rose ?
Why turns she from me ? Ah fool, over-fond
To dream I could call up . . .

. . . What never dream
Yet feigned ! 'Tis love ! Oh Anael speak to me !

Djabal—
Anael. Seek Djabal by the Prefect's chamber

At noon ! [She paces the room.

Loys [aside]. And am I not the Prefect now ?
Is it my fate to be the only one
Able to win her love, the only one
Unable to accept her love ? The past
Breaks up beneath my footing : came I here
This morn as to a slave, to set her free
And take her thanks, and then spend day by day
Content beside her in the Isle ? What works This knowledge in me now ? Her eye has broken

The faint disguise away : for Anael's sake
I left the Isle, for her espoused the cause
Of the Druses, all for her I thought, till now,
To live without !

—As I must live ! To-day
Ordains me Knight, forbids me . . . never shall

Forbid me to profess myself, heart, arm,
Thy soldier !

Anael. Djabal you demanded, comes.

Loys [aside]. What wouldst thou, Loys ?
See him ? Nought beside

Is wanting : I have felt his voice a spell
From first to last. He brought me here, made known

The Druses to me, drove me hence to seek Redress for them ; and shall I meet him now,
When nought is wanting but a word of his,
To—what ?—induce me to spurn hope, faith,
pride,

Honour away,—to cast my lot among
His tribe, become a proverb in men's mouths,
Breaking my high pact of companionship
With those who graciously bestowed on me
The very opportunities I turn

Against them ! Let me not see Djabal now !
Anael. The Prefect also comes.

Loys [aside]. If I let me see,
Not Djabal ! Him, degraded at a word,
To soothe me,—to attest belief in me—
And after, Djabal ! Yes, ere I return
To her, the Nuncio's vow shall have destroyed
This heart's rebellion, and coerced this will
For ever.

Anael, not before the vows
Irrevocably fix me . . .

Let me fly !
The Prefect, or I lose myself for ever !

[Goes.
Anael. Yes, I am calm now ; just one way
remains—

One, to attest my faith in him : for, see,
I were quite lost else : Loys, Djabal, stand
On either side—two men ! I balance looks
And words, give Djabal a man's preference,
No more. In Djabal, Hakeem is absorbed !
And for a love like this, the God who saves
My race, selects me for his bride ? One way !

Enter DJABAL.

Djabal [to himself]. No moment is to waste then ; 'tis resolved.

If Khalil may be trusted to lead back
My Druses, and if Loys can be lured
Out of the Isle—if I procure his silence,

Or promise never to return at least,—
All's over. Even now my bark awaits :
I reach the next wild islet and the next,
And lose myself beneath the sun for ever.
And now, to Anael !

Anael. Djabal, I am thine !

Djabal. Mine ? Djabal's ?—As if Hakeem had not been ?

Anael. Not Djabal's ? Say first, do you read my thought ?

Why need I speak, if you can read my thought ?

Djabal. I do not, I have said a thousand times.

Anael. (My secret's safe, I shall surprise him yet !)

Djabal, I knew your secret from the first :

Djabal, when first I saw you . . . (by our porch
You leant, and pressed the tinkling veil away,
And one fringe fell behind your neck—I see !)

. . . I knew you were not human, for I said

"This dim secluded house where the sea beats

"Is heaven to me—my people's huts are he."

"To them ; this august form will follow me,

"Mix with the waves his voice will,—I have
him ;

"And they, the Prefect ! Oh, my happiness

"Rounds to the full whether I choose or no !

"His eyes met mine, he was about to speak,

"His hand grew damp—surely he meant to say

"He let me love him : in that moment's bliss

"I shall forget my people pine for home—

"They pass and they repass with pallid eyes !"

I vowed at once a certain vow ; this vow—

Not to embrace you till my tribe was saved.

Embrace me !

Djabal [apart]. And she loved me ! Nought remained

But that ! Nay, Anael, is the Prefect dead ?

Anael. Ah, you reproach me ! True, his death crowns all,

I know—or should know : and I would do
much,

Believe ! but, death ! Oh, you, who have known death,

Would never doom the Prefect, were death fearful

As we report !

Death !—a fire curls within us

From the foot's palm, and fills up to the brain,
Up, out, then shatters the whole bubble-shell
Of flesh, perchance !

Death !—witness, I would die,
Whate'er death be, would venture now to die

For Khalil, for Maani—what for thee ?

Nay but embrace me, Djabal, in assurance

My vow will not be broken, for I must

Do something to attest my faith in you,

Be worthy you !

Djabal [avoiding her]. I come for that—to
say

Such an occasion is at hand : 'tis like

I leave you—that we part, my Anael,—part

For ever !

Anael. We part ? Just so ! I have succumbed,—

I am, he thinks, unworthy—and nought less

Will serve than such approval of my faith.

Then, we part not ! Remains there no way

short

Of that ? Oh not that !

Death !—yet a hurt bird

Died in my hands ; its eyes filmed—"Nay, it sleeps,"

I said, "will wake to-morrow well : " 'twas
dead.

Djabal. I stand here and time fleets.

Anael—I come

To bid a last farewell to you : perhaps

We never meet again. But, ere the Prefect

Arrive . . .

Enter KHALIL, breathlessly.

Khalil. He's here ! The Prefect ! Twenty
guards,

No more : no sign he dreams of danger. All

Awaits thee only. Ayooob, Karshook, keep

Their posts—wait but the deed's accomplishment

To join us with thy Druses to a man.

Still holds his course the Nuncio—near and near

The fleet from Candia steering.

Djabal [aside]. All is lost !

—Or won ?

Khalil. And I have laid the sacred robe,

The sword, the head-tiar, at the porch—the place
 Commanded. Thou wilt hear the Prefect's trumpet.

Djabal. Then I keep Anael,—him then;
 past recall,

I slay—'tis forced on me. As I began
 I must conclude—so be it!

Khalil. For the rest,
 Save Loys, our foe's solitary sword,
 All is so safe that . . . I will ne'er entreat
 Thy post again of thee: tho' danger none,
 There must be glory only meet for thee
 In slaying the Prefect.

Anael [aside]. And 'tis now that Djabal
 Would leave me!—in the glory meet for him!

Djabal. As glory, I would yield the deed to you

Or any Druse; what peril there may be,
 I keep. [Aside.] All things conspire to hound me on.

Not now, my soul, draw back, at least! Not
 now!

The course is plain, howe'er obscure all else.
 Once offer this tremendous sacrifice,
 Prevent what else will be irreparable,
 Secure these transcendental helps, regain
 The Cedars—then let all dark clear itself!
 I slay him!

Khalil. Anael, and no part for us!
 [To DJABAL.] Hast thou possessed her with . . .

Djabal [to ANAEL]. Whom speak you to?
 What is it you behold there? Nay, this smile Turns stranger. Shudder you? The man must die,

As thousands of our race have died thro' him.
 One blow, and I discharge his weary soul
 From the flesh that pollutes it! Let him fill Straight some new expiatory form, of earth
 Or sea, the reptile or some æry thing:
 What is there in his death?

Anael. My brother said,
 Is there no part in it for us?

Djabal. For Khalil,—
 The trumpet will announce the Nuncio's entry;
 Here, I shall find the Prefect hastening
 In the Pavilion to receive him—here
 I slay the Prefect; meanwhile Ayoob leads

The Nuncio with his guards within: once these Secured in the outer hall, bid Ayoob bar
 Entry or egress till I give the sign
 Which waits the landing of the argosies
 You will announce to me: this double sign
 That justice is performed and help arrived,
 When Ayoob shall receive, but not before,
 Let him throw open the palace doors, admit
 The Druses to behold their tyrant, ere
 We leave for ever this detested spot.

Go, Khalil, hurry all! No pause, no pause!
 Whirl on the dream, secure to wake anon!

Khalil. What sign? and who the bearer?
Djabal. Who shall show

My ring, admit to Ayoob. How she stands!
 Have I not . . . I must have some task for her.
 Anael, not that way! 'Tis the Prefect's
 chamber!

Anael, keep you the ring—give you the sign!
 (It holds her safe amid the stir.) You will Be faithful?

Anael [taking 'he ring]. I would fain be worthy. Hark! [Trumpet without.]

Khalil. He comes.

Djabal. And I too come.

Anael. One word, but one!
 Say, shall you be exalted at the deed?
 Then? On the instant?

Djabal. I exalted? What?
 He, there—we, thus—our wrongs revenged,
 our tribe

Set free? Oh, then shall I, assure yourself,
 Shall you, shall each of us, be in his death Exalted!

Khalil. He is here.

Djabal. Away—away! [They go.]

Enter the PREFECT with Guards, and LOYS.

The Prefect [to Guards]. Back, I say, to the galley every guard!

That's my sole care now; see each bench retains

Its complement of rowers; I embark
 O' the instant, since this Knight will have it so.
 Alas me! Could you have the heart, my Loys!
 [To a Guard who whispers.] Oh, bring the holy Nuncio here forthwith!

[The Guards go.]

Loys, a rueful sight, confess, to see
The grey discarded Prefect leave his post,
With tears i' the eye! So, you are Prefect
now?

You depose me—you succeed me? Ha, ha!
Loys. And dare you laugh, whom laughter less becomes

Than yesterday's forced meekness we beheld . . .

Prefect. —When you so eloquently pleaded,
Loys,

For my dismissal from the post? Ah, meek
With cause enough, consult the Nuncio else!
And wish him the like meekness: for so staunch

A servant of the Church can scarce have bought
His share in the Isle, and paid for it, hard pieces!

You've my successor to condole with, Nuncio!
I shall be safe by then i' the galley, Loys!

Loys. You make as you would tell me you rejoice

To leave your scene of . . .

Prefect. Trade in the dear Druses?
Blood and sweat traffic? Spare what yester-
day

We heard enough of! Drove I in the Isle
A profitable game? Learn wit, my son,
Which you'll need shortly! Did it never breed
Suspicion in you, all was not pure profit,
When I, the insatiate . . . and so forth—was bent

On having a partaker in my rule?
Why did I yield this Nuncio half the gain,
If not that I might also shift—what on him?
Half of the peril, Loys!

Loys. Peril?

Prefect. Hark you!
I'd love you if you'd let me—this for reason,
You save my life at price of . . . well, say risk

At least, of yours. I came a long time since
To the Isle; our Hospitallers bade me tame
These savage wizards, and reward myself—

Loys. The Knights who so repudiate your crime?

Prefect. Loys, the Knights! we doubtless understood

Each other; as for trusting to reward
From any friend beside myself . . . no, no!
I clutched mine on the spot, when it was
sweet,

And I had taste for it. I felt these wizards
Alive—was sure they were not on me, only When I was on them: but with age comes caution:

And stinging pleasures please less and sting
more.

Year by year, fear by fear! The girls were brighter

Than ever ('faith, there's yet one Anael left,
I set my heart upon—Oh, prithee, let That brave new sword lie still!)—These joys looked brighter,

But silenter the town, too, as I passed.
With this alcove's delicious memories
Began to mingle visions of gaunt fathers,
Quick-eyed sons, fugitives from the mine,
the oar,

Stealing to catch me. Brief, when I began To quake with fear—(I think I hear the Chapter

Solicited to let me leave, now all Worth staying for was gained and gone!)—I
say,

Just when, for the remainder of my life,
All methods of escape seemed lost—that then
Up should a young hot-headed Loys spring,
Talk very long and loud,—in fine, compel
The Knights to break their whole arrangement, have me

Home for pure shame—from this safehold of
mine

Where but ten thousand Druses seek my life,
To my wild place of banishment, San Gines
By Murcia, where my three fat manors lying,
Purchased by gains here and the Nuncio's
gold,

Are all I have to guard me,—that such fortune
Should fall to me, I hardly could expect.

Therefore I say, I'd love you.

Loys. Can it be?
I play into your hands then? Oh no, no!

The Venerable Chapter, the Great Order
Sunk o' the sudden into fiends of the pit?
But I will back—will yet unveil you!

Prefect.
To whom?—perhaps Sir Galeas, who in Chapter

Shook his white head thrice—and some dozen times

My hand next morning shook, for value paid!

To that Italian saint, Sir Cosimo?—

Indignant at my wringing year by year

A thousand bezants from the coral-divers,

As you recounted; felt the saint aggrieved?

Well might he—I allowed for his half-share

Merely one hundred. To Sir . . .

Loys. See! you dare
Inculcate the whole Order; yet should I,
A youth, a sole voice, have the power to
change

Their evil way, had they been firm in it?

Answer me!

Prefect. Oh, the son of Bretagne's Duke,
And that son's wealth, the father's influence,
too,

And the young arm, we'll even say, my Loys,
—The fear of losing or diverting these

Into another channel, by gainsaying

A novice too abruptly, could not influence

The Order! You might join, for aught they cared,

Their red-cross rivals of the Temple! Well,
I thank you for my part, at all events.

Stay here till they withdraw you! You'll inhabit

My palace—sleep, perchance, in the alcove

Whither I go to meet our holy friend.

Good! and now disbelieve me if you can,—

This is the first time for long years I enter

Thus [lifts the arras] without feeling just as if I lifted

The lid up of my tomb.

Loys. They share his crime!
God's punishment will overtake you yet.

Prefect. Thank you it does not! Pardon
this last flash:

I bear a sober visage presently

With the disinterested Nuncio here—

His purchase-money safe at Murcia, too!

Let me repeat—for the first time, no draught
Coming as from a sepulchre salutes me.

Me? When we next meet, this folly may have passed,
We'll hope. Ha, ha!

[Goes through the arras.]

Loys. Assure me but . . . he's gone!

He could not lie. Then what have I escaped,

I, who had so nigh given up happiness

For ever, to be linked with him and them!

Oh, opportunist of discoveries! I

Their Knight? I utterly renounce them all!

Hark! What, he meets by this the Nuncio?

Yes,

The same hyæna groan-like laughter! Quick—

To Djabal! I am one of them at last,

These simple-hearted Druses—Anael's tribe!

Djabal! She's mine at last. Djabal, I say!

[Goes.]

ACT IV.

Enter DJABAL.

Djabal. Let me but slay the Prefect.
The end now!

To-morrow will be time enough to pry

Into the means I took: suffice, they served,

Ignoble as they were, to hurl revenge

True to its object.

[Seeing the robe, etc. disposed.]

Mine should never so
I have hurried to accomplishment! Thee,

Djabal,
Far other mood befitted! Calm the Robe
Should clothe this doom's awarder!

[Taking the robe.] Shall I dare

Assume my nation's Robe? I am at least

A Druse again, chill Europe's policy

Drops from me: I dare take the Robe.

Why not

The Tiar? I rule the Druses, and what more
Betokens it than rule?—yet—yet—

[Lays down the tiar.]

[Footsteps in the alcove.] He comes!

[Taking the sword.]

If the Sword serve, let the Tiar lie! So,
feet

Clogged with the blood of twenty years can fall

Thus lightly! Round me, all ye ghosts!

He'll lift . . .

Which arm to push the arras wide?—or both?
Stab from the neck down to the heart—there
stay!

Near he comes—nearer—the next footstep!

Now! [As he dashes aside the arras,

ANAEL is discovered.

Ha! Anael! Nay, my Anael, can it be?

Heard you the trumpet? I must slay him here,

And here you ruin all. Why speak you not?

Anael, the Prefect comes! [ANAEL screams.]

So slow to feel

'Tis not a sight for you to look upon?

A moment's work—but such work! Till you go,

I must be idle—idle, I risk all!

[Pointing to her hair.

Those locks are well, and you are beauteous
thus,

But with the dagger 'tis, I have to do!

Anael. With mine!

Djabal. Blood—Anael?

Anael. Djabal, 'tis thy deed!

It must be! I had hoped to claim it mine—

Be worthy thee—but I must needs confess

'Twas not I, but thyself . . . not I have . . .

Djabal!

Speak to me!

Djabal. Oh, my punishment!

Anael. Speak to me

While I can speak! touch me, despite the blood!

When the command passed from thy soul to
mine,

I went, fire leading me, muttering of thee,

And the approaching exaltation,—“make

“One sacrifice!” I said,—and he sat there,

Bade me approach; and, as I did approach,

Thy fire with music burst into my brain.

'Twas but a moment's work, thou saidst—
perchance

It may have been so! Well, it is thy deed.

Djabal. It is my deed.

Anael. His blood all this!

—this! and . . .

“And more! Sustain me, Djabal! Wait not

—now

Let flash thy glory! Change thyself and me!

It must be! Ere the Druses flock to us!

At least confirm me! Djabal, blood gushed
forth—

He was our tyrant—but I looked he'd fall

Prone as asleep—why else is death called sleep?

Sleep? He bent o'er his breast! 'Tis sin,
I know,—

Punish me, Djabal, but wilt thou let him?

Be it thou that punishest, not he—who creeps

On his red breast—is here! 'Tis the small groan

Of a child—no worse! Bestow the new life,
then!

Too swift it cannot be, too strange, surpassing! [Following him as he retreats.

Now! Change us both! Change me and change thou!

Djabal [sinks on his knees]. Thus!

Behold my change! You have done nobly.

I!—

Anael. Can Hakeem kneel?

Djabal. No Hakeem,

and scarce Djabal!

I have dealt falsely, and this woe is come.

No—hear me ere scorn blast me! Once and ever,

The deed is mine. Oh think upon the past!

Anael [to herself]. Did I strike once, or twice, or many times?

Djabal. I came to lead my tribe where,
bathed in glooms,

Doth Bahumid the Renovator sleep:

Anael, I saw my tribe: I said, “Without

A miracle this cannot be”—I said

“Be there a miracle!”—for I saw you.

Anael. His head lies south the portal.

Djabal. —Weighed with this

The general good, how could I choose my
own?

What matter was my purity of soul?

Little by little I engaged myself—

Heaven would accept me for its instrument,

I hoped: I said Heaven had accepted me!

Anael. Is this blood breeds dreams in me? Who said

You were not Hakeem? And your miracles—

The fire that plays innocuous round your form?

[Again changing her whole manner.]

Ah, thou wouldst try me—thou art Hakeem still!

Djabal. Woe—woe! As if the Druses of the Mount

(Scarce Arabs, even there, but here, in the Isle, Beneath their former selves) should comprehend

The subtle lore of Europe! A few secrets That would not easily affect the meanest Of the crowd there, could wholly subjugate The best of our poor tribe. Again that eye?

Anael [after a pause springs to his neck].

Djabal, in this there can be no deceit! Why, Djabal, were you human only,—think, Maani is but human, Khalil human, Loys is human even—did their words Haunt me, their looks pursue me? Shame on you

So to have tried me! Rather, shame on me So to need trying! Could I, with the Prefect And the blood, there—could I see only you?—Hang by your neck over this gulf of blood? Speak, I am sayd! Speak, Djabal! Am I saved?

[As DJABAL slowly unclasps her arms, and puts her silently from him.]

Hakeem would save me. Thou art Djabal. Crouch!

Bow to the dust, thou basest of our kind! The pile of thee, I reared up to the cloud— Full, midway, of our fathers' trophied tombs, Based on the living rock, devoured not by The unstable desert's jaws of sand,—falls prone.

Fire, music, quenched: and now thou liest there

A ruin, obscene creatures will moan through. —Let us come, Djabal!

Djabal. Whither come?

Anael. At once—

Lest so it grow intolerable. Come!

Will I not share it with thee? Best at once! So, feel less pain! Let them deride,—thy tribe

Now trusting in thee,—Loys shall deride!

Come to them, hand in hand, with me!

Djabal.

Where come?

Anael. Where?—to the Druses thou hast wronged! Confess,

Now that the end is gained—(I love thee now—)

That thou hast so deceived them—(perchance love thee

Better than ever.) Come, receive their doom Of infamy! O, best of all I love thee!

Shame with the man, no triumph with the God,

Be mine! Come!

Djabal. Never! More shame yet? and why?

Why? You have called this deed mine—it is mine!

And with it I accept its circumstance.

How can I longer strive with fate? The past Is past: my false life shall henceforth show true.

Hear me! The argosies touch land by this; They bear us to fresh scenes and happier skies.

What if we reign together?—if we keep Our secret for the Druses' good?—by means Of even their superstition, plant in them New life? I learn from Europe: all who seek Man's good must awe man, by such means as these.

We two will be divine to them—we are!

All great works in this world spring from the ruins

Of greater projects—ever, on our earth, Babels men block out, Babylons they build.

I wrest the weapon from your hand! I claim

The deed! Retire! You have my ring—your bar

All access to the Nuncio till the forces From Venice land.

Anael. Thou wilt feign Hakeem then?

Djabal [putting the Tiara of Hakeem on his head]. And from this moment that I dare ope wide

Eyes that till now refused to see, begins My true dominion: for I know myself,

And what am I to personate. No word?

[ANAEI goes.]

'Tis come on me at last ! His blood on her—

What memories will follow that ! Her eye, Her fierce distorted lip and ploughed black brow !

Ah, fool ! Has Europe then so poorly tamed The Syrian blood from out thee ? Thou, presume

To work in this foul earth by means not foul ? Scheme, as for heaven,—but, on the earth, be glad

If a least ray like heaven's be left thee !

Thus

I shall be calm—in readiness—no way Surprised. [A noise without.]

This should be Khalil and my Druses. Venice is come then ! Thus I grasp thee, sword !

Druses, 'tis Hakeem saves you ! In ! Behold Your Prefect !

Enter LOYS. DJABAL hides the khandjar in his robe.

Loys. Oh, well found, Djabal !—but no time for words.

You know who waits there ?

[Pointing to the alcove.]

Well !—and that 'tis there

He meets the Nuncio ? Well ? Now, a surprise—

He there—

Djabal. I know—

Loys. —is now no mortal's lord, Is absolutely powerless—call him, dead— He is no longer Prefect—you are Prefect ! Oh, shriek not ! I do nothing in the dark, Nothing unworthy Breton blood, believe ! I understood at once your urgency That I should leave this isle for Rhodes ; I felt What you were loath to speak—your need of help.

I have fulfilled the task, that earnestness Imposed on me : have, face to face, confronted

The Prefect in full Chapter, charged on him The enormities of his long rule ; he stood Mute, offered no defence, no crime denied. On which, I spoke of you, and of your tribe,

Your faith so like our own, and all you urged Of old to me : I spoke, too, of your goodness, Your patience—brief, I hold henceforth the Isle

In charge, am nominally lord,—but you, You are associated in my rule—

Are the true Prefect ! Ay, such faith had they

In my assurance of your loyalty (For who insults an imbecile old man ?) That we assume the Prefecture this hour.

You gaze at me ? Hear greater wonders yet— I cast down all the fabric I have built.

These Knights, I was prepared to worship . . . but

Of that another time ; what's now to say, Is—I shall never be a Knight ! Oh, Djabal, Here first I throw all prejudice aside, And call you brother ! I am Druse like you : My wealth, my friends, my power, are wholly yours,

Your people's, which is now my people : for There is a maiden of your tribe, I love— She loves me—Khalil's sister—

Djabal. Anael ?

Loys. Start you ? Seems what I say, unknighly ? Thus it chanced :

When first I came, a novice, to the isle . . .

Enter one of the NUNCIO'S Guards from the alcove.

Guard. Oh horrible ! Sir Loys ! Here is Loys !

And here— [Others enter from the alcove. Pointing to DJABAL.] Secure him, bind him—this is he ! [They surround DJABAL.]

Loys. Madmen—what is't you do ? Stand from my friend,

And tell me !

Guard. Thou canst have no part in this— Surely no part ! But slay him not ! The Nuncio Commanded, slay him not !

Loys. Speak, or . . .

Guard. The Prefect Lies murdered there by him thou dost embrace.

Loys. By Djabal? Miserable fools! How Djabal?

[A Guard lifts DJABAL's robe; DJABAL flings down the khandjar.]

Loys [after a pause]. Thou hast received some insult worse than all,
Some outrage not to be endured—

[To the Guards.] Stand back!
He is my friend—more than my friend.
Thou hast

Slain him upon that provocation.

Guard. No!
No provocation! 'Tis a long devised
Conspiracy: the whole tribe is involved.
He is their Khalif—'tis on that pretence—
Their mighty Khalif who died long ago,
And now comes back to life and light again!
All is just now revealed, I know not how,
By one of his confederates—who, struck
With horror at this murder, first apprised
The Nuncio. As 'twas said, we find this
Djabal

Here where we take him.

Djabal [aside]. Who broke faith with me?

Loys [to DJABAL]. Hear'st thou? Speak!

Till thou speak, I keep off these,
Or die with thee. Deny this story! Thou
A Khalif, an impostor? Thou, my friend,
Whose tale was of an inoffensive tribe,
With . . . but thou know'st—on that tale's truth I pledged

My faith before the Chapter: what art thou?

Djabal. Loys, I am as thou hast heard.

All's true.

No more concealment! As these tell thee, all Was long since planned. Our Druses are
enough

To crush this handful: the Venetians land
Even now in our behalf. Loys, we part.

Thou, serving much, wouldst fain have served me more;

It might not be. I thank thee. As thou hearest,

We are a separated tribe: farewell!

Loys. Oh where will truth be found now?
Canst thou so

Belie the Druses? Do they share thy crime?
Those thou professest of our Breton stock,

Are partners with thee? Why, I saw but now
Khalil, my friend: he spoke with me—no word
Of this! and Anael—whom I love, and who Loves me—she spoke no word of this.

Djabal. Poor boy!
Anael, who loves thee? Khalil, fast thy
friend?

We, offsets from a wandering Count of Dreux?
No: older than the oldest, princelier
Than Europe's princeliest race, our tribe:
enough

For thine, that on our simple faith we found
A monarchy to shame your monarchies
At their own trick and secret of success.

The child of this our tribe shall laugh upon
The palace-step of him whose life ere night
Is forfeit, as that child shall know, and
yet

Shall laugh there! What, we Druses wait
forsooth

The kind interposition of a boy
—Can only save ourselves if thou concede:
—Khalil admire thee? He is my right-hand,
My delegate!—Anael accept thy love?

She is my bride!

Loys. Thy bride? She one of them?

Djabal. My bride!

Loys. And she retains her glorious eyes!

She, with those eyes, has shared this mis-creant's guilt!

Ah—who but she directed me to find
Djabal within the Prefect's chamber? Khalil Bade me seek Djabal there, too. All is truth.

What spoke the Prefect worse of them than
this?

Did the Church ill to institute long since
Perpetual warfare with such serpentry?

And I—have I desired to shift my part,
Evade my share in her design? 'Tis well.

Djabal. Loys, I wronged thee—but unwittingly:

I never thought there was in thee a virtue
That could attach itself to what thou deemest

A race below thine own. I wronged thee,
Loys,

But that is over : all is over now,
Save the protection I ensure against
My people's anger. By their Khalif's side,
Thou art secure and mayst depart : so,
come!

Loys. Thy side? I take protection at thy
hand?

Enter other Guards.

Guards. Fly with him! Fly, Sir Loys!

'Tis too true :

And only by his side thou mayst escape.
The whole tribe is in full revolt : they flock
About the palace—will be here—on thee—
And there are twenty of us, we the Guards
O' the Nuncio, to withstand them! Even we Had stayed to meet our death in ignorance,
But that one Druse, a single faithful Druse,
Made known the horror to the Nuncio. Fly!
The Nuncio stands aghast. At least let us Escape thy wrath, O Hakeem! We are nought

In thy tribe's persecution! [To LOYS.]
Keep by him!

They hail him Hakeem, their dead Prince
returned :

He is their God, they shout, and at his beck
Are life and death!

Loys [springing at the khandjar DJABAL had thrown down, seizes him by the throat].

Thus by his side am I!

Thus I resume my knighthood and its warfare,
Thus end thee, miscreant, in thy pride of
place!

Thus art thou caught. Without, thy dupes may cluster :

Friends aid thee, foes avoid thee,—thou art
Hakeem,

How say they?—God art thou! but also here
Is the least, youngest, meanest the Church calls

Her servant, and his single arm avails
To aid her as she lists. I rise, and thou Art crushed. Hordes of thy Druses flock
without :

Here thou hast me, who represent the Cross,
Honour and Faith, 'gainst Hell, Mahound
and thee.

Die! [DJABAL remains calm.] Implore my mercy, Hakeem, that my scorn

May help me! Nay, I cannot ply thy trade;
I am no Druse, no stabber : and thine eye, Thy form, are too much as they were—my
friend

Had such. Speak! Beg for mercy at my foot! [DJABAL still silent.]

Heaven could not ask so much of me—not,
sure,

So much. I cannot kill him so.

[After a pause.] Thou art

Strong in thy cause, then—dost outbrave us,
then.

Heardst thou that one of thine accomplices,
Thy very people, has accused thee? Meet
His charge! Thou hast not even slain the Prefect

As thy own vile creed warrants. Meet that Druse!

Come with me and disprove him—be thou tried

By him, nor seek appeal! Promise me this,
Or I will do God's office. What, shalt thou
Boast of assassins at thy beck, yet truth
Want even an executioner? Consent,
Or I will strike—look in my face—I will!

Djabal. Give me again my khandjar, if thou darest! [Loys gives it.]

Let but one Druse accuse me, and I plunge
This home. A Druse betray me? Let us go!
[Aside.] Who has betrayed me?

[Shouts without.]

Hearst thou? I hear

No plainer than long years ago I heard That shout—but in no dream now. They return!

Wilt thou be leader with me, Loys? Well.

ACT V.

The Uninitiated Druses, filling the hall tumultuously, and speaking together.

Here flock we, obeying the summons. Lo, Hakeem hath appeared, and the Prefect is dead, and we return to Lebanon! My manufacture of goats' fleece must, I doubt, soon fall away there. Come, old Nasif—link thine arm in mine—we fight, if needs be. Come, what is a great fight-word?—"Lebanon?" (My daughter—my daughter!)—But is Khalil to have the office of Hamza?—Nay, rather, if he be wise, the monopoly of henna and cloves. Where is Hakeem?—The only prophet I ever saw, prophesied at Cairo once, in my youth: a little black Copht, dressed all in black too, with a great stripe of yellow cloth flapping down behind him like the back-fin of a water-serpent. Is this he? Biamrallah! Biamreh! HAKEEM!

Enter the NUNCIO, with Guards.

Nuncio [to his Attendants]. Hold both, the sorcerer and this accomplice

Ye talk of, that accuseth him! And tell Sir Loys he is mine, the Church's hope: Bid him approve himself our Knight indeed! Lo, this black disemboгуing of the Isle!

[To the Druses.] Ah children, what a sight for these old eyes

That kept themselves alive this voyage through To smile their very last on you! I came

To gather one and all you wandering sheep Into my fold, as though a father came . . .

As though, in coming, a father should . . .

[To his Guards.] (Ten, twelve—Twelve guards of you, and not an outlet? None?

The wizards stop each avenue? Keep close!)

[To the Druses.] As if one came to a son's house, I say,

Sodid I come—no guard with me—to find . . .

Alas—alas!

A Druse. Who is the old man?

Another. Oh, ye are to shout!

Children, he styles you.

Druses. Ay, the Prefect's slain!

Glory to the Khalif, our Father!

Nuncio. Even so

I find, (ye prompt aright) your father slain.

While most he plotted for your good, that father

(Alas, how kind, ye never knew)—lies slain.

[Aside.] (And hell's worm gnaw the glozing knave—with me,

For being duped by his cajoleries!

Are these the Christians? These the docile crew

My bezants went to make me Bishop o'er?)

[To his Attendants, who whisper.] What say ye does this wizard style himself?

Hakeem? Biamrallah? The third Fatemite?

What is this jargon? He—the insane Khalif,

Dead near three hundred years ago, come back In flesh and blood again?

Druses.

He mutters! Hear ye?

He is blaspheming Hakeem. The old man

Is our dead Prefect's friend. Tear him!

Nuncio.

Ye dare not.

I stand here with my five-and-seventy years,

The Patriarch's power behind me; God's above.

Those years have witnessed sin enough; ere now

Misguided men arose against their lords,

And found excuse; but ye, to be enslaved

By sorceries, cheats—alas! the same tricks, tried

On my poor children in this nook o' the earth,

Could triumph, that have been successively

Exploded, laughed to scorn, all nations through:

"Romaiot, Ioudaioite kai proselutoi,

"Cretes and Arabians"—you are duped the last.

Said I, refrain from tearing me? I pray ye

Tear me! Shall I return to tell the Patriarch

That so much love was wasted—every gift

Rejected, from his benison I brought,

Down to the galley-full of bezants, sunk

An hour since at the harbour's mouth, by

that . . .

That . . . never will I speak his hated name!

[To his Servants.] What was the name his fellow slip-fetter

Called their arch-wizard by? [They whisper.]

Oh, Djabal was't?

Druses. But how a sorcerer? false wherein?

Nuncio.

(Ay, Djabal!)

How false? Ye know not, Djabal has confessed . . .

Nay, that by tokens found on him we learn . . .

What I sailed hither solely to divulge—

How by his spells the demons were allured
To seize you : not that these be aught save lies
And mere illusions. Is this clear ? I say,
By measures such as these, he would have led you

Into a monstrous ruin : follow ye ?

Say, shall ye perish for his sake, my sons ?

Druses. Hark ye !

Nuncio. —Be of one privilege amerced ?
No ! Infinite the Patriarch's mercies are !
No ! With the Patriarch's licence, still I bid

Tear him to pieces who misled you ! Haste !

Druses. The old man's beard shakes, and his eyes are white fire ! After all, I know nothing of Djabal beyond what Karshook says ; he knows but what Khalil says, who knows just what Djabal says himself. Now, the little Copht Prophet, I saw at Cairo in my youth, began by promising each bystander three full measures of wheat . . .

Enter KHALIL and the initiated DRUSES.

Khalil. Venice and her deliverance are at
hand :

Their fleet stands through the harbour. Hath he slain

The Prefect yet ? Is Djabal's change come
yet ?

Nuncio [to Attendants]. What's this of Venice ? Who's this boy ?

[Attendants whisper.] One Khalil ?

Djabal's accomplice, Loys called, but now,

The only Druse, save Djabal's self, to fear ?

[To the Druses.] I cannot hear ye with these aged ears :

Is it so ? Ye would have my troops assist ?

Doth he abet him in his sorceries ?

Down with the cheat, guards, as my children bid ! [They spring at KHALIL ; as he beats them back,

Stay ! No more bloodshed ! Spare deluded
youth !

Whom seek'st thou ? (I will teach him)— whom, my child ?

Thou know'st not what these know, what these declare.

I am an old man as thou seest—have done

With life ; and what should move me but the truth ?

Art thou the only fond one of thy tribe ?

'Tis I interpret for thy tribe.

Khalil.

Oh, this

Is the expected Nuncio ! Druses, hear—

Endure ye this ? Unworthy to partake

The glory Hakeem gains you ! While I speak,

The ships touch land : who makes for Lebanon ?

They plant the winged lion in these halls !

Nuncio [aside]. If it be true ! Venice ?

Oh, never true !

Yet Venice would so gladly thwart our Knights,

So fain get footing here, stand close by Rhodes !

Oh, to be duped this way !

Khalil.

Ere he appear

And lead you gloriously, repent, I say !

Nuncio [aside]. Nor any way to stretch the arch-wizard stark

Ere the Venetians come ? Cut off the head,

The trunk were easily stilled. [To the Druses.] He ? Bring him forth !

Since so you needs will have it, I assent.

You'd judge him, say you, on the spot—confound

The sorcerer in his very circle ? Where's

Our short black-bearded sallow friend who swore

He'd earn the Patriarch's guerdon by one stab ?

Bring Djabal forth at once !

Druses.

Ay, bring him forth !

The Patriarch drives a trade in oil and silk,

And we're the Patriarch's children—true men, we !

Where is the glory ? Show us all the glory !

Khalil. You dare not so insult him !

What, not see . . .

(I tell thee, Nuncio, these are uninstructed, Untrusting : they know nothing of our Khalif !)

—Not see that if he lets a doubt arise

'Tis but to give yourselves the chance of seeming

To have some influence in your own Return !

That all may say ye would have trusted him

Without the all-convincing glory—ay,
And did! Embrace the occasion, friends!

For, think—

What wonder when his change takes place?

But now

For your sakes, he should not reveal himself.

No: could I ask and have, I would not ask

The change yet!

Enter DJABAL and LOYS.

Spite of all, reveal thyself!

I had said, pardon them for me—for Anael—

For our sakes pardon these besotted men—

Ay, for thine own—they hurt not thee! Yet
now

One thought swells in me and keeps down all else.

This Nuncio couples shame with thee, has called

Imposture thy whole course, all bitter things
Has said: he is but an old fretful man!

Hakeem—nay, I must call thee Hakeem now—

Reveal thyself! See! Where is Anael? Sec!

Loys [to DJABAL]. Here are thy people.

Keep thy word to me!

Djabal. Who of my people hath accused me?

Nuncio. So!

So this is Djabal, Hakeem, and what not?

A fit deed, Loys, for thy first Knight's day!

May it be augury of thy after-life!

Ever prove truncheon of the Church as now

That, Nuncio of the Patriarch, having charge

Of the Isle here, I claim thee [turning to

DJABAL] as these bid me,

Forfeit for murder done thy lawful prince,

Thou conjurer that peep'st and mutterest!

Why should I hold thee from their hands?

(Spells, children?

But hear how I dispose of all his spells!)

Thou art a prophet?—wouldst entice thy tribe

From me?—thou workest miracles? (Attend!

Let him but move me with his spells!) I,

Nuncio . . .

Djabal. . . Which how thou camest to be,

I say not now,

Though I have also been at Stamboul, Luke!

Ply thee with spells, forsooth! What need of spells?

If Venice, in her Admiral's person, stoop

To ratify thy compact with her foe,

The Hospitallers, for this Isle—withdraw

Her warrant of the deed which reinstates

My people in their freedom, tricked away

By him I slew,—refuse to convoy us

To Lebanon and keep the Isle we leave—

Then will be time to try what spells can do!

Dost thou dispute the Republic's power?

Nuncio.

Lo ye!

He tempts me too, the wily exorcist!

No! The renowned Republic was and is

The Patriarch's friend: 'tis not for courting
Venice

That I—that these implore thy blood of me.

Lo ye, the subtle miscreant! Ha, so subtle?

Ye, Druses, hear him. Will ye be deceived?

How he evades me! Where's the miracle

He works? I bid him to the proof—fish up

Your galley-full of bezants that he sank!

That were a miracle! One miracle!

Enough of trifling, for it chafes my years.

I am the Nuncio, Druses! I stand forth

To save you from the good Republic's rage

When she shall find her fleet was summoned
here

To aid the mummeries of a knave like this.

[As the Druses hesitate, his

Attendants whisper.

Ah, well suggested! Why, we hold the while

One who, his close confederate till now,

Confesses Djabal at the last a cheat,

And every miracle a cheat. Who throws me

His head? I make three offers, once I offer,—

And twice . . .

Djabal.

Let who moves perish at my foot!

Khalil. Thanks, Hakeem, thanks! Oh,

Anael, Maani,

Why tarry they?

Druses [to each other]. He can! He can!

Live fire—

[To the NUNCIO.] I say he can, old man!

Thou know'st him not.

Live fire like that thou seest now in his eyes,

Plays fawning round him. See ! The change begins.

All the brow lightens as he lifts his arm.

Look not at me ! It was not I !

Djabal. What Druse

Accused me, as he saith ? I bid each bone Crumble within that Druse ! None, Loys, none

Of my own people, as thou said'st, have raised

A voice against me.

Nuncio [aside]. Venice to come ! Death !

Djabal [continuing]. Confess and go unscathed, however false !

Seest thou my Druses, Luke ? I would submit

To thy pure malice did one Druse confess ! How said I, Loys ?

Nuncio [to his Attendants who whisper].

Ah, ye counsel so ?

[Aloud.] Bring in the witness, then, who, first of all,

Disclosed the treason ! Now I have thee, wizard !

Ye hear that ? If one speaks, he bids you tear him

Joint after joint : well then, one does speak ! One,

Befooled by Djabal, even as yourselves,

But who hath voluntarily proposed

To expiate, by confessing thus, the fault Of having trusted him.

[They bring in a veiled Druse.

Loys. Now, Djabal, now !

Nuncio. Friend, Djabal fronts thee ! Make a ring, sons. Speak !

Expose this Djabal—what he was, and how :

The wiles he used, the aims he cherished : all, Explicitly as late 'twas spoken to these

My servants : I absolve and pardon thee.

Loys. Thou hast the dagger ready, Djabal ?

Djabal. Speak,

Recreant !

Druses. Stand back, fool ! farther ! Suddenly

You shall see some huge serpent glide from under

The empty vest, or down will thunder crash ! Back, Khalil !

Khalil. I go back ? Thus go I back !

[To ANAEL.] Unveil ! Nay, thou shalt face the Khalil ! Thus !

[He tears away ANAEL'S veil ; DJABAL folds his arms and bows his head ; the Druses fall back ; LOYS springs from the side of DJABAL and the NUNCIO.

Loys. Then she was true—she only of them all !

True to her eyes—may keep those glorious eyes,

And now be mine, once again mine ! Oh, Anael !

Dared I think thee a partner in his crime—That blood could soil that hand ? nay, 'tis mine—Anael,

—Not mine ?—who offer thee before all these

My heart, my sword, my name—so thou wilt say

That Djabal, who affirms thou art his bride, Lies—say but that he lies !

Djabal. Thou, Anael ?

Loys. Nay, Djabal, nay, one chance for me—the last !

Thou hast had every other ; thou hast spoken Days, nights, what falsehood listed thee—let me

Speak first now ; I will speak now !

Nuncio. Loys, pause !

Thou art the Duke's son, Bretagne's choicest stock,

Loys of Dreux, God's sepulchre's first sword : This wilt thou spit on, this degrade, this trample

To earth ?

Loys [to ANAEL]. Who had foreseen that one day Loys

Would stake these gifts against some other good

In the whole world ? I give them thee ! I would

My strong will might bestow real shape on them,

That I might see, with my own eyes, thy foot

Tread on their very neck ! 'Tis not by gifts
I put aside this Djabal : we will stand—
We do stand, see, two men ! Djabal, stand
forth !

Who's worth her, I or thou ? I—who for
Anael

Uprightly, purely kept my way, the long
True way—left thee each by-path, boldly
lived

Without the lies and blood,—or thou, or thou ?
Me ! love me, Anael ! Leave the blood and
him !

[To DJABAL.] Now speak—now, quick on this that I have said,—

Thou with the blood, speak if thou art a man !
Djabal [to ANAEL]. And was it thou be-trayedst me ? 'Tis well !

I have deserved this of thee, and submit.
Nor 'tis much evil thou inflictest : life
Ends here. The cedars shall not wave
for us :

For there was crime, and must be punishment.
See fate ! By thee I was seduced, by thee
I perish : yet do I—can I repent ?
I with my Arab instinct, thwarted ever
By my Frank policy,—and with, in turn,
My Frank brain, thwarted by my Arab
heart—

While these remained in equipoise, I lived
—Nothing ; had either been predominant,
As a Frank schemer or an Arab mystic,
I had been something ;—now, each has destroyed

The other—and behold, from out their crash,
A third and better nature rises up—
My mere man's-nature ! And I yield to it :
I love thee, I who did not love before !

Anael. Djabal !

Djabal. It seemed love, but it was not love :

How could I love while thou adoredst me ?
Now thou despisest, art above me so
Immeasurably ! Thou, no other, doomest
My death now ; this my steel shall execute
Thy judgment ; I shall feel thy hand in it.
Oh luxury to worship, to submit,
Transcended, doomed to death by thee !

Anael.

My Djabal !

Djabal. Dost hesitate ? I force thee then.

Approach,

Druses ! for I am out of reach of fate ;
No further evil waits me. Speak the doom !
Hear, Druses, and hear, Nuncio, and hear,
Loys !

Anael. HAKEEM ! [She falls dead.]

[The Druses scream, grovelling before him.] Druses. Ah Hakeem !—not on me thy wrath !

Biamrallah, pardon ! never doubted I !

Ha, dog, how sayest thou ?

[They surround and seize the NUNCIO and his Guards. LOYS flings himself upon the body of ANAEL, on which DJABAL continues to gaze as stupefied.]

Nuncio. Caitiffs ! Have ye eyes ?
Whips, racks should teach you ! What, his fools ? his dupes ?

Leave me ! Unhand me !

Khalil [approaching DJABAL timidly].
Save her for my sake !

She was already thine ; she would have shared
To-day thine exaltation : think, this day
Her hair was plaited thus because of thee !
Yes, feel the soft bright hair—feel !

Nuncio [struggling with those who have seized him]. What, because

His leman dies for him ? You think it hard To die ? Oh, would you were at Rhodes, and choice

Of deaths should suit you !

Khalil [bending over ANAEL'S body].

Just restore her life !

So little does it ! there—the eyelids tremble !
'Twas not my breath that made them : and the lips

Move of themselves. I could restore, her life !
Hakeem, we have forgotten—have presumed
On our free converse : we are better taught.
Sec, I kiss—how I kiss thy garment's hem
For her ! She kisses it—Oh, take her deed
In mine ! Thou dost believe now, Anael ?—

See,

She smiles ! Were her lips open o'er the teeth Thus, when I spoke first ? She believes in
thee !

Go not without her to the cedars, lord !
 Or leave us both—I cannot go alone !
 I have obeyed thee, if I dare so speak :
 Hath Hakeem thus forgot all Djabal knew ?
 Thou feelest then my tears fall hot and fast
 Upon thy hand, and yet thou speakest not ?
 Ere the Venetian trumpet sound—ere thou
 Exalt thyself, O Hakeem ! save thou her !

Nuncio. And the accursed Republic will arrive
 And find me in their toils—dead, very like,
 Under their feet !

What way—not one way yet
 To foil them ? None ?

[Observing DJABAL's face.

What ails the Khalif? Ah,
 That ghastly face ! A way to foil them yet !
 [To the Druses.] Look to your Khalif, Druses !

Is that face
 God Hakeem's? Where is triumph,—where is . . . what

Said he of exaltation—hath he promised
 So much to-day? Why then, exalt thyself !
 Cast off that husk, thy form, set free thy soul
 In splendour ! Now, bear witness ! here I stand—

I challenge him exalt himself, and I
 Become, for that, a Druse like all of you !

The Druses. Exalt thyself ! Exalt thyself,
 O Hakeem !

Djabal [advances]. I can confess now all from first to last.

There is no longer shame for me. I am . . .

[*Here the Venetian trumpet sounds :
 the Druses shout, DJABAL's eye catches the expression of those about him, and, as the old dream comes back, he is again confident and inspired.*

—Am I not Hakeem? And ye would have crawled

But yesterday within these impure courts
 Where now ye stand erect ! Not grand enough?

—What more could be conceded to such beasts
 As all of you, so sunk and base as you,
 Than a mere man? A man among such beasts
 Was miracle enough : yet him you doubt,
 Him you forsake, him fain would you destroy—

With the Venetians at your gate, the Nuncio
 Thus—(see the baffled hypocrite !) and, best,
 The Prefect there !

Druses. No, Hakeem, ever thine !

Nuncio. He lies—and twice he lies—and thrice he lies !

Exalt thyself, Mahound ! Exalt thyself !

Djabal. Druses ! we shall henceforth be far away—

Out of mere mortal ken—above the cedars—
 But we shall see ye go, hear ye return,
 Repeopling the old solitudes,—through thee,
 My Khalil ! Thou art full of me : I fill Thee full—my hands thus fill thee ! Yestereve, —Nay, but this morn, I deemed thee ignorant
 Of all to do, requiring word of mine
 To teach it : now, thou hast all gifts in one,
 With truth and purity go other gifts,
 All gifts come clustering to that. Go,
 lead

My people home whate'er betide !

[Turning to the Druses.] Ye take
 This Khalil for my delegate? To him
 Bow as to me? He leads to Lebanon—
 Ye follow?

Druses. We follow ! Now exalt thyself !

Djabal [raises LOYS]. Then to thee, Loys !
 How I wronged thee, Loys !

Yet, wronged, no less thou shalt have full
 revenge,

Fit for thy noble self, revenge—and thus.
 Thou, loaded with such wrongs, the princely
 soul,

The first sword of Christ's sepulchre—thou shalt

Guard Khalil and my Druses home again !

Justice, no less, God's justice and no more,
 For those I leave ! To seeking this, devote Some few days out of thy Knight's brilliant
 life :

And, this obtained them, leave their Lebanon,
 My Druses' blessing in thine ears—(they shall

Bless thee with blessing sure to have its
 way)

—One cedar-blossom in thy duca! cap,
 One thought of Anael in thy heart,—per-
 chance,

One thought of him who thus, to bid thee
speed,

His last word to the living speaks! This
done,

Resume thy course, and, first amidst the
first

In Europe, take my heart along with thee!

Go boldly, go serenely, go augustly—

What shall withstand thee then?

[He bends over ANAEL.] And last to
thee!

Ah, did I dream I was to have, this day,

Exalted thee? A vain dream: hast thou
not

Won greater exaltation? What remains

But press to thee, exalt myself to thee?

Thus I exalt myself, set free my soul!

[He stabs himself. As he falls, supported by KHALIL and LOYS, the Venetians enter; the ADMIRAL advances.

Admiral. God and St. Mark for Venice!

Plant the Lion!

[At the clash of the planted standard, the Druses shout and move tumultuously forward, LOYS drawing his sword.

A BLOT IN THE 'SCUTCHEON;

A TRAGEDY.

1843.

A BLOT IN THE 'SCUTCHEON.

PERSONS.

MILDRED TRESHAM.

GUENDOLEN TRESHAM.

THOROLD, Earl Tresham.

AUSTIN TRESHAM.

HENRY, Earl Mertoun.

GERARD, and other retainers of Lord Tresham.

TIME, 17—.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The interior of a lodge in LORD TRESHAM'S park. Many Retainers crowded at the window, supposed to command a view of the entrance to his mansion. GERARD, the warrenor, his back to a table on which are flagons, etc.

1st Retainer. Ay, do! push, friends, and then you'll push down me!

—What for? Does any hear a runner's foot Or a steed's trample or a coach-wheel's cry?

Is the Earl come or his least poursuivant? But there's no breeding in a man of you Save Gerard yonder: here's a half-place yet, Old Gerard!

Gerard. Save your courtesies, my friend. Here is my place.

2nd Retainer. Now, Gerard, out with it! What makes you sullen, this of all the days I' the year? To-day that young rich bountiful Handsome Earl Mertoun, whom alone they match

With our Lord Tresham through the country-side,

Is coming here in utmost bravery To ask our master's sister's hand?

Gerard. What then? Gerard. What then? Why, you, she speaks to, if she meets

Your worship, smiles on as you hold apart The boughs to let her through her forest walks,

You, always favourite for your no-deserts, You've heard, these three days, how Earl Mertoun sues

To lay his heart and house and broad lands too

At Lady Mildred's feet: and while we squeeze Ourselves into a mousehole lest we miss One congee of the least page in his train, You sit o' one side—"there's the Earl," say I—

"What then?" say you!

3rd Retainer. I'll wager he has let Both swans he tamed for Lady Mildred swim Over the falls and gain the river!

Gerard. Ralph,

Is not to-morrow my inspecting-day

For you and for your hawks?

4th Retainer. Let Gerard be! He's coarse-grained, like his carved black cross-bow stock.

Ha, look now, while we squabble with him, look!

Well done, now—is not this beginning, now, To purpose?

1st Retainer. Our retainers look as fine— That's comfort. Lord, how Richard holds himself

With his white staff! Will not a knave behind Prick him upright?

4th Retainer. He's only bowing, fool! The Earl's man bent us lower by this much.

1st Retainer. That's comfort. Here's a very cavalcade!

3rd Retainer. I don't see wherefore Richard, and his troop

Of silk and silver varlets there, should find
Their perfumed selves so indispensable
On high days, holidays! Would it so disgrace
Our family, if I, for instance, stood—
In my right hand a cast of Swedish hawks,
A leash of greyhounds in my left?—

Gerard. —With Hugh

The logman for supporter, in his right
The bill-hook, in his left the brushwoodshears!

3rd Retainer. Out on you, crab! What next, what next? The Earl!

1st Retainer. Oh Walter, groom, our horses, do they match

The Earl's? Alas, that first pair of the six—
They paw the ground—Ah Walter! and that brute

Just on his haunches by the wheel!

6th Retainer. Ay—ay!

You, Philip, are a special hand, I hear,
At soups and sauces: what's a horse to you?
D'ye mark that beast they've slid into the midst

So cunningly?—then, Philip, mark this further;

No leg has he to stand on!

1st Retainer. No? That's comfort.

2nd Retainer. Peace, Cook! The Earl descends. Well, Gerard, see

The Earl at least! Come, there's a proper man,

I hope! Why, Ralph, no falcon, Pole or Swede,

Has got a starrier eye.

3rd Retainer. His eyes are blue:

But leave my hawks alone!

4th Retainer. So young, and yet

So tall and shapely!

5th Retainer. Here's Lord Tresham's self!

There now—there's what a nobleman should be!

He's older, graver, loftier, he's more like A House's head.

2nd Retainer. But you'd not have a boy—
—And what's the Earl beside?—possess too soon

That stateliness?

1st Retainer. Our master takes his hand—
Richard and his white staff are on the move—
Back fall our people—(tsh!—there's Timothy
Sure to get tangled in his ribbon-ties,
And Peter's cursed rosette's a-coming off!)
—At last I see our lord's back and his friend's;

And the whole beautiful bright company
Close round them—in they go! [Jumping down from the window-bench, and making for the table and its jugs.]

Good health, long life,

Great joy to our Lord Tresham and his House!

6th Retainer. My father drove his father first to court,

After his marriage-day—ay, did he!

2nd Retainer. God bless

Lord Tresham, Lady Mildred, and the Earl!
Here, Gerard, reach your beaker!

Gerard. Drink, my boys!

Don't mind me—all's not right about me—
drink!

2nd Retainer [aside]. He's vexed, now, that he let the show escape!

[To GERARD.] Remember that the Earl returns this way.

Gerard. That way?

2nd Retainer. Just so.

Gerard. Then my way's here.

2nd Retainer. Old Gerard

Will die soon—mind, I said it! He was used
To care about the pitifullest thing

That touched the House's honour, not an eye
But his could see wherein: and on a cause

Of scarce a quarter this importance, Gerard
Fairly had fretted flesh and bone away

In cares that this was right, nor that was wrong,

Such point decorous, and such square by rule—

He knew such niceties, no herald more:

And now—you see his humour: die he will!

2nd Retainer. God help him! Who's for the great servants'-hall
To hear what's going on inside? They'd follow

Lord Tresham into the saloon.

3rd Retainer. I!—

4th Retainer. I!—

Leave Frank alone for catching, at the door,
Some hint of how the parley goes inside!
Prosperity to the great House once more!
Here's the last drop!

1st Retainer. Have at you! Boys, hurrah!

SCENE II.—A Saloon in the Mansion.

Enter LORD TRESHAM, LORD MERTOUN,
AUSTIN, and GUENDOLEN.

Tresham. I welcome you, Lord Mertoun, yet once more,
To this ancestral roof of mine. Your name
—Noble among the noblest in itself,
Yet taking in your person, fame avers,
New price and lustre,—(as that gem you
wear,
'Transmitted from a hundred knightly breasts,
Fresh chased and set and fixed by its last lord,
Seems to re-kindle at the core)—your name
Would win you welcome!—

Mertoun. Thanks!

Tresham. —But add to that,
The worthiness and grace and dignity
Of your proposal for uniting both
Our Houses even closer than respect Unites them now—add these, and you must grant

One favour more, nor that the least,—to think
The welcome I should give;—'tis given!

My lord,

My only brother, Austin: he's the king's.
Our cousin, Lady Guendolen—betrothed
To Austin: all are yours.

Mertoun. I thank you—less

For the expressed commendings which your seal,

And only that, authenticates—forbids

My putting from me . . . to my heart I take

Your praise . . . but praise less claims my gratitude,

Than the indulgent insight it implies
Of what must needs be uppermost with one Who comes, like me, with the bare leave to ask,

In weighed and measured unimpassioned
words,

A gift, which, if as calmly 'tis denied,
He must withdraw, content upon his cheek,
Despair within his soul. That I dare ask
Firmly, near boldly, near with confidence
That gift, I have to thank you. Yes, Lord
Tresham,

I love your sister—as you'd have one love
That lady . . . oh more, more I love her!
Wealth,

Rank, all the world thinks me, they're yours,
you know,
To hold or part with, at your choice—but grant

My true self, me without a rood of land,
A piece of gold, a name of yesterday,
Grant me that lady, and you . . . Death or
life?

Guendolen [apart to AUSTIN]. Why, this is loving, Austin!

Austin. He's so young!

Guendolen. Young? Old enough, I think, to half surmise

He never had obtained an entrance here,
Were all this fear and trembling needed.

Austin. Hush!

He reddens.

Guendolen. Mark him, Austin; that's true
love!

Ours must begin again.

Tresham. We'll sit, my lord.

Ever with best desert goes diffidence.

I may speak plainly nor be misconceived.

That I am wholly satisfied with you

On this occasion, when a falcon's eye

Were dull compared with mine to search out faults,

Is somewhat. Mildred's hand is hers to give
Or to refuse.

Mertoun. But you, you grant my suit?
I have your word if hers?

- Tresham.* My best of words
If hers encourage you. I trust it will.
Have you seen Lady Mildred, by the way?
Mertoun. I . . . I . . . our two de-mesnes, remember, touch ;
I have been used to wander carelessly
After my stricken game : the heron roused
Deep in my woods, has trailed its broken wing
Thro' thickets and glades a mile in yours,—or else
Some eyass¹ ill-reclaimed has taken flight
And lured me after her from tree to tree,
I marked not whither. I have come upon
The lady's wondrous beauty unaware,
And—and then . . . I have seen her.
Guendolen [aside to AUSTIN]. Note that mode
Of faltering out that, when a lady passed,
He, having eyes, did see her ! You had said—
“On such a day I scanned her, head to foot ; “Observed a red, where red should not have
been,
“Outside her elbow ; but was pleased enough
“Upon the whole.” Let such irreverent talk
Be lessoned for the future !
Tresham. What's to say
May be said briefly. She has never known
A mother's care ; I stand for father too.
Her beauty is not strange to you, it seems—
You cannot know the good and tender
heart,
Its girl's trust and its woman's constancy,
How pure yet passionate, how calm yet kind,
How grave yet joyous, how reserved yet free
As light where friends are—how imbued with lore
The world most prizes, yet the simplest, yet
The . . . one might know I talked of Mildred
—thus
We brothers talk !
Mertoun. I thank you.
Tresham. In a word,
Control's not for this lady ; but her wish
To please me outstrips in its subtlety
My power of being pleased : herself creates
The want she means to satisfy. My heart
Prefers your suit to her as 'twere its own.
Can I say more?
Mertoun. No more—thanks, thanks
—no more !
Tresham. This matter then discussed . . .
Mertoun. —We'll waste no breath
On aught less precious. I'm beneath the roof
Which holds her : while I thought of that,
my speech
To you would wander—as it must not do,
Since as you favour me I stand or fall.
I pray you suffer that I take my leave !
Tresham. With less regret 'tis suffered, that again
We meet, I hope, so shortly.
Mertoun. We ? again ?—
Ah yes, forgive me—when shall . . . you will crown
Your goodness by forthwith apprising me
When . . . if . . . the lady will appoint a
day
For me to wait on you—and her.
Tresham. So soon
As I am made acquainted with her thoughts
On your proposal—howsoever they lean—
A messenger shall bring you the result.
Mertoun. You cannot bind me more to you, my lord.
Farewell till we renew . . . I trust, renew
A converse ne'er to disunite again.
Tresham. So may it prove !
Mertoun. You, lady, you, sir, take
My humble salutation !
Guendolen and Austin. Thanks !
Tresham. Within there !
[Servants enter. TRESHAM conducts
MERTOUN to the door. Meantime
AUSTIN remarks,
Well,
Here I have an advantage of the Earl,
Confess now ! I'd not think that all was safe
Because my lady's brother stood my friend !
Why, he makes sure of her—“do you say,
yes—
“She'll not say, no,”—what comes it to beside ?

¹ Young hawk.

- I should have prayed the brother, "speak this speech,
 "For Heaven's sake urge this on her—put in this—
 "Forget not, as you'd save me, t'other thing,—
 "Then set down what she says, and how she looks,
 "And if she smiles, and" (in an under breath)
 "Only let her accept me, and do you
 "And all the world refuse me, if you dare!"
Guendolen. That way you'd take, friend Austin? What a shame
 I was your cousin, tamely from the first
 Your bride, and all this fervour's run to waste!
 Do you know you speak sensibly to-day?
 The Earl's a fool.
Austin. Here's Thorold. Tell him so!
Tresham [returning]. Now, voices, voices!
 'St! the lady's first!
 How seems he?—seems he not . . . come, faith give fraud
 The mercy-stroke whenever they engage!
 Down with fraud, up with faith! How seems the Earl?
 A name! a blazon! if you knew their worth,
 As you will never! come—the Earl?
Guendolen. He's young.
Tresham. What's she? an infant save in heart and brain.
 Young! Mildred is fourteen, remark! And you . . .
 Austin, how old is she?
Guendolen. There's tact for you!
 I meant that being young was good excuse
 If one should tax him . . .
Tresham. Well?
Guendolen. —With lacking wit.
Tresham. He lacked wit? Where might he lack wit, so please you?
Guendolen. In standing straighter than the steward's rod
 And making you the tiresomest harangue,
 Instead of slipping over to my side
 And softly whispering in my ear, "Sweet lady,
 "Your cousin there will do me detriment
 "He little dreams of: he's absorbed, I see,
 "In my old name and fame—be sure he'll leave
 "My Mildred, when his best account of me
 "Is ended, in full confidence I wear
 "My grandsire's periwig down either cheek.
 "I'm lost unless your gentleness vouchsafes" . . .
Tresham. . . . "To give a best of best accounts, yourself,
 "Of me and my demerits." You are right!
 He should have said what now I say for him.
 You golden creature, will you help us all?
 Here's Austin means to vouch for much, but you
 —You are . . . what Austin only knows!
 Come up,
 All three of us: she's in the library
 No doubt, for the day's wearing fast. Precede!
Guendolen. Austin, how we must—!
Tresham. Must what? Must speak truth,
 Malignant tongue! Detect one fault in him!
 I challenge you!
Guendolen. Witchcraft's a fault in him,
 For you're bewitched.
Tresham. What's urgent we obtain
 Is, that she soon receive him—say, to-morrow—
 Next day at furthest.
Guendolen. Ne'er instruct me!
Tresham. Come!
 —He's out of your good graces, since forsooth,
 He stood not as he'd carry us by storm
 With his perfections! You're for the composed Manly assured becoming confidence!
 Get her to say, "to-morrow," and I'll give you . . .
 I'll give you black Urganda, to be spoiled
 With petting and snail-paces. Will you?
 Come!
- SCENE III.—MILDRED'S chamber. A painted window overlooks the park.
 MILDRED and GUENDOLEN
Guendolen. Now, Mildred, spare those pains. I have not left
 Our talkers in the library, and climbed

The wearisome ascent to this your bower
In company with you,—I have not dared . . .
Nay, worked such prodigies as sparing you
Lord Mertoun's pedigree before the flood,
Which Thorold seemed in very act to tell —Or bringing Austin to pluck up that most Firm-rooted heresy—your suitor's eyes,
He would maintain, were grey instead of blue—

I think I brought him to contrition !—Well,
I have not done such things, (all to deserve
A minute's quiet cousin's talk with you,)
To be dismissed so coolly.

Mildred. Guendolen !

What have I done ? what could suggest . . .

Guendolen. There, there !

Do I not comprehend you'd be alone
To throw those testimonies in a heap,
Thorold's enlargings, Austin's brevities,
With that poor silly heartless Guendolen's
Ill-timed misplaced attempted smartnesses—
And sift their sense out ? now, I come to spare you

Nearly a whole night's labour. Ask and have !
Demand, be answered ! Lack I ears and eyes ?
Am I perplexed which side of the rock-table
The Conqueror dined on when he landed
first,

Lord Mertoun's ancestor was bidden take—
The bow-hand or the arrow-hand's great
meed ?

Mildred, the Earl has soft blue eyes !

Mildred. My brother—

Did he . . . you said that he received him
well ?

Guendolen. If I said only "well" I said not much.

Oh, stay—which brother ?

Mildred. Thorold ! who—who else ?

Guendolen. Thorold (a secret) is too proud by half,—

Nay, hear me out—with us he's even gentler
Than we are with our birds. Of this great
House

The least retainer that e'er caught his glance
Would die for him, real dying—no mere talk :
And in the world, the court, if men would cite

The perfect spirit of honour, Thorold's name
Rises of its clear nature to their lips.
But he should take men's homage, trust in it,
And care no more about what drew it down.
He has desert, and that, acknowledgment ;
Is he content ?

Mildred. You wrong him, Guendolen.

Guendolen. He's proud, confess ; so proud with brooding o'er

The light of his interminable line,
An ancestry with men all paladins,
And women all . . .

Mildred. Dear Guendolen, 'tis late !
When yonder purple pane the climbing moon
Pierces, I know 'tis midnight.

Guendolen. Well, that Thorold
Should rise up from such musings, and receive
One come audaciously to graft himself
Into this peerless stock, yet find no flaw,
No slightest spot in such an one . . .

Mildred. Who finds
A spot in Mertoun ?

Guendolen. Not your brother ; therefore,
Not the whole world.

Mildred. I am weary, Guendolen.
Bear with me !

Guendolen. I am foolish.

Mildred. Oh no, kind !

But I would rest.

Guendolen. Good night and rest to you !
I said how gracefully his mantle lay
Beneath the rings of his light hair ?

Mildred. Brown hair.

Guendolen. Brown ? why, it is brown : how could you know that ?

Mildred. How ? did not you—Oh, Austin
'twas, declared

His hair was light, not brown—my head !—
and look,

The moon-beam purpling the dark chamber !
Sweet,

Good night !

Guendolen. Forgive me—sleep the soundlier for me !

[Going, she turns suddenly.

Mildred !

Perdition ! all's discovered ! Thorold finds —That the Earl's greatest of all grandmothers

Was grander daughter still—to that fair dame
Whose garter slipped down at the famous dance ! [Goes.

Mildred. Is she—can she be really gone
at last ?

My heart ! I shall not reach the window.
Needs

Must I have sinned much, so to suffer.

[She lifts the small lamp which is suspended before the Virgin's image in the window, and places it by the purple pane.

There !

[She returns to the seat in front.

Mildred and Mertoun ! Mildred, with consent

Of all the world and Thorold, Mertoun's bride !

Too late ! 'Tis sweet to think of, sweeter still

To hope for, that this blessed end soothes up
The curse of the beginning ; but I know
It comes too late : 'twill sweetest be of all
To dream my soul away and die upon.

[A noise without.

The voice ! Oh why, why glided sin the snake

Into the paradise Heaven meant us both ?

[The window opens softly.

A low voice sings.

There's a woman like a dew-drop, she's so purer than the purest ;

And her noble heart's the noblest, yes, and her sure faith's the surest :

And her eyes are dark and humid, like the depth on depth of lustre

Hid i' the harebell, while her tresses, sunnier than the wild-grape cluster,

Gush in golden-tinted plenty down her neck's rose-misted marble :

Then her voice's music . . . call it the well's bubbling the bird's warble !

[A figure wrapped in a mantle appears at the window.

And this woman says, " My days were sunless and my nights were moonless,

" Parched the pleasant April herbage, and the lark's heart's outbreak tuneless,

" If you loved me not ! " And I who—(ah, for words of flame !) adore her,
Who am mad to lay my spirit prostrate palpably before her—

[He enters, approaches her seat, and bends over her.

I may enter at her portal soon, as now her lattice takes me,

And by noontide as by midnight make her mine,
as hers she makes me !

[The Earl throws off his slouches hat and long cloak.

My very heart sings, so I sing, Beloved !

Mildred. Sit, Henry—do not take my hand !

Mertoun. 'Tis mine.

The meeting that appalled us both so much
Is ended.

Mildred. What begins now ?

Mertoun. Happiness

Such as the world contains not.

Mildred. That is it.

Our happiness would, as you say, exceed
The whole world's best of blisses : we—do we Deserve that ? Utter to your soul, what
mine

Long since, Beloved, has grown used to hear,
Like a death-knell, so much regarded once,
And so familiar now ; this will not be !

Mertoun. Oh, Mildred, have I met your brother's face ?

Compelled myself—if not to speak untruth,
Yet to disguise, to shun, to put aside
The truth, as—what had e'er prevailed on me
Save you, to venture ? Have I gained at last
Your brother, the one scarer of your dreams,
And waking thoughts' sole apprehension too ?
Does a new life, like a young sunrise, break
On the strange unrest of our night, confused
With rain and stormy flaw—and will you see
No dripping blossoms, no fire-tinted drops
On each live spray, no vapour steaming up,
And no expressless glory in the Fast ?

When I am by you, to be ever by you,
When I have won you and may worship you,
Oh, Mildred, can you say " this will not be " ?

Mildred. Sin has surprised us, so will punishment.

Mertoun. No—me alone, who sinned alone !

Mildred. The night
You likened our past life to—was it storm
Throughout to you then, Henry ?

Mertoun. Of your life
I spoke—what am I, what my life, to waste
A thought about when you are by me?—you
It was, I said my folly called the storm
And pulled the night upon. 'Twas day with
me—

Perpetual dawn with me.

Mildred. Come what, come will,
You have been happy : take my hand !

Mertoun [after a pause]. How good
Your brother is ! I figured him a cold—
Shall I say, haughty man ?

Mildred. They told me all.
I know all.

Mertoun. It will soon be over.
Mildred. Over ?

Oh, what is over ? what must I live through
And say, "'tis over" ? Is our meeting over ?
Have I received in presence of them all
The partner of my guilty love—with brow
Trying to seem a maiden's brow—with lips
Which make believe that when they strive to form

Replies to you and tremble as they strive,
It is the nearest ever they approached
A stranger's . . . Henry, yours that stranger's
. . . lip—

With cheek that looks a virgin's, and that is . . .

Ah God, some prodigy of thine will stop
This planned piece of deliberate wickedness
In its birth even ! some fierce leprous spot
Will mar the brow's dissimulating ! I Shall murmur no smooth speeches got by
heart,

But, frenzied, pour forth all our woeful story,
The love, the shame, and the despair—with
them

Round me aghast as round some cursed fount
That should spirt water, and spouts blood.

I'll not

. . . Henry, you do not wish that I should draw

VOL. I.

This vengeance down ? I'll not affect a grace
That's gone from me—gone once, and gone
for ever !

Mertoun. Mildred, my honour is your own. I'll share

Disgrace I cannot suffer by myself.
A word informs your brother I retract
This morning's offer ; time will yet bring forth
Some better way of saving both of us

Mildred. I'll meet their faces, Henry !

Mertoun. When ? to-morrow !
Get done with it !

Mildred. Oh, Henry, not to-morrow !
Next day ! I never shall prepare my words
And looks and gestures sooner.—How you must

Despise me !

Mertoun. Mildred, break it if you choose,
A heart the love of you uplifted—still
Uplifts, thro' this protracted agony,
To heaven ! but Mildred, answer me,—first pace

The chamber with me—once again—now, say
Calmly the part, the . . . what it is of me
You see contempt (for you did say contempt)

Contempt for you in ! I would pluck it off
And cast it from me !—but no—no, you'll not Repeat that?—will you, Mildred, repeat that ?

Mildred. Dear Henry !

Mertoun. I was scarce a boy—e'en now
What am I more ? And you were infantine
When first I met you ; why, your hair fell loose

On either side ! My fool's-cheek reddens now
Only in the recalling how it burned
That morn to see the shape of many a dream

You know we boys are prodigal of charms
To her we dream of—I had heard of one,
Had dreamed of her, and I was close to her,
Might speak to her, might live and die her
own,

Who knew ? I spoke. Oh, Mildred, feel you not

That now, while I remember every glance
Of yours, each word of yours, with power to test

And weigh them in the diamond scales of
pride,

Resolved the treasure of a first and last Heart's love shall have been bartered at its worth,

—That now I think upon your purity
And utter ignorance of guilt—your own
Or other's guilt—the girlish undisguised
Delight at a strange novel prize—(I talk
A silly language, but interpret, you !)
If I, with fancy at its full, and reason
Scarce in its germ, enjoined you secrecy,
If you had pity on my passion, pity
On my protested sickness of the soul
To sit beside you, hear you breathe, and watch
Your eyelids and the eyes beneath—if you Accorded gifts and knew not they were gifts—

If I grew mad at last with enterprise
And must behold my beauty in her bower
Or perish—(I was ignorant of even My own desires—what then were you?) if
sorrow—

Sin—if the end came—must I now renounce
My reason, blind myself to light, say truth
Is false and lie to God and my own soul?
Contempt were all of this !

Mildred. Do you believe . . .
Or, Henry, I'll not wrong you—you believe
That I was ignorant. I scarce grieve o'er
The past. We'll love on ; you will love me
still.

Mertoun. Oh, to love less what one has injured ! Dove,
Whose pinion I have rashly hurt, my breast—Shall my heart's warmth not nurse thee into strength?

Flower I have crushed, shall I not care for thee?
Bloom o'er my crest, my fight-mark and device !

Mildred, I love you and you love me.

Mildred. Go !
Be that your last word. I shall sleep to-night.

Mertoun. This is not our last meeting?

Mildred. One night more.

Mertoun. And then—think, then !

Mildred. Then, no
sweet courtship-days,
No dawning consciousness of love for us,
No strange and palpitating births of sense

From words and looks, no innocent fears and hopes,

Reserves and confidences : morning's over !

Mertoun. How else should love's perfected noontide follow?

All the dawn promised shall the day perform

Mildred. So may it be ! but—

You are cautious, Love?
Are sure that unobserved you scaled the walls?

Mertoun. Oh, trust me ! Then our final meeting's fixed

To-morrow night?

Mildred. Farewell ! Stay, Henry
. . . wherefore?

His foot is on the yew-tree bough ; the turf
Receives him : now the moonlight as he runs
Embraces him—but he must go—is gone.

Ah, once again he turns—thanks, thanks, my
Love !

He's gone. Oh, I'll believe him every word !

I was so young, I loved him so, I had

No mother, God forgot me, and I fell.

There may be pardon yet : all's doubt beyond
Surely the bitterness of death is past.

ACT II.

SCENE.—The Library.

Enter LORD TRESHAM, hastily.

Tresham. This way ! In, Gerard, quick !

[As GERARD enters, TRESHAM secures the door.

Now speak ! or, wait—

I'll bid you speak directly. [Seats himself.

Now repeat

Firmly and circumstantially the tale

You just now told me ; it eludes me ; either

I did not listen, or the half is gone

Away from me. How long have you lived
here?

Here in my house, your father kept our woods
Before you?

Gerard. —As his father did, my lord.

I have been eating, sixty years almost,

Your bread.

Tresham. Yes, yes. You ever were of all

The servants in my father's house, I know,
The trusted one. You'll speak the truth.

Gerard. I'll speak
God's truth. Night after night . . .

Tresham. Since when?

Gerard. At least

A month—each midnight has some man access
To Lady Mildred's chamber.

Tresham. Tush, "access"—
No wide words like "access" to me!

Gerard. He runs
Along the woodside, crosses to the South,
Takes the left tree that ends the avenue . . .

Tresham. The last great yew-tree?

Gerard. You might stand upon
The main boughs like a platform. Then
he . . .

Tresham. Quick!

Gerard. Climbs up, and, where they lessen at the top,

—I cannot see distinctly, but he throws,
I think—for this I do not vouch—a line
That reaches to the lady's casement—

Tresham. —Which
He enters not! Gerard, some wretched fool
Dares pry into my sister's privacy!

When such are young, it seems a precious thing
To have approached,—to merely have approached,

Got sight of, the abode of her they set Their frantic thoughts upon. He does not enter?

Gerard?

Gerard. There is a lamp that's full i' the midst,

Under a red square in the painted glass
Of Lady Mildred's . . .

Tresham. Leave that name out! Well?
That lamp?

Gerard. —Is moved at midnight higher up
To one pane—a small dark-blue pane; he waits
For that among the boughs: at sight of that,
I see him, plain as I see you, my lord,
Open the lady's casement, enter there . . .

Tresham. —And stay?

Gerard. An hour, two hours.

Tresham. And this you saw
Once?—twice?—quick!

Gerard. Twenty times.

Tresham. And what brings you
Under the yew-trees?

Gerard. The first night I left
My range so far, to track the stranger stag

That broke the pale, I saw the man.

Tresham. Yet sent
No cross-bow shaft through the marauder?

Gerard. But
He came, my lord, the first time he was seen,
In a great moonlight, light as any day,

From Lady Mildred's chamber.

Tresham [after a pause]. You have no cause

—Who could have cause to do my sister
wrong?

Gerard. Oh, my lord, only once—let me
this once

Speak what is on my mind! Since first I noted

All this, I've groaned as if a fiery net
Plucked me this way and that—fire if I turned
To her, fire if I turned to you, and fire
If down I flung myself and strove to die.

The lady could not have been seven years old

When I was trusted to conduct her safe
Through the deer-herd to stroke the snow-white fawn

I brought to eat bread from her tiny hand
Within a month. She ever had a smile
To greet me with—she . . . if it could undo
What's done, to lop each limb from off this trunk . . .

All that is foolish talk, not fit for you—
I mean, I could not speak and bring her hurt For Heaven's compelling. But when I was fixed

To hold my peace, each morsel of your food
Eaten beneath your roof, my birth-place
too,

Choked me. I wish I had grown mad in doubts

What it behoved me do. This morn it seemed

Either I must confess to you, or die:

Now it is done, I seem the vilest worm
That crawls, to have betrayed my lady.

- Tresham.* No— Until thought settle and I see my course.
 No, Gerard ! Avert, oh God, only this woe from me !
Gerard. Let me go ! [As he sinks his head between his arms on the table, GUENDOLEN'S voice is heard at the door.]
Tresham. A man, you say : Lord Tresham ! [She knocks.] Is Lord
 What man ? Young ? Not a vulgar hind ? Tresham there ?
 What dress ? [TRESHAM, hastily turning, pulls down the first book above him and opens it.]
Gerard. A slouched hat and a large dark foreign cloak Wraps his whole form ; even his face is hid ;
 But I should judge him young : no hind, be sure !
Tresham. Why ?
Gerard. He is ever armed : his sword projects
 Beneath the cloak.
Tresham. Gerard,—I will not say
 No word, no breath of this !
Gerard. Thanks, thanks, my lord !
[Goes.]
Tresham [paces the room. After a pause]. "The Earl"—whose worth did I asseverate
 Oh, thought's absurd !—as with some monstrous fact Till I am very fain to hope that . . . Thorold, Which, when ill thoughts beset us, seems to give What is all this ? You are not well !
 Merciful God that made the sun and stars, Tresham. Who, I ?
 The waters and the green delights of earth, You laugh at me.
 The lie ! I apprehend the monstrous fact — Guendolen. Has what I'm fain to hope,
 Yet know the maker of all worlds is good, Arrived then ? Does that huge tome show
 And yield my reason up, inadequate some blot
 To reconcile what yet I do behold— In the Earl's 'scutcheon come no longer back Blasting my sense ! There's cheerful day Than Arthur's time ? outside : Tresham. When left you Mildred's
 This is my library, and this the chair chamber ?
 My father used to sit in carelessly Guendolen. Oh, late enough, I told you !
 After his soldier-fashion, while I stood The main thing
 Between his knees to question him : and here To ask is, how I left her chamber,—sure,
 Gerard our grey retainer,—as he says, Content yourself, she'll grant this paragon
 Fed with our food, from sire to son, an age,— Of Earls no such ungracious . . .
 Has told a story—I am to believe !
 That Mildred . . . oh, no, no ! both tales Tresham. Send her here !
 are true, Guendolen. Thorold ?
 Her pure cheek's story and the forester's ! Tresham. I mean—acquaint Would she, or could she, err—much less, her, Guendolen, confound —But mildly !
 All guilts of treachery, of craft, of . . . Guendolen. Mildly ?
 Heaven Tresham. Ah, you guessed aright !
 Keep me within its hand !—I will sit here I am not well : there is no hiding it.
 But tell her I would see her at her leisure—
 That is, at once ! here in the library !
 The passage in that old Italian book
 We hunted for so long is found, say, found—

And if I let it slip again . . . you see,
That she must come—and instantly!

Guendolen. I'll die
Piecemeal, record that, if there have not gloomed
Some blot i' the 'scutcheon!

Tresham. Go! or, Guendolen,
Be you at call,—with Austin, if you choose,—
In the adjoining gallery! There, go!

[GUENDOLEN goes.]

Another lesson to me! You might bid
A child disguise his heart's sore, and conduct
Some sly investigation point by point
With a smooth brow, as well as bid me catch
The inquisitorial cleverness some praise.
If you had told me yesterday, "There's one "You needs must circumvent and practise
with,

"Entrap by policies, if you would worm
"The truth out: and that one is—Mildred!"

There,
There—reasoning is thrown away on it!
Prove she's unchaste . . . why, you may after prove
That she's a poisoner, traitress, what you will!
Where I can comprehend nought, nought's
to say.

Or do, or think. Force on me but the first Abomination,—then outpour all plagues,
And I shall ne'er make count of them.

Enter MILDRED.

Mildred. What book
Is it I wanted, Thorold? Guendolen
Thought you were pale; you are not pale.

That book?
That's Latin surely.

Tresham. Mildred, here's a line,
(Don't lean on me: I'll English it for you)
"Love conquers all things." What love conquers them?

What love should you esteem—best love?

Mildred. True love.

Tresham. I mean, and should have said, whose love is best

Of all that love or that profess to love?

Mildred. The list's so long: there's father's, mother's, husband's . . .

Tresham. Mildred, I do believe a brother's
love

For a sole sister must exceed them all.
For see now, only see! there's no alloy
Of earth that creeps into the perfect'st gold
Of other loves—no gratitude to claim;
You never gave her life, not even aught
That keeps life—never tended her, instructed,
Enriched her—so, your love can claim no right
O'er her save pure love's claim: that's what
I call

Freedom from earthliness. You'll never hope
To be such friends, for instance, she and you,
As when you hunted cowslips in the woods
Or played together in the meadow hay.

Oh yes—with age, respect comes, and your worth

Is felt, there's growing sympathy of tastes,
There's ripened friendship, there's confirmed esteem:

—Much head these make against the newcomer!

The startling apparition, the strange youth—
Whom one half-hour's conversing with, or,
say,

Mere gazing at, shall change (beyond all
change

This Ovid ever sang about) your soul
. . . Her soul, that is,—the sister's soul!
With her

'Twas winter yesterday; now, all is warmth,
The green leaf's springing and the turtle's
voice,

"Arise and come away!" Come whither?
—far

Enough from the esteem, respect, and all
The brother's somewhat insignificant
Array of rights! All which he knows before,
Has calculated on so long ago!

I think such love, (apart from yours and
mine,)

Contented with its little term of life,
Intending to retire betimes, aware
How soon the background must be place
for it,

—I think, am sure, a brother's love exceeds
All the world's love in its unworldliness.

Mildred. What is this for?

Tresham. This, Mildred, is it for !
Or, no, I cannot go to it so soon !

That's one of many points my haste left out—
Each day, each hour throws forth its silk-slight film

Between the being tied to you by birth,
And you, until those slender threads compose
A web that shrouds her daily life of hopes
And fears and fancies, all her life, from yours :
So close you live and yet so far apart !

And must I rend this web, tear up, break
down

The sweet and palpitating mystery
That makes hersacred? You—for you I mean,
Shall I speak, shall I not speak?

Mildred. Speak !

Tresham. I will.
Is there a story men could—any man Could tell of you, you would conceal from
me?

I'll never think there's falsehood on that lip.
Say "There is no such story men could tell,"
And I'll believe you, though I disbelieve
The world—the world of better men than I,
And women such as I suppose you. Speak !
[After a pause.] Not speak? Explain then !

Clear it up then ! Move

Some of the miserable weight away
That presses lower than the grave ! Not speak?
Some of the dead weight, Mildred ! Ah, if I Could bring myself to plainly make their charge

Against you ! Must I, Mildred? Silent still?
[After a pause.] Is there a gallant that has night by night

Admittance to your chamber?

[After a pause.] Then, his name !
Till now, I only had a thought for you :
But now,—his name !

Mildred. Thorold, do you devise
Fit expiation for my guilt, if fit
There be ! 'Tis nought to say that I'll endure

And bless you,—that my spirit yearns to purge

Her stains off in the fierce renewing fire :

But do not plunge me into other guilt !

Oh, guilt enough ! I cannot tell his name.

Tresham. Then judge yourself ! How should I act? Pronounce !

Mildred. Oh, Thorold, you must never tempt me thus !

To die here in this chamber by that sword
Would seem like punishment : so should I glide,

Like an arch-cheat, into extremest bliss !

'Twere easily arranged for me : but you—
What would become of you?

Tresham. And what will now Become of me? I'll hide your shame and
mine

From every eye ; the dead must heave their hearts

Under the marble of our chapel-floor ;

They cannot rise and blast you. You may
wed

Your paramour above our mother's tomb ;
Our mother cannot move from 'neath your foot.

We too will somehow wear this one day out :
But with to-morrow hastens here—the Earl !
The youth without suspicion face can come
From Heaven, and heart from . . . whence proceed such hearts?

I have despatched last night at your command

A missive bidding him present himself
To-morrow—here—thus much is said ; the
rest

Is understood as if 'twere written down—

"His suit finds favour in your eyes." Now dictate

This morning's letter that shall countermand
Last night's—do dictate that !

Mildred. But, Thorold—
if I will receive him as I said?

Tresham. The Earl?

Mildred. I will receive him.

Tresham [starting up]. Ho there !
Guendolen !

GUENDOLEN and AUSTIN enter.

And, Austin, you are welcome, too ! Look
there !

The woman there !

Austin and Guendolen. How? Mildred!

Tresham. Mildred once !
 Now the receiver night by night, when sleep
 Blesses the inmates of her father's house,
 —I say, the soft sly wanton that receives
 Her guilt's accomplice 'neath this roof which holds
 You, Guendolen, you, Austin, and has held
 A thousand Treshams—never one like her !
 No lighter of the signal-lamp her quick
 Foul breath near quenches in hot eagerness
 To mix with breath as foul ! no loosener
 O' the lattice, practised in the stealthy tread,
 The low voice and the noiseless come-and-go !
 Not one composer of the bacchant's mien
 Into—what you thought Mildred's, in a word !
 Know her !

Guendolen. Oh, Mildred, look to me, at least !
 Thorold—she's dead, I'd say, but that she stands
 Rigid as stone and whiter !

Tresham. You have heard . . .
Guendolen. Too much ! You must proceed no further.

Mildred. Yes—
 Proceed ! All's truth. Go from me !

Tresham. All is truth,
 She tells you ! Well, you know, or ought to
 know,
 All this I would forgive in her. I'd con
 Each precept the harsh world enjoins, I'd take
 Our ancestors' stern verdicts one by one,
 I'd bind myself before them to exact
 The prescribed vengeance—and one word of hers,

The sight of her, the bare least memory
 Of Mildred, my one sister, my heart's pride
 Above all prides, my all in all so long,
 Would scatter every trace of my resolve.
 What were it silently to waste away
 And see her waste away from this day forth,
 Two scathed things with leisure to repent,
 And grow acquainted with the grave, and die
 Tired out if not at peace, and be forgotten ?
 It were not so impossible to bear.
 But this—that, fresh from last night's pledge renewed
 Of love with the successful gallant there,

She calmly bids me help her to entice,
 Inveigle an unconscious trusting youth
 Who thinks her all that's chaste and good and pure,
 —Invites me to betray him . . . who so fit
 As honour's self to cover shame's arch-deed ?
 —That she'll receive Lord Mertoun—(her own phrase)—

This, who could bear ? Why, you have heard of thieves,
 Stabbers, the earth's disgrace, who yet have laughed,

"Talk not to me of torture—I'll betray
 "No comrade I've pledged faith to!"—you have heard

Of wretched women—all but Mildreds—tied
 By wild illicit ties to losels vile You'd tempt them to forsake ; and they'll reply

"Gold, friends, repute, I left for him, I find
 "In him, why should I leave him then for gold,

"Repute or friends?"—and you have felt your heart

Respond to such poor outcasts of the world
 As to so many friends ; bad as you please,
 You've felt they were God's men and women
 still,

So, not to be disowned by you. But she
 That stands there, calmly gives her lover up
 As means to wed the Earl that she may hide
 Their intercourse the surelier : and, for this,
 I curse her to her face before you all.

Shame hunt her from the earth ! Then Heaven do right

To both ! It hears me now—shall judge her then ! [As MILDRED faints and falls,
TRESHAM rushes out.

Austin. Stay, Tresham, we'll accompany
 you !

Guendolen. We ?
 What, and leave Mildred ? We ? Why, where's my place

But by her side, and where yours but by mine ?
 Mildred—one word ! Only look at me, then !

Austin. No, Guendolen ! I echo Thorold's
 voice.

She is unworthy to behold . . .

Guendolen.

If you spoke on reflection, and if I Approved your speech—if you (to put the
thing
At lowest) you the soldier, bound to make The king's cause yours and fight for it, and throw

Regard to others of its right or wrong,
—If with a death-white woman you can help,
Let alone sister, let alone a Mildred,
You left her—or if I, her cousin, friend
This morning, playfellow but yesterday,
Who said, or thought at least a thousand
times,

“I'd serve you if I could,” should now face
round

And say, “Ah, that's to only signify “I'd serve you while you're fit to serve yourself:

“So long as fifty eyes await the turn

“Of yours to forestall its yet half-formed wish,

“I'll proffer my assistance you'll not need—

“When every tongue is praising you, I'll join

“The praisers' chorus—when you're hemmed
about

“With lives between you and detraction—
lives

“To be laid down if a rude voice, rash eye,

“Rough hand should violate the sacred ring

“Their worship throws about you,—then
indeed,

“Who'll stand up for you stout as I?” If so

We said, and so we did,—not Mildred there

Would be unworthy to behold us both,

But we should be unworthy, both of us,

To be beheld by—by—your meanest dog,

Which, if that sword were broken in your face

Before a crowd, that badge torn off your breast,

And you cast out with hooting and contempt,

—Would push his way thro' all the hooters,
gain

Your side, go off with you and all your shame

To the next ditch you choose to die in!

Austin,

Do you love me? Here's Austin, Mildred,

—here's

Your brother says he does not believe half—

Us two? No, nor half that—of all he heard! He says,
Look up and take his hand!

Austin. Look up and take
My hand, dear Mildred!

Mildred. I—I was so young!
Beside, I loved him, Thorold—and I had No mother; God forgot me: so, I fell.

Guendolen. Mildred!
Mildred. Require no further!

Did I dream
That I could palliate what is done? All's true.
Now, punish me! A woman takes my hand?
Let go my hand! You do not know, I see.
I thought that Thorold told you.

Guendolen. What is this?

Where start you to?
Mildred. Oh, Austin, loosen me!

You heard the whole of it—your eyes were
worse,

In their surprise, than Thorold's! Oh, unless

You stay to execute his sentence, loose

My hand! Has Thorold gone, and are you
here?

Guendolen. Here, Mildred, we two friends of yours will wait

Your bidding; be you silent, sleep or muse!

Only, when you shall want your bidding done,

How can we do it if we are not by?

Here's Austin waiting patiently your will!

One spirit to command, and one to love

And to believe in it and do its best,

Poor as that is, to help it—why, the world

Has been won many a time, its length and breadth,

By just such a beginning!

Mildred. I believe
If once I threw my arms about your neck
And sunk my head upon your breast, that I Should weep again.

Guendolen. Let go her hand now,
Austin!

Wait for me. Pace the gallery and think
On the world's seemings and realities,
Until I call you. [AUSTIN goes.

Mildred. No—I cannot weep.
No more tears from this brain—no sleep—no
tears!

O Guendolen, I love you!

Guendolen. Yes: and "love"
Is a short word that says so very much!
It says that you confide in me.

Mildred. Confide!

Guendolen. Your lover's name, then! I've so much to learn,
Ere I can work in your behalf!

Mildred. My friend,
You know I cannot tell his name.

Guendolen. At least
He is your lover? and you love him too?

Mildred. Ah, do you ask me that?—but I am fallen
So low!

Guendolen. You love him still, then?
Mildred. My sole prop

Against the guilt that crushes me! I say,
Each night ere I lie down, "I was so young—
"I had no mother, and I loved him so!"
And then God seems indulgent, and I dare
Trust him my soul in sleep.

Guendolen. How could you let us
E'en talk to you about Lord Mertoun then?

Mildred. There is a cloud around me.

Guendolen. But you said
You would receive his suit in spite of this?

Mildred. I say there is a cloud . . .

Guendolen. No cloud to me!
Lord Mertoun and your lover are the same!

Mildred. What maddest fancy . . .

Guendolen [calling aloud]. Austin!
(spare your pains—

When I have got a truth, that truth I keep)— Mildred. By all you love, sweet Guen-dolen, forbear!

Have I confided in you . . .

Guendolen. Just for this!
Austin!—Oh, not to guess it at the first!

But I did guess it—that is, I divined,
Felt by an instinct how it was: why else
Should I pronounce you free from all that heap

Of sins which had been irredeemable?
I felt they were not yours—what other way Than this, not yours? The secret's wholly
mine!

Mildred. If you would see me die before his face . . .

Guendolen. I'd hold my peace! And it the Earl returns
To-night?

Mildred. Ah Heaven, he's lost!

Guendolen. I thought so. Austin!

Enter AUSTIN.

Oh, where have you been hiding?

Austin. Thorold's gone,
I know not how, across the meadow-land.

I watched him till I lost him in the skirts
O' the beech-wood.

Guendolen. Gone? All thwarts us.

Mildred. Thorold too?

Guendolen. I have thought. First lead this Mildred to her room.

Go on the other side; and then we'll seek
Your brother: and I'll tell you, by the way,
The greatest comfort in the world. You said
There was a clue to all. Remember, Sweet,
He said there was a clue! I hold it. Come!

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The end of the Yew-tree Avenue under MILDRED'S window. A light seen through a central red pane.

Enter TRESHAM through the trees.

Again here! But I cannot lose myself.
The heath—the orchard—I have traversed glades

And dells and bosky paths which used to lead
Into green wild-wood depths, bewildering
My boy's adventurous step. And now they tend

Hither or soon or late; the blackest shade Breaks up, the thronged trunks of the trees
ope wide,

And the dim turret I have fled from, fronts
Again my step; the very river put
Its arm about me and conducted me
To this detested spot. Why then, I'll shun
Their will no longer: do your will with me!
Oh, bitter! To have reared a towering scheme
Of happiness, and to behold it ~~ruined~~.

Were nothing : all men hope, and see their hopes
 Frustrate, and grieve awhile, and hope anew.
 But I . . . to hope that from a line like ours
 No horrid prodigy like this would spring,
 Were just as though I hoped that from these old
 Confederates against the sovereign day,
 Children of older and yet older sires,
 Whose living coral berries dropped, as now
 On me, on many a baron's surcoat once,
 On many a beauty's whimple—would proceed
 No poison-tree, to thrust, from hell its root,
 Hither and thither its strange snaky arms.
 Why came I here? What must I do? [A bell strikes.] A bell?
 Midnight! and 'tis at midnight . . . Ah, I catch —Woods, river, plains, I catch your meaning now,
 And I obey you! Hist! This tree will serve.
 [He retires behind one of the trees.
After a pause, enter MERTOUN cloaked as before.
 Mertoun. Not time! Beat out thy last voluptuous beat
 Of hope and fear, my heart! I thought the clock
 I' the chapel struck as I was pushing through
 The ferns. And so I shall no more see rise
 My love-star! Oh, no matter for the past!
 So much the more delicious task to watch
 Mildred revive: to pluck out, thorn by thorn,
 All traces of the rough forbidden path
 My rash love lured her to! Each day must see
 Some fear of hers effaced, some hope renewed:
 Then there will be surprises, unforeseen
 Delights in store. I'll not regret the past.
 [The light is placed above in the purple pane.
 And see; my signal rises, Mildred's star!
 I never saw it lovelier than now
 It rises for the last time. If it sets,
 'Tis that the re-assuring sun may dawn.
 [As he prepares to ascend the last tree of the avenue, TRESHAM arrests his arm.
 Unhand me—peasant, by your grasp! Here's gold.
 'Twas a mad freak of mine. I said I'd pluck

A branch from the white-blossomed shrub beneath
 The casement there. Take this, and hold your peace.
 Tresham. Into the moonlight yonder, come with me!
 Out of the shadow!
 Mertoun. I am armed, fool!
 Tresham. Yes,
 Or no? You'll come into the light, or no?
 My hand is on your throat—refuse!—
 Mertoun. That voice!
 Where have I heard . . . no—that was mild and slow.
 I'll come with you. [They advance.
 Tresham. You're armed: that's well.
 Declare
 Your name: who are you?
 Mertoun. (Tresham!—she is lost!)
 Tresham. Oh, silent? Do you know, you bear yourself Exactly as, in curious dreams I've had
 How felons, this wild earth is full of, look
 When they're detected, still your kind has looked!
 The bravo holds an assured countenance,
 The thief is voluble and plausible,
 But silently the slave of lust has crouched
 When I have fancied it before a man.
 Your name!
 Mertoun. I do conjure Lord Tresham—ay,
 Kissing his foot, if so I might prevail—
 That he for his own sake forbear to ask
 My name! As heaven's above, his future weal
 Or woe depends upon my silence! Vain!
 I read your white inexorable face.
 Know me, Lord Tresham!
 [He throws off his disguises.
 Tresham. Mertoun!
 [After a pause.] Draw now!
 Mertoun. Hear me
 But speak first!
 Tresham. Not one least word on your life!
 Be sure that I will strangle in your throat
 The least word that informs me how you live
 And yet seem what you seem! No doubt
 'twas you

Taught Mildred still to keep that face and sin.
We should join hands in frantic sympathy
If you once taught me the unteachable,
Explained how you can live so, and so lie.
With God's help I retain, despite my sense,
The old belief—a life like yours is still Impossible. Now draw!

Mertoun. Not for my sake,
Do I entreat a hearing—for your sake,
And most, for her sake!

Tresham. Ha ha, what should I Know of your ways? A miscreant like your-
self,

How must one rouse his ire? A blow?
that's pride
No doubt, to him! One spurns him, does one not?

Or sets the foot upon his mouth, or spits Into his face! Come! Which, or all of these?

Mertoun. 'Twixt him and me and Mildred,
Heaven be judge!

Can I avoid this? Have your will, my lord!
[He draws and, after a few passes, falls.]

Tresham. You are not hurt?

Mertoun. You'll hear me now!

Tresham. But rise!

Mertoun. Ah, Tresham, say I not "you'll hear me now!"

And what procures a man the right to speak
In his defence before his fellow man,
But—I suppose—the thought that presently
He may have leave to speak before his God
His whole defence?

Tresham. Not hurt? It cannot be!
You made no effort to resist me. Where Did my sword reach you? Why not have returned

My thrusts? Hurt where?

Mertoun. My lord—

Tresham. How young he is!

Mertoun. Lord Tresham, I am very young, and yet

I have entangled other lives with mine.
Do let me speak, and do believe my speech!
That when I die before you presently,— Tresham. Can you stay here till I return with help?

Mertoun. Oh, stay by me! When I was less than boy

I did you grievous wrong and knew it not—
Upon my honour, knew it not! Once known,
I could not find what seemed a better way
To right you than I took: my life—you feel
How less than nothing were the giving you
The life you've taken! But I thought my
way

The better—only for your sake and hers:
And as you have decided otherwise,
Would I had an infinity of lives
To offer you! Now say—instruct me—think!
Can you, from the brief minutes I have left,
Eke out my reparation? Oh think—think!
For I must wring a partial—dare I say,
Forgiveness from you, ere I die?

Tresham. I do
Forgive you.

Mertoun. Wait and ponder that great word!
Because, if you forgive me, I shall hope
To speak to you of—Mildred!

Tresham. Mertoun, haste
And anger have undone us. 'Tis not you Should tell me for a novelty you're young,
Thoughtless, unable to recall the past.

Be but your pardon ample as my own!

Mertoun. Ah, Tresham, that a sword-stroke and a drop

Of blood or two, should bring all this about!
Why, 'twas my very fear of you, my love
Of you—(what passion like a boy's for one Like you?)—that ruined me! I dreamed of
you—

You, all accomplished, courted everywhere,
The scholar and the gentleman. I burned
To knit myself to you: but I was young,
And your surpassing reputation kept me
So far aloof! Oh, wherefore all that love?
With less of love, my glorious yesterday
Of praise and gentlest words and kindest
looks,

Had taken place perchance six months ago.
Even now, how happy we had been! And
yet

I know the thought of this escaped you,
Tresham!

Let me look up into your face; I feel

'Tis changed above me: yet my eyes are glazed.

Where? where?

[As he endeavours to raise himself, his eye catches the lamp.]

Ah, Mildred! What will

Mildred do?

Tresham, her life is bound up in the life
That's bleeding fast away! I'll live—must live,

There, if you'll only turn me I shall live
And save her! Tresham—oh, had you but heard!

Had you but heard! What right was yours to set

The thoughtless foot upon her life and mine,

And then say, as we perish, "Had I thought,
"All had gone otherwise"? We've sinned and die:

Never you sin, Lord Tresham! for you'll die,
And God will judge you.

Tresham. Yes, be satisfied!

That process is begun.

Mertoun. And she sits there

Waiting for me! Now, say you this to her—
You, not another—say, I saw him die

As he breathed this, "I love her"—you don't know

What those three small words mean! Say, loving her

Lowers me down the bloody slope to death
With memories . . . I speak to her, not you,

Who had no pity, will have no remorse,
Perchance intend her . . . Die along with me,

Dear Mildred! 'tis so easy, and you'll 'scape
So much unkindness! Can I lie at rest,

With rude speech spoken to you, ruder deeds
Done to you?—heartless men shall have my heart,

And I tied down with grave-clothes and the worm,

Aware, perhaps, of every blow—oh God!—
Upon those lips—yet of no power to tear

The felon stripe by stripe! Die, Mildred!

Leave

Their honourable world to them! For God
We're good enough, though the world casts us out. [A whistle is heard.]

Tresham. Ho, Gerard!

Enter GERARD, AUSTIN and GUENDOLEN, with lights.

No one speak!

You see what's done.

I cannot bear another voice.

Mertoun.

There's light—

Light all about me, and I move to it.

Tresham, did I not tell you—did you not

Just promise to deliver words of mine

To Mildred?

Tresham. I will bear those words to her.

Mertoun. Now?

Tresham. Now. Lift you the body, and leave me

The head.

[As they have half raised MERTOUN, he turns suddenly.]

Mertoun. I knew they turned me: turn me not from her!

There! stay you! there!

[Dies.]

Guendolen [after a pause]. Austin, remain you here

With Thorold until Gerard comes with help:
Then lead him to his chamber. I must go

To Mildred.

Tresham. Guendolen, I hear each word

You utter. Did you hear him bid me give His message? Did you hear my promise? I,

And only I, see Mildred.

Guendolen.

She will die.

Tresham. Oh no, she will not die! I dare not hope

She'll die. What ground have you to think she'll die?

Why, Austin's with you!

Austin.

Had we but arrived

Before you fought!

Tresham.

There was no fight at all.

He let me slaughter him—the boy! I'll trust

The body there to you and Gerard—thus!

Now bear him on before me.

Austin,

Whither bear him?

Tresham. Oh, to my chamber! When we meet there next,
We shall be friends.

[They bear out the body of MERTOUN.]

Will she die, Guendolen?

Guendolen. Where are you taking me?

Tresham. He fell just here.

Now answer me. Shall you in your whole life

—You who have nought to do with Mertoun's fate,

Now you have seen his breast upon the turf,
Shall you e'er walk this way if you can help?
When you and Austin wander arm-in-arm
Through our ancestral grounds, will not a shade

Be ever on the meadow and the waste—
Another kind of shade than when the night
Shuts the woodside with all its whispers up?
But will you ever so forget his breast
As carelessly to cross this bloody turf
Under the black yew avenue? That's well!
You turn your head: and I then?—

Guendolen. What is done
Is done. My care is for the living. Thorold,
Bear up against this burden: more remains
To set the neck to!

Tresham. Dear and ancient trees
My fathers planted, and I loved so well!
What have I done that, like some fabled crime
Of yore, lets loose a Fury leading thus
Her miserable dance amidst you all?
Oh, never more for me shall winds intone
With all your tops a vast antiphony,
Demanding and responding in God's praise!
Hers ye are now, not mine! Farewell—
farewell!

SCENE II.—MILDRED'S chamber.

MILDRED alone.

He comes not! I have heard of those who seemed

Resourceless in prosperity,—you thought
Sorrow might slay them when she listed; yet
Did they so gather up their diffused strength
At her first menace, that they bade her strike,

And stood and laughed her subtlest skill to scorn.

Oh, 'tis not so with me! The first woe fell,
And the rest fall upon it, not on me:

Else should I bear that Henry comes not?— fails

Just this first night out of so many nights?
Loving is done with. Were he sitting now,
As so few hours since, on that seat, we'd love
No more—contrive no thousand happy ways
To hide love from the loveless, any more.

I think I might have urged some little point
In my defence, to Thorold; he was breathless
For the least hint of a defence: but no,
The first shame over, all that would might fall.
No Henry! Yet I merely sit and think
The morn's deed o'er and o'er. I must have crept

Out of myself. A Mildred that has lost
Her lover—oh, I dare not look upon Such woe! I crouch away from it! 'Tis she, Mildred, will break her heart, not I! The
world

Forsakes me: only Henry's left me—left?
When I have lost him, for he does not come,
And I sit stupidly . . . Oh Heaven, break up
This worse than anguish, this mad apathy,
By any means or any messenger!

Tresham [without]. Mildred!

Mildred. Come in!

Heaven hears me!

[Enter TRESHAM.] You? alone?

Oh, no more cursing!

Tresham. Mildred, I must sit.

There—you sit!

Mildred. Say it, Thorold—do not look
The curse! deliver all you come to say!
What must become of me? Oh, speak that thought

Which makes your brow and cheeks so pale!

Tresham. My thought?

Mildred. All of it!

Tresham. How we waded—years ago—
After those water-lilies, till the plash,
I know not how, surprised us; and you dared
Neither advance nor turn back: so, we stood Laughing and crying until Gerard came—
Once safe upon the turf, the loudest too,

For once more reaching the relinquished prize!
How idle thoughts are, some men's, dying men's!

Mildred,—

Mildred. You call me kindlier by my name
Than even yesterday: what is in that?

Tresham. It weighs so much upon my mind that I

This morning took an office not my own!
I might . . . of course, I must be glad or grieved,

Content or not, at every little thing
That touches you. I may with a wrung
heart

Even reprove you, Mildred; I did more:
Will you forgive me?

Mildred. Thorold? do you mock?
Or no . . . and yet you bid me . . . say that word!

Tresham. Forgive me, Mildred!—are you silent, Sweet?

Mildred [starting up]. Why does not
Henry Mertoun come to-night?
Are you, too, silent?

[Dashing his mantle aside, and pointing to his scabbard, which is empty.]

Ah, this speaks for you!
You've murdered Henry Mertoun! Now proceed!

What is it I must pardon? This and all?
Well, I do pardon you—I think I do.

Thorold, how very wretched you must be!

Tresham. He bade me tell you . . .

Mildred. What I do forbid
Your utterance of! So much that you may tell

And will not—how you murdered him . . .
but, no!

You'll tell me that he loved me, never more
Than bleeding out his life there: must I say
"Indeed," to that? Enough! I pardon you.

Tresham. You cannot, Mildred! for the harsh words, yes:

Of this last deed Another's judge: whose doom

I wait in doubt, despondency and fear.

Mildred. Oh, true! There's thought for me to pardon! True!

You loose my soul of all its cares at once.
Death makes me sure of him for ever! You Tell me his last words? He shall tell me
them,

And take my answer—not in words, but reading

Himself the heart I had to read him late,
Which death . . .

Tresham. Death? You are dying too? Well said

Of Guendolen! I dared not hope you'd die:
But she was sure of it.

Mildred. Tell Guendolen
I loved her, and tell Austin . . .

Tresham. Him you loved:
And me?

Mildred. Ah, Thorold! Was't not rashly
done

To quench that blood, on fire with youth and hope

And love of me—whom you loved too, and
yet

Suffered to sit here waiting his approach
While you were slaying him? Oh, doubtlessly
You let him speak his poor confused boy's-
speech

—Do his poor utmost to disarm your wrath
And respite me!—you let him try to give
The story of our love and ignorance,
And the brief madness and the long despair—
You let him plead all this, because your code

Of honour bids you hear before you strike:
But at the end, as he looked up for life
Into your eyes—you struck him down!

Tresham. No! No!
Had I but heard him—had I let him speak Half the truth—less—had I looked long on
him

I had desisted! Why, as he lay there,
The moon on his flushed cheek, I gathered all
The story ere he told it: I saw through

The troubled surface of his crime and yours
A depth of purity immovable,

Had I but glanced, where all seemed turbidest
Had gleamed some inlet to the calm beneath;

I would not glance: my punishment's at
hand.

There, Mildred, is the truth ! and you—say
on—

You curse me?

Mildred. As I dare approach that Heaven
Which has not bade a living thing despair,
Which needs no code to keep its grace from
stain,

But bids the vilest worm that turns on it
Desist and be forgiven,—I—forgive not,
But bless you, Thorold, from my soul of souls !

[Falls on his neck.]

There ! Do not think too much upon the past !
The cloud that's broke was all the same a cloud
While it stood up between my friend and you ;
You hurt him 'neath its shadow : but is that
So past retrieve ? I have his heart, you know ;
I may dispose of it : I give it you !
It loves you as mine loves ! Confirm me,

Henry ! [Dies.]

Tresham. I wish thee joy, Beloved ! I am glad

In thy full gladness !

Guendolen [without]. Mildred ! Tresham !

[Entering with AUSTIN.] Thorold,
I could desist no longer. Ah, she swoons !
That's well.

Tresham. Oh, better far than that !

Guendolen. She's dead !
Let me unlock her arms !

Tresham. She threw them thus
About my neck, and blessed me, and then died :

You'll let them stay now, Guendolen !

Austin. Leave her
And look to him ! What ails you, Thorold ?

Guendolen. White
As she, and whiter ! Austin ! quick—this side !

Austin. A froth is oozing through his clenched teeth ;

Both lips, where they're not bitten through,
are black :

Speak, dearest Thorold !

Tresham. Something does weigh down
My neck beside her weight : thanks : I should fall

But for you, Austin, I believe !—there, there,
'Twill pass away soon !—ah,—I had forgotten :

I am dying.

Guendolen. Thorold—Thorold—why was
this ?

Tresham. I said, just as I drank the poison
off,

The earth would be no longer earth to me,
The life out of all life was gone from me.
There are blind ways provided, the foredone
Heart-weary player in this pageant-world
Drops out by, letting the main masque defile
By the conspicuous portal : I am through—Just through !

Guendolen. Don't leave him, Austin !
Death is close.

Tresham. Already Mildred's face is peacefuller.

I see you, Austin—feel you : here's my hand,
Put yours in it—you, Guendolen, yours too !
You're lord and lady now—you're Treshams ;
name

And fame are yours : you hold our 'scutcheon
up.

Austin, no blot on it ! You see how blood Must wash one blot away : the first blot
came

And the first blood came. To the vain world's eye

All's gules again : no care to the vain world,
From whence the red was drawn !

Austin. No blot shall come !

Tresham. I said that : yet it did come.
Should it come,

Vengeance is God's, not man's. Remember me ! [Dies.]

Guendolen [letting fall the pulseless arm].
Ah, Thorold, we can but—remember
you !

COLOMBE'S BIRTHDAY;

A PLAY.

1844.

NO ONE LOVES AND HONOURS BARRY CORNWALL MORE THAN

DOES ROBERT BROWNING;

WHO, HAVING NOTHING BETTER THAN THIS PLAY

TO GIVE HIM IN PROOF OF IT, MUST SAY SO.

LONDON: 1844.

COLOMBE'S BIRTHDAY.

Ivy and violet, what do ye here
With blossom and shoot in the warm spring-weather,
Hiding the arms of Monchenci and Vere?
—Hanmer.

PERSONS.

COLOMBE OF RAVESTEIN, Duchess of Juliers and Cleves.

SADYNE, ADOLF, her attendants.

GUIBERT, GAUCELME, MAUFROY, CLUG-NET, courtiers.

VALENCE, advocate of Cleves.

PRINCE BERTHOLD, claimant of the Duchy.

MELCHIOR, his confidant.

PLACE.—The Palace at Juliers.

TIME, 16—.

ACT I.

MORNING.

SCENE.—A corridor leading to the Audience-chamber.

GAUCELME, CLUGNET, MAUFROY *and other
Courtiers, round GUIBERT, who is silently reading a paper: as he drops it at the end—*

Guibert. That this should be her birthday; and the day

We all invested her, twelve months ago,

As the late Duke's true heiress and our liege;
And that this also must become the day . . .

Oh, miserable lady!

1st Courtier. Ay, indeed?

2nd Courtier. Well, Guibert?

3rd Courtier. But your news, my friend, your news!

The sooner, friend, one learns Prince Berthold's pleasure,

The better for us all: how writes the Prince?
Give me! I'll read it for the common good.

Guibert. In time, sir,—but till time comes, pardon me!

Our old Duke just disclosed his child's retreat,
Declared her true succession to his rule,
And died: this birthday was the day, last
year,

We convoyed her from Castle Ravestein—
That sleeps out trustfully its extreme age
On the Meuse' quiet bank, where she lived queen

Over the water-buds,—to Juliers' court
With joy and bustle. Here again we stand;
Sir Gaucelme's buckle's constant to his cap:
To-day's much such another sunny day!

Gaucelme. Come, Guibert, this outgrows a jest, I think!

You're hardly such a novice as to need
The lesson, you pretend.

Guibert. What lesson, sir?
That everybody, if he'd thrive at court,
Should, first and last of all, look to himself?

Why, no: and therefore with your good example,
(—Ho, Master Adolf!)—to myself I'll look.

Enter ADOLF.

Guibert. The Prince's letter; why, of all men else,
Comes it to me?

Adolf. By virtue of your place,
Sir Guibert! 'Twas the Prince's express charge,

His envoy told us, that the missive there
Should only reach our lady by the hand
Of whosoever held your place.

Guibert. Enough!

[ADOLF retires.]

Then, gentles, who'll accept a certain poor
Indifferently honourable place,
My friends, I make no doubt, have gnashed
their teeth

At leisure minutes these half-dozen years,
To find me never in the mood to quit?
Who asks may have it, with my blessing,
and—

This to present our lady. Who'll accept?
You,—you,—you? There it lies, and may,
for me!

Maufroy [a youth, picking up the paper, reads aloud] "Prince Berthold, proved by titles following

"Undoubted Lord of Juliers, comes this day
"To claim his own, with licence from the Pope,

"The Emperor, the Kings of Spain and France" . . .

Gaucelme. Sufficient "titles following," I
judge!

Don't read another! Well,—"to claim his
own?"

Maufroy. "—And take possession of the Duchy held

"Since twelve months, to the true heir's prejudice,

"By" . . . Colombe, Juliers' mistress, so she thinks,

And Ravestein's mere lady, as we find.

Who wants the place and paper? Guibert's
right.

I hope to climb a little in the world,—
I'd push my fortunes,—but, no more than he,
Could tell her on this happy day of days,
That, save the nosegay in her hand, perhaps,
There's nothing left to call her own. Sir
Clugnet,

You famish for promotion; what say you?

Clugnet [an old man]. To give this letter were a sort, I take it,

Of service: services ask recompense:
What kind of corner may be Ravestein?

Guibert. The castle? Oh, you'd share her fortunes? Good!

Three walls stand upright, full as good as four,
With no such bad remainder of a roof.

Clugnet. Oh,—but the town?

Guibert. Five houses, fifteen huts;
A church whereto was once a spire, 'tis judged;

And half a dyke, except in time of thaw.

Clugnet. Still, there's some revenue?

Guibert. Else Heaven forfend!
You hang a beacon out, should fogs increase;
So, when the Autumn floats of pine-wood steer

Safe 'mid the white confusion, thanks to you,
Their grateful raftsmen flings a guilder in;
—That's if he mean to pass your way next
time.

Clugnet. If not?

Guibert. Hang guilders, then! He blesses you.

Clugnet. What man do you suppose me?
Keep your paper!

And, let me say, it shows no handsome spirit

To dally with misfortune: keep your place!

Gaucelme. Some one must tell her.

Guibert. Some one may: you may!

Gaucelme. Sir Guibert, 'tis no trifle turns me sick

Of court-hypocrisy at years like mine,
But this goes near it. Where's there news
at all?

Who'll have the face, for instance, to affirm
He never heard, e'en while we crowned the girl,

That Juliers' tenure was by Salic law;

That one, confessed her father's cousin's child,

And, she away, indisputable heir,

Against our choice protesting and the Duke's.
Claimed Juliers?—nor, as he preferred his claim,

That first this, then another potentate,

Inclined to its allowance?—I or you,

Or any one except the lady's self?

Oh, it had been the direst cruelty

To break the business to her! Things might change :

At all events, we'd see next masque at end,

Next mummerly over first : and so the edge

Was taken off sharp tidings as they came,

Till here's the Prince upon us, and there's she

—Wreathing her hair, a song between her lips,

With just the faintest notion possible

That some such claimant earns a livelihood

About the world, by feigning grievances—

Few pay the story of, but grudge its price,

And fewer listen to, a second time.

Your method proves a failure; now try mine!

And, since this must be carried . . .

Guibert [snatching the paper from him].

By your leave!

Your zeal transports you! 'Twill not serve the Prince

So much as you expect, this course you'd take.

If she leaves quietly her palace,—well;

But if she died upon its threshold,—no :

He'd have the trouble of removing her.

Come, gentles, we're all—what the devil knows!

You, Gaucelme, won't lose character, beside :

You broke your father's heart superiorly

To gather his succession—never blush!

You're from my province, and, be comforted,

They tell of it with wonder to this day.

You can afford to let your talent sleep.

We'll take the very worst supposed, as true :

There, the old Duke knew, when he hid his child

Among the river-flowers at Ravestein,

With whom the right lay! Call the Prince our Duke!

There, she's no Duchess, she's no anything

More than a young maid with the bluest eyes :
And now, sirs, we'll not break this young maid's heart

Coolly as Gaucelme could and would! No haste!

His talent's full-blown, ours but in the bud :
We'll not advance to his perfection yet—

Will we, Sir Maufroy? See, I've ruined
Maufroy

For ever as a courtier!

Gaucelme. Here's a coil!

And, count us, will you? Count its residue,
This boasted convoy, this day last year's crowd!

A birthday, too, a gratulation day!

I'm dumb : bid that keep silence!

Maufroy and others. Eh, Sir Guibert?
He's right : that does say something : that's bare truth.

Ten—twelve, I make : a perilous dropping off!

Guibert. Pooh—is it audience hour? The vestibule

Swarms too, I wager, with the common sort
That want our privilege of entry here.

Gaucelme. Adolf! [Re-enter ADOLF.]
Who's outside?

Guibert. Oh, your looks suffice!
Nobody waiting?

Maufroy [looking through the door-folds].
Scarce our number!

Guibert. 'Sdeath!
Nothing to beg for, to complain about?

It can't be! Ill news spreads, but not so fast
As thus to frighten all the world!

Gaucelme. The world
Lives out of doors, sir—not with you and me
By presence-chamber porches, state-room stairs,

Wherever warmth's perpetual : outside's free
To every wind from every compass-point,
And who may get nipped needs be weather-wise.

The Prince comes and the lady's People go ;
The snow-goose settles down, the swallows flee—

Why should they wait for winter-time? 'Tis instinct.

Don't you feel somewhat chilly?

Guibert. That's their craft? And last year's crowders-round and criers-forth That strewed the garlands, overarched the roads,
Lighted the bonfires, sang the loyal songs!
Well 'tis my comfort, you could never call me
The People's Friend! The People keep their word—
I keep my place: don't doubt I'll entertain
The People when the Prince comes, and the People
Are talked of! Then, their speeches—no one tongue
Found respite, not a pen had holiday
—For they wrote, too, as well as spoke,
these knaves!
Now see: we tax and tithe them, pill and poll,
They wince and fret enough, but pay they must
—We manage that,—so, pay with a good
grace
They might as well, it costs so little more.
But when we've done with taxes, meet folk next
Outside the toll-booth and the rating-place,
In public—there they have us if they will,
We're at their mercy after that, you see!
For one tax not ten devils could extort—
Over and above necessity, a grace;
This prompt disbosoming of love, to wit—
Their vine-leaf wrappage of our tribute penny,
And crowding attestation, all works well.
Yet this precisely do they thrust on us!
These cappings quick, these crook-and-cring-ings low,
Hand to the heart, and forehead to the knee,
With grin that shuts the eyes and opes the
mouth—
So tender they their love; and, tender made,
Go home to curse us, the first do it we ask.
As if their souls were any longer theirs!
As if they had not given ample warrant
To who should clap a collar on their neck,
Rings in their nose, a goad to either flank,
And take them for the brute they boast themselves!
Stay—there's a bustle at the outer door—

And somebody entreating . . . that's my name!
Adolf.—I heard my name!
Adolf. 'Twas probably
The suitor.
Guibert. Oh, there is one?
Adolf. With a suit
He'd fain enforce in person.
Guibert. The good heart —And the great fool! Just ope the middoor's fold!
Is that a lappet of his cloak, I see?
Adolf. If it bear plenteous sign of travel
. . . ay,
The very cloak my comrades tore!
Guibert. Why tore?
Adolf. He seeks the Duchess' presence in that trim:
Since daybreak, was he posted hereabouts
Lest he should miss the moment.
Guibert. Where's he now?
Adolf. Gone for a minute possibly, not
more:
They have ado enough to thrust him back.
Guibert. Ay—but my name, I caught?
Adolf. Oh, sir—he said
—What was it?—You had known him formerly,
And, he believed, would help him did you guess
He waited now; you promised him as much:
The old plea! 'Faith, he's back,—renews the charge!
[Speaking at the door.] So long as the man parleys, peace outside—
Nor be too ready with your halberts, there!
Gaucelme. My horse bespattered, as he blocked the path
A thin sour man, not unlike somebody.
Adolf. He holds a paper in his breast, whereon
He glances when his cheeks flush and his
brow
At each repulse—
Gaucelme. I noticed he'd a brow.
Adolf. So glancing, he grows calmer, leans awhile
Over the balustrade, adjusts his dress,

Adolf. Her Grace receives the court.
Guibert [aside]. Now, sursum corda, quoth the mass-priest! Do—
 Whoever's my kind saint, do let alone
 These pushings to and fro, and pullings
 back;

Peaceably let me hang o' the devil's arm
 The downward path, if you can't pluck me off
 Completely! Let me live quite his, or yours!

[The Courtiers begin to range themselves, and move toward the door.]

After me, Valence! So, our famous Cleves Lacks bread? Yet don't we gallants buy their lace?

And dear enough—it beggars me, I know,
 To keep my very gloves fringed properly.
 This, Valence, is our Great State Hall you
 cross;

Yon grey urn's veritable marcasite,
 The Pope's gift: and those salvers testify
 The Emperor. Presently you'll set your foot

. . . But you don't speak, friend Valence!

Valence. I shall speak.

Gauzelme [aside to GUIBERT]. Guibert—it were no such ungraceful thing

If you and I, at first, seemed horror-struck
 With the bad news. Look here, what you shall do.

Suppose you, first, clap hand to sword and cry
 "Yield strangers our allegiance? First I'll perish

"Beside your Grace!"—and so give me the cue
 To . . .

Guibert. —Clap your hand to note-book and jot down

That to regale the Prince with? I conceive.
 [To VALENCE.] Do, Valence, speak, or I shall half suspect

You're plotting to supplant us, me the first,
 I' the lady's favour! Is't the grand harangue
 You mean to make, that thus engrosses
 you?

—Which of her virtues you'll apostrophize?
 Or is't the fashion you aspire to start,
 Of that close-curled, not unbecoming hair?
 Or what else ponder you?

Valence. My townsmen's wrongs.

ACT II.

NOON.

SCENE.—The Presence-chamber.

The DUCHESS and SABYNE.

The Duchess. Announce that I am ready for the court!

Sabyne. 'Tis scarcely audience-hour, I think; your Grace

May best consult your own relief, no doubt,
 And shun the crowd: but few can have arrived.

The Duchess. Let those not yet arrived, then, keep away!

'Twas me, this day last year at Ravestein,
 You hurried. It has been full time, beside,
 This half-hour. Do you hesitate?

Sabyne. Forgive me!

The Duchess. Stay, Sabyne; let me hasten to make sure

Of one true thanker: here with you begins
 My audience, claim you first its privilege!
 It is my birth's event they celebrate:

You need not wish me more such happy days,
 But—ask some favour! Have you none to ask?
 Has Adolf none, then? this was far from least
 Of much I waited for impatiently,
 Assure yourself! It seemed so natural
 Your gift, beside this bunch of river-bells,
 Should be the power and leave of doing good
 To you, and greater pleasure to myself.

You ask my leave to-day to marry Adolf?
 The rest is my concern.

Sabyne. Your Grace is ever
 Our lady of dear Ravestein,—but, for Adolf . . .

The Duchess. "But"? You have not, sure, changed in your regard
 And purpose towards him?

Sabyne. We change?

The Duchess. Well then? Well?

Sabyne. How could we two be happy, and,
 most like,

Leave Juliers, when—when . . . but 'tis audience-time!

The Duchess. "When, if you left me, I were left indeed!"
 Would you subjoin that?—Bid the court approach!
 —Why should we play thus with each other, Sabyne?

Do I not know, if courtiers prove remiss,
 If friends detain me, and get blame for it,
 There is a cause? Of last year's fervid throng
 Scarce one half comes now.

Sabyne [aside]. One half? No, alas!

The Duchess. So can the mere suspicion of a cloud

Over my fortunes, strike each loyal heart.
 They've heard of this Prince Berthold; and,
 forsooth,

Some foolish arrogant pretence he makes,
 May grow more foolish and more arrogant,
 They please to apprehend! I thank their love.

Admit them!

Sabyne [aside]. How much has she really learned?

The Duchess. Surely, whoever's absent,
 Tristan waits?

—Or at least Romuald, whom my father raised

From nothing—come, he's faithful to me,
 come!

(Sabyne, I should but be the prouder—yes,
 The fitter to comport myself aright)

Not Romuald? Xavier—what said he to that?

For Xavier hates a parasite, I know!

[SABYNE goes out.]

The Duchess. Well, sunshine's everywhere, and summer too.

Next year 'tis the old place again, perhaps—
 The water-breeze again, the birds again.

—It cannot be! It is too late to be!

What part had I, or choice in all of it?

Hither they brought me; I had not to think

Nor care, concern myself with doing good

Or ill, my task was just—to live,—to live,

And, answering ends there was no need explain,

To render Juliers happy—so they said.

All could not have been falsehood: some was love,

And wonder and obedience. I did all
 They looked for: why then cease to do it now?

Yet this is to be calmly set aside,
 And—ere next birthday's dawn, for aught I know,

Things change, a claimant may arrive, and I . . .

It cannot nor it shall not be! His right?
 Well then, he has the right, and I have not,

—But who bade all of you surround my life
 And close its growth up with your ducal crown
 Which, plucked off rudely, leaves me perishing?

I could have been like one of you,—loved,
 hoped,

Fear'd, lived and died like one of you—but you

Would take that life away and give me this,
 And I will keep this! I will face you!
 Come!

Enter the COURTIERs and VALENCE.

The Courtiers. Many such happy mornings to your Grace!

The Duchess [aside, as they pay their devoir].
 The same words, the same faces,—the same love!

I have been overfearful. These are few;
 But these, at least, stand firmly: these are mine.

As many come as may; and if no more,
 'Tis that these few suffice—they do suffice!
 What succour may not next year bring me?

Plainly,

I feared too soon. [To the Courtiers.] I thank you, sirs: all thanks!

Valence [aside, as the DUCHESS passes from one group to another, conversing]. 'Tis she—the vision this day last year brought,

When, for a golden moment at our Cleves,
 She tarried in her progress hither. Cleves

Chose me to speak its welcome, and I spoke
 —Not that she could have noted the recluse

—Ungainly, old before his time—who gazed.
 Well, Heaven's gifts are not wasted, and that gaze

Kept, and shall keep me to the end, her own!

She was above it—but so would not sink
My gaze to earth! The People caught it,
hers—

Thenceforward, mine; but thus entirely mine,
Who shall affirm, had she not raised my soul Ere she retired and left me—them? She turns—

There's all her wondrous face at once! The ground

Reels and . . . [suddenly occupying himself with his paper]

These wrongs of theirs I have to plead!
The Duchess [to the Courtiers]. Nay, compliment enough! and kindness' self

Should pause before it wish me more such years.

'Twas fortunate that thus, ere youth escaped,
I tasted life's pure pleasure—one such, pure,
Is worth a thousand, mixed—and youth's for pleasure:

Mine is received; let my age pay for it.

Gaucelme. So, pay, and pleasure paid for,
thinks your Grace,

Should never go together?

Guibert. How, Sir Gaucelme?

Hurry one's feast down unenjoyingly

At the snatched breathing-intervals of work?

As good you saved it till the dull day's-end

When, stiff and sleepy, appetite is gone.

Eat first, then work upon the strength of food!

The Duchess. True: you enable me to risk
my future,

By giving me a past beyond recall.

I lived, a girl, one happy leisure year:

Let me endeavour to be the Duchess now!

And so,—what news, Sir Guibert, spoke you of?

[As they advance a little, and

GUIBERT speaks—

—That gentleman?

Valence [aside]. I feel her eyes on me.

Guibert [to VALENCE]. The Duchess, sir, inclines to hear your suit.

Advance! He is from Cleves.

Valence [coming forward. Aside]. Their wrongs—their wrongs!

The Duchess. And you, sir, are from Cleves? How fresh in mind,

The hour or two I passed at queenly Cleves!
She entertained me bravely, but the best
Of her good pageant seemed its standers-by.
With insuppressive joy on every face!

What says my ancient famous happy Cleves?

Valence. Take the truth, lady—you are made for truth!

So think my friends: nor do they less deserve
The having you to take it, you shall think,

When you know all—nay, when you only know

How, on that day you recollect at Cleves,

When the poor acquiescing multitude

Who thrust themselves with all their woes
apart

Into unnoticed corners, that the few,
Their means sufficed to muster trappings for,

Might fill the foreground, occupy your sight

With joyous faces fit to bear away

And boast of as a sample of all Cleves

—How, when to daylight these crept out
once more,

Clutching, unconscious, each his empty rags
Whence the scant coin, which had not half bought bread,

That morn he shook forth, counted piece by piece,

And, well-advisedly, on perfumes spent them

To burn, or flowers to strew, before your path

—How, when the golden flood of music and
bliss

Ebb'd, as their moon retreated, and again

Left the sharp black-point rocks of misery bare

—Then I, their friend, had only to suggest

“Saw she the horror as she saw the pomp!”

And as one man they cried “He speaks the
truth:

“Show her the horror! Take from our own mouths

“Our wrongs and show them, she will see them too!”

This they cried, lady! I have brought the wrongs.

The Duchess. Wrongs? Cleves has wrongs

—apparent now and thus?

I thank you! In that paper? Give it me!

Valence. (There, Cleves!) In this! (What did I promise, Cleves?)

Our weavers, clothiers, spinners are reduced

Since . . . Oh, I crave your pardon ! I forget I buy the privilege of this approach, And promptly would discharge my debt. I lay This paper humbly at the Duchess' feet.

[Presenting GUIBERT'S paper.

Guibert. Stay ! for the present . . .

The Duchess. Stay, sir ? I take aught That teaches me their wrongs with greater pride Than this your ducal circlet. Thank you, sir !

[The DUCHESS reads hastily ; then, turning to the Courtiers—

What have I done to you ? Your deed or mine Was it, this crowning me ? I gave myself No more a title to your homage, no, Than church-flowers, born this season, wrote the words

In the saint's-book that sanctified them first. For such a flower, you plucked me ; well, you erred—

Well, 'twas a weed ; remove the eye-sore quick ! But should you not remember it has lain Steeped in the candles' glory, palely shrined, Nearer God's Mother than most earthly things ? —That if't be faded 'tis with prayer's sole breath—

That the one day it boasted was God's day ? Still, I do thank you ! Had you used respect, Here might I dwindle to my last white leaf, Here lose life's latest freshness, which even yet May yield some wandering insect rest and food : So, fling me forth, and—all is best for all ! [After a pause.] Prince Berthold, who art

Juliers' Duke it seems—

The King's choice, and the Emperor's, and the Pope's—

Be mine, too ! Take this People ! Tell not me Of rescripts, precedents, authorities, —But take them, from a heart that yearns to give !

Find out their love,—I could not ; find their fear,—

I would not ; find their like,—I never shall, Among the flowers ! [Taking off her coronet.

Colombe of Ravestein

Thanks God she is no longer Duchess here !

Valence [advancing to GUIBERT.] Sir

Guibert, knight, they call you—this of

Is the first step I ever set at court.

You dared make me your instrument, I find ;

For that, so sure as you and I are men,

We reckon to the utmost presently :

But as you are a courtier and I none,

Your knowledge may instruct me. I, already,

Have too far outraged, by my ignorance

Of courtier-ways, this lady, to proceed

A second step and risk addressing her :

—I am degraded—you let me address !

Out of her presence, all is plain enough

What I shall do—but in her presence, too,

Surely there's something proper to be done.

[To the others.] You, gentles, tell me if I guess aright—

May I not strike this man to earth ?

The Courtiers [as GUIBERT springs forward, withholding him.] Let go !

—The clothiers' spokesman, Guibert ? Grace a churl ?

The Duchess [to VALENCE.] Oh, be acquainted with your party, sir !

He's of the oldest lineage Juliers boasts ;

A lion crests him for a cognizance ;

"Scorning to waver"—that's his 'scutcheon's word ;

His office with the new Duke—probably

The same in honour as with me ; or more,

By so much as this gallant turn deserves.

He's now, I dare say, of a thousand times

The rank and influence that remain with her

Whose part you take ! So, lest for taking it

You suffer . . .

Valence. I may strike him then to earth ?

Guibert [falling on his knee.] Great and dear lady, pardon me ! Hear once !

Believe me and be merciful—be just !

I could not bring myself to give that paper

Without a keener pang than I dared meet

—And so felt Clugnet here, and Maufroy here

—No one dared meet it. Protestation's cheap,—

But, if to die for you did any good,

[To GAUCELME.] Would not I die, sir ? Say your worst of me !

But it does no good, that's the mournful truth.

And since the hint of a resistance, even.

Would just precipitate, on you the first,

A speedier ruin—I shall not deny,
 Saving myself indubitable pain,
 I thought to give you pleasure (who might say?)
 By showing that your only subject found
 To carry the sad notice, was the man
 Precisely ignorant of its contents ;
 A nameless, mere provincial advocate ;
 One whom 'twas like you never saw before,
 Never would see again. All has gone wrong ;
 But I meant right, God knows, and you, I trust !

The Duchess. A nameless advocate, this gentleman ?

—[I pardon you, Sir Guibert !]

Guibert [rising, to VALENCE]. Sir, and you ?

Valence. —Rejoice that you are lightened of a load.

Now, you have only me to reckon with.

The Duchess. One I have never seen, much less obliged ?

Valence. Dare I speak, lady ?

The Duchess.

Dare you !

Heard you not

I rule no longer ?

Valence. Lady, if your rule

Were based alone on such a ground as these [Pointing to the Courtiers.]

Could furnish you,—abjure it ! They have hidden

A source of true dominion from your sight.

The Duchess. You hear them—no such source is left . . .

Valence. I hear Cleves !

Whose haggard craftsmen rose to starve this day,

Starve now, and will lie down at night to starve,
 Sure of a like to-morrow—but as sure
 Of a most unlike morrow-after-that,
 Since end things must, end howsoever things may.

What curbs the brute-force instinct in its hour?
 What makes—instead of rising, all as one,
 And teaching fingers, so expert to wield
 Their tool, the broadsword's play or carbine's trick,

—What makes that there's an easier help,
 they think,

For you, whose name so few of them can spell,
 Whose face scarce one in every hundred saw,—

You simply have to understand their wrongs,
 And wrongs will vanish—so, still trades are plied,

And swords lie rusting, and myself stand here ?

There is a vision in the heart of each

Of justice, mercy, wisdom, tenderness

To wrong and pain, and knowledge of its cure :

And these embodied in a woman's form

That best transmits them, pure as first received,

From God above her, to mankind below.

Will you derive your rule from such a ground,

Or rather hold it by the suffrage, say,

Of this man—this—and this ?

The Duchess [after a pause]. You come from Cleves :

How many are at Cleves of such a mind ?

Valence [from his paper]. "We, all the manufacturers of Cleves—"

The Duchess. Or stay, sir—lest I seem too covetous—

Are you my subject ? such as you describe,

Am I to you, though to no other man ?

Valence [from his paper].—"Valence, ordained your Advocate at Cleves—"

The Duchess [replacing the coronet]. Then I remain Cleves' Duchess ! Take you note,

While Cleves but yields one subject of this stamp,

I stand her lady till she waves me off !

For her sake, all the Prince claims I withhold ;

Laugh at each menace ; and, his power defying,

Return his missive with its due contempt !

[Casting it away.]

Guibert [picking it up].—Which to the Prince I will deliver, lady,

(Note it down, Gaucelme)—with your message too !

The Duchess. I think the office is a subject's, sir !

—Either . . . how style you him?—my special guarder

The Marshal's—for who knows but violence

May follow the delivery?—Or, perhaps,

My Chancellor's—for law may be to urge

On its receipt !—Or, even my Chamberlain's—

For I may violate established form !

[To VALENCE.] Sir,—for the half-hour till this service ends,
Will you become all these to me?

Valence [falling on his knee]. My liege!

The Duchess. Give me!

[The Courtiers present their badges of office.]

[Putting them by.] Whatever was their virtue once,

They need new consecration. [Raising

VALENCE.] Are you mine?

I will be Duchess yet! [She retires.

The Courtiers. Our Duchess yet!

A glorious lady! Worthy love and dread!

I'll stand by her,—And I, whate'er betide!

Guibert [to VALENCE]. Well done, well done, sir! I care not who know's,

You have done nobly and I envy you—

Tho' I am but unfairly used, I think:

For when one gets a place like this I hold,

(One gets too the remark that its mere wages,

The pay and the preferment, make our prize.

Talk about zeal and faith apart from these,

We're laughed at—much would zeal and faith subsist

Without these also! Yet, let these be stopped,

Our wages discontinue,—then, indeed,

Our zeal and faith, (we hear on every side,) Are not released—having been pledged away

I wonder, for what zeal and faith in turn?

Hard money purchased me my place! No, no—

I'm right, sir—but your wrong is better still, If I had time and skill to argue it.

Therefore, I say, I'll serve you, how you please—

If you like,—fight you, as you seem to wish—

(The kinder of me that, in sober truth,

I never dreamed I did you any harm) . . .

Gaucelme. —Or, kinder still, you'll introduce, no doubt,

His merits to the Prince who's just at hand,

And let no hint drop he's made Chancellor

And Chamberlain and Heaven knows what beside!

Clugnet [to VALENCE]. You stare, young sir, and threaten! Let me say,

That at your age, when first I came to court, I was not much above a gentleman;

While now . . .

I'valence. —You are Head-Lackey?

With your office

I have not yet been graced, sir!

Other Courtiers [to CLUGNET]. Let him

talk!

Fidelity, disinterestedness,

Excuse so much! Men claim my worship ever

Who staunchly and steadfastly . . .

Enter ADOLF.

Adolf. The Prince arrives.

Courtiers. Ha? How?

Adolf. He leaves his guard a stage behind At Aix, and enters almost by himself.

1st Courtier. The Prince! This foolish business puts all out.

2nd Courtier. Let Gaucelme speak first!

3rd Courtier. Better I began

About the state of Juliers: should one say

All's prosperous and inviting him?

4th Courtier. —Or rather,

All's prostrate and imploring him?

5th Courtier. That's best

Where's the Cleves' paper, by the way?

4th Courtier [to VALENCE]. Sir—sir—

If you'll lend that paper—trust it me,

I'll warrant . . .

5th Courtier. Softly, sir—the Marshal's duty!

Clugnet. Has not the Chamberlain a hearing first

By virtue of his patent?

Gaucelme. Patents?—Duties?

All that, my masters, must begin again!

One word composes the whole controversy:

We're simply now—the Prince's!

The Others. Ay—the Prince's!

Enter SABYNE.

Sabyné. Adolf! Bid . . . Oh, no time for ceremony!

Where's whom our lady calls her only subject?

She needs him. Who is here the Duchess's?

Valence [starting from his reverie]. Most gratefully I follow to her feet.

ACT III.

AFTERNOON.

SCENE.—The Vestibule.

Enter PRINCE BERTHOLD and MELCHIOR.

Berthold. A thriving little burgh this Juliers looks.

[Half-apart.] Keep Juliers, and as good you kept Cologne :

Better try Aix, though !—

Melchior. Please 't your Highness speak ?

Berthold [as before]. Aix, Cologne, Frankfurt,—Milan ;—Rome !—

Melchior. The Grave.

More weary seems your Highness, I remark,
Than sundry conquerors whose path I've watched

Through fire and blood to any prize they gain.
I could well wish you, for your proper sake,
Had met some shade of opposition here
—Found a blunt seneschal refuse unlock,
Or a scared usher lead your steps astray.
You must not look for next achievement's palm

So easily : this will hurt your conquering.

Berthold. My next ? Ay, as you say, my next and next !

Well, I am tired, that's truth, and moody too,
This quiet entrance-morning : listen why !
Our little burgh, now, Juliers—'tis indeed
One link, however insignificant,
Of the great chain by which I reach my hope,
—A link I must secure ; but otherwise,
You'd wonder I esteem it worth my grasp.
Just see what life is, with its shifts and turns !
It happens now—this very nook—to be
A place that once . . . not a long while since, neither—

When I lived an ambiguous hanger-on
Of foreign courts, and bore my claims about,
Discarded by one kinsman, and the other
A poor priest merely,—then, I say, this place
Shone my ambition's object ; to be Duke—
Seemed then, what to be Emperor seems now.
My rights were far from judged as plain and sure

In those days as of late, I promise you :
And 'twas my day-dream, Lady Colombe here
Might e'en compound the matter, pity me,
Be struck, say, with my chivalry and grace
(I was a boy !)—bestow her hand at length,
And make me Duke, in her right if not mine.
Here am I, Duke confessed, at Juliers now.
Hearken : if ever I be Emperor,
Remind me what I felt and said to-day !

Melchior. All this consoles a bookish man like me.

—And so will weariness cling to you. Wrong,
Wrong ! Had you sought the lady's court yourself,—

Faced the redoubtables composing it,
Flattered this, threatened that man, bribed the other,—

Pleaded by writ and word and deed, your cause,—

Conquered a footing inch by painful inch,—
And, after long years' struggle, pounced at last
On her for prize,—the right life had been lived,
And justice done to divers faculties
Shut in that brow. Yourself were visible
As you stood victor, then ; whom now—
(your pardon !)

I am forced narrowly to search and see,
So are you hid by helps—this Pope, your uncle—

Your cousin, the other King ! You are a mind,—

They, body : too much of mere legs-and-arms
Obstructs the mind so ! Match these with their like :

Match mind with mind !

Berthold. And where's your mind to match ?

They show me legs-and-arms to cope withal !
I'd subjugate this city—where's its mind ?

[The Courtiers enter slowly.]

Melchior. Got out of sight when you came troops and all !

And in its stead, here greets you flesh-and-blood :

A smug economy of both, this first !

[As CLUGNET bows obsequiously.]

Well done, gout, all considered !—I may go ?

Berthold. Help me receive them !

Melchior. Oh, they just will say
What yesterday at Aix their fellows said—
At Treves, the day before! Sir Prince, my
friend,
Why do you let your life slip thus?—Mean-
time,
I have my little Juliers to achieve—
The understanding this tough Platonist,
Your holy uncle disinterred, Amelius:
Lend me a company of horse and foot,
To help me through his tractate—gain my Duchy!

Berthold. And Empire, after that is gained,
will be—?

Melchior. To help me through your uncle's comment, Prince! [Goes.]

Berthold. Ah? Well: he o'er-refines—the scholar's fault!

How do I let my life slip? Say, this life,
I lead now, differs from the common life
(Of other men in mere degree, not kind,
Of joys and griefs,—still there is such degree
More largeness in a life is something, sure,— Enough to care about and struggle for,
In this world: for this world, the size of
things;

The sort of things, for that to come, no doubt.
A great is better than a little aim:
And when I wooed Priscilla's rosy mouth
And failed so, under that grey convent-wall,
Was I more happy than I should be now

[By this time, the Courtiers are ranged before him.]

If failing of my Empire? Not a whit.
—Here comes the mind, it once had tasked me sore

To baffle, but for my advantages!
All's best as 'tis: these scholars talk and talk.
[Sits himself.]

The Courtiers. Welcome our Prince to Juliers!—to his heritage!
Our dutifullest service proffer we!

Clugnet. I, please your Highness, having exercised
The function of Grand Chamberlain at court,
With much acceptance, as men testify . . .

Berthold. I cannot greatly thank you, gentlemen!

The Pope declares my claim to the Duchy founded

On strictest justice—you concede it, therefore,
I do not wonder: and the kings my friends
Protest they mean to see such claim enforced,—
You easily may offer to assist.

But there's a slight discretionary power
To serve me in the matter, you've had long,
Though late you use it. This is well to say—
But could you not have said it months ago?
I'm not denied my own Duke's truncheon,
true—

'Tis flung me—I stoop down, and from the ground

Pick it, with all you placid standers-by:
And now I have it, gems and mire at once,
Grace go with it to my soiled hands, you say!
Guibert. (By Paul, the advocate our doughty friend

Cuts the best figure!)

Gaucelme. If our ignorance
May have offended, sure our loyalty . . .

Berthold. Loyalty? Yours? Oh—of your selves you speak!

I mean the Duchess all this time, I hope!
And since I have been forced repeat my claims

As if they never had been urged before,
As I began, so must I end, it seems.

The formal answer to the grave demand!
What says the lady?

Courtiers [one to another]. 1st Courtier.
Marshal! 2nd Courtier. Orator!

Guibert. A variation of our mistress' way!
Wipe off his boots' dust, Clugnet!—that, he waits!

1st Courtier. Your place!

2nd Courtier. Just now it was your own!

Guibert. The devil's!
Berthold [to GUIBERT]. Come forward, friend—you with the paper, there!

Is Juliers the first city I've obtained?
By this time, I may boast proficiency
In each decorum of the circumstance.
Give it me as she gave it—the petition, Demand, you style it! What's required, in brief?

What title's reservation, appanage's Allowance? I heard all at Treves, last week.

Gaucelme [to GUIBERT]. "Give it him as she gave it!"

Guibert. And why not? [To BERTHOLD.] The lady crushed your summons thus together,

And bade me, with the very greatest scorn
So fair a frame could hold, inform you . . .
Courtiers. Stop—

Idiot!

Guibert. —Inform you she denied your claim,

Defied yourself! (I tread upon his heel,
The blustering advocate!)

Berthold. By heaven and earth!
Dare you jest, sir?

Guibert. Did they at Treves, last week?

Berthold [starting up]. Why then, I look much bolder than I knew,

And you prove better actors than I thought:
Since, as I live, I took you as you entered
For just so many dearest friends of mine,
Fled from the sinking to the rising power
—The sneaking'st crew, in short, I e'er despised!

Whereas, I am alone here for the moment,
With every soldier left behind at Aix!
Silence? That means the worst? I thought as much!

What follows next then?

Courtiers. Gracious Prince, he raves!

Guibert. He asked the truth and why not get the truth?

Berthold. Am I a prisoner? Speak, will somebody?

—But why stand paltering with imbeciles?
Let me see her, or . . .

Guibert. Her, without her leave,
Shall no one see: she's Duchess yet!

Courtiers [footsteps without, as they are disputing]. Good chance!
She's here—the Lady Colombe's self!

Berthold. 'Tis well!
[Aside.] Array a handful thus against my
world?

Not ill done, truly! Were not this a mind

To match one's mind with? Colombe! Let us wait!

I failed so, under that grey convent wall!
She comes.

Guibert. The Duchess! Strangers, range yourselves!

[As the DUCHESS enters in conversation with VALENCE, BERTHOLD and the Courtiers fall back a little.

The Duchess. Presagefully it beats, presagefully,
My heart: the right is Berthold's and not
mine.

Valence. Grant that he has the right, dare
I mistrust

Your power to acquiesce so patiently
As you believe, in such a dream-like change
Of fortune—change abrupt, profound, complete?

The Duchess. Ah, the first bitterness is over now!

Bitter I may have felt it to confront
The truth, and ascertain those natures' value
I had so counted on; that was a pang:
But I did bear it, and the worst is over.
Let the Prince take them!

Valence. And take Juliers too?
—Your people without crosses, wands and chains—
Only with hearts?

The Duchess. There I feel guilty, sir!
I cannot give up what I never had:
For I ruled these, not them—these stood between.

Shall I confess, sir? I have heard by stealth
Of Berthold from the first; more news and
more:

Closer and closer swam the thundercloud,
But I was safely housed with these, I knew.
At times when to the casement I would turn,
At a bird's passage or a flower-trail's play,
I caught the storm's red glimpses on its edge—
Yet I was sure some one of all these friends
Would interpose: I followed the bird's flight Or plucked the flower: some one would interpose!

Valence. Not one thought on the People—and Clèves there!

The Duchess. Now, sadly conscious my real sway was missed,
Its shadow goes without so much regret :
Else could I not again thus calmly bid you,
Answer Prince Berthold !

Valence. Then you acquiesce?

The Duchess. Remember over whom it was I ruled !

Guibert [stepping forward]. Prince Berthold, yonder, craves an audience, lady !

The Duchess [to VALENCE]. I only have to turn, and I shall face

Prince Berthold ! Oh, my very heart is sick !
It is the daughter of a line of Dukes
This scornful insolent adventurer
Will bid depart from my dead father's halls !
I shall not answer him—dispute with him—
But, as he bids, depart ! Prevent it, sir !
Sir—but a mere day's respite ! Urge for me
—What I shall call to mind I should have urged

When time's gone by : 'twill all be mine, you urge !

A day—an hour—that I myself may lay
My rule down ! 'Tis too sudden—must not be !

The world's to hear of it ! Once done—for ever !

How will it read, sir ? How be sung about ?
Prevent it !

Berthold [approaching]. Your frank indignation, lady,

Cannot escape me. Overbold I seem ;
But somewhat should be pardoned my surprise
At this réception,—this defiance, rather.

And if, for their and your sake, I rejoice
Your virtues could inspire a trusty few
To make such gallant stand in your behalf,
I cannot but be sorry, for my own,
Your friends should force me to retrace my steps :

Since I no longer am permitted speak
After the pleasant peaceful course prescribed
No less by courtesy than relationship—
Which I remember, if you once forgot.
But never must attack pass unrepelled.
Suffer that, through you, I demand of these,
Who controverts my claim to Juliens ?

The Duchess.

—Me

You say, you do not speak to—

Berthold. Of your subjects

I ask, then : whom do you accredit ? Where Stand those should answer ?

Valence [advancing]. The lady is alone.

Berthold. Alone, and thus ? So weak and yet so bold ?

Valence. I said she was alone—

Berthold. And weak, I said.

Valence. When is man strong until he feels alone ?

It was some lonely strength at first, be sure,
Created organs, such as those you seek,
By which to give its varied purpose shape :
And, naming the selected ministrants,
Took sword, and shield, and sceptre,—each,
a man !

That strength performed its work and passed its way :

You see our lady : there, the old shapes stand !

—A Marshal, Chamberlain, and Chancellor—
“Be helped their way, into their death put life

“And find advantage !”—so you counsel us.
But let strength feel alone, seek help itself,—
And, as the inland-hatched sea-creature hunts
The sea's breast out,—as, littered 'mid the waves

The desert-brute makes for the desert's joy,
So turns our lady to her true resource,
Passing o'er hollow fictions, worn-out types,
—And I am first her instinct fastens on.

And prompt I say, as clear as heart can speak,
The People will not have you ; nor shall have !
It is not merely I shall go bring Cleves
And fight you to the last,—though that does much,

And men and children,—ay, and women too,
Fighting for home, are rather to be feared
Than mercenaries fighting for their pay—

But, say you beat us, since such things have been,

And, where this Juliens laughed, you set your foot

Upon a steaming bloody splash—what then ?

Stand you the more our lord that there you stand?

Lord it o'er troops whose force you concentrate,

A pillared flame whereto all ardours tend—

Lord it 'mid priests whose schemes you amplify,

A cloud of smoke 'neath which all shadows brood—

But never, in this gentle spot of earth,

Can you become our Colombe, our play-queen,

For whom, to furnish lilies for her hair,

We'd pour our veins forth to enrich the soil.

—Our conqueror? Yes!—Our despot? Yes!

—Our Duke?

Know yourself, know us!

Berthold [who has been in thought]. Know your lady, also!

[Very deferentially.]—To whom I needs must exculpate myself

For having made a rash demand, at least.

Wherefore to you, sir, who appear to be

Her chief adviser, I submit my claims,

[Giving papers.]

But, this step taken, take no further step,

Until the Duchess shall pronounce their worth.

Here be our meeting-place; at night, its time:

Till when I humbly take the lady's leave!

[He withdraws. As the DUCHESS turns to VALENCE, the Courtiers interchange glances and come forward a little.]

1st Courtier. So, this was their device!

2nd Courtier. No bad device!

3rd Courtier. You'd say they love each other, Guibert's friend

From Cleves, and she, the Duchess!

4th Courtier. —And moreover,

That all Prince Berthold comes for, is to help Their loves!

5th Courtier. Pray, Guibert, what is next to do?

Guibert [advancing]. I laid my office at the Duchess' foot—

Others. And I—and I—and I!

The Duchess. I took them, sirs.
Guibert [apart to VALENCE]. And now, sir,

I am simple knight again—

Guibert, of the great ancient house, as yet

That never bore affront; whate'er your birth,—

As things stand now, I recognize yourself

(If you'll accept experience of some date)

As like to be the leading man o' the time,

Therefore as much above me now, as I

Seemed above you this morning. Then, I offered

To fight you: will you be as generous

And now fight me?

Valence. Ask when my life is mine!

Guibert. ('Tis hers now!)

Clugnet [apart to VALENCE, as GUIBERT turns from him]. You, sir, have insulted me

Grossly,—will grant me, too, the selfsame favour

You've granted him, just now, I make no question?

Valence. I promise you, as him, sir.

Clugnet. Do you so?

Handsomely said! I hold you to it, sir.

You'll get me reinstated in my office

As you will Guibert!

The Duchess. I would be alone!

[They begin to retire slowly; as

VALENCE is about to follow—

Alone, sir—only with my heart: you stay!

Gauclme. You hear that? Ah, light breaks upon me! Cleves—

It was at Cleves some man harangued us all—

With great effect,—so those who listened said,

My thoughts being busy elsewhere: was this he?

Guibert,—your strange, disinterested man!

Your uncorrupted, if uncourtly friend!

The modest worth you mean to patronize!

He cares about no Duchesses, not he—

His sole concern is with the wrongs of Cleves!

What, Guibert? What, it breaks on you at last?

Guibert. Would this hall's floor were a mine's roof! I'd back

And in her very face . . .

- Gaucelme.* Apply the match
That fired the train,—and where would you be, pray?
Guibert. With him!
Gaucelme. Stand, rather, safe outside with me!
The mine's charged: shall I furnish you the match
And place you properly? To the ante-chamber!
Guibert. Can you?
Gaucelme. Try me! Your friend's in fortune!
Guibert. Quick—
To the antechamber! He is pale with bliss!
Gaucelme. No wonder! Mark her eyes!
Guibert. To the antechamber!
[The Courtiers retire.]
The Duchess. Sir, could you know all you have done for me
You were content! You spoke, and I am saved.
Valence. Be not too sanguine, lady! Ere you dream,
That transient flush of generosity Fades off, perchance. The man, beside, is gone,—
Him we might bend; but see, the papers here—
Inalterably his requirement stays,
And cold hard words have we to deal with
now.
In that large eye there seemed a latent pride,
To self-denial not incompetent,
But very like to hold itself dispensed
From such a grace: however, let us hope!
He is a noble spirit in noble form.
I wish he less had bent that brow to smile
As with the fancy how he could subject
Himself upon occasion to—himself!
From rudeness, violence, you rest secure;
But do not think your Duchy rescued yet!
The Duchess. You,—who have opened a new world to me,
Will never take the faded language up
Of that I leave? My Duchy—keeping it,
Or losing it—is that my sole world now?
Valence. Ill have I spoken if you thence despise
- Juliers; although the lowest, on true grounds,
Be worth more than the highest rule, on false:
Aspire to rule, on the true grounds!
The Duchess. Nay, hear—
False, I will never—rash, I would not be!
This is indeed my birthday—soul and body,
Its hours have done on me the work of years.
You hold the requisition: ponder it!
If I have right, my duty's plain: if he—
Say so, nor ever change a tone of voice!
At night you meet the Prince; meet meat eve!
Till when, farewell! This discomposes you!
Believe in your own nature, and its force
Of renovating mine! I take my stand
Only as under me the earth is firm:
So, prove the first step stable, all will prove.
That first, I choose: [Laying her hand on his.]
—the next to take, choose you!
[She withdraws.]
Valence [after a pause]. What drew down this on me?—on me, dead once,
She thus bids live,—since all I hitherto Thought dead in me, youth's ardours and emprise,
Burst into life before her, as she bids
Who needs them. Whither will this reach, where end?
Her hand's print burns on mine . . . Yet she's above—
So very far above me! All's too plain:
I served her when the others sank away,
And she rewards me as such souls reward—
The changed voice, the suffusion of the cheek,
The eye's acceptance, the expressive hand,
—Reward, that's little, in her generous
thought,
Though all to me . . .
I cannot so disclaim
Heaven's gift, nor call it other than it is!
She loves me!
[Looking at the Prince's papers.]—Which love, these, perchance, forbid.
Can I decide against myself—pronounce
She is the Duchess and no mate for me?
Cleves, help me! Teach me,—every haggard face,—
To sorrow and endure! I will do right
Whatever be the issue. Help me, Cleves!

ACT IV.

EVENING.

SCENE.—An Ante-chamber.Enter the Courtiers.

Maufray. Now, then, that we may speak
—how spring this mine?

Gaucelme. Is Guibert ready for its match?
He cools!

Not so friend Valence with the Duchess there!
"Stay, Valence! Are not you my better
self?"

And her cheek mantled—

Guibert. Well, she loves him, sir:
And more,—since you will have it I grow cool,—

She's right: he's worth it.

Gaucelme. For his deeds to-day?
Say so!

Guibert. What should I say beside?

Gaucelme. Not this—

For friendship's sake leave this for me to say—
That we're the dupes of an egregious cheat!
This plain unpractised suitor, who found way
To the Duchess through the merest die's turn-up

A year ago, had seen her and been seen,
Loved and been loved.

Guibert. Impossible!

Gaucelme. —Nor say,
How sly and exquisite a trick, moreover,
Was this which—taking not their stand on facts

Boldly, for that had been endurable,
But worming on their way by craft, they choose

Resort to, rather,—and which you and we,
Sheep-like, assist them in the playing-off!

The Duchess thus parades him as preferred,
Not on the honest ground of preference,

Seeing first, liking more, and there an end—
But as we all had started equally,

And at the close of a fair race he proved
The only valiant, sage and loyal man.

Herself, too, with the pretty fits and starts,—

The careless, winning, candid ignorance
Of what the Prince might challenge or forego—
She had a hero in reserve! What risk
Ran she? This deferential easy Prince
Who brings his claims for her to ratify—
—He's just her puppet for the nonce!
You'll see,—

Valence pronounces, as is equitable,
Against him: off goes the confederate:
As equitably, Valence takes her hand!

The Chancellor. You run too fast: her hand, no subject takes.

Do not our archives hold her father's will?
That will provides against such accident,
And gives next heir, Prince Berthold, the reversion

Of Juliers, which she forfeits, wedding so.

Gaucelme. I know that, well as you,—but does the Prince?

Knows Berthold, think you, that this plan,
he helps,

For Valence's ennoblement,—would end,
If crowned with the success which seems its due,

In making him the very thing he plays,
The actual Duke of Juliers? All agree
That Colombe's title waived or set aside,
He is next heir.

The Chancellor. Incontrovertibly.

Gaucelme. Guibert, your match, now, to the train!

Guibert. Enough!

I'm with you: selfishness is best again.
I thought of turning honest—what a dream!
Let's wake now!

Gaucelme. Selfish, friend, you never were:

'Twas but a series of revenges taken
On your unselfishness for prospering ill.
But now that you're grown wiser, what's our
course?

Guibert. —Wait, I suppose, till Valence weds our lady,

And then, if we must needs revenge ourselves,
Apprise the Prince.

Gaucelme. —The Prince, ere then dismissed

With thanks for playing his mock part so well?

Tell the Prince now, sir ! Ay, this very night,
Ere he accepts his dole and goes his way,
Explain how such a marriage makes him Duke,
Then trust his gratitude for the surprise !

Guibert. —Our lady wedding Valence all
the same

As if the penalty were undisclosed ?

Good ! If she loves, she'll not disown her
love,

Throw Valence up. I wonder you see that.

Gaucelme. The shame of it—the suddenness and shame !

Within her, the inclining heart—without,

A terrible array of witnesses—

And Valence by, to keep her to her word,

With Berthold's indignation or disgust !

We'll try it !—Not that we can venture much.
Her confidence we've lost for ever : Berthold's is all to gain.

Guibert. To-night, then, venture we !
Yet—if lost confidence might be renewed ?

Gaucelme. Never in noble natures ! With the base ones,—

Twist off the crab's claw, wait a smarting-
while,

And something grows and grows and gets to be

A mimic of the lost joint, just so like

As keeps in mind it never, never will Replace its predecessor ! Crabs do that :

But lop the lion's foot—and . . .

Guibert. To the Prince !

Gaucelme [aside]. And come what will to the lion's foot, I pay you,

My cat's-paw, as I long have yearned to pay.

[Aloud.] Footsteps ! Himself ! 'Tis Valence breaks on us,

Exulting that their scheme succeeds. We'll
hence—

And perfect ours ! Consult the archives, first—
Then, fortified with knowledge, seek the Hall !

Cugnat [to GAUCELME as they retire].

You have not smiled so since your father died !

As they retire, enter VALENCE with papers.

Valence. So must it be ! I have examined
these

With scarce a palpitating heart—so calm,
Keeping her image almost wholly off,
Setting upon myself determined watch,
Repelling to the uttermost his claims :

And the result is—all men would pronounce
And not I, only, the result to be—

Berthold is heir ; she has no shade of right

To the distinction which divided us,

But, suffered to rule first, I know not why,

Her rule connived at by those Kings and Popes,

To serve some devil's-purpose,—now 'tis
gained,

Whate'er it was, the rule expires as well.

—Valence, this rapture . . . selfish can it be ?

Eject it from your heart, her home !—It stays !

Ah, the brave world that opens on us both !

—Do my poor townsmen so esteem it ?
Cleves,—

I need not your pale faces ! This, reward

For service done to you ? Too horrible !

I never served you : 'twas myself I served—

Nay, served not—rather saved from punishment

Which, had I failed you then, would plague me now.

My life continues yours, and your life, mine.

But if, to take God's gift, I swerve no step—

Cleves ! If I breathe no prayer for it—if she, [Footsteps without.]

Colombe, that comes now, freely gives her-
self—

Will Cleves require, that, turning thus to her,
I . . .

Enter Prince BERTHOLD.

Pardon, sir ! I did not look for you Till night, i' the Hall ; nor have as yet declared

My judgment to the lady.

Berthold. So I hoped.

Valence. And yet I scarcely know why that should check

The frank disclosure of it first to you—

What her right seems, and what, in consequence,

She will decide on.

Berthold. That I need not ask.

Valence. You need not : I have proved the lady's mind :

And, justice being to do, dare act for her.

Berthold. Doubtless she has a very noble mind.

Valence. Oh, never fear but she'll in each conjuncture

Bear herself bravely ! She no whit depends
On circumstance ; as she adorns a throne,
She had adorned . . .

Berthold. A cottage—in what book
Have I read that, of every queen that lived ?
A throne ! You have not been instructed,
sure,

To forestall my request ?

Valence. 'Tis granted, sir !
My heart instructs me. I have scrutinized
Your claims . . .

Berthold. Ah—claims, you mean,
at first preferred ?

I come, before the hour appointed me,
To pray you let those claims at present rest,
In favour of a new and stronger one.

Valence. You shall not need a stronger :
on the part

(O) the lady, all you offer I accept,
Since one clear right suffices : yours is clear.
Propose !

Berthold. I offer her my hand.

Valence. Your hand ?

Berthold. A Duke's, yourself say ; and, at no far time,
Something here whispers me—an Emperor's.
The lady's mind is noble : which induced
This seizure of occasion ere my claims
Were—settled, let us amicably say !

Valence. Your hand !

Berthold. (He will fall down and kiss it next !)

Sir, this astonishment's too flattering,
Nor must you hold your mistress' worth so cheap.

Enhance it, rather,—urge that blood is blood—
The daughter of the Burgraves, Landgraves, Markgraves,
Remains their daughter ! I shalt scarce gain-
say.

Elsewhere or here, the lady needs must rule :
Like the imperial crown's great chrysoprase,¹
They talk of—somewhat out of keeping there,
And yet no jewel for a meaner cap.

Valence. You wed the Duchess ?

Berthold. Cry you mercy, friend !
Will the match also influence fortunes here ?
A natural solicitude enough.

Be certain, no bad chance it proves for you !
However high you take your present stand,
There's prospect of a higher still remove—
For Juliers will not be my resting-place,
And, when I have to choose a substitute
To rule the little burgh, I'll think of you
Who need not give your mates a character.
And yet I doubt your fitness to supplant

The grey smooth Chamberlain : he'd hesitate
A doubt his lady could demean herself
So low as to accept me. Courage, sir !
I like your method better : feeling's play
Is franker much, and flatters me beside.

Valence. I am to say, you love her ?

Berthold. Say that too !
Love has no great concernment, thinks the
world,

With a Duke's marriage. How go precedents
In Juliers' story—how use Juliers' Dukes ?
I see you have them here in goodly row ;
Yon must be Luitpold—ay, a stalwart sire !
Say, I have been arrested suddenly
In my ambition's course, its rocky course,
By this sweet flower : I fain would gather it
And then proceed : so say and speedily —(Nor stand there like Duke Luitpold's brazen self !)

Enough, sir : you possess my mind, I think.
This is my claim, the others being withdrawn,
And to this be it that, i' the Hall to-night,
Your lady's answer comes ; till when, farewell ! [He retires.]

Valence [after a pause]. The heavens and earth stay as they were ; my heart
Beats as it beat : the truth remains the truth.
What falls away, then, if not faith in her ?
Was it my faith, that she could estimate
Love's value, and, such faith still guiding me,

¹ A variety of chalcedony.

Dare I now test her? Or grew faith so strong
Solely because no power of test was mine?

Enter the DUCHESS.

The Duchess. My fate, sir! Ah, you turn away. All's over.

But you are sorry for me? Be not so!
What I might have become, and never was,
Regret with me! What I have merely been,
Rejoice I am no longer! What I seem Beginning now, in my new state, to be,
I hope that I am!—for, once my rights proved void,

This heavy roof seems easy to exchange
For the blue sky outside—my lot henceforth.

Valence. And what a lot is Berthold's!

The Duchess. How of him?

Valence. He gathers earth's whole good into his arms;

Standing, as man now, stately, strong and wise,

Marching to fortune, not surprised by her.
One great aim, like a guiding-star, above—
Which tasks strength, wisdom, stateliness, to lift

His manhood to the height that takes the prize;

A prize not near—lest overlooking earth
He rashly spring to seize it—nor remote,
So that he rest upon his path content:
But day by day, while shimmering grows shine,

And the faint circlet prophesies the orb,
He sees so much as, just evolving these,
The stateliness, the wisdom and the strength,
To due completion, will suffice this life,
And lead him at his grandest to the grave.
After this star, out of a night he springs;
A beggar's cradle for the throne of thrones
He quits; so, mounting, feels each step he mounts,

Nor, as from each to each exultingly
He passes, overleaps one grade of joy.
This, for his own good:—with the world,
each gift

Of God and man,—reality, tradition,
Fancy and fact—so well environ him,

That as a mystic panoply they serve—
Of force, untenanted, to awe mankind,
And work his purpose out with half the
world,

While he, their master, dexterously slipt
From such encumbrance, is meantime employed

With his own prowess on the other half.
Thus shall he prosper, every day's success
Adding, to what is he, a solid strength—
An æry might to what encircles him,
Till at the last, so life's routine lends help,
That as the Emperor only breathes and moves,

His shadow shall be watched, his step or stalk

Become a comfort or a portent, how
He trails his ermine take significance,— Till even his power shall cease to be most
power,

And men shall dread his weakness more, not dare

Peril their earth its bravest, first and best,
Its typified invincibility.
Thus shall he go on, greatening, till he ends—
The man of men, the spirit of all flesh,
The fiery centre of an earthly world!

The Duchess. Some such a fortune I had dreamed should rise

Out of my own—that is, above my power
Seemed other, greater potencies to stretch—
Valence. For you?

The Duchess. It was not I moved there, I think:

But one I could,—though constantly beside,
And aye approaching,—still keep distant
from,

And so adore. 'Twas a man moved there.

Valence. Who?

The Duchess. I felt the spirit, never saw the face.

Valence. See it! 'Tis Berthold's! He enables you

To realize your vision.

The Duchess. Berthold?

Valence. Duke—

Emperor to be: he proffers you his hand.

The Duchess. Generous and princely!

- Valence.* He is all of this.
The Duchess. Thanks, Berthold, for my father's sake! No hand
 Degrades me.
Valence. You accept the proffered hand?
The Duchess. That he should love me!
Valence. "Loved" I did not say.
 Had that been—love might so incline the Prince
 To the world's good, the world that's at his foot,—
 I do not know, this moment, I should dare
 Desire that you refused the world—and Cleves—
 The sacrifice he asks.
The Duchess. Not love me, sir?
Valence. He scarce affirmed it.
The Duchess. May not deeds affirm?
Valence. What does he? . . . Yes, yes, very much he does!
 All the shame saved, he thinks, and sorrow saved—
 Immitigable sorrow, so he thinks,—
 Sorrow that's deeper than we dream, perchance.
The Duchess. Is not this love?
Valence. So very much he does!
 For look, you can descend now gracefully:
 All doubts are banished, that the world might have,
 Or worst, the doubts yourself, in after-time,
 May call up of your heart's sincereness now.
 To such, reply, "I could have kept my rule—
 "Increased it to the utmost of my dreams—
 "Yet I abjured it." This, he does for you:
 It is munificently much.
The Duchess. Still "much!"
 But why is it not love, sir? Answer me!
Valence. Because not one of Berthold's words and looks
 Had gone with love's presentment of a flower
 To the beloved: because bold confidence,
 Open superiority, free pride—
 Love owns not, yet were all that Berthold owned:
 Because where reason, even, finds no flaw,
 Unerringly a lover's instinct may.
- The Duchess.* You reason, then, and doubt?
Valence. I love, and know.
The Duchess. You love? How strange!
 I never cast a thought
 On that. Just see our selfishness! You seemed
 So much my own . . . I had no ground—and yet,
 I never dreamed another might divide
 My power with you, much less exceed it.
Valence. Lady,
 I am yours wholly.
The Duchess. Oh, no, no, not mine!
 'Tis not the same now, never more can be.
 —Your first love, doubtless! Well, what's gone from me?
 What have I lost in you?
Valence. My heart replies—
 No loss there! So, to Berthold back again:
 This offer of his hand, he bids me make—
 Its obvious magnitude is well to weigh.
The Duchess. She's . . . yes, she must be very fair for you!
Valence. I am a simple advocate of Cleves.
The Duchess. You! With the heart and brain that so helped me,
 I fancied them exclusively my own,
 Yet find are subject to a stronger sway!
 She must be . . . tell me, is she very fair?
Valence. Most fair, beyond conception or belief.
The Duchess. Black eyes?—no matter!
 Colombe, the world leads
 Its life without you, whom your friends professed
 The only woman: see how true they spoke!
 One lived this while, who never saw your face,
 Nor heard your voice—unless . . . Is she from Cleves?
Valence. Cleves knows her well.
The Duchess. Ah—just a fancy, now!
 When you poured forth the wrongs of Cleves,
 —I said,
 —Thought, that is, afterward . . .
Valence. You thought of me?
The Duchess. Of whom else? Only such great cause, I thought,

For such effect : see what true love can do !
 Cleves is his love. I almost fear to ask
 . . . And will not. This is idling : to our work !

Admit before the Prince, without reserve,
 My claims misgrounded ; then may follow better.

. . . When you poured out Cleves' wrongs impetuously,

Was she in your mind ?

Valence. All done was done for her —To humble me !

The Duchess. She will be proud at least.

Valence. She ?

The Duchess. When you tell her.

Valence. That will never be.

The Duchess. How — are there sweeter things you hope to tell ?

No, sir ! You counselled me, —I counsel you
 In the one point I — any woman — can.

Your worth, the first thing ; let her own come next —

Say what you did through her, and she
 through you —

The praises of her beauty afterward !

Will you ?

Valence. I dare not.

The Duchess. Dare not ?

Valence. She I love

Suspects not such a love in me.

The Duchess. You jest.

Valence. The lady is above me and away.
 Not only the brave form, and the bright mind,
 And the great heart, combine to press me low —

But all the world calls rank divides us.

The Duchess. Rank !

Now grant me patience ! Here's a man declares

Oracularly in another's case —

Sees the true value and the false, for them —

Nay, bids them see it, and they straight do
 see.

You called my court's love worthless — so it turned :

I threw away as dross my heap of wealth,
 And here you stickle for a piece or two !

First — has she seen you ?

Valence. Yes.

The Duchess. She loves you, then.

Valence. One flash of hope burst ; then succeeded night :

And all's at darkest now. Impossible !

The Duchess. We'll try : you are — so to speak — my subject yet ?

Valence. As ever — to the death.

The Duchess. Obey me, then !

Valence. I must.

The Duchess. Approach her, and . . .
 no ! first of all

Get more assurance. "My instructress," say,
 "Was great, descended from a line of kings,
 "And even fair" — (wait why I say this folly) —

"She said, of all men, none for eloquence,
 "Courage, and (what cast even these to shade)
 "The heart they sprung from, — none deserved like him

"Who saved her at her need : if she said this,
 "What should not one I love, say ?"

Valence. Heaven — this hope —
 Oh, lady, you are filling me with fire !

The Duchess. Say this ! — nor think I bid you cast aside

One touch of all the awe and reverence ;
 Nay, make her proud for once to heart's content

That all this wealth of heart and soul's her
 own !

Think you are all of this, — and, thinking it,
 . . . (Obey !)

Valence. I cannot choose.

The Duchess. Then, kneel to her
 [VALENCE sinks on his knee.]

I dream !

Valence. Have mercy ! Yours, unto the death, —

I have obeyed. Despise, and let me die !

The Duchess. Alas, sir, is it to be ever
 thus ?

Even with you as with the world ? I know
 This morning's service was no vulgar deed
 Whose motive, once it dares avow itself,
 Explains all done and infinitely more,
 So, takes the shelter of a nobler cause.
 Your service named its true source, — loyalty !

While I career on all the world for stage,
There needs at home my representative.

The Duchess. —Such, rather, would some warrior-woman be—

One dowered with lands and gold, or rich in
friends—

One like yourself.

Berthold. Lady, I am myself,
And have all these: I want what's not myself, Nor has all these. Why give one hand two swords?

Here's one already: be a friend's next gift
A silk glove, if you will—I have a sword.

The Duchess. You love me, then?

Berthold. Your lineage I revere,
Honour your virtue, in your truth believe,
Do homage to your intellect, and bow
Before your peerless beauty.

The Duchess. But, for love—

Berthold. A further love I do not understand.

Our best course is to say these hideous truths,
And see them, once said, grow endurable:
Like waters shuddering from their central bed,
Black with the midnight bowels of the earth,
That, once up-spouted by an earthquake's
throe,

A portent and a terror—soon subside,
Freshen apace, take gold and rainbow hues
In sunshine, sleep in shadow, and at last Grow common to the earth as hills or trees—
Accepted by all things they came to scare.

The Duchess. You cannot love, then?

Berthold. —Charlemagne, perhaps!
Are you not over-curious in love-lore?

The Duchess. I have become so, very recently.

It seems, then, I shall best deserve esteem,
Respect, and all your candour promises,
By putting on a calculating mood—
Asking the terms of my becoming yours?

Berthold. Let me not do myself injustice,
neither.

Because I will not condescend to fictions
That promise what my soul can ne'er acquit,
It does not follow that my guarded phrase
May not include far more of what you seek,
Than wide profession of less scrupulous men.

You will be Empress, once for all: with me
The Pope disputes supremacy—you stand,
And none gainsays, the earth's first woman.

The Duchess. That—

Or simple Lady of Ravestein again?

Berthold. The matter's not in my arbitra-
ment:

Now I have made my claims—which I regret—

Cede one, cede all.

The Duchess. This claim then, you enforce?

Berthold. The world looks on.

The Duchess. And when must I decide?

Berthold. When, lady? Have I said thus much so promptly

For nothing?—Poured out, with such pains,
at once

What I might else have suffered to ooze forth
Droplet by droplet in a lifetime long—

For aught less than as prompt an answer,
too?

All's fairly told now: who can teach you
more?

The Duchess. I do not see him.

Berthold. I shall ne'er deceive.

This offer should be made befittingly
Did time allow the better setting forth
The good of it, with what is not so good,
Advantage, and disparagement as well:
But as it is, the sum of both must serve.
I am already weary of this place;
My thoughts are next stage on to Rome.
Decide!

The Empire—or,—not even Juliers now!

Hail to the Empress—farewell to the Duchess!

[The Courtiers, who have been drawing nearer and nearer, interpose.]

Gaucelme. —“Farewell,” Prince? when we break in at our risk—

Clugnet. Almost upon court-licence trespassing—

Gaucelme. —To point out how your claims are valid yet!

You know not, by the Duke her father's will,
The lady, if she weds beneath her rank,
Forfeits her Duchy in the next heir's favour—
So 'tis expressly stipulate. And if
It can be shown 'tis her intent to wed

A subject, then yourself, next heir, by right Succeed to Juliers.

Berthold. What insanity?—

Guibert. Sir, there's one Valence, the pale fiery man

You saw and heard this morning—thought,
no doubt,

Was of considerable standing here :

I put it to your penetration, Prince,

If aught save love, the truest love for her

Could make him serve the lady as he did !

He's simply a poor advocate of Cleves

—Creeps here with difficulty, finds a place

With danger, gets in by a miracle,

And for the first time meets the lady's face—

So runs the story : is that credible ?

For, first—no sooner in, than he's apprised

Fortunes have changed ; you are all-powerful
here,

The lady as powerless : he stands fast by her !

The Duchess [aside]. And do such deeds spring up from love alone ?

Guibert. But here occurs the question, does the lady

Love him again ? I say, how else can she ?

Can she forget how he stood singly forth

In her defence, dared outrage all of us,

Insult yourself—for what, save love's reward ?

The Duchess [aside]. And is love then the sole reward of love ?

Guibert. But, love him as she may and must—you ask,

Means she to wed him ? “Yes,” both natures answer !

Both, in their pride, point out the sole result ;

Nought less would he accept nor she propose.

For each conjecture was she great enough

—Will be, for this.

Clugnet. Though, now that this is known,

Policy, doubtless, urges she deny . . .

The Duchess. —What, sir, and wherefore ?

—since I am not sure

That all is any other than you say !

You take this Valence, hold him close to
me,

Him with his actions : can I choose but look ?

I am not sure, love trulier shows itself

Than in this man, you hate and would degrade,

Yet, with your worst abatement, show me
thus.

Nor am I—(thus made look within myself, Ere I had dared)—now that the look is
dared—

Sure that I do not love him !

Guibert. I hear you, Prince ?

Berthold. And what, sirs, please you, may this prattle mean

Unless to prove with what alacrity

You give your lady's secrets to the world ?

How much indebted, for discovering

That quality, you make me, will be found

When there's a keeper for my own to seek.

Courtiers. “Our lady ?”

Berthold. —She assuredly remains.

The Duchess. Ah, Prince—and you too can be generous ?

You could renounce your power, if this were so,

And let me, as these phrase it, wed my love

Yet keep my Duchy ? You perhaps exceed Ilhim, even, in disinterestedness !

Berthold. How, lady, should all this affect my purpose ?

Your will and choice are still as ever, free.

Say, you have known a worthier than myself

In mind and heart, of happier form and face—

Others must have their birthright : I have gifts,

To balance theirs, not blot them out of sight.

Against a hundred alien qualities,

I lay the prize I offer. I am nothing :

Wed you the Empire ?

The Duchess. And my heart away ?

Berthold. When have I made pretension to your heart ?

I give none. I shall keep your honour safe ;

With mine I trust you, as the sculptor trusts

Yon marble woman with the marble rose,

Loose on her hand, she never will let fall,

In graceful, slight, silent security.

You will be proud of my world-wide career,

And I content in you the fair and good.

What were the use of planting a few seeds

The thankless climate never would mature—

Affections all repelled by circumstance ?

Enough : to these no credit I attach,—
To what you own, find nothing to object.
Write simply on my requisition's face
What shall content my friends—that you admit,
As Colombe of Ravestein, the claims therein,
Or never need admit them, as my wife—
And either way, all's ended !

The Duchess.

Let all end !

Berthold. The requisition !

Guibert. —Valence holds, of course !

Berthold. Desire his presence !

[ADOLF goes out.]

Courtiers [to each other]. Out it all comes yet ;

He'll have his word against the bargain yet ;
He's not the man to tamely acquiesce.

One passionate appeal—upbraiding even,
May turn the tide again. Despair not yet !

[They retire a little.]

Berthold [to MELCHIOR]. The Empire has its old success, my friend !

Melchior. You've had your way : before the spokesman speaks,

Let me, but this once, work a problem out,
And ever more be dumb ! The Empire wins ?
To better purpose have I read my books !

Enter VALENCE.

Melchior [to the Courtiers]. Apart, my masters !

[To VALENCE.] Sir, one word with you !
I am a poor dependant of the Prince's—
Pitched on to speak, as of slight consequence.
You are no higher, I find : in other words,
We two, as probably the wisest here,
Need not hold diplomatic talk like fools.
Suppose I speak, divesting the plain fact
Of all their tortuous phrases, fit for them ?
Do you reply so, and what trouble saved !
The Prince, then—an embroiled strange heap of news

This moment reaches him—if true or false,
All dignity forbids he should inquire
In person, or by worthier deputy ;
Yet somehow must inquire, lest slander come :
And so, 'tis I am pitched on. You have heard
His offer to your lady ?

Valence.

Yes.

Melchior.

—Conceive

Her joy thereat ?

Valence. I cannot.

Melchior.

No one can.

All draws to a conclusion, therefore.

Valence [aside].

So !

No after-judgment—no first thought revised—
Her first and last decision !—me, she leaves,
Takes him ; a simple heart is flung aside,
The ermine o'er a heartless breast embraced.
Oh Heaven, this mockery has been played too oft !

Once, to surprise the angels—twice, that fiends
Recording, might be proud they chose not so—Thrice, many thousand times, to teach the
world

All men should pause, misdoubt their strength, since men

Can have such chance yet fail so signally,
But ever, ever this farewell to Heaven,
Welcome to earth—this taking death for life—
This spurning love and kneeling to the world—
Oh Heaven, it is too often and too old !

Melchior. Well, on this point, what but an absurd rumour

Arises—these, its source—its subject, you !
Your faith and loyalty misconstruing,
They say, your service claims the lady's hand !
Of course, nor Prince nor lady can respond :
Yet something must be said : for, were it true
You made such claim, the Prince would . . .

Valence.

Well, sir,—would ?

Melchior. —Not only probably withdraw his suit,
But, very like, the lady might be forced Accept your own. Oh, there are reasons
why !

But you'll excuse at present all save one,—
I think so. What we want is, your own witness,
For, or against—her good, or yours : decide !
Valence [aside]. Be it her good if she accounts it so !

[After a contest.] For what am I but hers, to choose as she ?

Who knows how far, beside, the light from her
May reach, and dwell with, what she looks upon ?

Melchior [to the Prince]. Now to him, you !

- Berthold* [to VALENCE]. My friend acquaints you, sir,
The noise runs . . .
- Valence*. —Prince, how fortunate are you,
Wedding her as you will, in spite of noise,
To show belief in love! Let her but love you,
All else you disregard! What else can be?
You know how love is incompatible
With falsehood—purifies, assimilates
All other passions to itself.
- Melchior*. Ay, sir:
But softly! Where, in the object we select,
Such love is, perchance, wanting?
- Valence*. Then indeed,
What is it you can take?
- Melchior*. Nay, ask the world!
Youth, beauty, virtue, an illustrious name,
An influence o'er mankind.
- Valence*. When man perceives . . .
—Ah, I can only speak as for myself!
- The Duchess*. Speak for yourself!
- Valence*. May I?—no, I have spoken,
And time's gone by. Had I seen such an one,
As I loved her—weighing thoroughly that word—
So should my task be to evolve her love:
If for myself!—if for another—well.
- Berthold*. Heroic truly! And your sole reward,—
The secret pride in yielding up love's right?
- Valence*. Who thought upon reward? And yet how much
Comes after—oh, what amplest recompense!
Is the knowledge of her, nought? the memory, nought?
- Lady, should such an one have looked on you,
Ne'er wrong yourself so far as quote the world
And say, love can go unrequited here!
You will have blessed him to his whole life's end—
Low passions hindered, baser cares kept back,
All goodness cherished where you dwelt—and dwell.
What would he have? He holds you—you, both form
- And mind, in his,—where self-love makes such room
For love of you, he would not serve you now
The vulgar way,—repulse your enemies,
Win you new realms, or best, to save the old
Die blissfully—that's past so long ago!
He wishes you no need, thought, care of him—
Your good, by any means, himself unseen,
Away, forgotten!—He gives that life's task up,
As it were . . . but this charge which I return—[Offers the requisition, which she takes.
Wishing your good.
The Duchess [having subscribed it]. And opportunely, sir—
Since at a birthday's close, like this of mine,
Good wishes gentle deeds reciprocate.
Most on a wedding-day, as mine is too,
Should gifts be thought of: yours comes first by right.
Ask of me!
Berthold. He shall have whate'er he asks,
For your sake and his own.
Valence [aside]. If I should ask—
The withered bunch of flowers she wears—perhaps,
One last touch of her hand, I never more
Shall see! [After a pause, presenting his paper to the Prince.
Cleves' Prince, redress the wrongs of Cleves!
Berthold. I will, sir!
The Duchess [as VALENCE prepares to retire]. —Nay, do out your duty, first!
You bore this paper; I have registered
My answer to it: read it and have done!
[VALENCE reads it.
I take him—give up Juliers and the world.
This is my Birthday.
Melchior. Berthold, my one hero
Of the world she gives up, one friend worth my books,
Sole man I think it pays the pains to watch,—
Speak, for I know you through your Popes and Kings!]

Berthold [after a pause]. Lady, well rewarded ! Sir, as well deserved !
 I could not imitate—I hardly envy—
 I do admire you. All is for the best.
 Too costly a flower were this, I see it now,
 To pluck and set upon my barren helm
 To wither—any garish plume will do.
 I'll not insult you and refuse your Duchy—
 You can so well afford to yield it me,
 And I were left, without it, sadly lorn.
 As it is—for me—if that will flatter you,
 A somewhat wearier life seems to remain
 Than I thought possible where . . . 'faith, their life

Begins already ! They're too occupied
 To listen : and few words content me best.

[Abruptly to the Courtiers.] I am your Duke, though ! Who obey me here ?

The Duchess. Adolf and Sabyne follow us—

Guibert [starting from the Courtiers].

—And I ?

Do I not follow them, if I mayn't you ?
 Shall not I get some little duties up
 At Ravestein and emulate the rest ?
 God save you, Gaucelme ! 'Tis my Birthday,
 too !

Berthold. You happy handful that remain
 with me

. . . That is, with Dietrich the black Barna-bite

I shall leave over you—will earn your wages

Or Dietrich has forgot to ply his trade !

Meantime,—go copy me the precedents

Of every installation, proper styles

And pedigrees of all your Juliers' Dukes—

While I prepare to plod on my old way,

And somewhat wearily, I must confess !

The Duchess [with a light joyous laugh as she turns from them]. Come, Valence, to our friends, God's earth . . .

Valence [as she falls into his arms].

—And thee !

DRAMATIC ROMANCES.

184— 185—

INCIDENT OF THE FRENCH CAMP.

v.

I.

You know, we French stormed Ratisbor
A mile or so away,
On a little mound, Napoleon
Stood on our storming-day ;
With neck out-thrust, you fancy how,
Legs wide, arms locked behind,
As if to balance the prone brow
Oppressive with its mind.

II.

Just as perhaps he mused " My plans
" That soar, to earth may fall,
" Let once my army-leader Lannes
" Waver at yonder wall," —
Out 'twixt the battery-smokes there flew
A rider, bound on bound
Full-galloping ; nor bridle drew
Until he reached the mound.

III.

Then off there flung in smiling joy,
And held himself erect
By just his horse's mane, a boy :
You hardly could suspect—
(So tight he kept his lips compressed, Scarce any blood came through)
You looked twice ere you saw his breast
Was all but shot in two.

IV.

" Well," cried he, " Emperor, by God's grace
" We've got you Ratisbon !
" The Marshal's in the market-place,
" And you'll be there anon
" To see your flag-bird flap his vans
" Where I, to heart's desire,
" Perched him !" The chief's eye flashed ;
his plans
Soared up again like fire.

The chief's eye flashed ; but presently
Softened itself, as sheathes
A film the mother-eagle's eye
When her bruised eaglet breathes ;
" You're wounded !" " Nay," the soldier's pride
Touched to the quick, he said :
" I'm killed, Sire !" And his chief beside Smiling the boy fell dead.

THE PATRIOT.

AN OLD STORY.

I.

It was roses, roses, all the way,
With myrtle mixed in my path like mad :
The house-roofs seemed to heave and sway,
The church-spires flamed, such flags they had,
A year ago on this very day.

II.

The air broke into a mist with bells,
The old walls rocked with the crowd and cries.
Had I said, " Good folk, mere noise repels—
But give me your sun from yonder
skies !"
They had answered, " And afterward, what else ?"

III.

Alack, it was I who leaped at the sun
To give it my loving friends to keep !
Nought man could do, have I left un-
done :
And you see my harvest, what I reap
This very day, now a year is run.

IV.

There's nobody on the house-tops now—
Just a palsied few at the windows set ;
For the best of the sight is, all allow,
At the Shambles' Gate—or, better yet,
By the very scaffold's foot, I trow.

V.

I go in the rain, and, more than needs,
A rope cuts both my wrists behind ;
And I think, by the feel, my forehead bleeds,
For they fling, whoever has a mind,
Stones at me for my year's misdeeds.

VI.

Thus I entered, and thus I go !
In triumphs, people have dropped down
dead.
"Paid by the world, what dost thou owe
"Me?"—God might question ; now instead,
'Tis God shall repay : I am safer so.

MY LAST DUCHESS.

FERRARA.

THAT's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now: Frà Pandolf's hands
Worked busily a day, and there she stands.
Will't please you sit and look at her? I said
"Frà Pandolf" by design, for never read
Strangers like you that pictured countenance,
The depth and passion of its earnest glance,
But to myself they turned (since none puts by The curtain, I have drawn for you, but I)
And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst, How such a glance came there ; so, not the
first

Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not
Her husband's presence only, called that spot
Of joy into the Duchess' cheek : perhaps Frà Pandolf chanced to say "Her mantle laps

"Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
"Must never hope to reproduce the faint

"Half-flush that dies along her throat :"
such stuff.

Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough
For calling up that spot of joy. She had
A heart—how shall I say?—toosoon made glad,
Too easily impressed ; she liked whate'er
She looked on, and her looks went ev'rywhere.
Sir, 'twas all one ! My favour at her breast,
The dropping of the daylight in the West,
The bough of cherries some officious fool
Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
She rode with round the terrace—all and each
Would draw from her alike the approving
speech,

Or blush, at least. She thanked men,— good ! but thanked

Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked
My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame
This sort of trifling? Even had you skill
In speech—(which I have not)—to make your will

Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
"Or that in you disgusts me ; here you miss,
"Or there exceed the mark"—and if she let Herself be lessoned so, nor plainly set
Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse, —E'en then would be some stooping ; and I
choose

Never to stoop. Oh sir, she smiled, no doubt, Whene'er I passed her ; but who passed without

Much the same smile? This grew ; I gave commands ;

Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands

As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet

The company below, then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretence
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed ;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,

Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for
me !

COUNT GISMOND.

AIX IN PROVENCE.

I.

CHRIST God who savest man, save most
 Of men Count Gismond who saved me !
 Count Gauthier, when he chose his post,
 Chose time and place and company
 To suit it ; when he struck at length
 My honour, 'twas with all his strength.

II.

And doubtlessly ere he could draw
 All points to one, he must have schemed
 That miserable morning saw
 Few half so happy as I seemed,
 While being dressed in queen's array
 To give our tourney prize away.

III.

I thought they loved me, did me grace
 To please themselves ; 'twas all their deed ;
 God makes, or fair or foul, our face ;
 If showing mine so caused to bleed
 My cousins' hearts, they should have dropped
 A word, and straight the play had stopped.

IV.

They, too, so beauteous ! Each a queen
 By virtue of her brow and breast ;
 Not needing to be crowned, I mean,
 As I do. E'en when I was dressed,
 Had either of them spoke, instead
 Of glancing sideways with still head !

V.

But no · they let me laugh, and sing
 My birthday song quite through, adjust
 The last rose in my garland, fling
 A last look on the mirror, trust
 My arms to each an arm of theirs,
 And so descend the castle-stairs—

And come out on the morning-troop
 Of merry friends who kissed my cheek,

And called me queen, and made me stoop
 Under the canopy—(a streak
 That pierced it, of the outside sun,
 Powdered with gold 'its gloom's soft dun)—

VII.

And they could let me take my state
 And foolish throne amid applause
 Of all come there to celebrate
 My queen's-day—Oh I think the cause
 Of much was, they forgot no crowd
 Makes up for parents in their shroud !

VIII.

However that be, all eyes were bent
 Upon me, when my cousins cast
 Theirs down ; 'twas time I should present
 The victor's crown, but . . . there, 'twill
 last
 No long time . . . the old mist again
 Blinds me as then it did. How vain !

IX.

See ! Gismond's at the gate, in talk
 With his two boys : I can proceed.
 Well, at that moment, who should stalk
 Forth boldly—to my face, indeed—
 But Gauthier, and he thundered "Stay !"
 And all stayed. "Bring no crowns, I say !

X.

"Bring torches ! Wind the penance-sheet
 "About her ! Let her shun the chaste,
 "Or lay herself before their feet !
 "Shall she whose body I embraced
 "A night long, queen it in the day ?
 "For honour's sake no crowns, I say !"

XI.

I ? What I answered ? As I live,
 I never fancied such a thing
 As answer possible to give.
 What says the body when they spring
 Some monstrous torture-engine's whole
 Strength on it ? No more says the soul.

XII.

Till out strode Gismond ; then I knew
That I was saved. I never met
His face before, but, at first view,
I felt quite sure that God had set Himself to Satan ; who would spend
A minute's mistrust on the end ?

XIII.

He strode to Gauthier, in his throat
Gave him the lie, then struck his mouth
With one back-handed blow that wrote
In blood men's verdict there. North, South, East, West, I looked. The lie was dead,
And damned, and truth stood up instead.

XIV.

This glads me most, that I enjoyed
The heart of the joy, with my content
In watching Gismond unalloyed
By any doubt of the event :
God took that on him—I was bid
Watch Gismond for my part : I did.

XV.

Did I not watch him while he let
His armourer just brace his greaves,
Rivet his hauberk, on the fret
The while ! His foot . . . my memory leaves
No least stamp out, nor how anon
He pulled his ringing gauntlets on.

XVI.

And e'en before the trumpet's sound
Was finished, prone lay the false knight,
Prone as his lie, upon the ground :
Gismond flew at him, used no sleight
O' the sword, but open-breasted drove,
Cleaving till out the truth he clove.

XVII.

Which done, he dragged him to my feet
And said " Here die, but end thy breath
" In full confession, lest thou fleet
" From my first, to God's second death !
" Say, hast thou lied ? " And, " I have lied
" To God and her," he said, and died.

XVIII.

Then Gismond, kneeling to me, asked —What safe my heart holds, though no
word
Could I repeat now, if I tasked
My powers for ever, to a third
Dear even as you are. Pass the rest
Until I sank upon his breast.

XIX.

Over my head his arm he flung.
Against the world ; and scarce I felt
His sword (that dripped by me and swung)
A little shifted in its belt :
For he began to say the while
How South our home lay many a mile.

XX.

So 'mid the shouting multitude
We two walked forth to never more
Return. My cousins have pursued
Their life, untroubled as before
I vexed them. Gauthier's dwelling-place
God lighten ! May his soul find grace !

XXI.

Our elder boy has got the clear
Great brow ; tho' when his brother's black
Full eye shows scorn, it . . . Gismond here?
And have you brought my tercel¹ back ?
I just was telling Adela
How many birds it struck since May.

THE BOY AND THE ANGEL.

MORNING, evening, noon and night,
" Praise God ! " sang Theocrite.

Then to his poor trade he turned,
Whereby the daily meal was earned.

Hard he laboured, long and well ;
O'er his work the boy's curls fell.

But ever, at each period,
He stopped and sang, "Praise God!"

Then back again his curls he threw,
And cheerful turned to work anew.

Said Blaise, the listening monk, "Well done;
"I doubt not thou art heard, my son:"

"As well as if thy voice to-day
"Were praising God, the Pope's great way.

"This Easter Day, the Pope at Rome
"Praises God from Peter's dome."

Said Theocrite, "Would God that I "Might praise him, that great way, and die!"

Night passed, day shone,
And Theocrite was gone.

With God a day endures away,
A thousand years are but a day.

God said in heaven, "Nor day nor night
"Now brings the voice of my delight."

Then Gabriel, like a rainbow's birth,
Spread his wings and sank to earth;

Entered, in flesh, the empty cell,
Lived there, and played the craftsman well;

And morning, evening, noon and night,
Praised God in place of Theocrite.

And from a boy, to youth he grew:
The man put off the stripling's hue:

The man matured and fell away
Into the season of decay:

And ever o'er the trade he bent,
And ever lived on earth content.

(He did God's will; to him, all one
If on the earth or in the sun.)

God said, "A praise is in mine ear;
"There is no doubt in it, no fear:

"So sing old worlds, and so
"New worlds that from my footstool go.

"Clearer loves sound other ways:
"I miss my little human praise."

Then forth sprang Gabriel's wings, off fell
The flesh disguise, remained the cell.

'Twas Easter Day: he flew to Rome,
And paused above Saint Peter's dome.

In the tiring-room close by
The great outer gallery,

With his holy vestments dight,
Stood the new Pope, Theocrite:

And all his past career
Came back upon him clear,

Since when, a boy, he plied his trade,
Till on his life the sickness weighed;

And in his cell, when death drew near,
An angel in a dream brought cheer:

And rising from the sickness drear
He grew a priest, and now stood here.

To the East with praise he turned,
And on his sight the angel burned.

"I bore thee from thy craftsman's cell
"And set thee here; I did not well.

"Vainly I left my angel-sphere;
"Vain was thy dream of many a year.

"Thy voice's praise seemed weak; it dropped—
"Creation's chorus stopped!

"Go back and praise again
"The early way, while I remain.

"With that weak voice of our disdain,
 "Take up creation's pausing strain.
 "Back to the cell and poor employ :
 "Resume the craftsman and the boy !"

Theocrite grew old at home ;
 A new Pope dwelt in Peter's dome.

One vanished as the other died :
 They sought God side by side.

INSTANS TYRANNUS.

I.

Of the million or two, more or less,
 I rule and possess,
 One man, for some cause undefined,
 Was least to my mind.

II.

I struck him, he grovelled of course—
 For, what was his force ?
 I pinned him to earth with my weight
 And persistence of hate :
 And he lay, would not moan, would not curse,
 As his lot might be worse.

III.

"Were the object less mean, would he stand
 "At the swing of my hand !
 "For obscurity helps him and blots
 "The hole where he squats."
 So, I set my five wits on the stretch
 To inveigle the wretch.
 All in vain ! Gold and jewels I threw,
 Still he couched there perdue ;
 I tempted his blood and his flesh,
 Hid in roses my mesh,
 Choicest cates and the flagon's best spilt :
 Still he kept to his filth.

IV.

I had he kith now or kin, were access
 To his heart, did I press :
 Just a son or a mother to seize !
 No such booty as these.

Were it simply a friend to pursue
 'Mid my million or two,
 Who could pay me in person or pelf
 What he owes me himself !
 No : I could not but smile through my chafe :
 For the fellow lay safe
 As his mates do, the midge and the nit,
 —Through minuteness, to wit.

Then a humour more great took its place
 At the thought of his face,
 The droop, the low cares of the mouth,
 The trouble uncouth
 'Twixt the brows, all that air one is fain
 To put out of its pain.
 And, "no !" I admonished myself,
 "Is one mocked by an elf,
 "Is one baffled by toad or by rat ?
 "The gravamen's in that !
 "How the lion, who crouches to suit
 "His back to my foot,
 "Would admire that I stand in debate !
 "But the small turns the great
 "If it vexes you,—that is the thing !
 "Toad or rat vex the king ?
 "Though I waste half my realm to unearth
 "Toad or rat, 'tis well worth !"

So, I soberly laid my last plan
 To extinguish the man.
 Round his creep-hole, with never a break
 Ran my fires for his sake ;
 Over-head, did my thunder combine
 With my underground mine :
 Till I looked from my labour content
 To enjoy the event.

VII.

When sudden . . . how think ye, the end ?
 Did I say "without friend" ?
 Say rather, from marge to blue marge
 The whole sky grew his targe
 With the sun's self for visible boss,
 While an Arm ran across
 Which the earth heaved beneath like a breast
 Where the wretch was safe prest !

Do you see? Just my vengeance complete,
 The man sprang to his feet,
 Stood erect, caught at God's skirts, and prayed!
 —So, / was afraid!

MESMERISM.

I.

ALL I believed is true!
 I am able yet
 All I want, to get
 By a method as strange as new:
 Dare I trust the same to you?

II.

If at night, when doors are shut,
 And the wood-worm picks,
 And the death-watch ticks,
 And the bar has a flag of smut,
 And a cat's in the water-butt—

III.

And the socket floats and flares,
 And the house-beams groan,
 And a foot unknown
 Is surmised on the garret-stairs,
 And the locks slip unawares—

IV.

And the spider, to serve his ends,
 By a sudden thread,
 Arms and legs outspread,
 On the table's midst descends,
 Comes to find, God knows what friends!—

V.

If since eve drew in, I say,
 I have sat and brought
 (So to speak) my thought
 To bear on the woman away,
 Till I felt my hair turn grey—

VI.

Till I seemed to have and hold,
 In the vacancy
 'Twixt the wall and me,
 From the hair-plait's chestnut gold
 To the foot in its muslin fold—

VII.

Have and hold, then and there,
 Her, from head to foot,
 Breathing and mute,
 Passive and yet aware,
 In the grasp of my steady stare—

VIII.

Hold and have, there and then,
 All her body and soul
 That completes my whole,
 All that women add to men,
 In the clutch of my steady ken—

IX.

Having and holding, till
 I imprint her fast
 On the void at last
 As the sun does whom he will
 By the calotypist's skill—

X.

Then,—if my heart's strength serve,
 And through all and each
 Of the veils I reach
 To her soul and never swerve,
 Knitting an iron nerve—

XI.

Command her soul to advance
 And inform the shape
 Which has made escape
 And before my countenance
 Answers me her glance—

XII.

I, still with a gesture fit
 Of my hands that best
 Do my soul's behest,
 Pointing the power from it,
 While myself do steadfast sit—

XIII.

Steadfast and still the same
 On my object bent,
 While the hands give vent
 To my ardour and my aim
 And break into very flame—

XIV.

Then I reach, I must believe,
 Not her soul in vain,
 For to me again
 It reaches, and past retrieve
 Is wound in the toils I weave ;

XV.

And must follow as I require,
 As befits a thrall,
 Bringing flesh and all,
 Essence and earth-attire,
 To the source of the tractile fire :

XVI.

Till the house called hers, not mine,
 With a growing weight
 Seems to suffocate
 If she break not its leaden line
 And escape from its close confine.

XVII.

Out of doors into the night !
 On to the maze
 Of the wild wood-ways,
 Not turning to left nor right
 From the pathway, blind with sight—

XVIII.

Making thro' rain and wind
 O'er the broken shrubs,
 'Twixt the stems and stubs,
 With a still, composed, strong mind,
 Nor a care for the world behind—

XIX.

Swifter and still more swift,
 As the crowding peace
 Doth to joy increase
 In the wide blind eyes uplift
 Thro' the darkness and the drift !

XX.

While I—to the shape, I too
 Feel my soul dilate
 Nor a whit abate,
 And relax not a gesture due,
 As I see my belief come true.

XXI.

For, there ! have I drawn or no
 Life to that lip ?
 Do my fingers dip
 In a flame which again they throw
 On the cheek that breaks a-glow ?

XXII.

Ha ! was the hair so first ?
 What, unfiled,
 Made alive, and spread
 Through the void with a rich outburst,
 Chestnut gold-interpersed ?

XXIII.

Like the doors of a casket-shrine,
 See, on either side,
 Her two arms divide
 Till the heart betwixt makes sign,
 Take me, for I am thine !

XXIV.

"Now—now"—the door is heard !
 Hark, the stairs ! and near—
 Nearer—and here—
 "Now !" and at call the third
 She enters without a word.

XXV.

On doth she march and on
 To the fancied shape ;
 It is, past escape,
 Herself, now : the dream is done
 And the shadow and she are one.

XXVI.

First I will pray. Do Thou
 That ownest the soul,
 Yet wilt grant control
 To another, nor disallow
 For a time, restrain me now !

XXVII.

I admonish me while I may,
 Not to squander guilt,
 Since require Thou wilt
 At my hand its price one day !
 What the price is, who can say ?

THE GLOVE.

(PETER RONSARD loquitur.)

"HEIGHO!" yawned one day King Francis,
 "Distance all value enhances !
 "When a man's busy, why, leisure
 "Strikes him as wonderful pleasure :
 "Faith, and at leisure once is he ?
 "Straightway he wants to be busy.
 "Here we've got peace ; and aghast I'm "Caught thinking war the true pastime.
 "Is there a reason in metre ?
 "Give us your speech, master Peter !"
 I who, if mortal dare say so,
 Ne'er am at loss with my Naso,
 "Sire," I replied, "joys prove cloudlets :
 "Men are the merest Ixions"—
 Here the King whistled aloud, "Let's
 "—Heigho—go look at our lions !"
 Such are the sorrowful chances
 If you talk fine to King Francis.

And so, to the courtyard proceeding,
 Our company, Francis was leading,
 Increased by new followers tenfold
 Before he arrived at the penfold ;
 Lords, ladies, like clouds which bedizen
 At sunset the western horizon.
 And Sir De Lorge pressed 'mid the foremost
 With the dame he professed to adore most.
 Oh, what a face ! One by fits eyed
 Her, and the horrible pitside ;
 For the penfold surrounded a hollow
 Which led where the eye scarce dared follow,
 And shelved to the chamber secluded
 Where Bluebeard, the great lion, brooded.
 The King hailed his keeper, an Arab
 As glossy and black as a scarab,¹

And bade him make sport and at once stir
 Up and out of his den the old monster.
 They opened a hole in the wire-work
 Across it, and dropped there a firework,
 And fled : one's heart's beating redoubled ;
 A pause, while the pit's mouth was troubled,
 The blackness and silence so utter,
 By the firework's slow sparkling and sputter ;
 Then earth in a sudden contortion
 Gave out to our gaze her abortion.
 Such a brute ! Were I friend Clement
 Marot

(Whose experience of nature's but narrow,
 And whose faculties move in no small mist
 When he versifies David the Psalmist)
 I should study that brute to describe you
Illum Juda Leonem de Tribu.
 One's whole blood grew curdling and creepy
 To see the black mane, vast and heapy,
 The tail in the air stiff and straining,
 The wide eyes, nor waxing nor waning,
 As over the barrier which bounded
 His platform, and us who surrounded
 The barrier, they reached and they rested
 On space that might stand him in best stead :
 For who knew, he thought, what the amaze-
 ment,
 The eruption of clatter and blaze meant,
 And if, in this minute of wonder,
 No outlet, 'mid lightning and thunder,
 Lay broad, and, his shackles all shivered,
 The lion at last was delivered ?
 Ay, that was the open sky o'erhead !
 And you saw by the flash on his forehead,
 By the hope in those eyes wide and steady,
 He was leagues in the desert already,
 Driving the flocks up the mountain,
 Or catlike couched hard by the fountain
 To waylay the date-gathering negress :
 So guarded he entrance or egress.
 "How he stands !" quoth the King : "we may well swear,
 ("No novice, we've won our spurs elsewhere
 "And so can afford the confession,
 "We exercise wholesome discretion
 "In keeping aloof from his threshold ;
 "Once hold you, those jaws want no fresh
 hold,

" Their first would too pleasantly purloin
 " The visitor's brisket or surloin :
 " But who's he would prove so fool-hardy ?
 " Not the best man of Marignan, pardie ! "

The sentence no sooner was uttered,
 Than over the rails a glove fluttered,
 Fell close to the lion, and rested :
 The dame 'twas, who flung it and jested
 With life so, De Lorge had been wooing
 For months past ; he sat there pursuing
 His suit, weighing out with nonchalance
 Fine speeches like gold from a balance.

Sound the trumpet, no true knight's a tarrier !
 De Lorge made one leap at the barrier, Walked straight to the glove,—while the lion

Ne'er moved, kept his far-reaching eye on
 The palm-tree-edged desert-spring's sapphire,
 And the musky oiled skin of the Kaffir,—
 Picked it up, and as calmly retreated,
 Leaped back where the lady was seated,
 And full in the face of its owner
 Flung the glove.

" Your heart's queen, you dethrone her ?
 " So should I ! "—cried the King—" 'twas mere vanity,
 " Not love, set that task to humanity ! "
 Lords and ladies alike turned with loathing
 From such a proved wolf in sheep's clothing.

Not so, I ; for I caught an expression
 In her brow's undisturbed self-possession
 Amid the Court's scoffing and merriment,—
 As if from no pleasing experiment
 She rose, yet of pain not much heedful
 So long as the process was needful,—
 As if she had tried in a crucible,
 To what " speeches like gold " were reducible,

And, finding the finest prove copper,
 Felt the smoke in her face was but proper ;
 To know what she had not to trust to,
 Was worth all the ashes and dust too.
 She went out 'mid hooting and laughter ;
 Clement Marot stayed ; I followed after,

And asked, as a grace, what it all meant ?
 If she wished not the rash deed's recalcitrant ?
 " For I "—so I spoke—" am a poet :
 " Human nature,—behoves that I know it ! "

She told me, " Too long had I heard " Of the deed proved alone by the word :
 " For my love—what De Lorge would not dare !

" With my scorn—what De Lorge could compare !

" And the endless descriptions of death
 " He would brave when my lip formed a
 breath,

" I must reckon as braved, or, of course,
 " Doubt his word—and moreover, perforce,
 " For such gifts as no lady could spurn,
 " Must offer my love in return.

" When I looked on your lion, it brought
 " All the dangers at once to my thought,
 " Encountered by all sorts of men,
 " Before he was lodged in his den,—
 " From the poor slave whose club or bare
 hands

" Dug the trap, set the snare on the sands,
 " With no King and no Court to applaud,
 " By no shame, should he shrink, overawed,
 " Yet to capture the creature made shift,
 " That his rude boys might laugh at the gift,
 "—To the page who last leaped o'er the fence

" Of the pit, on no greater pretence
 " Than to get back the bonnet he dropped,
 " Lest his pay for a week should be stopped.
 " So, wiser I judged it to make " One trial what ' death for my sake '
 " Really meant, while the power was yet
 mine,

" Than to wait until time should define
 " Such a phrase not so simply as I ;
 " Who took it to mean just ' to die.'
 " The blow a glove gives is but weak :
 " Does the mark yet discolour my cheek ?
 " But when the heart suffers a blow,
 " Will the pain pass so soon, do you know ? "

I looked, as away she was sweeping.
 And saw a youth eagerly keeping

As close as he dared to the doorway.
 No doubt that a noble should more weigh
 His life than befits a plebeian ;
 And yet, had our brute been Nemean—
 (I judge by a certain calm fervour
 The youth stepped with, forward to serve her) —He'd have scarce thought you did him the worst turn

If you whispered "Friend, what you'd get, first earn !"

And when, shortly after, she carried
 Her shame from the Court, and they married,
 To that marriage some happiness, maugre
 The voice of the Court, I dared augur.

For De Lorge, he made women with men vie,
 Those in wonder and praise, these in envy ;
 And in short stood so plain a head taller
 That he wooed and won . . . how do you call her ?

The beauty, that rose in the sequel
 To the King's love, who loved her a week
 well.

And 'twas noticed he never would honour
 De Lorge (who looked daggers upon her)
 With the easy commission of stretching
 His legs in the service, and fetching
 His wife, from her chamber, those straying
 Sad gloves she was always mislaying,
 While the King took the closet to chat in,—
 But of course this adventure came pat in.
 And never the King told the story,
 How bringing a glove brought such glory,
 But the wife smiled—"His nerves are grown firmer :

"Mine he brings now and utters no murmur."

Venienti occurrere morbo !

With which moral I drop my theorbo.

TIME'S REVENGES.

I'VE a Friend, over the sea ;
 I like him, but he loves me.
 It all grew out of the books I write ;
 They find such favour in his sight

That he slaughters you with savage looks
 Because you don't admire my books.
 He does himself though,—and if some vein
 Were to snap to-night in this heavy brain,
 To-morrow month, if I lived to try,
 Round should I just turn quietly,
 Or out of the bedclothes stretch my hand
 Till I found him, come from his foreign land

To be my nurse in this poor place,
 And make my broth and wash my face
 And light my fire and, all the while,
 Bear with his old good-humoured smile
 That I told him "Better have kept away
 "Than come and kill me, night and day,
 "With, worse than fever throbs and shoots,
 "The creaking of his clumsy boots."
 I am as sure that this he would do,
 As that Saint Paul's is striking two.
 And I think I rather . . . woe is me !
 —Yes, rather would see him than not see,
 If lifting a hand could seat him there
 Before me in the empty chair
 To-night, when my head aches indeed,
 And I can neither think nor read
 Nor make these purple fingers hold
 The pen ; this garret's freezing cold !

And I've a Lady—there he wakes,
 The laughing fiend and prince of snakes
 Within me, at her name, to pray
 Fate send some creature in the way
 Of my love for her, to be down-torn,
 Uphrust and outward-borne,
 So I might prove myself that sea
 Of passion which I needs must be !
 Call my thoughts false and my fancies quaint
 And my style infirm and its figures faint,
 All the critics say, and more blame yet,
 And not one angry word you get.
 But, please you, wonder I would put
 My cheek beneath that lady's foot
 Rather than trample under mine
 The laurels of the Florentine,
 And you shall see how the devil spends
 A fire God gave for other ends !
 I tell you, I stride up and down
 This garret, crowned with love's best crown,

And feasted with love's perfect feast,
 To think I kill for her, at least,
 Body and soul and peace and fame,
 Alike youth's end and manhood's aim,
 —So is my spirit, as flesh with sin,
 Filled full, eaten out and in
 With the face of her, the eyes of her,
 The lips, the little chin, the stir
 Of shadow round her mouth; and she —I'll tell you,—calmly would decree
 That I should roast at a slow fire,
 If that would compass her desire
 And make her one whom they invite
 To the famous ball to-morrow night.

There may be heaven; there must be hell;
 Meantime, there is our earth here—well!

THE ITALIAN IN ENGLAND.

THAT second time they hunted me
 From hill to plain, from shore to sea,
 And Austria, hounding far and wide
 Her blood-hounds thro' the country-side,
 Breathed hot and instant on my trace,—
 I made six days a hiding-place
 Of that dry green old aqueduct
 Where I and Charles, when boys, have plucked

The fire-flies from the roof above,
 Bright creeping thro' the moss they love:
 —How long it seems since Charles was lost!
 Six days the soldiers crossed and crossed
 The country in my very sight;
 And when that peril ceased at night,
 The sky broke out in red dismay
 With signal fires; well, there I lay
 Close covered o'er in my recess,
 Up to the neck in ferns and cress,
 Thinking on Metternich our friend,
 And Charles's miserable end,
 And much beside, two days; the third,
 Hunger o'ercame me when I heard
 The peasants from the village go
 To work among the maize; you know,
 With us in Lombardy, they bring
 Provisions packed on mules, a string

With little bells that cheer their task,
 And casks, and boughs on every cask;
 To keep the sun's heat from the wine;
 These I let pass in jingling line,
 And, close on them, dear noisy crew,
 The peasants from the village, too;
 For at the very rear would troop
 Their wives and sisters in a group
 To help, I knew. When these had passed,
 I threw my glove to strike the last,
 Taking the chance: she did not start,
 Much less cry out, but stooped apart,
 One instant rapidly glanced round,
 And saw me beckon from the ground.
 A wild bush grows and hides my crypt;
 She picked my glove up while she stripped
 A branch off, then rejoined the rest
 With that; my glove lay in her breast.
 Then I drew breath; they disappeared:
 It was for Italy I feared.

An hour, and she returned alone
 Exactly where my glove was thrown.
 Meanwhile came many thoughts: on me
 Rested the hopes of Italy.
 I had devised a certain tale
 Which, when 'twas told her, could not fail

Persuade a peasant of its truth;
 I meant to call a freak of youth
 This hiding, and give hopes of pay,
 And no temptation to betray.
 But when I saw that woman's face,
 Its calm simplicity of grace,
 Our Italy's own attitude
 In which she walked thus far, and stood,
 Planting each naked foot so firm,
 To crush the snake and spare the worm—
 At first sight of her eyes, I said,
 "I am that man upon whose head
 "They fix the price, because I hate
 "The Austrians over us: the State
 "Will give you gold—oh, gold so much!—
 "If you betray me to their clutch,
 "And be your death, for aught I know,
 "If once they find you saved their foe.
 "Now, you must bring me food and drink,
 "And also paper, pen and ink,

"And carry safe what I shall write
 "To Padua, which you'll reach at night
 "Before the duomo shuts; go in,
 "And wait till Tenebræ begin;
 "Walk to the third confessional,
 "Between the pillar and the wall,
 "And kneeling whisper, Whence comes peace?
 "Say it a second time, then cease;
 "And if the voice inside returns,
 "From Christ and Freedom; what concerns
 "The cause of Peace?—for answer, slip
 "My letter where you placed your lip;
 "Then come back happy we have done
 "Our mother service—I, the son,
 "As you the daughter of our land!"

Three mornings more, she took her stand
 In the same place, with the same eyes:
 I was no surer of sun-rise
 Than of her coming. We conferred
 Of her own prospects, and I heard
 She had a lover—stout and tall,
 She said—then let her eyelids fall,
 "He could do much"—as if some doubt
 Entered her heart,—then, passing out,
 "She could not speak for others, who
 "Had other thoughts; herself she knew:"
 And so she brought me drink and food.
 After four days, the scouts pursued
 Another path; at last arrived
 The help my Paduan friends contrived
 To furnish me: she brought the news.
 For the first time I could not choose
 But kiss her hand, and lay my own
 Upon her head—"This faith was shown "To Italy, our mother; she "Uses my hand and blesses thee."
 She followed down to the sea-shore;
 I left and never saw her more.

How very long since I have thought Concerning—much less wished for—ought Beside the good of Italy,
 For which I live and mean to die!
 I never was in love; and since
 Charles proved false, what shall now convince.

My inmost heart I have a friend?
 However, if I pleased to spend
 Real wishes on myself—say, three—
 I know at least what one should be.
 I would grasp Metternich until
 I felt his red wet throat distil
 In blood thro' these two hands. And next,
 Nor much for that am I perplexed—
 Charles, perjured traitor, for his part,
 Should die slow of a broken heart
 Under his new employers. Last —Ah, there, what should I wish? For fast

Do I grow old and out of strength.
 If I resolved to seek at length
 My father's house again, how scared
 They all would look, and unprepared!
 My brothers live in Austria's pay
 —Disowned me long ago, men say;
 And all my early mates who used
 To praise me so—perhaps induced
 More than one early step of mine—
 Are turning wise: while some opine
 "Freedom grows license," some suspect
 "Haste breeds delay," and recollect
 They always said, such premature
 Beginnings never could endure!
 So, with a sullen "All's for best,"
 The land seems settling to its rest.
 I think then, I should wish to stand
 This evening in that dear, lost land,
 Over the sea the thousand miles,
 And know if yet that woman smiles
 With the calm smile; some little farm
 She lives in there, no doubt: what harm
 If I sat on the door-side bench,
 And, while her spindle made a trench
 Fantastically in the dust,
 Inquired of all her fortunes—just
 Her children's ages and their names,
 And what may be the husband's aims
 For each of them. I'd talk this out,
 And sit there, for an hour about,
 Then kiss her hand once more, and lay
 Mine on her head, and go my way.

So much for idle wishing—how
 It steals the time! To business now.

THE ENGLISHMAN IN ITALY.

PIANO DI SORRENTO

FORTÙ, Fortù, my beloved one,
 Sit here by my side,
 On my knees put up both little feet !
 I was sure, if I tried,
 I could make you laugh spite of Scirocco.
 Now, open your eyes,
 Let me keep you amused till he vanish
 In black from the skies,
 With telling my memories over
 As you tell your beads ;
 All the Plain saw me gather, I garland
 —The flowers or the weeds.

 Time for rain ! for your long hot dry Autumn
 Had net-worked with brown
 The white skin of each grape on the bunches,
 Marked like a quail's crown,
 Those creatures you make such account of,
 Whose heads,—speckled white
 Over brown like a great spider's back,
 As I told you last night, —
 Your mother bites off for her supper.
 Red-ripe as could be,
 Pomegranates were chapping and splitting
 In halves on the tree :
 And betwixt the loose walls of great flint-
 stone,
 Or in the thick dust
 On the path, or straight out of the rock-
 side,
 Wherever could thrust
 Some burnt sprig of bold hardy rock-flower
 Its yellow face up,
 For the prize were great butterflies fighting,
 Some five for one cup.
 So, I guessed, ere I got up this morning,
 What change was in store,
 By the quick rustle-down of the quail-nets
 Which woke me before
 I could open my shutter, made fast
 With a bough and a stone,
 And look thro' the twisted dead vine-twigs,
 Sole lattice that's known.

Quick and sharp rang the rings down the net-poles,
 While, busy beneath,
 Your priest and his brother tugged at them,
 The rain in their teeth.
 And out upon all the flat house-roofs
 Where split figs lay drying,
 The girls took the frails under cover :
 Nor use seemed in trying
 To get out the boats and go fishing,
 For, under the cliff,
 Fierce the black water frothed o'er the blind-
 rock.
 No seeing our skiff
 Arrive about noon from Amalfi,
 —Our fisher arrive,
 And pitch down his basket before us,
 All trembling alive
 With pink and grey jellies, your sea-fruit ;
 You touch the strange lumps,
 And mouths gape there, eyes open, all manner
 Of horns and of humps,
 Which only the fisher looks grave at,
 While round him like imps
 C'ling screaming the children as naked
 And brown as his shrimps ;
 Himself too as bare to the middle
 —You see round his neck
 The string and its brass coin suspended,
 That saves him from wreck.
 But to-day not a boat reached Salerno,
 So back, to a man,
 Came our friends, with whose help in the vineyards
 Grape-harvest began.
 In the vat, halfway up in our house-side,
 Like blood the juice spins,
 While your brother all bare-legged is dancing
 Till breathless he grins
 Dead-beaten in effort on effort
 To keep the grapes under,
 Since still when he seems all but master,
 In pours the fresh plunder
 From girls who keep coming and going
 With basket on shoulder,
 And eyes shut against the rain's driving ;
 Your girls that are older,—

For under the hedges of aloe,
 And where, on its bed
 Of the orchard's black mould, the love-apple
 Lies pulpy and red,
 All the young ones are kneeling and filling
 Their laps with the snails
 Tempted out by this first rainy weather,—
 Your best of regales,
 As to-night will be proved to my sorrow,
 When, supping in state,
 We shall feast our grape-gleaners (two dozen,
 Three over one plate)
 With lasagne so tempting to swallow
 In slippery ropes,
 And gourds fried in great purple slices,
 That colour of popes.
 Meantime, see the grape bunch they've brought you :
 The rain-water slips
 O'er the heavy blue bloom on each globe
 Which the wasp to your lips
 Still follows with fretful persistence :
 Nay, taste, while awake,
 This half of a curd-white smooth cheese-ball
 That peels, flake by flake,
 Like an onion, each smoother and whiter ;
 Next, sip this weak wine
 From the thin green glass flask, with its stopper,
 A leaf of the vine ;
 And end with the prickly-pear's red flesh
 That leaves thro' its juice
 The stony black seeds on your pearl-teeth.
 Scirocco is loose !
 Hark, the quick, whistling pelt of the olives
 Which, thick in one's track,
 Tempt the stranger to pick up and bite
 them,
 Tho' not yet half black !
 How the old twisted olive trunks shudder,
 The medlars let fall
 Their hard fruit, and the brittle great fig-trees
 Snap off, figs and all,
 For here comes the whole of the tempest !
 No refuge, but creep
 Back again to my side and my shoulder,
 And listen or sleep.

O how will your country show next week,
 When all the vine-boughs
 Have been stripped of their foliage to pasture
 The mules and the cows ?
 Last eve, I rode over the mountains ;
 Your brother, my guide,
 Soon left me, to feast on the myrtles
 That offered, each side,
 Their fruit-balls, black, glossy and luscious,—
 Or strip from the sorbs
 A treasure, or, rosy and wondrous,
 Those hairy gold orbs !
 But my mule picked his sure sober path out,
 Just stopping to neigh
 When he recognized down in the valley
 His mates on their way
 With the faggots and barrels of water ;
 And soon we emerged
 From the plain, where the woods could scarce
 follow ;
 And still as we urged
 Our way, the woods wondered, and left us,
 As up still we trudged
 Though the wild path grew wilder each instant,
 And place was e'en grudged
 'Mid the rock-chasms and piles of loose stones
 Like the loose broken teeth
 Of some monster which climbed there to die
 From the ocean beneath—
 Place was grudged to the silver-grey fumeweed
 That clung to the path,
 And dark rosemary ever a-dying
 That, 'spite the wind's wrath,
 So loves the salt rock's face to seaward,
 And lentisks¹ as staunch
 To the stone where they root and bear berries,
 And . . . what shows a branch
 Coral-coloured, transparent, with circlets
 Of pale seagreen leaves ;
 Over all trod my mule with the caution
 Of gleaners o'er sheaves,
 Still, foot after foot like a lady,
 Till, round after round,
 He climbed to the top of Calvano,
 And God's own profound

Was above me, and round me the mountains,
 And under, the sea,
 And within me my heart to bear witness
 What was and shall be.
 Oh, heaven and the terrible crystal !
 No rampart excludes
 Your eye from the life to be lived
 In the blue solitudes.
 Oh, those mountains, their infinite movement !
 Still moving with you ;
 For, ever some new head and breast of them
 Thrusts into view
 To observe the intruder ; you see it
 If quickly you turn
 And, before they escape you surprise them.
 They grudge you should learn
 How the soft plains they look on, lean over
 And love (they pretend) —Cower beneath them, the flat sea-pine crouches,
 The wild fruit-trees bend,
 E'en the myrtle-leaves curl, shrink and shut :
 All is silent and grave :
 'Tis a sensual and timorous beauty,
 How fair ! but a slave.
 So, I turned to the sea ; and there slumbered
 As greenly as ever
 Those isles of the siren, your Galli ;
 No ages can sever
 The Three, nor enable their sister
 To join them,—halfway
 On the voyage, she looked at Ulysses—
 No farther to-day,
 Tho' the small one, just launched in the wave,
 Watches breast-high and steady
 From under the rock, her bold sister
 Swum halfway already.
 Fortu' shall we sail there together
 And see from the sides
 Quite new rocks show their faces, new haunts
 Where the siren abides ?
 Shall we sail round and round them, close over
 The rocks, tho' unseen,
 That ruffle the grey glassy water
 To glorious green ?
 Then scramble from splinter to splinter,
 Reach land and explore,

On the largest, the strange square black turret
 With never a door,
 Just a loop to admit the quick lizards ; !
 Then, stand there and hear
 The birds' quiet singing, that tells us
 What life is, so clear ?
 —The secret they sang to Ulysses
 When, ages ago,
 He heard and he knew this life's secret
 I hear and I know.
 Ah, see ! The sun breaks o'er Calvano ;
 He strikes the great gloom
 And flutters it o'er the mount's summit
 In airy gold fume.
 All is over. Look out, see the gipsy,
 Our tinker and smith,
 Has arrived, set up bellows and forge,
 And down-squatted forthwith
 To his hammering, under the wall there ;
 One eye keeps aloof
 The urchins that itch to be putting
 His jews'-harps to proof,
 While the other, thro' locks of curled wire,
 Is watching how sleek
 Shines the hog, come to share in the windfall
 —Chew, abbot's own cheek !
 All is over. Wake up and come out now,
 And down let us go,
 And see the fine things got in order
 At church for the show
 Of the Sacrament, set forth this evening.
 To-morrow's the Feast
 Of the Rosary's Virgin, by no means
 Of Virgins the least,
 As you'll hear in the off-hand discourse
 Which (all nature, no art)
 The Dominican brother, these three weeks,
 Was getting by heart.
 Not a pillar nor post but is dizen'd
 With red and blue papers ;
 All the roof waves with ribbons, each altar
 A-blaze with long tapers ;
 But the great masterpiece is the scaffold
 Rigg'd glorious to hold
 All the fiddlers and fifers and drummers
 And trumpeters bold,

Not afraid of Bellini nor Auber,
 Who, when the priest's hoarse,
 Will strike us up something that's brisk
 For the feast's second course.
 And then will the flaxen-wigged Image
 Be carried in pomp
 Thro' the plain, while in gallant procession
 The priests mean to stomp.
 All round the glad church lie old bottles
 With gunpowder stopped,
 Which will be, when the Image re-enters,
 Religiously popped;
 And at night from the crest of Calvano
 Great bonfires will hang,
 On the plain will the trumpets join chorus;
 And more poppers bang.
 At all events, come—to the garden
 As far as the wall;
 See me tap with a hoe on the plaster
 Till out there shall fall
 A scorpion with wide angry nippers!

—"Such trifles!" you say?
 Forth, in my England at home,
 Men meet gravely to-day
 And debate, if abolishing Corn-laws
 Be righteous and wise
 —If 'twere proper, Scirocco should vanish
 In black from the skies!

IN A GONDOLA.

He sings.

I SEND my heart up to thee, all my heart
 In this my singing.
 For the stars help me, and the sea bears part;
 The very night is clinging
 Closer to Venice' streets to leave one space
 Above me, whence thy face
 May light my joyous heart to thee its dwelling-
 place.

She speaks.

Say after me, and try to say
 My very words, as if each word
 Came from you of your own accord,
 In your own voice, in your own way:

"This woman's heart and soul and brain
 "Are mine as much as this gold chain
 "She bids me wear; which" (say again)
 "I choose to make by cherishing
 "A precious thing, or choose to fling
 "Over the boat-side, ring by ring."
 And yet once more say . . . no word more!
 Since words are only words. Give o'er!

Unless you call me, all the same,
 Familiarly by my pet name;
 Which if the Three should hear you call,
 And me reply to, would proclaim
 At once our secret to them all.
 Ask of me, too, command me, blame—
 Do, break down the partition-wall
 'Twixt us, the daylight world beholds
 Curtained in dusk and splendid folds!
 What's left but—all of me to take?
 I am the Three's: prevent them, slake
 Your thirst! 'Tis said, the Arab sage,
 In practising with gems, can loose
 Their subtle spirit in his cruce
 And leave but ashes: so, sweet mage,
 Leave them my ashes when thy use
 Sucks out my soul, thy heritage!

He sings.

I.

Past we glide, and past, and past!
 What's that poor Agnese doing
 Where they make the shutters fast?
 Grey Zanobi's just a-wooing
 To his couch the purchased bride:
 Past we glide!

II.

Past we glide, and past, and past!
 Why's the Pucci Palace flaring
 Like a beacon to the blast?
 Guests by hundreds, not one caring
 If the dear host's neck were wried:
 Past we glide!

She sings.

I.

The moth's kiss, first!
 Kiss me as if you made believe
 You were not sure, this eve,

How my face, your flower, had pursed
Its petals up ; so, here and there
You brush it, till I grow aware
Who wants me, and wide ope I burst.

II.

The bee's kiss, now !
Kiss me as if you entered gay
My heart at some noonday,
A bud that dares not disallow
The claim, so all is rendered up,
And passively its shattered cup
Over your head to sleep I bow.

He sings.

I.

What are we two ?
I am a Jew,
And carry thee, farther than friends can pursue,
To a feast of our tribe ;
Where they need thee to bribe
The devil that blasts them unless he imbibe-Thy . . . Scatter the vision for ever ! And
now,
As of old, I am I, thou art thou !

II.

Say again, what we are ?
The sprite of a star,
I lure thee above where the destinies bar
My plumes their full play
Till a ruddier ray
Than my pale one announce there is withering away
Some . . . Scatter the vision for ever ! And
now,
As of old, I am I, thou art thou !

He muses.

Oh, which were best, to roam or rest ?
The land's lap or the water's breast ?
To sleep on yellow millet-sheaves,
Or swim in lucid shallows just
Eluding water-lily leaves,
An inch from Death's black fingers, thrust
To lock you, whom release he must ;
Which life were best on Summer eves ?

He speaks, musing.

Lie back ; could thought of mine improve
you ?
From this shoulder let there spring
A wing ; from this, another wing ;
Wings, not legs and feet, shall move you !
Snow-white must they spring, to blend
With your flesh, but I intend
They shall deepen to the end,
Broader, into burning gold,
Till both wings crescent-wise enfold
Your perfect self, from 'neath your feet
To o'er your head, where, lo, they meet
As if a million sword-blades hurled
Defiance from you to the world !

Rescue me thou, the only real !
And scare away this mad ideal
That came, nor motions to depart !
Thanks ! Now, stay ever as thou art !

Still he muses.

I.

What if the Three should catch at last
Thy serenader ? While there's cast
Paul's cloak about my head, and fast
Gian pinions me, Himself has past
His stylet thro' my back ; I reel ;
And . . . is it thou I feel ?

II.

They trail me, these three godless knaves,
Past every church that saints and saves,
Nor stop till, where the cold sea raves
By Lido's wet accursed graves,
They scoop mine, roll me to its brink,
And . . . on thy breast I sink !

She replies, musing.

Dip your arm o'er the boat-side, elbow-deep,
As I do : thus : were death so unlike sleep,
Caught this way ? Death's to fear from flame or steel,
Or poison doubtless ; but from water—
feel !

Go find the bottom ! Would you stay me ?
There !

Now pluck a great blade of that ribbon-grass
To plait in where the foolish jewel was,
I flung away : since you have praised my hair,
'Tis proper to be choice in what I wear.

He speaks.

Row home? must we row home? Too surely Know I where its front's demurely
Over the Giudecca piled ;
Window just with window mating,
Door on door exactly waiting,
All's the set face of a child :
But behind it, where's a trace
Of the staidness and reserve,
And formal lines without a curve,
In the same child's playing-face ?
No two windows look one way
O'er the small sea-water thread
Below them. Ah, the autumn day
I, passing, saw you overhead !
First, out a cloud of curtain blew,
Then a sweet cry, and last came you—
To catch your lory¹ that must needs
Escape just then, of all times then,
To peck a tall plant's fleecy seeds,
And make me happiest of men.
I scarce could breathe to see you reach
So far back o'er the balcony
To catch him ere he climbed too high
Above you in the Smyrna peach
That quick the round smooth cord of gold,
This coiled hair on your head, unrolled,
Fell down you like a gorgeous snake
The Roman girls were wont, of old,
When Rome there was, for coolness' sake
To let lie curling o'er their bosoms.
Dear lory, may his beak retain Ever its delicate rose stain
As if the wounded lotus-blossoms
Had marked their thief to know again !

Stay longer yet, for others' sake
Than mine ! What should your chamber do ?
—With all its rarities that ache
In silence while day lasts, but wake

At night-time and their life renew,
Suspended just to pleasure you
Who brought against their will together
These objects, and, while day lasts, weave
Around them such a magic tether
That dumb they look : your harp, believe,

With all the sensitive tight strings
Which dare not speak, now to itself
Breathes slumberously, as if some elf
Went in and out the chords, his wings
Make murmur wheresoe'er they graze,
As an angel may, between the maze
Of midnight palace-pillars, on
And on, to sow God's plagues, have gone
Through guilty glorious Babylon.
And while such murmurs flow, the nymph
Bends o'er the harp-top from her shell
As the dry limpet for the lymph
Come with a tune he knows so well.
And how your statues' hearts must swell !

And how your pictures must descend
To see each other, friend with friend !
Oh, could you take them by surprise,
You'd find Schidone's eager Duke
Doing the quaintest courtesies
To that prim saint by Haste-thee-Luke !
And, deeper into her rock den,
Bold Castelfranco's Magdalen
You'd find retreated from the ken
Of that robed counsel-keeping Ser—
As if the Tizian thinks of her,
And is not, rather, gravely bent
On seeing for himself what toys
Are these, his progeny invent,
What litter now the board employs
Whereon he signed a document
That got him murdered ! Each enjoys
Its night so well, you cannot break
The sport up, so, indeed must make
More stay with me, for others' sake.

She speaks.

I.

To-morrow, if a harp-string, say,
Is used to tie the jasmine-back
That overfloods my room with sweets,

Contrive your Zorzi somehow meets
My Zanze ! If the ribbon's black,
The Three are watching : keep away !

II.

Your gondola—let Zorzi wreathe
A mesh of water-weeds about
Its prow, as if he unaware
Had struck some quay or bridge-foot stair !
That I may throw a paper out
As you and he go underneath.

There's Zanze's vigilant taper ; safe are we.
Only one minute more to-night with me ?
Resume your past self of a month ago !
Be you the bashful gallant, I will be
The lady with the colder breast than snow.
Now bow you, as becomes, nor touch my hand
More than I touch yours when I step to land,
And say, " All thanks, Siora ! "—

Heart to heart
And lips to lips ! Yet once more, ere we part,
Clasp me and make me thine, as mine thou art ! [He is surprised, and stabbed.]
It was ordained to be so, sweet !—and best
Comes now, beneath thine eyes, upon thy breast.
Still kiss me ! Care not for the cowards ! Care
Only to put aside thy beauteous hair
My blood will hurt ! The Three, I do not scorn
To death, because they never lived : but I Have lived indeed, and so—(yet one more kiss)—can die !

WARING.

[*Mr. Alfred Domett, C.M.G., author of "Ranolf and Amohia," full of descriptions of
New Zealand scenery.*]

I.

WHAT's become of Waring
Since he gave us all the slip,
Chose land-travel or seafaring,
Boots and chest or staff and scrip,
Rather than pace up and down
Any longer London town ?

II.

Who'd have guessed it from his lip
Or his brow's accustomed bearing,
On the night he thus took ship
Or started landward ?—little caring
For us, it seems, who supped together
(Friends of his too, I remember)
And walked home thro' the merry weather,
The snowiest in all December.
I left his arm that night myself
For what's-his-name's, the new prose-poet
Who wrote the book there, on the shelf—
How, forsooth, was I to know it
If Waring meant to glide away
Like a ghost at break of day ?
Never looked he half so gay !

III.

He was prouder than the devil :
How he must have cursed our revel !
Ay and many other meetings,
Indoor visits, outdoor greetings,
As up and down he paced this London,
With no work done, but great works undone,
Where scarce twenty knew his name.
Why not, then, have earlier spoken,
Written, bustling ? Who's to blame
If your silence kept unbroken ?
" True, but there were sundry jottings,
" Stray-leaves, fragments, blurs and blottings,
" Certain first steps were achieved
" Already which "—(is that your meaning ?)
" Had well borne out who'er believed
" In more to come ! " But who goes gleaming
Hedgeside chance-blades, while full-sheaved
Stand cornfields by him ? Pride, o'erweening
Pride alone, puts forth such claims
O'er the day's distinguished names.

IV.

Meantime, how much I loved him,
I find out now I've lost him.
I who cared not if I moved him,
Who could so carelessly accost him,
Henceforth never shall get free
Of his ghostly company,

His eyes that just a little wink
As deep I go into the merit
Of this and that distinguished spirit—
His cheeks' raised colour, soon to sink,
As long I dwell on some stupendous
And tremendous (Heaven defend us !)
Monstr'-inform'-ingens-horrend-ous
Demoniaco-seraphic
Penman's latest piece of graphic.
Nay, my very wrist grows warm
With his dragging weight of arm.
E'en so, swimmingly appears,
Through one's after-supper musings,
Some lost lady of old years
With her beauteous vain endeavour
And goodness unrepaid as ever ;
The face, accustomed to refusings,
We, puppies that we were . . . Oh never Surely, nice of conscience, scrupled
Being aught like false, forsooth, to ?
Telling aught but honest truth to ?
What a sin, had we centupled
Its possessor's grace and sweetness !
No ! she heard in its completeness
Truth, for truth's a weighty matter,
And truth, at issue, we can't flatter !
Well, 'tis done with ; she's exempt
From damning us thro' such a sally ;
And so she glides, as down a valley,
Taking up with her contempt,
Past our reach ; and in, the flowers
Shut her unregarded hours.

v.

Oh, could I have him back once more,
This Waring, but one half-day more !
Back, with the quiet face of yore,
So hungry for acknowledgment
Like mine ! I'd fool him to his bent.
Feed, should not he, to heart's content ?
I'd say, "to only have conceived,
"Planned your great works, apart from progress,
"Surpasses little works achieved !"
I'd lie so, I should be believed.
I'd make such havoc of the claims
Of the day's distinguished names
To feast him with, as feasts an ogress

Her feverish sharp-toothed gold-crowned
child !
Or as one feasts a creature rarely
Captured here, unreconciled
To capture ; and completely gives
Its pettish humours license, barely Requiring that it lives .

vi.

Ichabod, Ichabod,
The glory is departed !
Travels Waring East away ?
Who, of knowledge, by hearsay,
Reports a man upstarted
Somewhere as a god,
Hordes grown European-hearted,
Millions of the wild made tame
On a sudden at his fame ?
In Vishnu-land what Avatar ?
Or who in Moscow, toward the Czar,
With the demurest of footfalls
Over the Kremlin's pavement bright
With serpentine and syenite,¹
Steps, with five other Generals
That simultaneously take snuff.
For each to have pretext enough
And kerchiefwise unfold his sash
Which, softness' self, is yet the stuff
To hold fast where a steel chain snaps,
And leave the grand white neck no gash ?
Waring in Moscow, to those rough
Cold northern natures born perhaps,
Like the lambwhite maiden dear
From the circle of mute kings
Unable to repress the tear,
Each as his sceptre down he flings,
To Dian's fane at Taurica,
Where now a captive priestess, she alway
Mingles her tender grave Hellenic speech
With theirs, tuned to the hailstone-beaten beach
As pours some pigeon, from the myrrhy lands
Rapt by the whirlblast to fierce Scythian strands .
Where breed the swallows, her melodious cry
Amid their barbarous twitter !
In Russia ? Never ! Spain were fitter !

Ay, most likely 'tis in Spain
That we and Waring meet again
Now, while he turns down that cool narrow lane

Into the blackness, out of grave Madrid
All fire and shine, abrupt as when there's slid
Its stiff gold blazing pall
From some black coffin-lid.

Or, best of all,
I love to think

The leaving us was just a feint ;
Back here to London did he slink,
And now works on without a wink
Of sleep, and we are on the brink
Of something great in fresco-paint :
Some garret's ceiling, walls and floor,
Up and down and o'er and o'er
He splashes, as none splashed before
Since great Caldara Polidore.¹
Or Music means this land of ours
Some favour yet, to pity won
By Purcell from his Rosy Bowers,—
"Give me my so-long promised son,
"Let Waring end what I begun !"
Then down he creeps and out he steals
Only when the night conceals
His face ; in Kent 'tis cherry-time,
Or hops are picking : or at prime
Of March he wanders as, too happy,
Years ago when he was young,
Some mild eve when woods grew sappy
And the early moths had sprung
To life from many a trembling sheath
Woven the warm boughs beneath ;
While small birds said to themselves
What should soon be actual song,
And young gnats, by tens and twelves,
Made as if they were the throng
That crowd around and carry aloft

The sound they have nursed, so sweet and pure,
Out of a myriad noises soft,
Into a tone that can endure
Amid the noise of a July noon
When all God's creatures crave their boon,
All at once and all in tune,

Raphael.

And get it, happy as Waring then,
Having first within his ken
What a man might do with men :
And far too glad, in the even-glow,
To mix with the world he meant to take Into his hand, he told you, so—
And out of it his world to make,
To contract and to expand
As he shut or oped his hand.
Oh Waring, what's to really be ?
A clear stage and a crowd to see !
Some Garrick, say, out shall not he
The heart of Hamlet's mystery pluck ?
Or, where most unclean beasts are rife,
Some Junius—am I right ?—shall tuck
His sleeve, and forth with flaying-knife !
Some Chatterton shall have the luck
Of calling Rowley into life !
Some one shall somehow run a muck
With this old world for want of strife
Sound asleep. Contrive, contrive
To rouse us, Waring ! Who's alive ?
Our men scarce seem in earnest now.
Distinguished names !—but 'tis, somehow,
As if they played at being names
Still more distinguished, like the games
Of children. Turn our sport to earnest
With a visage of the sternest !
Bring the real times back, confessed
Still better than our very best !

II.

I.

"WHEN I last saw Waring . . ."
(How all turned to him who spoke !
You saw Waring ? Truth or joke ?
In land-travel or sea-faring ?)

II.

"We were sailing by Triest
"Where a day or two we harboured :
"A sunset was in the West,
"When, looking over the vessel's side,
"One of our company espied
"A sudden speck to larboard

"And as a sea-duck flies and swims
 "At once, so came the light craft up,
 "With its sole lateen sail that trims
 "And turns (the water round its rims
 "Dancing, as round a sinking cup)
 "And by us like a fish it curled,
 "And drew itself up close beside,
 "Its great sail on the instant furled,
 "And o'er its thwarts a shrill voice cried,
 "(A neck as bronzed as a Lascar's)
 "'Buy wine of us, you English Brig?
 "'Or fruit, tobacco and cigars?
 "'A pilot for you to Triest?
 "'Without one, look you ne'er so big,
 "'They'll never let you up the bay!
 "'We natives should know best.'
 "I turned, and 'just those fellows' way,'
 "Our captain said, 'The 'long-shore thieves
 "'Are laughing at us in their sleeves.'

III.

"In truth, the boy leaned laughing back;
 "And one, half-hidden by his side
 "Under the furled sail, soon I spied,
 "With great grass hat and kerchief black,
 "Who looked up with his kingly throat,
 "Said somewhat, while the other shook
 "His hair back from his eyes to look
 "Their longest at us; then the boat,
 "I know not how, turned sharply round,
 "Laying her whole side on the sea
 "As a leaping fish does; from the lee
 "Into the weather, cut somehow "Her sparkling path beneath our bow
 "And so went off, as with a bound,
 "Into the rosy and golden half
 "O' the sky, to overtake the sun
 "And reach the shore, like the sea-calf
 "Its singing cave; yet I caught one
 "Glance ere away the boat quite passed,
 "And neither time nor toil could mar
 "Those features: so I saw the last
 "Of Waring!"—You? Oh, never star
 "Was lost here but it rose afar!
 "Look East, where whole new thousands
 "are!
 "In Vishnu-land what Avatar?

THE TWINS.

"Give" and "It-shall-be-given-unto-you."

I.

GRAND rough old Martin Luther Bloomed fables—flowers on furze,
 The better the uncouth:
 Do roses stick like burrs?

II.

A beggar asked an alms
 One day at an abbey-door,
 Said Luther; but, seized with qualms,
 The abbot replied, "We're poor!"

III.

"Poor, who had plenty once,
 "When gifts fell thick as rain:
 "But they give us nought, for the nonce
 "And now should we give again?"

IV.

Then the beggar, "See your sins!
 "Of old, unless I err,
 "Ye had brothers for inmates, twins,
 "Date and Dabitur.

V.

"While Date was in good case
 "Dabitur flourished too:
 "For Dabitur's lenten face
 "No wonder if Date rue.

VI.

"Would ye retrieve the one?
 "Try and make plump the other!
 "When Date's penance is done,
 "Dabitur helps his brother.

VII.

"Only, beware relapse!"
 The Abbot hung his head.
 This beggar might be perhaps
 An angel, Luther said.

A LIGHT WOMAN.

I.

So far as our story approaches the end,
Which do you pity the most of us three?—
My friend, or the mistress of my friend
With her wanton eyes, or me?

II.

My friend was already too good to lose,
And seemed in the way of improvement yet,
When she crossed his path with her huntingnoose
And over him drew her net.

III.

When I saw him tangled in her toils,
A shame, said I, if she adds just him
To her nine-and-ninety other spoils,
The hundredth for a whim!

IV.

And before my friend be wholly hers,
How easy to prove to him, I said,
An eagle's the game her pride prefers,
Though she snaps at a wren instead!

V.

So, I gave her eyes my own eyes to take,
My hand sought hers as in earnest need,
And round she turned for my noble sake,
And gave me herself indeed.

VI.

The eagle am I, with my fame in the world,
The wren is he, with his maiden face.
—You look away and your lip is curled?
Patience, a moment's space!

VII.

For see, my friend goes shaking and white;
He eyes me as the basilisk:
I have turned, it appears, his day to night,
Eclipsing his sun's disk.

VIII.

And I did it, he thinks, as a very thief:
“Though I love her—that, he compre-
hends—
“One should master one's passions, (love, in chief)
“And be loyal to one's friends!”

IX.

And she,—she lies in my hand as tame
As a pear late basking over a wall;
Just a touch to try and off it came;
'Tis mine,—can I let it fall?

X.

With no mind to eat it, that's the worst!
Were it thrown in the road, would the case assist?
'Twas quenching a dozen blue-flies' thirst
When I gave its stalk a twist.

XI.

And I,—what I seem to my friend, you see:
What I soon shall seem to his love, you
guess:
What I seem to myself, do you ask of me?
No hero, I confess.

XII.

'Tis an awkward thing to play with souls,
And matter enough to save one's own:
Yet think of my friend, and the burning coals
He played with for bits of stone!

XIII.

One likes to show the truth for the truth;
That the woman was light is very true:
But suppose she says,—Never mind that youth!
What wrong have I done to you?

XIV.

Well, any how, here the story stays,
So far at least as I understand;
And, Robert Browning, you writer of plays,
Here's a subject made to your hand!

THE LAST RIDE TOGETHER.

I.

I SAID—Then, dearest, since 'tis so,
 Since now at length my fate I know,
 Since nothing all my love avails,
 Since all, my life seemed meant for, fails,
 Since this was written and needs must
 be—

My whole heart rises up to bless
 Your name in pride and thankfulness !
 Take back the hope you gave,—I claim
 Only a memory of the same,
 —And this beside, if you will not blame,
 Your leave for one more last ride with me.

II.

My mistress bent that brow of hers ;
 Those deep dark eyes where pride demurs
 When pity would be softening through,
 Fixed me a breathing-while or two
 With life or death in the balance : right !
 The blood replenished me again ;
 My last thought was at least not vain :
 I and my mistress, side by side
 Shall be together, breathe and ride,
 So, one day more am I deified.

Who knows but the world may end tonight ?

III.

Hush ! if you saw some western cloud
 All billowy-bosomed, over-bowed
 By many benedictions—sun's
 And moon's and evening-star's at once—
 And so, you, looking and loving best,
 Conscious grew, your passion drew
 Cloud, sunset, moonrise, star-shine too,
 Down on you, near and yet more near,
 Till flesh must fade for heaven was here !—
 Thus leant she and lingered—joy and fear !
 Thus lay she a moment on my breast.

IV.

Then we began to ride. My soul
 Smoothed itself out, a long-cramped scroll

Freshening and fluttering in the wind.
 Past hopes already lay behind.

What need to strive with a life awry ?
 Had I said that, had I done this,
 So might I gain, so might I miss.
 Might she have loved me ? just as well
 She might have hated, who can tell !
 Where had I been now if the worst befell ?
 And here we are riding, she and I.

V.

Fail I alone, in words and deeds ?
 Why, all men strive and who succeeds ?
 We rode ; it seemed my spirit flew,
 Saw other regions, cities new,
 As the world rushed by on either side.
 I thought,—All labour, yet no less
 Bear up beneath their unsuccess.
 Look at the end of work, contrast
 The petty done, the undone vast,
 This present of theirs with the hopeful
 past !
 I hoped she would love me ; here we ride.

VI.

What hand and brain went ever paired ?
 What heart alike conceived and dared ?
 What act proved all its thought had
 been ?
 What will but felt the fleshly screen ?
 We ride and I see her bosom heave.
 There's many a crown for who can reach.
 Ten lines, a statesman's life in each !
 The flag stuck on a heap of bones,
 A soldier's doing ! what atones ?
 They scratch his name on the Abbey-
 stones.
 My riding is better, by their leave.

VII.

What does it all mean, poet ? Well,
 Your brains beat into rhythm, you tell
 What we felt only ; you expressed
 You hold things beautiful the best,
 And pace them in rhyme so, side by side.

'Tis something, nay 'tis much : but then,
 I have you yourself what's best for men ?
 Are you—poor, sick, old ere your time—
 Nearer one whit your own sublime
 Than we who never have turned a rhyme ?
 Sing, riding's a joy ! For me, I ride.

VIII.

And you, great sculptor—so, you gave
 A score of years to Art, her slave,
 And that's your Venus, whence we turn
 To yonder girl that fords the burn !
 You acquiesce, and shall I repine ?
 What, man of music, you grown grey
 With notes and nothing else to say,
 Is this your sole praise from a friend,
 " Greatly his opera's strains intend,
 " Put in music we know how fashion
 end ! "
 I gave my youth ; but we ride, in fine.

IX.

Who knows what's fit for us ? Had fate
 Proposed bliss here should sublimate
 My being—had I signed the bond—
 Still one must lead some life beyond,
 Have a bliss to die with, dim-described.
 This foot once planted on the goal,
 This glory-garland round my soul,
 Could I descry such ? Try and test !
 I sink back shuddering from the quest.
 Earth being so good, would heaven seem
 best ?
 Now, heaven and she are beyond this ride.

And yet—she has not spoke so long !
 What if heaven be that, fair and strong
 At life's best, with our eyes upturned
 Whither life's flower is first discerned,
 We, fixed so, ever should so abide ?
 What if we still ride on, we two
 With life for ever old yet new,
 Changed not in kind but in degree,
 The instant made eternity,—
 And heaven just prove that I and she Ride, ride together, for ever ride ?

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN ;

A CHILD'S STORY.

(Written for, and inscribed to, W. M. the Younger.)

I.

HAMELIN Town's in Brunswick,
 By famous Hanover city ;
 The river Weser, deep and wide,
 Washes its wall on the southern side ;
 A pleasanter spot you never spied ;
 But, when begins my ditty,
 Almost five hundred years ago,
 To see the townsfolk suffer so
 From vermin, was a pity.

II.

Rats !
 They fought the dogs and killed the cats,
 And bit the babies in the cradles,
 And ate the cheeses out of the vats,
 And licked the soup from the cooks' own ladles,
 Split open the kegs of salted sprats,
 Made nests inside men's Sunday hats,
 And even spoiled the women's chats
 By drowning their speaking
 With shrieking and squeaking in fifty different sharps and flats.

III.

At last the people in a body
 To the Town Hall came flocking :
 " 'Tis clear," cried they, " our Mayor's a noddy ;
 " And as for our Corporation—shocking
 " To think we buy gowns lined with ermine
 " For dolts that can't or won't determine
 " What's best to rid us of our vermin !
 " You hope, because you're old and obese,
 " To find in the furry civic robe ease ?
 " Rouse up, sirs ! Give your brains a racking
 " To find the remedy we're lacking,
 " Or, sure as fate, we'll send you packing ! "
 At this the Mayor and Corporation
 Quaked with a mighty consternation.

IV.

An hour they sat in council,

At length the Mayor broke silence :

"For a guilder I'd my ermine gown sell,

"I wish I were a mile hence !

"It's easy to bid one rack one's brain—

"I'm sure my poor head aches again,

"I've scratched it so, and all in vain.

"Oh for a trap, a trap, a trap !"

Just as he said this, what should hap

At the chamber door but a gentle tap ?

"Bless us," cried the Mayor, "what's that ?"

(With the Corporation as he sat,

Looking little though wondrous fat ;

Nor brighter was his eye, nor moister

Than a too-long-opened oyster,

Save when at noon his paunch grew mutinous

For a plate of turtle green and glutinous)

"Only a scraping of shoes on the mat ?

"Anything like the sound of a rat

"Makes my heart go pit-a-pat !"

V.

"Come in !"—the Mayor cried, looking bigger :

And in did come the strangest figure !

His queer long coat from heel to head

Was half of yellow and half of red,

And he himself was tall and thin,

With sharp blue eyes, each like a pin,

And light loose hair, yet swarthy skin,

No tuft on cheek nor beard on chin,

But lips where smiles went out and in ;

There was no guessing his kith and kin :

And nobody could enough admire

The tall man and his quaint attire.

Quoth one : "It's as my great-grandsire,

"Starting up at the Trump of Doom's tone,

"Had walked this way from his painted tombstone !"

VI.

He advanced to the council-table :

And, "Please your honours," said he, "I'm able,

"By means of a secret charm, to draw

"All creatures living beneath the sun,

"That creep or swim or fly or run,

"After me so as you never saw !

"And I chiefly use my charm

"On creatures that do people harm,

"The mole and toad and newt and viper ;

"And people call me the Pied Piper."

(And here they noticed round his neck

A scarf of red and yellow stripe,

To match with his coat of the self-same cheque ;

And at the scarf's end hung a pipe ;

And his fingers, they noticed, were ever straying

As if impatient to be playing

Upon this pipe, as low it dangled

Over his vesture so old-fangled.)

"Yet," said he, "poor piper as I am,

"In Tartary I freed the Cham,

"Last June, from his huge swarms of gnats ;

"I eased in Asia the Nizam

"Of a monstrous brood of vampyre-bats :

"And as for what your brain bewilders,

"If I can rid your town of rats

"Will you give me a thousand guilders ?"

"One? fifty thousand !"—was the exclamation
Of the astonished Mayor and Corporation.

VII.

Into the street the Piper stept,

Smiling first a little smile,

As if he knew what magic slept

In his quiet pipe the while ;

Then, like a musical adept,

To blow the pipe his lips he wrinkled,

And green and blue his sharp eyes twinkled,

Like a candle-flame where salt is sprinkled ;

And ere three shrill notes the pipe uttered,

You heard as if an army muttered ;

And the muttering grew to a grumbling ;

And the grumbling grew to a mighty rumbling ;

And out of the houses the rats came tumbling.

Great rats, small rats, lean rats, brawny rats,

Brown rats, black rats, grey rats, tawny rats,

Grave old plodders, gay young friskers,

Fathers, mothers, uncles, cousins,

Cocking tails and pricking whiskers,

Families by tens and dozens,

Brothers, sisters, husbands, wives—

Followed the Piper for their lives.

From street to street he piped advancing,
And step for step they followed dancing,
Until they came to the river Weser,
Wherein all plunged and perished !
—Save one who, stout as Julius Cæsar,
Swam across and lived to carry

(As he, the manuscript he cherished)
To Rat-land home his commentary :
Which was, "At the first shrill notes of the pipe,
"I heard a sound as of scraping tripe,
"And putting apples, wondrous ripe,
"Into a cider-press's gripe :
"And a moving away of pickle-tub-boards,
"And a leaving ajar of conserve-cupboards,
"And a drawing the corks of train-oil-flasks,
"And a breaking the hoops of butter-casks :
"And it seemed as if a voice

"(Sweeter far than by harp or by psaltery
"Is breathed) called out, 'Oh rats, rejoice !

"The world is grown to one vast drysaltery !

"So munch on, crunch on, take your nuncheon,

"Breakfast, supper, dinner, luncheon !"

"And just as a bulky sugar-puncheon,

"All ready staved, like a great sun stone

"Glorious scarce an inch before me,

"Just as methought it said, 'Come, bore me !'

"—I found the Weser rolling o'er me."

VIII.

You should have heard the Hamelin people
Ringing the bells till they rocked the steeple.
"Go," cried the Mayor, "and get long poles,
"Poke out the nests and block up the holes !
"Consult with carpenters and builders,
"And leave in our town not even a trace
"Of the rats !"—when suddenly, up the face
Of the Piper perked in the market-place,
With a, "First, if you please, my thousand guilders !"

IX.

A thousand guilders ! The Mayor looked
blue ;

So did the Corporation too.

For council dinners made rare havoe

With Claret, Moselle, Vin-de-Grave, Hock ;

And half the money would replenish
Their cellar's biggest butt with Rhenish.

To pay this sum to a wandering fellow

With a gipsy coat of red and yellow !

"Beside," quoth the Mayor with a knowing wink,

"Our business was done at the river's brink ;

"We saw with our eyes the vermin sink,

"And what's dead can't come to life, I think.

"So, friend, we're not the folks to shrink

"From the duty of giving you something for drink,

"And a matter of money to put in your poke ;

"But as for the guilders, what we spoke

"Of them, as you very well know, was in joke.

"Beside, our losses have made us thrifty.

"A thousand guilders ! Come, take fifty !"

x.

The Piper's face fell, and he cried

"No trifling ! I can't wait, beside !

"I've promised to visit by dinnertime

"Bagdat, and accept the prime

"Of the Head-Cook's pottage, all he's rich in,

"For having left, in the Caliph's kitchen,

"Of a nest of scorpions no survivor :

"With him I proved no bargain-driver,

"With you, don't think I'll bate a stiver !

"And folks who put me in a passion

"May find me pipe after another fashion."

XI.

"How?" cried the Mayor, "d'ye think I brook

"Being worse treated than a Cook ?

"Insulted by a lazy ribald

"With idle pipe and vesture piebald ?

"You threaten us, fellow ? Do your worst,

"Blow your pipe there till you burst !"

XII.

Once more he stept into the street

And to his lips again

Laid his long pipe of smooth straight cane ;

And ere he blew three notes (such sweet

Soft notes as yet musician's cunning

Never gave the enraptured air)

There was a rustling that seemed like a bustling
Of merry crowds justling at pitching and hustling,
Small feet were pattering, wooden shoes
clattering,
Little hands clapping and little tongues chattering,
And, like fowls in a farm-yard when barley
is scattering,
Out came the children running.
All the little boys and girls,
With rosy cheeks and flaxen curls,
And sparkling eyes and teeth like pearls,
Tripping and skipping, ran merrily after
The wonderful music with shouting and laughter.

XIII.

The Mayor was dumb, and the Council stood
As if they were changed into blocks of wood,
Unable to move a step, or cry
To the children merrily skipping by,
—Could only follow with the eye
That joyous crowd at the Piper's back.
But how the Mayor was on the rack,
And the wretched Council's bosoms beat,
As the Piper turned from the High Street
To where the Weser rolled its waters
Right in the way of their sons and daughters !
However he turned from South to West,
And to Koppelberg Hill his steps addressed,
And after him the children pressed ;
Great was the joy in every breast.
" He never can cross that mighty top !
" He's forced to let the piping drop,
" And we shall see our children stop !"
When, lo, as they reached the mountain-
side,
A wondrous portal opened wide,
As if a cavern was suddenly hollowed ;
And the Piper advanced and the children followed,
And when all were in to the very last,
The door in the mountain-side shut fast.
Did I say, all ? No ! One was lame,
And could not dance the whole of the way ;
And in after years, if you would blame
His sadness, he was used to say,—

" It's dull in our town since my playmates left !
" I can't forget that I'm bereft
" Of all the pleasant sights they see,
" Which the Piper also promised me.
" For he led us, he said, to a joyous land,
" Joining the town and just at hand,
" Where waters gushed and fruit-trees grew
" And flowers put forth a fairer hue,
" And everything was strange and new ;
" The sparrows were brighter than peacocks
here,
" And their dogs outran our fallow deer,
" And honey-bees had lost their stings,
" And horses were born with eagles' wings :
" And just as I became assured
" My lame foot would be speedily cured,
" The music stopped and I stood still,
" And found myself outside the hill,
" Left alone against my will,
" To go now limping as before,
" And never hear of that country more !"

XIV.

Alas, alas for Hamelin !

There came into many a burgher's pate
A text which says that heaven's gate
Opens to the rich at as easy rate
As the needle's eye takes a camel in !
The mayor sent East, West, North and South,
To offer the Piper, by word of mouth,
Wherever it was men's lot to find him,
Silver and gold to his heart's content,
If he'd only return the way he went,
And bring the children behind him.
But when they saw 'twas a lost endeavour,
And Piper and dancers were gone for ever,
They made a decree that lawyers never Should think their records dated duly
If, after the day of the month and year,
These words did not as well appear,
" And so long after what happened here
" On the Twenty-second of July,
" Thirteen hundred and seventy-six :"
And the better in memory to fix
The place of the children's last retreat,
They called it, the Pied Piper's Street—
Where any one playing on pipe or tabor
Was sure for the future to lose his labour.

Nor suffered they hostelry or tavern
 To shock with mirth a street so solemn ;
 But opposite the place of the cavern
 They wrote the story on a column,
 And on the great church-window painted
 The same, to make the world acquainted
 How their children were stolen away,
 And there it stands to this very day.
 And I must not omit to say
 That in Transylvania there's a tribe
 Of alien people who ascribe
 The outlandish ways and dress
 On which their neighbours lay such stress,
 To their fathers and mothers having risen
 Out of some subterraneous prison
 Into which they were trepanned
 Long time ago in a mighty band
 Out of Hamelin town in Brunswick land,
 But how or why, they don't understand.

XV.

So, Willy, let me and you be wipers
 Of scores out with all men—especially pipers !
 And, whether they pipe us free from rats or from mice,
 If we've promised them aught, let us keep our promise !

THE FLIGHT OF THE DUCHESS.

I.

You'RE my friend :
 I was the man the Duke spoke to ;
 I helped the Duchess to cast off his yoke, too ;
 So here's the tale from beginning to end,
 My friend !

II.

Ours is a great wild country :
 If you climb to our castle's top,
 I don't see where your eye can stop ;
 For when you've passed the cornfield country,
 Where vineyards leave off, flocks are packed,
 And sheep-range leads to cattle-tract,
 And cattle-tract to open-chase,
 And open-chase to the very base
 Of the mountain where, at a funeral pace,

Round about, solemn and slow,
 One by one, row after row,
 Up and up the pine-trees go,
 So, like black priests up, and so
 Down the other side again
 To another greater, wilder country,
 That's one vast red drear burnt-up plain,
 Branched through and through with many a vein
 Whence iron's dug, and copper's dealt ;
 Look right, look left, look straight before,— Beneath they mine, above they smelt,
 Copper-ore and iron-ore,
 And forge and furnace mould and melt,
 And so on, more and ever more,
 Till at the last, for a bounding belt,
 Comes the salt sand hoar of the great sea-
 shore,
 —And the whole is our Duke's country.

III.

I was born the day this present Duke was—
 (And O, says the song, ere I was old !)
 In the castle where the other Duke was—
 (When I was happy and young, not old !)
 I in the kennel, he in the bower :
 We are of like age to an hour.
 My father was huntsman in that day ;
 Who has not heard my father say
 That, when a boar was brought to bay,
 Three times, four times out of five,
 With his huntspear he'd contrive
 To get the killing-place transfixed,
 And pin him true, both eyes betwixt ?
 And that's why the old Duke would rather
 He lost a salt-pit than my father,
 And loved to have him ever in call ;
 That's why my father stood in the hall
 When the old Duke brought his infant out
 To show the people, and while they passed
 The wondrous bantling round about,
 Was first to start at the outside blast
 As the Kaiser's courier blew his horn
 Just a month after the babe was born.
 "And," quoth the Kaiser's courier, "since
 "The Duke has got an heir, our Prince
 "Needs the Duke's self at his side :"
 The Duke looked down and seemed to wince,
 But he thought of wars o'er the world wide,

Castles a-fire, men on their march,
The toppling tower, the crashing arch ;
And up he looked, and awhile he eyed
The row of crests and shields and banners
Of all achievements after all manners,
And "ay," said the Duke with a surly
pride.

The more was his comfort when he died
At next year's end, in a velvet suit,
With a gilt glove on his hand, his foot
In a silken shoe for a leather boot,
Petticoated like a herald,
In a chamber next to an ante-room,
Where he breathed the breath of page and
groom,

What he called stink, and they, perfume :
-- They should have set him on red Berold
Mad with pride, like fire to manage !
They should have got his cheek fresh tannage
Such a day as to-day in the merry sunshine !
Had they stuck on his fist a merry-foot merlin !
(Hark, the wind's on the heath at its game !
Oh for a noble falcon-lanner
To flap each broad wing like a banner,
And turn in the wind, and dance like flame !)
Had they broached a white-beer cask from Berlin

- Or if you incline to prescribe mere wine
Put to his lips, when they saw him pine,
A cup of our own Moldavia fine,
Cotnar for instance, green as May sorrel
And rosy with sweet,—we shall not quarrel.

IV.

So, at home, the sick tall yellow Duchess
Was left with the infant in her clutches,
She being the daughter of God knows who :

And now was the time to revisit her tribe.
Abroad and afar they went, the two,
And let our people rail and gibe
At the empty hall and extinguished fire,
As loud as we liked, but ever in vain,
Till after long years we had our desire,
And back came the Duke and his mother
again.

V.

And he came back the pertest little ape
That ever affronted human shape ;

Full of his travel, struck at himself.

You'd say, he despised our bluff old ways ?
—Not he ! For in Paris they told the elf
Our rough North land was the Land of Lays,
The one good thing left in evil days ;
Since the Mid-Age was the Heroic Time,
And only in wild nooks like ours
Could you taste of it yet as in its prime,
And see true castles, with proper towers,
Young-hearted women, old-minded men,
And manners now as manners were then.
So, all that the old Dukes had been, without knowing it,
This Duke would fain know he was, without being it ;

'Twas not for the joy's self, but the joy of his showing it,
Nor for the pride's self, but the pride of our seeing it,
He revived all usages thoroughly worn-out,
The souls of them fumed-forth, the hearts of them turn-out :

And chief in the chase his neck he perilled
On a lathy horse, all legs and length,
With blood for bone, all speed, no strength ;
—They should have set him on red Berold
With the red eye slow consuming in fire,
And the thin stiff ear like an abbey-spire !

VI.

Well, such as he was, he must marry, we heard :
And out of a convent, at the word,
Came the lady, in time of spring.

—Oh, old thoughts they cling, they cling !
That day, I know, with a dozen oaths
I clad myself in thick hunting-clothes
Fit for the chase of urochs or buffle
In winter-time when you need to muffle.
But the Duke had a mind we should cut a figure,

And so we saw the lady arrive :
My friend, I have seen a white crane bigger !
She was the smallest lady alive,
Made in a piece of nature's madness,
Too small, almost, for the life and gladness

That over-filled her, as some hive
Out of the bears' reach on the high trees
Is crowded with its safe merry bees :
In truth, she was not hard to please !

Up she looked, down she looked, round at the mead,

Straight at the castle, that's best indeed
To look at from outside the walls :

As for us, styled the "serfs and thralls,"
She as much thanked me as if she had said it,
(With her eyes, do you understand ?)

Because I patted her horse while I led it ;

And Max, who rode on her other hand,
Said, no bird flew past but she inquired
What its true name was, nor ever seemed tired—

If that was an eagle she saw hover,
And the green and grey bird on the field was the plover.

When suddenly appeared the Duke :
And as down she sprung, the small foot pointed

On to my hand,—as with a rebuke,
And as if his backbone were not jointed,
The Duke stepped rather aside than forward,
And welcomed her with his grandest
smile ;

And, mind you, his mother all the while
Chilled in the rear, like a wind to Nor'ward ;
And up, like a weary yawn, with its pullies
Went, in a shriek, the rusty portcullis ;
And, like a glad sky the north-wind sullies,
The lady's face stopped its play,
As if her first hair had grown grey ;
For such things must begin some one day.

VII.

In a day or two she was well again ;
As who should say, " You labour in vain !
" This is all a jest against God, who meant
" I should ever be, as I am, content " And glad in his sight ; therefore, glad I will be."
So, smiling as at first went she.

VIII.

She was active, stirring, all fire—
Could not rest, could not tire—
To a stone she might have given life !
(I myself loved once, in my day)
—For a shepherd's, miner's, huntsman's wife,
(I had a wife, I know what I say)

Never in all the world such an one !

And here was plenty to be done,
And she that could do it, great or small,
She was to do nothing at all.

There was already this man in his post,
This in his station, and that in his office,
And the Duke's plan admitted a wife, at most,
To meet his eye, with the other trophies,
Now outside the hall, now in it,
To sit thus, stand thus, see and be seen,
At the proper place in the proper minute,
And die away the life between.

And it was amusing enough, each infraction
Of rule—(but for after-sadness that came)
To hear the consummate self-satisfaction
With which the young Duke and the old dame

Would let her advise, and criticise,
And, being a fool, instruct the wise,
And, child-like, parcel out praise or blame :
They bore it all in complacent guise,
As though an artificer, after contriving
A wheel-work image as if it were living,
Should find with delight it could motion to strike him !

So found the Duke, and his mother like him :
The lady hardly got a rebuff—
That had not been contemptuous enough,
With his cursed smirk, as he nodded applause,
And kept off the old mother-cat's claws.

IX.

So, the little lady grew silent and thin,
Paling and ever paling,
As the way is with a hid chagrin ;
And the Duke perceived that she was ailing,
And said in his heart, "'Tis done to spite me,
" But I shall find in my power to right me !"
Don't swear, friend ! The old one, many a year,
Is in hell, and the Duke's self . . . you shall hear.

X.

Well, early in autumn, at first winter-warning,
When the stag had to break with his foot, of a
morning,
A drinking-hole out of the fresh tender ice
That covered the pond till the sun, in a trice.

Loosening it, let out a ripple of gold,
 And another and another, and faster and faster,
 Till, dimpling to blindness, the wide water rolled :
 Then it so chanced that the Duke our master
 Asked himself what were the pleasures in season,
 And found, since the calendar bade him be hearty,
 He should do the Middle Age no treason
 In resolving on a hunting-party.
 Always provided, old books showed the way
 of it !
 What meant old poets by their strictures ?
 And when old poets had said their say of it,
 How taught old painters in their pictures ?
 We must revert to the proper channels,
 Workings in tapestry, paintings on panels,
 And gather up woodcraft's authentic traditions:
 Here was food for our various ambitions,
 As on each case, exactly stated—
 To encourage your dog, now, the properest chirrup,
 Or best prayer to Saint Hubert on mounting your stirrup—
 We of the household took thought and debated.
 Blessed was he whose back ached with the jerkin
 His sire was wont to do forest-work in ;
 Blessed he who nobly sunk "ohs"
 And "ahs" while he tugged on his grand-sire's trunk-hose ;
 What signified hats if they had no rims on,
 Each slouching before and behind like the scallop,
 And able to serve at sea for a shallop,
 Loaded with lacquer and looped with crimson ?
 So that the deer now, to make a short rhyme
 on't,
 What with our Venerers, Prickers and Verderers,
 Might hope for real hunters at length and not murderers,
 And oh the Duke's tailor, he had a hot time
 on't !

XI.

Now you must know that when the first dizziness
 Of flap-hats and buff-coats and jack-boots subsided,
 The Duke put this question, "The Duke's part provided,
 "Had not the Duchess some share in the business?"
 For out of the mouth of two or three witnesses
 Did he establish all fit-or-unfitnesses :
 And, after much laying of heads together,
 Somebody's cap got a notable feather
 By the announcement with proper unction
 That he had discovered the lady's function ;
 Since ancient authors gave this tenet,
 "When horns wind a mort and the deer is at siege,
 "Let the dame of the castle prick forth on her jennet,
 "And, with water to wash the hands of her liege
 "In a clean ewer with a fair toweling,
 "Let her preside at the disemboweling."
 Now, my friend, if you had so little religion
 As to catch a hawk, some falcon-lanner,
 And thrust her broad wings like a banner
 Into a coop for a vulgar pigeon ;
 And if day by day and week by week
 You cut her claws, and sealed her eyes,
 And clipped her wings, and tied her beak,
 Would it cause you any great surprise
 If, when you decided to give her an airing,
 You found she needed a little preparing ?
 —I say, should you be such a curmudgeon,
 If she clung to the perch, as to take it in dudgeon ?
 Yet when the Duke to his lady signified,
 Just a day before, as he judged most dignified,
 In what a pleasure she was to participate,—
 And, instead of leaping wide in flashes,
 Her eyes just lifted their long lashes,
 As if pressed by fatigue even he could not dissipate,
 And duly acknowledged the Duke's fore-
 thought,
 But spoke of her health, if her health were worth aught,

Of the weight by day and the watch by night,
And much wrong now that used to be right,
So, thanking him, declined the hunting,—
Was conduct ever more affronting?

With all the ceremony settled—

With the towel ready, and the sewer
Polishing up his oldest ewer,
And the jennet pitched upon, a piebald,
Black-barred, cream-coated and pink eyeballed,—

No wonder if the Duke was nettled !

And when she persisted nevertheless,—

Well, I suppose here's the time to confess
That there ran half round our lady's chamber
A balcony none of the hardest to clamber ;
And that Jacynth the tire-woman, ready in waiting,

Stayed in call outside, what need of relating ?
And since Jacynth was like a June rose, why,
a fervent

Adorer of Jacynth of course was your servant ;
And if she had the habit to peep through the casement,

How could I keep at any vast distance ?

And so, as I say, on the lady's persistence,
The Duke, dumb-stricken with amazement,
Stood for a while in a sultry smother,

And then, with a smile that partook of the awful,

Turned her over to his yellow mother

To learn what was held decorous and lawful ;

And the mother smelt blood with a cat-like instinct,

As her cheek quick whitened thro' all its quince-tinct.

Oh, but the lady heard the whole truth at once !

What meant she ?—Who was she ?—Her duty and station,

The wisdom of age and the folly of youth, at
once,

Its decent regard and its fitting relation—

In brief, my friend, set all the devils in hell
free

And turn them out to carouse in a belfry
And treat the priests to a fifty-part canon,
And then you may guess how that tongue of hers ran on !

Well, somehow or other it ended at last
And, licking her whiskers, out she passed ;
And after her,—making (he hoped) a face
Like Emperor Nero or Sultan Saladin,
Stalked the Duke's self with the austere grace
Of ancient hero or modern paladin,
From door to staircase—oh such a solemn
Unbending of the vertebral column !

XII.

However, at sunrise our company mustered ;
And here was the huntsman bidding un-kennel,

And there 'neath his bonnet the pricker
blustered,

With feather dank as a bough of wet fennel ;
For the court-yard walls were filled with fog

You might have cut as an axe chops a log—
Like so much wool for colour and bulkiness ;
And out rode the Duke in a perfect sulkiness, Since, before breakfast, a man feels but queasily,

And a sinking at the lower abdomen
Begins the day with indifferent omen.
And lo, as he looked around uneasily,
The sun ploughed the fog up and drove it asunder

This way and that from the valley under ;
And, looking through the court-yard arch,
Down in the valley, what should meet him
But a troop of Gipsies on their march ?
No doubt with the annual gifts to greet him.

XIII.

Now, in your land, Gipsies reach you, only After reaching all lands beside ;
North they go, South they go, trooping or lonely,

And still, as they travel far and wide,
Catch they and keep now a trace here, a trace there,
That puts you in mind of a place here, a place there.

But with us, I believe they rise out of the
ground,
And nowhere else, I take it, are found
With the earth-tint yet so freshly embrowned :

Born, no doubt, like insects which breed on
The very fruit they are meant to feed on.
For the earth—not a use to which they don't turn it,

The ore that grows in the mountain's womb,

Or the sand in the pits like a honeycomb,
They sift and soften it, bake it and burn it—
Whether they weld you, for instance, a snaffle
With side-bars never a brute can baffle ;

Or a lock that's a puzzle of wards within wards ;

Or, if your colt's fore-foot inclines to curve
inwards,

Horseshoes they hammer which turn on a swivel

And won't allow the hoof to shrivel.
Then they cast bells like the shell of the winkle

That keep a stout heart in the ram with their tinkle ;

But the sand—they pinch and pound it like otters ;

Commend me to Gipsy glass-makers and potters !

Glasses they'll blow you, crystal-clear,
Where just a faint cloud of rose shall appear,
As if in pure water you dropped and let die
A bruised black-blooded mulberry ;

And that other sort, their crowning pride,
With long white threads distinct inside,
Like the lake-flower's fibrous roots which dangle

Loose such a length and never tangle,
Where the bold sword-lily cuts the clear waters,

And the cup-lily couches with all the white daughters :

Such are the works they put their hand to,
The uses they turn and twist iron and sand to.
And these made the troop, which our Duke saw sally

Toward his castle from out of the valley,
Men and women, like new-hatched spiders,
Come out 'with the morning to greet our riders.

And up they wound till they reached the ditch,
Whereat all stopped save one, a witch

That I knew, as she hobbled from the group,
By her gait directly and her stoop,
I, whom Jacynth was used to importune
To let that same witch tell us our fortune.
The oldest Gipsy then above ground ;
And, sure as the autumn season came round,
She paid us a visit for profit or pastime,
And every time, as she swore, for the last
time.

And presently she was seen to sidle
Up to the Duke till she touched his bridle,
So that the horse of a sudden reared up
As under its nose the old witch peered up
With her worn-out eyes, or rather eye-holes

Of no use now but to gather brine,
And began a kind of level whine
Such as they used to sing to their viols
When their ditties they go grinding
Up and down with nobody minding :
And then, as of old, at the end of the humming

Her usual presents were forthcoming
—A dog-whistle blowing the fiercest of trebles, (Just a sea-shore stone holding a dozen fine pebbles,)

Or a porcelain mouth-piece to screw on a pipe-end,—

And so she awaited her annual stipend.
But this time, the Duke would scarcely vouchsafe

A word in reply ; and in vain she felt
With twitching fingers at her belt
For the purse of sleek pinc-martin pelt,
Ready to put what he gave in her pouch
safe,—

Till, either to quicken his apprehension,
Or possibly with an after-intention,
She was come, she said, to pay her duty
To the new Duchess, the youthful beauty.
No sooner had she named his lady,
Than a shine lit up the face so shady,
And its smirk returned with a novel meaning—
For it struck him, the babe just wanted weaning ;

If one gave her a taste of what life was and
sorrow,
She, foolish to-day, would be wiser tomorrow ;

And who so fit a teacher of trouble
As this sordid crone bent well-nigh double?
So, glancing at her wolf-skin vesture,
(If such it was, for they grow so hirsute

That their own fleece serves for natural fur-suit)

He was contrasting, 'twas plain from his gesture,

The life of the lady so flower-like and delicate
With the loathsome squalor of this helicat.

I, in brief, was the man the Duke beckoned
From out of the throng, and while I drew near

He told the crone—as I since have reckoned
By the way he bent and spoke into her car

With circumspection and mystery—

The main of the lady's history,

Her frowardness and ingratitude :

And for all the crone's submissive attitude

I could see round her mouth the loose plaits tightening,

And her brow with assenting intelligence
brightening,

As though she engaged with hearty goodwill

Whatever he now might enjoin to fulfil,
And promised the lady a thorough frightening.
And so, just giving her a glimpse
Of a purse, with the air of a man who imps
The wing of the hawk that shall fetch the hernshaw,

He bade me take the Gipsy mother

And set her telling some story or other
Of hill or dale, oak-wood or fernshaw,
To wile away a weary hour
For the lady left alone in her bower,
Whose mind and body craved exertion
And yet shrank from all better diversion.

XIV.

Then clapping heel to his horse, the mere curveter,

Out rode the Duke, and after his hollo Horses and hounds swept, huntsman and servitor,

And back I turned and bade the crone
follow.

And what makes me confident what's to be told you

Had all along been of this crone's devising,
Is, that, on looking round sharply, behold
you,

There was a novelty quick as surprising :
For first, she had shot up a full head in stature,

And her step kept pace with mine nor falterd,

As if age had foregone its usurpature,

And the ignoble mien was wholly altered,

And the face looked quite of another nature,

And the change reached too, whatever the change meant,

Her shaggy wolf-skin cloak's arrangement :

For where its tatters hung loose like sedges,

Gold coins were glittering on the edges,

Like the band-roll strung with tomons

Which proves the veil a Persian woman's :

And under her brow, like a snail's horns newly

Come out as after the rain he paces,

Two unmistakeable eye-points duly

Live and aware looked out of their places.

So, we went and found Jacynth at the entry

Of the lady's chamber standing sentry ;

I told the command and produced my companion,

And Jacynth rejoiced to admit any one,

For since last night, by the same token,

Not a single word had the lady spoken :

They went in both to the presence together,

While I in the balcony watched the weather.

XV.

And now, what took place at the very first
of all,

I cannot tell, as I never could learn it :

Jacynth constantly wished a curse to fall

On that little head of hers and burn it

If she knew how she came to drop so soundly

Asleep of a sudden and there continue

The whole time sleeping as profoundly

As one of the boars my father would pin you

'Twixt the eyes where life holds garrison,

—Jacynth forgive me the comparisor !

But where I begin my own narration

Is a little after I took my station

To breathe the fresh air from the balcony,
And, having in those days a falcon eye,
To follow the hunt thro' the open country,
From where the bushes thinnier crested
The hillocks, to a plain where's not one tree.

When, in a moment, my ear was arrested
By—was it singing, or was it saying,
Or a strange musical instrument playing
In the chamber?—and to be certain
I pushed the lattice, pulled the curtain,
And there lay Jacynth asleep,
Yet as if a watch she tried to keep,
In a rosy sleep along the floor
With her head against the door;
While in the midst, on the seat of state,
Was a queen—the Gipsy woman late,
With head and face downbent
On the lady's head and face intent:
For, coiled at her feet like a child at ease,
The lady sat between her knees
And o'er them the lady's clasped hands met,
And on those hands her chin was set,
And her upturned face met the face of the crone

Wherein the eyes had grown and grown
As if she could double and quadruple
At pleasure the play of either pupil
—Very like, by her hands' slow fanning,
As up and down like a gor-crow's flappers
They moved to measure, or bell-clappers.

I said "Is it blessing, is it banning,
"Do they applaud you or burlesque you—
"Those hands and fingers with no flesh
on?"

But, just as I thought to spring in to the rescue,
At once I was stopped by the lady's expression:

For it was life her eyes were drinking
From the crone's wide pair above unwinking,
—Life's pure fire received without shrinking,
Into the heart and breast whose heaving
Told you no single drop they were leaving,
—Life, that filling her, passed ~~re~~dundant
Into her very hair, back swerving
Over each shoulder, loose and abundant,
As her head thrown back showed the white throat curving;

And the very tresses shared in the pleasure,
Moving to the mystic measure,
Bounding as the bosom bounded.
I stopped short, more and more confounded,
As still her cheeks burned and eyes glistened,
As she listened and she listened:

When all at once a hand detained me,
The selfsame contagion gained me,
And I kept time to the wondrous chime,
Making out words and prose and rhyme,
Till it seemed that the music furled

Its wings like a task fulfilled, and dropped
From under the words it first had propped,
And left them midway in the world:
Word took word as hand takes hand,
I could hear at last, and understand,
And when I held the unbroken thread,
The Gipsy said:—

"And so at last we find my tribe.
"And so I set thee in the midst,
"And to one and all of them describe
"What thou saidst and what thou didst,
"Our long and terrible journey through,
"And all thou art ready to say and do
"In the trials that remain:
"I trace them the vein and the other vein
"That meet on thy brow and part again,
"Making our rapid mystic mark;
"And I bid my people prove and probe
"Each eye's profound and glorious globe
"Till they detect the kindred spark
In those depths so dear and dark,
"Like the spots that snap and burst and flee,
"Circling over the midnight sea.
"And on that round young cheek of thine
"I make them recognize the tinge,
"As when of the costly scarlet wine
"They drip so much as will impinge
"And spread in a thinnest scale afloat
"One thick gold drop from the olive's coat
"Over a silver plate whose sheen
"Still thro' the mixture shall be seen.
"For so I prove thee, to one and all,
"Fit, when my people ope their breast,
"To see the sign, and hear the call,
"And take the vow, and stand the test
"Which adds one more child to the rest—

- "When the breast is bare and the arms are wide,
 "And the world is left outside.
 "For there is probation to decree,
 "And many and long must the trials be
 "Thou shalt victoriously endure,
 "If that brow is true and those eyes are sure ;
 "Like a jewel-finder's fierce assay
 "Of the prize he dug from its mountain-tomb—
 "Let once the vindicating ray
 "Leap out amid the anxious gloom,
 "And steel and fire have done their part
 "And the prize falls on its finder's heart ;
 "So, trial after trial past,
 "Wilt thou fall at the very last
 "Breathless, half in trance
 "With the thrill of the great deliverance,
 "Into our arms for evermore ;
 "And thou shalt know, those arms once curled
 "About thee, what we knew before,
 "How love is the only good in the world.
 "Henceforth be loved as heart can love,
 "Or brain devise, or hand approve !
 "Stand up, look below,
 "It is our life at thy feet we throw
 "To step with into light and joy ;
 "Not a power of life but we employ
 "To satisfy thy nature's want ;
 "Art thou the tree that props the plant,
 "Or the climbing plant that seeks the tree—
 "Canst thou help us, must we help thee ?
 "If any two creatures grew into one,
 "They would do more than the world has done :
 "Though each apart were never so weak,
 "Ye vainly through the world should seek
 "For the knowledge and the might
 "Which in such union grew their right :
 "So, to approach at least that end,
 "And blend,—as much as may be, blend
 "Thee with us or us with thee,—
 "As climbing plant or propping tree,
 "Shall some one deck thee, over and down,
 "Up and about, with blossoms and leaves ?
 "Fix his heart's fruit for thy garland-crown,
 "Cling with his soul as the gourd-vine cleaves,
 "Die on thy boughs and disappear
 "While not a leaf of thine is ere ?
 "Or is the other fate in store,
 "And art thou fitted to adore,
 "To give thy wondrous self away,
 "And take a stronger nature's sway ?
 "I foresee and could foretell
 "Thy future portion, sure and well :
 "But those passionate eyes speak true, speak true,
 "Let them say what thou shalt do !
 "Only be sure thy daily life,
 "In its peace or in its strife,
 "Never shall be unobserved ;
 "We pursue thy whole career,
 "And hope for it, or doubt, or fear,—
 "Lo, hast thou kept thy path or swerved,
 "We are beside thee in all thy ways,
 "With our blame, with our praise,—
 "Our shame to feel, our pride to show,
 "Glad, angry—but indifferent, no !
 "Whether it be thy lot to go,
 "For the good of us all, where the haters meet
 "In the crowded city's horrible street ;
 "Or thou step alone through the morass
 "Where never sound yet was
 "Save the dry quick clap of the stork's bill,
 "For the air is still, and the water still,
 "When the blue breast of the dipping coot
 "Dives under, and all is mute.
 "So, at the last shall come old age,
 "Decrepit as befits that stage ;
 "How else wouldst thou retire apart
 "With the hoarded memories of thy heart,
 "And gather all to the very least
 "Of the fragments of life's earlier feast,
 "Let fall through eagerness to find
 "The crowning dainties yet behind ?
 "Ponder on the entire past
 "Laid together thus at last,
 "When the twilight helps to fuse
 "The first fresh with the faded hues,
 "And the outline of the whole,
 "As round ~~one's~~ shades their framework roll,
 "Grandly fronts for once thy soul.
 "And then as, 'mid the dark, a gleam
 "Of yet another morning breaks,

"And like the hand which ends a dream,
 "Death, with the might of his sunbeam,
 "Touches the flesh and the soul awakes,
 "Then——"

Ay, then indeed something would happen !

But what ? For here her voice changed like a bird's ;

There grew more of the music and less of the words ;

Had Jacynth only been by me to clap pen

To paper and put you down every syllable
 With those clever clerkly fingers,

All I've forgotten as well as what lingers

In this old brain of mine that's but ill able

To give you even this poor version

Of the speech I spoil, as it were, with stammering

—More fault of those who had the hammering

Of prosody into me and syntax,

And did it, not with hobnails but tintacks !

But to return from this excursion,—

Just, do you mark, when the song was sweetest,

The peace most deep and the charm completest,

There came, shall I say, a snap—

And the charm vanished !

And my sense returned, so strangely banished,

And, starting as from a nap,

I knew the crone was bewitching my lady,

With Jacynth asleep ; and but one spring made I

Down from the casement, round to the portal,

Another minute and I had entered,—

When the door opened, and more than mortal

Stood, with a face where to my mind centred

All beauties I ever saw or shall see,

The Duchess · I stopped as if struck by palsy.

She was so different, happy and beautiful,

I felt at once that all was best,

And that I had nothing to do, for the rest,

But wait her commands, obey and be dutiful.
 Not that, in fact, there was any commanding ;

I saw the glory of her eye,

And the brow's height and the breast's expanding,

And I was hers to live or to die.

As for finding what she wanted,

You know God Almighty granted

Such little signs should serve wild creatures

To tell one another all their desires,

So that each knows what his friend requires,

And does its bidding without teachers.

I preceded her ; the crone

Followed silent and alone ;

I spoke to her, but she merely jabbered

In the old style ; both her eyes had slunk

Back to their pits ; her stature shrunk ;

In short, the soul in its body sunk

Like a blade sent home to its scabbard.

We descended, I preceding ;

Crossed the court with nobody heeding ;

All the world was at the chase,

The courtyard like a desert-place,

The stable emptied of its small fry ;

I saddled myself the very palfrey

I remember patting while it carried her,

The day she arrived and the Duke married
 her.

And, do you know, though it's easy deceiving

Oneself in such matters, I can't help believing

The lady had not forgotten it either,

And knew the poor devil so much beneath her

Would have been only too glad for her service

To dance on hot ploughshares like a Turk dervise,

But, unable to pay proper duty where owing
 it,

Was reduced to that pitiful method of showing it :

For though the moment I began setting

His saddle on my own nag of Berold's beget-ting,

(Not that I meant to be obtrusive)

She stopped me, while his rug was shifting,

By a single rapid finger's lifting,

And, with a gesture kind but conclusive,

And a little shake of the head, refused me,—

I say, although she never used me,

Yet when she was mounted, the Gipsy behind her,

And I ventured to remind her,

I suppose with a voice of less steadiness
 Than usual, for my feeling exceeded me,
 —Something to the effect that I was in readiness

Whenever God should please she needed me,—

Then, do you know, her face looked down on me
 With a look that placed a crown on me,
 And she felt in her bosom,—mark, her bosom—
 And, as a flower-tree drops its blossom,
 Dropped me . . . ah, had it been a purse
 Of silver, my friend, or gold that's worse,
 Why, you see, as soon as I found myself

So understood,—that a true heart so may gain

Such a reward,—I should have gone home again,

Kissed Jacynth, and soberly drowned myself !
 It was a little plait of hair

Such as friends in a convent make

To wear, each for the other's sake,—
 This, see, which at my breast I wear,
 Ever did (rather to Jacynth's grudgment),
 And ever shall, till the Day of Judgment.
 And then,—and then,—to cut short,—this is idle,

These are feelings it is not good to foster,—
 I pushed the gate wide, she shook the bridle,
 And the palfrey bounded,—and so we lost her.

XVI.

When the liquor's out why clink the cannikin?
 I did think to describe you the panic in
 The redoubtable breast of our master the mannikin,

And what was the pitch of his mother's yellowness,

How she turned as a shark to snap the spare-rib

Clean off, sailors say, from a pearl-diving
 Carib,

When she heard, what she called the flight of the feloness

—But it seems such child's play,
 What they said and did with the lady away !
 And to dance on, when we've lost the music,
 Always made me—and no doubt makes you
 —sick.

Nay, to my mind, the world's face looked so stern

As that sweet form disappeared through the postern,

She that kept it in constant good humour,
 It ought to have stopped ; there seemed nothing to do more.

But the world thought otherwise and went on,
 And my head's one that its spite was spent on :
 Thirty years are fled since that morning,
 And with them all my head's adorning.

Nor did the old Duchess die outright,
 As you expect, of suppressed spite,
 The natural end of every adder

Not suffered to empty its poison-bladder :

But she and her son agreed, I take it,
 That no one should touch on the story to wake it,

For the wound in the Duke's pride rankled fiery,

So, they made no search and small inquiry—
 And when fresh Gipsies have paid us a visit,
 I've

Noticed the couple were never inquisitive,
 But told them they're folks the Duke don't want here,

And bade them make haste and cross the frontier.

Brief, the Duchess was gone and the Duke
 was glad of it,

And the old one was in the young one's stead,

And took, in her place, the household's
 head,

And a blessed time the household had of it !
 And were I not, as a man may say, cautious
 How I trench, more than needs, on the nauseous,

I could favour you with sundry touches
 Of the paint-smutches with which the Duchess Heightened the mellowness of her cheek's yellowness

(To get on faster) until at last her
 Cheek grew to be one master-plaster
 Of mucus and fucus from mere use of ceruse :

In short, she grew from scalp to udder
 Just the object to make you shudder.

XVII.

You're my friend—

What a thing friendship is, world without end!
How it gives the heart and soul a stir-up

As if somebody broached you a glorious runlet,

And poured out, all lovelily, sparkingly,
sunlit,

Our green Moldavia, the streaky syrup,
Cotnar as old as the time of the Druids—

Friendship may match with that monarch of fluids ;

Each supple a dry brain, fills you its ins-and-outs,

Gives your life's hour-glass a shake when the thin sand doubts

Whether to run on or stop short, and guarantees
Age is not all made of stark sloth and arrant ease.

I have seen my little lady once more,
Jacynth, the Gipsy, Berold, and the rest
of it,

For to me spoke the Duke, as I told you
before ;

I always wanted to make a clean breast
of it :

And now it is made—why, my heart's blood,
that went trickle,

Trickle, but anon, in such muddy driblets,
Is pumped up brisk now, through the main ventricle,

And genially floats me about the giblets.
I'll tell you what I intend to do :

I must see this fellow his sad life through—
He is our Duke, after all,

And I, as he says, but a serf and thrall.

My father was born here, and I inherit

His fame, a chain he bound his son with ;

Could I pay in a lump I should prefer it,

But there's no mine to blow up and get done with :

So, I must stay till the end of the chapter.

For, as to our middle-age-manners-adapter,

Be it a thing to be glad on or sorry on,

Some day or other, his head in a morion

And breast in a hauberk, his heels he'll kick up,

Slain by an onslaught fierce of hiccup.

And then, when red doth the sword of our Duke rust,

And its leathern sheath lie o'ergrown with a blue crust,

Then I shall scrape together my earnings ;

For, you see, in the churchyard Jacynth reposes,

And our children all went the way of the roses :

It's a long lane that knows no turnings.

One needs but little tackle to travel in ;

So, just one stout cloak shall I indue :

And for a staff, what beats the javelin
With which his boars my father pinned you ?

And then, for a purpose you shall hear
presently,

Taking some Cotnar, a tight plump skinful,
I shall go journeying, who but I, pleasantly !
Sorrow is vain and despondency sinful.

What's a man's age ? He must hurry more,
that's all ;

Cram in a day, what his youth took a year to hold :

When we mind labour, then only, we're too old—

What age had Methusalem when he begat
Saul ?

And at last, as its haven some buffeted ship
sees,

(Come all the way from the north-parts with sperm oil)

I hope to get safely out of the turmoil
And arrive one day at the land of the Gipsies,
And find my lady, or hear the last news of
her

From some old thief and son of Lucifer,
His forehead chapleted green with wreathy hop,

Sunburned all over like an Æthiop.

And when my Cotnar begins to operate

And the tongue of the rogue to run at a proper rate,

And our wine-skin, tight once, shows each flaccid dent,

I shall drop in with—as if by accident—

“You never knew, then, how it all ended,

“What fortune good or bad attended

“The little lady your Queen befriended ?”

—And when that's told me, what's remaining?
 This world's too hard for my explaining.
 The same wise judge of matters equine
 Who still preferred some slim four-year-old
 To the big-boned stock of mighty Berold,
 And, for strong Cotnar, drank French weak wine,
 He also must be such a lady's scorner!
 Smooth Jacob still robs homely Esau:
 Now up, now down, the world's one see-saw.
 —So, I shall find out some snug corner
 Under a hedge, like Orson the wood-knight,
 Turn myself round and bid the world good night;
 And sleep a sound sleep till the trumpet's blowing
 Wakes me (unless priests cheat us laymen)
 To a world where will be no further throwing
 Pearls before swine that can't value them.
 Amen!

A GRAMMARIAN'S FUNERAL,

SHORTLY AFTER THE REVIVAL OF LEARNING IN EUROPE.

LET us begin and carry up this corpse,
 Singing together.
 Leave we the common crofts, the vulgar thorpes
 Each in its tether
 Sleeping safe on the bosom of the plain,
 Cared-for till cock-crow:
 Look out if yonder be not day again
 Rimming the rock-row!
 That's the appropriate country; there, man's thought,
 Rarer, intenser,
 Self-gathered for an outbreak, as it ought,
 Chafes in the censer.
 Leave we the unlettered plain its herd and crop;
 Seek we sepulture
 On a tall mountain, cited to the top,
 Crowded with culture!

All the peaks soar, but one the rest excels;
 Clouds overcome it;
 No! yonder sparkle is the citadel's
 Circling its summit.
 Thither our path lies; wind we up the heights:
 Wait ye the warning?
 Our low life was the level's and the night's;
 He's for the morning.
 Step to a tune, square chests, erect each head,
 'Ware the beholders!
 This is our master, famous calm and dead,
 Borne on our shoulders.
 Sleep, crop and herd! sleep, darkling thorpe and croft,
 Safe from the weather!
 He, whom we convoy to his grave aloft,
 Singing together,
 He was a man born with thy face and throat,
 Lyric Apollo!
 Long he lived nameless: how should spring take note
 Winter would follow?
 Till lo, the little touch, and youth was gone!
 Cramped and diminished,
 Moaned he, "New measures, other feet anon!
 "My dance is finished?"
 Ne, that's the world's way: (keep the mountain-side,
 Make for the city!)

He knew the signal, and stepped on with pride
 Over men's pity;
 Left play for work, and grappled with the world
 Bent on escaping:
 "What's in the scroll," quoth he, "thou keepest furled?
 "Show me their shaping,
 "Theirs who most studied man, the bard and sage,—
 "Give!"—So, he gowned him,
 Straight got by heart that book to its last page:
 Learned, we found him.
 Yea, but we found him bald too, eyes like lead,
 Accents uncertain:
 "Time to taste life," another would have said,
 "Up with the curtain!"

This man said rather, "Actual life comes next?"

"Patience a moment!

"Grant I have mastered learning's crabbed text,

"Still there's the comment.

"Let me know all! Prate not of most or least,

"Painful or easy!

"Even to the crumbs I'd fain eat up the feast,

"Ay, nor feel queasy."

(Oh, such a life as he resolved to live,

When he had learned it,

When he had gathered all books had to give!

Sooner, he spurned it.

Image the whole, then execute the parts—

Fancy the fabric

(Quite, ere you build, ere steel strike fire from quartz,

Ere mortar dab brick!

(Here's the town-gate reached: there's the market-place Gaping before us.)

Yea, this in him was the peculiar grace

(Hearten our chorus!)

That before living he'd learn how to live—

No end to learning:

Earn the means first—God surely will contrive

Use for our earning.

Others mistrust and say, "But time escapes:

"Live now or never!"

He said, "What's time? Leave Now for dogs and apes!

"Man has Forever."

Back to his book then: deeper drooped his head:

Calculus racked him:

Leaden before, his eyes grew dross of lead:

Tussis attacked him.

"Now, master, take a little rest!"—not he!

(Caution redoubled,

Step two abreast, the way winds narrowly!)

Not a whit troubled

Back to his studies, fresher than at first,

Fierce as a dragon

He (soul-hydroptic with a sacred thirst)

Sucked at the flagon.

Oh, if we draw a circle premature,

Heedless of far gain,

Greedy for quick returns of profit, sure

Bad is our bargain!

Was it not great? did not he throw on God,

(He loves the burthen)—

God's task to make the heavenly period

Perfect the carthen?

Did not he magnify the mind, show clear

Just what it all meant?

He would not discount life, as fools do here,

Paid by instalment.

He ventured neck or nothing—heaven's success

Found, or earth's failure:

"Wilt thou trust death or not?" He answered "Yes:

"Hence with life's pale lure!"

That low man seeks a little thing to do,

Sees it and does it:

This high man, with a great thing to pursue,

Dies ere he knows it.

That low man goes on adding one to one,

His hundred's soon hit:

This high man, aiming at a million,

Misses an unit.

That, has the world here—should he need the next,

Let the world mind him!

This, throws himself on God, and unperplexed

Seeking shall find him.

So, with the throttling hands of death at strife,

Ground he at grammar;

Still, thro' the rattle, parts of speech were rife:

While he could stammer

He settled Holi's business—let it be!—

Properly based Oum—

Gave us the doctrine of the enclitic De,

Dead from the waist down.

Well, here's the platform, here's the proper place:

Hail to your purlieus,

All ye highfliers of the feathered race,

Swallows and curlews!

Here's the top-peak; the multitude below

Live, for they can, there:

This man decided not to Live but Know—

Bury this man there?

Here—here's his place, where meteors shoot,
clouds form,

Lightnings are loosened,
Stars come and go! Let joy break with the storm,

Peace let the dew send!
Lofty designs must close in like effects:

Lofily lying,
Leave him—still loftier than the world suspects,
Living and dying.

THE HERETIC'S TRAGEDY.

A MIDDLE-AGE INTERLUDE.

ROSA MUNDI; SEU, FULCITE ME FLORIBUS.
A CONCEIT OF MASTER GYSBRECHT,

THE-BAR, YPRES CITY. CANTUQUE, Virgilus. AND HATH OFTEN BEEN SUNG
AT HOCK-TIDE AND FESTIVALS. GAVISUS
ERAM, Jessides.

(It would seem to be a glimpse from the burning of Jacques du Bourg-Molay, at Paris,
A.D. 1314; as distorted by the refraction from Flemish brain to brain, during the course of a couple of centuries.)

[Molay was Grand Master of the Templars when that order was suppressed in 1312.]

I.

PREADMONISHETH THE ABBOT DEODAET.

THE Lord, we look to once for all,
Is the Lord we should look at, all at
once:

He knows not to vary, saith Saint Paul,
Nor the shadow of turning, for the nonce.

See him no other than as he is!

Give both the infinitudes their due—

Infinite mercy, but, I wis,
As infinite a justice too.

[Organ: plagal-cadence.

As infinite a justice too.

II.

ONE SINGETH.

John, Master of the Temple of God,
Falling to sin the Unknown Sin,
What he bought of Emperor Aldabrod,
He sold it to Sultan Saladin:
Till, caught by Pope Clement, a-buzzing there,
Hornet-prince of the mad wasps' hive,
And clipt of his wings in Paris square,
They bring him now to be burned alive.

[And wanteth there grace of lute or clavicithern, ye shall say to confirm him who singeth—

We bring John now to be burned alive.

III.

In the midst is a goodly gallows built;
'Twixt fork and fork, a stake is stuck;
But first they set divers tumbrels a-tilt,
Make a trench all round with the city muck;
Inside they pile log upon log, good store;
Faggots no few, blocks great and small,
Reach a man's mid-thigh, no less, no more,—
For they mean he should roast in the sight
of all.

CHORUS.

We mean he should roast in the sight of all.

IV.

Good sappy bavins¹ that kindle forthwith;
Billets that blaze substantial and slow;
Pine-stump split deftly, dry as pith;
Larch-heart that chars to a chalk-white glow:
Then up they hoist me John in a chafe,
Sling him fast like a hog to scorch,
Spit in his face, then leap back safe,
Sing "Laudes" and bid clap-to the torch.

CHORUS.

Laus Deo—who bids clap-to the torch.

V.

John of the Temple, whose fame so bragged,
Is burning alive in Paris square!
How can he curse, if his mouth is gagged?
Or wriggle his neck, with a collar there?

¹ Faggots.

Or heave his chest, which a band goes round ?

Or threat with his fist, since his arms are spliced ?

Or kick with his feet, now his legs are bound ?

—Thinks John, I will call upon Jesus Christ.

[Here one crosseth himself.]

VI.

Jesus Christ—John had bought and sold,

Jesus Christ—John had eaten and drunk ;

To him, the Flesh meant silver and gold.

(Salvd reverentiâ.)

Now it was, "Saviour, bountiful lamb,

"I have roasted thee Turks, though men roast me !

"See thy servant, the plight wherein I am !

"Art thou a saviour? Save thou me !"

CHORUS.

'Tis John the mocker cries, "Save thou me !"

VII.

Who maketh God's menace an idle word ?

—Saith, it no more means what it proclaims,

Than a damsel's threat to her wanton bird ?—

For she too rattles of ugly names.

—Saith, he knoweth but one thing,—what he knows ?

That God is good and the rest is breath ;

Why else is the same styed Sharon's rose ?

Once a rose, ever a rose, he saith.

CHORUS.

O, John shall yet find a rose, he saith !

VIII.

Alack, there be roses and roses, John !

Some, honied of taste like your leman's
tongue :

Some, bitter ; for why ? (roast gaily on !)

Their tree struck root in devil's-dung.

When Paul once reasoned of righteousness

And of temperance and of judgment to come,

Good Felix trembled, he could no less :

John, snickering, crook'd his wicked thumb.

CHORUS.

What cometh to John of the wicked thumb ?

Ha ha, John plucketh now at his rose

To rid himself of a sorrow at heart !

Lo,—petal on petal, fierce rays unclose ;

Anther on anther, sharp spikes outstart ;

And with blood for dew, the bosom boils ;

And a gust of sulphur is all its smell ;

And lo, he is horribly in the toils

Of a coal-black giant flower of hell !

CHORUS.

What maketh heaven, That maketh hell.

X.

So, as John called now, through the fire amain,

On the Name, he had cursed with, all his
life—

To the Person, he bought and sold again—

For the Face, with his daily buffets rife—

Feature by feature It took its place :

And his voice, like a mad dog's choking bark,

At the steady whole of the Judge's face—

Died. Forth John's soul flared into the dark.

SURJOINETH THE ABBOT DEODAET.

God help all poor souls lost in the dark !

HOLY-CROSS DAY.

ON WHICH THE JEWS WERE FORCED TO ATTEND AN ANNUAL CHRISTIAN SER-MON IN ROME.

[“Now was come about Holy-Cross Day, and now must my lord preach his first sermon to the Jews : as it was of old cared for in the merciful bowels of the Church, that, so to speak, a crumb at least from her conspicuous table here in Rome should be, though but once yearly, cast to the famishing dogs, under-trampled and bespitten-upon beneath the feet of the guests. And a moving sight in truth, this, of so many of the besotted blind restif and ready-to-perish Hebrews ! now maternally brought—nay (for He saith, ‘Compel them to come in’) haled, as it were, by the head and hair, and against their obstinate hearts, to partake of the heavenly grace. What awakening, what striving with tears, what working of a yeasty conscience ! Nor was my lord wanting to himself on so apt an occasion ; witness the abundance of conversions which did incessantly reward him : though not to my lord be altogether the glory."—Diary by the Bishop's Secretary, 1600.]

What the Jews really said, on thus being driven to church, was rather to this effect :—

I.

FEE, faw, fum ! bubble and squeak !
Blessedest Thursday's the fat of the week.
Rumble and tumble, sleek and rough,
Stinking and savoury, smug and gruff,
Take the church-road, for the bell's due chime
Gives us the summons—'tis sermon-time !

II.

Boh, here's Barnabas ! Job, that's you ?
Up stumps Solomon—bustling too ?
Shame, man ! greedy beyond your years
To handsel the bishop's shaving-shears ?
Fair play's a jewel ! Leave friends in the lurch ?
Stand on a line ere you start for the church !

III.

Higgledy piggledy, packed we lie,
Rats in a hamper, swine in a sty,
Wasps in a bottle, frogs in a sieve,
Worms in a carcase, fleas in a sleeve.
Hist ! square shoulders, settle your thumbs
And buzz for the bishop—here he comes.

IV.

Bow, wow, wow—a bone for the dog !
I liken his Grace to an acorned hog.
What, a boy at his side, with the bloom of a lass,
To help and handle my lord's hour-glass !
Didst ever behold so lithe a chine ?
His cheek hath laps like a fresh-singed swine.

V.

Aaron's asleep—shove hip to haunch,
Or somebody deal him a dig in the paunch !

Look at the purse with the tassel and knob,
And the gown with the angel and thingumbob !

What's he at, quotha ? reading his text !
Now you've his curtesy—and what comes next ?

VI.

See to our converts—you doomed black dozen—
No stealing away—nor cog nor cozen !
You five, that were thieves, deserve it fairly ;
You seven, that were beggars, will live less sparely ;
You took your turn and dipped in the hat,
Got fortune—and fortune gets you ; mind that !

VII.

Give your first groan—compunction's at work ;
And soft ! from a Jew you mount to a Turk.
Lo, Micah,—the selfsame beard on chin
He was four times already converted in !
Here's a knife, clip quick—it's a sign of grace—
Or he ruins us all with his hanging-face.

VIII.

Whom now is the bishop a-leering at ?
I know a point where his text falls pat.
I'll tell him to-morrow, a word just now
Went to my heart and made me vow
I meddle no more with the worst of trades—
Let somebody else pay his serenades.

IX.

Groan all together now, whee—hee—hee !
It's a-work, it's a-work, ah, woe is me !
It began, when a herd of us, picked and placed,
Were spurred through the Corso, stripped to the waist ;
Jew brutes, with sweat and blood well spent
To usher in worthy Christian Lent.

X.

It grew, when the hangman entered our bounds,
Yelled, pricked us out to his church like hounds :

It got to a pitch, when the hand indeed
Which gutted my purse would throttle my creed :

And it overflows when, to even the odd,
Men I helped to their sins help me to their God.

XI.

But now, while the scapegoats leave our
flock,

And the rest sit silent and count the clock,
Since forced to muse the appointed time
(On these precious facts and truths sublime,
Let us fitly employ it, under our breath,
In saying Ben Ezra's Song of Death.

XII.

For Rabbi Ben Ezra, the night he died,
Called sons and sons' sons to his side,
And spoke, "This world has been harsh and
strange ;
"Something is wrong : there needeth a
change.

"But what, or where? at the last or first?

"In one point only we sinned, at worst.

XIII.

"The Lord will have mercy on Jacob yet,
"And again in his border see Israel set.
"When Judah beholds Jerusalem,
"The stranger-seed shall be joined to them :
"To Jacob's House shall the Gentiles cleave.
"So the Prophet saith and his sons believe.

XIV.

"Ay, the children of the chosen race
"Shall carry and bring them to their place :
"In the land of the Lord shall lead the same,
"Bondsmen and handmaids. Who shall
blame,
"When the slaves enslave, the oppressed ones o'er
"The oppressor triumph for evermore?

XV.

"God spoke, and gave us the word to keep,
"Bade never fold the hands nor sleep
"Mid a faithless world,—at watch and ward,
"Till Christ at the end relieve our guard.

"By His servant Moses the watch was set :
"Though near upon cock-crow, we keep it
yet.

XVI.

"Thou ! if thou wast He, who at mid-watch
came,

"By the starlight, naming a dubious name !

"And if, too heavy with sleep—too rash

"With fear—O Thou, if that martyr-gash

"Fell on Thee coming to take thine own,

"And we gave the Cross, when we owed the Throne—

XVII.

"Thou art the Judge. We are bruised thus.

"But, the Judgment over, join sides with us !

"Thine too is the cause ! and not more thine

"Than ours, is the work of these dogs and swine,

"Whose life laughs through and spits at their creed !

"Who maintain Thee in word, and defy Thee in deed !

XVIII.

"We withstood Christ then? Be mindful
how

"At least we withstand Barabbas now !

"Was our outrage sore? But the worst we spared,

"To have called these—Christians, had we dared !

"Let defiance to them pay mistrust of Thee,

"And Rome make amends for Calvary !

XIX.

"By the torture, prolonged from age to age,

"By the infamy, Israel's heritage,

"By the Ghetto's plague, by the garb's dis-
grace,

"By the badge of shame, by the felon's
place,

"By the branding-tool, the bloody whip,

"And the summons to Christian fellowship,—

XX.

"We boast our proof that at least the Jew
"Would wrest Christ's name from the Devil's crew.

"Thy face took never so deep a shade
 "But we fought them in it, God our aid!
 "A trophy to bear, as we march, thy band,
 "South, East, and on to the Pleasant Land!"

[Pope Gregory XVI. abolished this bad business of the Sermon.—R. B.]

PROTUS.

[This poem is without warrant of history.]

AMONG these latter busts we count by scores,
 Half-emperors and quarter-emperors,
 Each with his bay-leaf fillet, loose-thonged
 vest,
 Loric and low-browed Gorgon on the breast,—
 One loves a baby face, with violets there,
 Violets instead of laurel in the hair,
 As those were all the little locks could bear.

Now read here. "Protus ends a period

"Of empery beginning with a god;
 "Born in the porphyry chamber at Byzant,
 "Queens by his cradle, proud and ministrant:
 "And if he quickened breath there, 'twould like fire

"Pantingly through the dim vast realm transpire.

"A fame that he was missing spread afar:
 "The world from its four corners, rose in
 war,

"Till he was borne out on a balcony
 "To pacify the world when it should see.

"The captains ranged before him, one, his
 hand

"Made baby points at, gained the chief command.

"And day by day more beautiful he grew

"In shape, all said, in feature and in hue,

"While young Greek sculptors, gazing on the child,

"Became with old Greek sculpture reconciled.

"Already sages laboured to condense

"In easy tomes a life's experience:

"And artists took grave counsel to impart

"In one breath and one hand-sweep, all their art—

"To make his graces prompt as blossoming

"Of plentifully-watered palms in spring:

"Since well beseems it, whoso mounts the
 throne,

"For beauty, knowledge, strength, should stand alone,

"And mortals love the letters of his name."

—Stop! Have you turned two pages? Still
 the same.

New reign, same date. The scribe goes on to say

How that same year, on such a month and
 day,

"John the Pannonian, groundedly believed

"A blacksmith's bastard, whose hard hand reprieved

"The Empire from its fate the year before,—

"Came, had a mind to take the crown, and wore

"The same for six years (during which the Huns

"Kept off their fingers from us), till his sons

"Put something in his liquor"—and so forth.

Then a new reign. Stay—"Take at its just worth"

(Subjoins an annotator) "what I give

"As hearsay. Some think, John let Protus
 live

"And slip away. 'Tis said, he reached man's age

"At some blind northern court; made, first a page,

"Then tutor to the children; last, of use

"About the hunting-stables. I deduce

"He wrote the little tract 'On worming dogs,'

"Whereof the name in sundry catalogues

"Is extant yet. A Protus of the race

"Is rumoured to have died a monk in Thrace,—

"And if the same, he reached senility."

Here's John the Smith's rough-hammered head. Great eye,

Gross jaw and gripped lips do what granite can
 To give you the crown-grasper. What a man!

THE STATUE AND THE BUST.

THERE'S a palace in Florence, the world knows well,
And a statue watches it from the square,
And this story of both do our townsmen tell.

Ages ago, a lady there,
At the farthest window facing the East
Asked, "Who rides by with the royal air?"

The bridesmaids' prattle around her ceased ;
She leaned forth, one on either hand ;
They saw how the blush of the bride increased—

They felt by its beats her heart expand—
As one at each ear and both in a breath
Whispered, "The Great-Duke Ferdinand."

That self-same instant, underneath,
The Duke rode past in his idle way,
Emptily and fine like a swordless sheath.

Gay he rode, with a friend as gay,
Till he threw his head back—"Who is she?"
—"A bride the Riccardi brings home to-day."

Hair in heaps lay heavily
Over a pale brow spirit-pure—
Carved like the heart of a coal-black tree,

Crisped like a war-steed's encolure¹—
And vainly sought to dissemble her eyes
Of the blackest black our eyes endure.

And lo, a blade for a knight's emprise
Filled the fine empty sheath of a man,—
The Duke grew straightway brave and wise.

He looked at her, as a lover can ;
She looked at him, as one who awakes :
The past was a sleep, and her life began.

Now, love so ordered for both their sakes,
A feast was held that selfsame night
In the pile which the mighty shadow makes.

(For Via Larga is three-parts light,
But the palace overshadows one,
Because of a crime which may God requite !

To Florence and God the wrong was done,
Through the first republic's murder there
By Cosimo and his cursed son.)

The Duke (with the statue's face in the square)
Turned in the midst of his multitude
At the bright approach of the bridal pair.

Face to face the lovers stood
A single minute and no more,
While the bridegroom bent as a man subdued—

Bowed till his bonnet brushed the floor—
For the Duke on the lady a kiss conferred,
As the courtly custom was of yore.

In a minute can lovers exchange a word?
If a word did pass, which I do not think,
Only one out of the thousand heard.

That was the bridegroom. At day's brink
He and his bride were alone at last
In a bedchamber by a taper's blink.

Calmly he said that her lot was cast,
That the door she had passed was shut on
her
Till the final catafalk² repassed.

The world meanwhile, its noise and stir,
Through a certain window facing the East,
She could watch like a convent's chronicler.

Since passing the door might lead to a feast,
And a feast might lead to so much beside,
He, of many evils, chose the least.

"Freely I choose too," said the bride—
"Your window and its world suffice,"
Replied the tongue, while the heart replied—

² The stage or scaffolding for a coffin whilst in the church.

"If I spend the night with that devil twice,
 "May his window serve as my loop of hell
 "Whence a damned soul looks on paradise !

"I fly to the Duke who loves me well,
 "Sit by his side and laugh at sorrow
 "Ere I count another ave-bell,

"'Tis only the coat of a page to borrow,
 "And tie my hair in a horse-boy's trim,
 "And I save my soul—but not to-morrow"—

(She checked herself and her eye grew dim)
 "My father tarries to bless my state :
 "I must keep it one day more for him.

"Is one day more so long to wait ?
 "Moreover the Duke rides past, I know ;
 "We shall see each other, sure as fate."

She turned on her side and slept. Just so !
 So we resolve on a thing and sleep :
 So did the lady, ages ago.

That night the Duke said, "Dear or cheap
 "As the cost of this cup of bliss may prove
 "To body or soul, I will drain it deep."

And on the morrow, bold with love,
 He beckoned the bridegroom (close on call,
 As his duty bade, by the Duke's alcove)

And smiled "'Twas a very funeral,
 "Your lady will think, this feast of ours,—
 "A shame to efface, whate'er befall !

"What if we break from the Arno bowers,
 "And try if Petraja, cool and green,
 "Cure last night's fault with this morning's flowers?"

The bridegroom, not a thought to be seen
 On his steady brow and quiet mouth,
 Said, "Too much favour for me so mean !

"But, alas ! my lady leaves the South ;
 "Each wind that comes from the Apennine
 "Is a menace to her tender youth :

"Nor a way exists, the wise opine,
 "If she quits her palace twice this year,
 "To avert the flower of life's decline."

Quoth the Duke, "A sage and a kindly
 fear.

"Moreover Petraja is cold this spring :
 "Be our feast to-night as usual here !"

And then to himself—"Which night shall bring

"Thy bride to her lover's embraces, fool—
 "Or I am the fool, and thou art the king !

"Yet my passion must wait a night, nor cool—

"For to-night the Envoy arrives from France
 "Whose heart I unlock with thyself, my tool.

"I need thee still and might miss perchance.
 "To-day is not wholly lost, beside,
 "With its hope of my lady's countenance :

"For I ride—what should I do but ride ?
 "And passing her palace, if I list,
 "May glance at its window—well betide !"

So said, so done : nor the lady missed
 One ray that broke from the ardent brow,
 Nor a curl of the lips where the spirit kissed.

Be sure that each renewed the vow,
 No morrow's sun should arise and set
 And leave them then as it left them now.

But next day passed, and next day yet,
 With still fresh cause to wait one day more
 Ere each leaped over the parapet.

And still, as love's brief morning wore,
 With a gentle start, half smile, half sigh,
 They found love not as it seemed before.

They thought it would work infallibly,
 But not in despite of heaven and earth :
 The rose would blow when the storm passed by.

Meantime they could profit in winter's dearth "Let Robbia's craft so apt and strange
By store of fruits that supplant the rose : "Arrest the remains of young and fair,
The world and its ways have a certain worth: "And rivet them while the seasons range.

And to press a point while these oppose "Make me a face on the window there,
Were simple policy ; better wait : "Waiting as ever, mute the while,
We lose no friends and we gain no foes. "My love to pass below in the square !

Meantime, worse fates than a lover's fate, "And let me think that it may beguile
Who daily may ride and pass and look "Dreary days which the dead must spend Where his lady watches behind the grate ! "Down in their darkness under the aisle,

And she—she watched the square like a book "To say, 'What matters it at the end ?
Holding one picture and only one, "I did no more while my heart was warm
Which daily to find she undertook : "'Than does that image, my pale-faced
friend.'

When the picture was reached the book was "Where is the use of the lip's red charm, done, "The heaven of hair, the pride of the brow,
And she turned from the picture at night to "And the blood that blues the inside arm—
scheme
Of tearing it out for herself next sun.

So weeks grew months, years ; gleam by gleam "Unless we turn, as the soul knows how,
The glory dropped from their youth and love, "The earthly gift to an end divine ?
And both perceived they had dreamed a "A lady of clay is as good, I trow."

dream ;
Which hovered as dreams do, still above :
But who can take a dream for a truth ?
Oh, hide our eyes from the next remove !

One day as the lady saw her youth
Depart, and the silver thread that streaked
Her hair, and, worn by the serpent's tooth, (And, leaning out of a bright blue space,
As a ghost might lean from a chink of sky,
The passionate pale lady's face—

Eyeing ever, with earnest eye
And quick-turned neck at its breathless stretch,
Some one who ever is passing by—)

The brow so puckered, the chin so peaked,—
And wondered who the woman was,
Hollow-eyed and haggard-checked,

The Duke had sighed like the simplest wretch
In Florence, "Youth—my dream escapes !
"Will its record stay ?" And he bade them fetch

"Him, the Carver, a hand to aid,
"Who fashions the clay no love will change,
"And fixes a beauty never to fade.
Some subtle moulder of brazen shapes—
Can the soul, the will, die out of a man
"Ere his body find the grave that gapes ?

"John of Douay¹ shall effect my plan,
 "Set me on horseback here aloft,
 "Alive, as the crafty sculptor can,

"In the very square I have crossed so oft :
 "That men may admire, when future suns
 "Shall touch the eyes to a purpose soft,

"While the mouth and the brow stay brave in bronze—

"Admire and say, 'When he was alive
 "'How he would take his pleasure once !'

"And it shall go hard but I contrive
 "To listen the while, and laugh in my tomb
 "At idleness which aspires to strive."

So ! While these wait the trump of doom,
 How do their spirits pass, I wonder,
 Nights and days in the narrow room ?

Still, I suppose, they sit and ponder
 What a gift life was, ages ago,
 Six steps out of the chapel yonder.

Only they see not God, I know,
 Nor all that chivalry of his,
 The soldier-saints who, row on row,

Burn upward each to his point of bliss—
 Since, the end of life being manifest,
 He had burned his way thro' the world to this.

I hear you reproach, "But delay was best,
 "For their end was a crime."—Oh, a crime will do

As well, I reply, to serve for a test,

As a virtue golden through and through,
 Sufficient to vindicate itself
 And prove its worth at a moment's view !

Must a game be played for the sake of pelf ?
 Where a button goes, 'twere an epigram
 To offer the stamp of the very Guelph.

The true has no value beyond the sham :
 As well the counter as coin, I submit,
 When your table's a hat, and your prize a dram

Stake your counter as boldly every whit,
 Venture as warily, use the same skill,
 Do your best, whether winning or losing it,

If you choose to play !—is my principle.
 Let a man contend to the uttermost
 For his life's set prize, be it what it will !

The counter our lovers staked was lost
 As surely as if it were lawful coin :
 And the sin I impute to each frustrate ghost

Is—the unlit lamp and the ungirt loin,
 Though the end in sight was a vice, I say
 You of the virtue (we issue join)
 How strive you ? De te, fabula !

PORPHYRIA'S LOVER.

THE rain set early in to-night,
 The sullen wind was soon awake,
 It tore the elm-tops down for spite,
 And did its worst to vex the lake :
 I listened with heart fit to break.
 When glided in Porphyria ; straight
 She shut the cold out and the storm,
 And kneeled and made the cheerless grate
 Blaze up, and all the cottage warm ;
 Which done, she rose, and from her form
 Withdrew the dripping cloak and shawl,
 And laid her soiled gloves by, untied
 Her hat and let the damp hair fall,
 And, last, she sat down by my side
 And called me. When no voice replied,
 She put my arm about her waist,
 And made her smooth white shoulder bare,
 And all her yellow hair displaced,
 And, stooping, made my cheek lie there,
 And spread, o'er all, her yellow hair,
 Murmuring how she loved me—she
 Too weak, for all her heart's endeavour,
 To set its struggling passion free
 From pride, and vainer ties dissever,
 And give herself to me for ever.

But passion sometimes would prevail,
 Nor could to-night's gay feast restrain
 A sudden thought of one so pale
 For love of her, and all in vain :
 So, she was come through wind and rain.
 Be sure I looked up at her eyes
 Happy and proud ; at last I knew
 Porphyria worshipped me ; surprise
 Made my heart swell, and still it grew
 While I debated what to do.
 That moment she was mine, mine, fair,
 Perfectly pure and good : I found
 A thing to do, and all her hair
 In one long yellow string I wound
 Three times her little throat around,
 And strangled her. No pain felt she ;
 I am quite sure she felt no pain.
 As a shut bud that holds a bee,
 I warily oped her lids : again
 Laughed the blue eyes without a stain.
 And I untightened next the tress
 About her neck ; her cheek once more
 Blushed bright beneath my burning kiss :
 I propped her head up as before,
 Only, this time my shoulder bore
 Her head, which droops upon it still :
 The smiling rosy little head,
 So glad it has its utmost will,
 That all it scorned at once is fled,
 And I, its love, am gained instead !
 Porphyria's love : she guessed not how
 Her darling one wish would be heard.
 And thus we sit together now,
 And all night long we have not stirred,
 And yet God has not said a word !

"CHILDE ROLAND TO THE DARK TOWER CAME."

(See Edgar's song in "LEAR.")

I.

My first thought was, he lied in every
 word,
 That hoary cripple, with malicious eye
 Askance to watch the working of his lie

On mine, and mouth scarce able to afford
 Suppression of the glee, that pursed and scored
 Its edge, at one more victim gained thereby.

II.

What else should he be set for, with his staff?
 What, save to waylay with his lies, ensnare
 All travellers who might find him posted
 there,
 And ask the road? I guessed what skull-like laugh
 Would break, what crutch 'gin write my epitaph
 For pastime in the dusty thoroughfare,

III.

If at his counsel I should turn aside
 Into that ominous tract which, all agree,
 Hides the Dark Tower. Yet acquiescingly
 I did turn as he pointed : neither pride
 Nor hope rekindling at the end descried,
 So much as gladness that some end might be.

IV.

For, what with my whole world-wide wandering,
 What with my search drawn out thro'
 years, my hope
 Dwindled into a ghost not fit to cope
 With that obstreperous joy success would bring,
 I hardly tried now to rebuke the spring
 My heart made, finding failure in its scope.

V.

As when a sick man very near to death
 Seems dead indeed, and feels begin and end
 The tears and takes the farewell of each
 friend,
 And hears one bid the other go, draw breath Freelier outside, ("since all is o'er," he saith,
 "And the blow fallen no grieving can amend ;")

VI.

While some discuss if near the other graves
 Be room enough for this, and when a day
 Suits best for carrying the corpse away,

With care about the banners, scarves and staves :

And still the man hears all, and only craves
He may not shame such tender love and stay.

VII.

Thus, I had so long suffered in this quest,
Heard failure prophesied so oft, been writ
So many times among "The Band"—to wit,
The knights who to the Dark Tower's search addressed
Their steps—that just to fail as they, seemed best,
And all the doubt was now—should I be fit?

VIII.

Só, quiet as despair, I turned from him,
That hateful cripple, out of his highway
Into the path he pointed. All the day
Had been a dreary one at best, and dim
Was settling to its close, yet shot one grim
Red leer to see the plain catch its estray.

IX.

For mark ! no sooner was I fairly found
Pledged to the plain, after a pace or two,
Than, pausing to throw backward a last view
O'er the safe road, 'twas gone ; grey plain all round :
Nothing but plain to the horizon's bound.
I might go on ; nought else remained to do.

X.

So, on I went. I think I never saw
Such starved ignoble nature ; nothing thrive :
For flowers—as well expect a cedar grove !
But cackle, spurge, according to their law
Might propagate their kind, with none to awe,
You'd think ; a burr had been a treasure-trove.

XI.

No ! penury, inertness and grimace,
In some strange sort, were the land's portion. " See
"Or shut your eyes," said Nature peevishly,

"It nothing skills : I cannot help my case :
"'Tis the Last Judgment's fire must cure
this place,
"Calcine its clods and set my prisoners free."

XII.

If there pushed any ragged thistle-stalk
Above its mates, the head was chopped ;
the bents
Were jealous else. What made those holes and rents
In the dock's harsh swarth leaves, bruised as to baulk
All hope of greenness ? 'tis a brute must walk
Pashing their life out, with a brute's intents.

XIII.

As for the grass, it grew as scant as hair
In leprosy ; thin dry blades pricked the mud
Which underneath looked kneaded up with blood.
One stiff blind horse, his every bone a-stare,
Stood stupefied, however he came there :
Thrust out past service from the devil's stud !

XIV.

Alive ? he might be dead for aught I know,
With that red gaunt and colloped neck
a-strain,
And shut eyes underneath the rusty mane :
Seldom went such grotesqueness with such
woe ;
I never saw a brute I hated so ;
He must be wicked to deserve such pain.

XV.

I shut my eyes and turned them on my heart.
As a man calls for wine before he fights,
I asked one draught of earlier, happier
sights,
Ere fitly I could hope to play my part.
Think first, fight afterwards—the soldier's art :
One taste of the old time sets all to rights

XVI.

Not it ! I fancied Cuthbert's reddening face
Beneath its garniture of curly gold,
Dear fellow, till I almost felt him fold

An arm in mine to fix me to the place,
That way he used. Alas, one night's disgrace!
Out went my heart's new fire and left it cold.

XVII.

Giles then, the soul of honour—there he stands
Frank as ten years ago when knighted first.
What honest man should dare (he said) he durst.

Good—but the scene shifts—faugh! what hangman hands
Pin to his breast a parchment? His own bands
Read it. Poor traitor, spit upon and curst!

XVIII.

Better this present than a past like that;
Back therefore to my darkening path again!
No sound, no sight as far as eye could strain.
Will the night send a howlet or a bat?
I asked: when something on the dismal flat
Came to arrest my thoughts and change their train.

XIX.

A sudden little river crossed my path
As unexpected as a serpent comes.
No sluggish tide congenial to the glooms;
This, as it frothed by, might have been a bath
For the fiend's glowing hoof—to see the wrath
Of its black eddy bespate with flakes and spumes.

XX.

So petty yet so spiteful! All along,
Low scrubby alders kneeled down over it;
Drenched willows flung them headlong in a fit
Of mute despair, a suicidal throng:
The river which had done them all the wrong,
Whate'er that was, rolled by, deterred no whit.

XXI.

Which, while I forded,—good saints, how I feared
To set my foot upon a dead man's cheek,
Each step, or feel the spear I thrust to seek
For hollows, tangled in his hair or beard!
—It may have been a water-rat I speared,
But, ugh! it sounded like a baby's shriek.

XXII.

Glad was I when I reached the other bank.
Now for a better country. Vain presage!
Who were the strugglers, what war did they wage,
Whose savage trample thus could pad the dank
Soil to a plash? Toads in a poisoned tank,
Or wild cats in a red-hot iron cage—

XXIII.

The fight must so have seemed in that fell cirque.
What penned them there, with all the plain to choose?
No foot-print leading to that horrid mews,
None out of it. Mad brewage set to work
Their brains, no doubt, like galley-slaves the Turk
Pits for his pastime, Christians against Jews.

XXIV.

And more than that—a furlong on—why,
there!
What bad use was that engine for, that wheel,
Or brake, not wheel—that harrow fit to reel
Men's bodies out like silk? with all the air
Of Tophet's tool, on earth left unaware,
Or brought to sharpen its rusty teeth of steel.

XXV.

Then came a bit of stubbed ground, once a wood,
Next a marsh, it would seem, and now mere
earth
Desperate and done with; (so a fool finds mirth,
Makes a thing and then mars it, till his mood
Changes and off he goes!) within a rood—
Bog, clay and rubble, sand and stark black dearth.

XXVI.

Now blotches rankling, coloured gay and grim,
Now patches where some leanness of the soil's
Broke into moss or substances like boils;
Then came some palsied oak, a cleft in him
Like a distorted mouth that splits its rim
Gaping at death, and dies while it recoils.

XXVII.

And just as far as ever from the end !
 Nought in the distance but the evening,
 nought
 To point my footstep further ! At the thought,
 A great black bird, Apollyon's bosom-friend,
 Sailed past, nor beat his wide wing dragon-penned
 That brushed my cap—perchance the guide
 I sought.

XXVIII.

For, looking up, aware I somehow grew,
 'Spite of the dusk, the plain had given place
 All round to mountains—with such name to grace
 Mere ugly heights and heaps now stolen in view.
 How thus they had surprised me,—solve it,
 you !
 How to get from them was no clearer case.

XXIX.

Yet half I seemed to recognize some trick
 Of mischief happened to me, God knows
 when—
 In a bad dream perhaps. Here ended, then,
 Progress this way. When, in the very nick
 Of giving up, one time more, came a click
 As when a trap shuts—you're inside the den !

XXX.

Burningly it came on me all at once,
 This was the place ! those two hills on the
 right,
 Crouched like two bulls locked horn in horn in fight ;
 While to the left, a tall scalped mountain . . .
 Dunce,
 Dotted, a-doing at the very nonce,
 After a life spent training for the sight !

XXXI.

What in the midst lay but the Tower itself ?
 The round squat turret, blind as the fool's
 heart,
 Built of brown stone, without a counterpart
 In the whole world. The tempest's mocking elf
 Points to the shipman thus the unseen shelf
 He strikes on, only when the timbers start.

XXXII.

Not see ? because of night perhaps ?—why,
 day
 Came back again for that ! before it left,
 The dying sunset kindled through a cleft :
 The hills, like giants at a hunting, lay,
 Chin upon hand, to see the game at bay,—
 "Now stab and end the creature—to the heft !"

XXXIII.

Not hear ? when noise was everywhere ! it tolled
 Increasing like a bell. Names in my ears
 Of all the lost adventurers my peers,—
 How such a one was strong, and such was bold,
 And such was fortunate, yet each of old Lost, lost ! one moment knelled the woe of years.

XXXIV.

There they stood, ranged along the hill-sides,
 met
 To view the last of me, a living frame
 For one more picture ! in a sheet of flame
 I saw them and I knew them all. And yet
 Dauntless the slug-horn to my lips I set,
 And blew. "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower came."

LURIA;

A TRAGEDY.

1846.

I DEDICATE THIS LAST ATTEMPT FOR THE PRESENT AT DRAMATIC POETRY TO A GREAT DRAMATIC POET;

"WISHING WHAT I WRITE MAY BE READ BY HIS LIGHT:"

IF A PHRASE ORIGINALLY ADDRESSED,

BY NOT THE LEAST WORTHY OF HIS CONTEMPORARIES,

TO SHAKESPEARE,

MAY BE APPLIED HERE, BY ONE WHOSE SOLE PRIVILEGE IS IN A GRATEFUL ADMIRATION,

TO WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR

LONDON: 1846.

LURIA.

PERSONS.

LURIA, a Moor, Commander of the Florentine Forces.

HUSAIN, a Moor, his friend.

PUCCIO, the old Florentine Commander, now LURIA's chief officer.

BRACCIO, Commissary of the Republic of Florence.

JACOPO (LAPO), his secretary.

TIBURZIO, Commander of the Pisans.

DOMIZIA, a noble Florentine lady.

SCENE.—LURIA'S Camp between Florence and Pisa.

TIME, 14—.

ACT I.

MORNING.

BRACCIO, as dictating to his Secretary;
PUCCIO standing by.

Braccio [to PUCCIO]. Then, you join battle in an hour?

Puccio.

Luria, the captain.

Braccio [to the Secretary]. "In an hour, the battle."

[To PUCCIO.] Sir, let your eye run o'er this loose digest,

And see if very much of your report
Have slipped away through my civilian phrase.
Does this instruct the Signory aright
How army stands with army?

Puccio [taking the paper]. All seems here:
—That Luria, seizing with our city's force
The several points of vantage, hill and
plain,

Shuts Pisa safe from help on every side,
And, baffling the Lucchese arrived too late,
Must, in the battle he delivers now,
Beat her best troops and first of chiefs.

Braccio. So sure?

Tiburzio's a consummate captain too!

Puccio. Luria holds Pisa's fortune in his
hand.

Braccio [to the Secretary]. "The Signory hold Pisa in their hand."

Your own proved soldiership's our warrant,
sir:

So, while my secretary ends his task,

Not I; Have out two horsemen, by the open roads,
To post with it to Florence!

Puccio [returning the paper]. All seems here ;

Unless . . . Ser Braccio, 'tis my last report !
 Since Pisa's outbreak, and my overthrow,
 And Luria's hastening at the city's call
 To save her, as he only could, no doubt ;
 Till now that she is saved or sure to be,—
 Whatever you tell Florence, I tell you :
 Each day's note you, her Commissary, make
 Of Luria's movements, I myself supply.
 No youngster am I longer, to my cost ;
 Therefore while Florence gloried in her choice
 And vaunted Luria, whom but Luria, still,
 As if zeal, courage, prudence, conduct, faith,
 Had never met in any man before,
 I saw no pressing need to swell the cry.
 But now, this last report and I have done :
 So, ere to-night comes with its roar of praise,
 'Twere not amiss if some one old i' the trade Subscribed with, " True, for once rash counsel's best.

" This Moor of the bad faith and doubtful race,
 " This boy to whose untried sagacity,
 " Raw valour, Florence trusts without reserve
 " The charge to save her,—justifies her choice ;
 " In no point has this stranger failed his friends.
 " Now praise ! " I say this, and it is not here.

Braccio [to the Secretary]. Write, " Puccio, superseded in the charge,

" By Luria, bears full witness to his worth,
 " And no reward our Signory can give
 " Their champion but he'll back it cheerfully."
 Aught more? Five minutes hence, both messengers ! [PUCCIO goes.]

Braccio [after a pause, and while he slowly tears the paper into shreds]. I think . . .
 (pray God, I hold in fit contempt

This warfare's noble art and ordering,
 And,—once the brace of prizes fairly matched,
 Polcaxe with polcaxe, knife with knife as
 good,—

Spit properly at what men term their skill !—)
 Yet here I think our fighter has the odds.
 With Pisa's strength diminished thus and thus,
 Such points of vantage in our hands and such,
 Lucca still off the stage, too,—all's assured :
 Luria must win this battle. Write the Court,
 That Luria's trial end and sentence pass !

Secretary. Patron,—

Braccio. Ay, Lapo?

Secretary. If you trip, I fall ;
 'Tis in self-interest I speak—

Braccio. Nay, nay,
 You overshoot the mark, my Lapo ! Nay !
 When did I say pure love's impossible ?
 I make you daily write those red cheeks thin,
 Load your young brow with what concerns
 it least,

And, when we visit Florence, let you pace
 The Piazza by my side as if we talked,
 Where all your old acquaintances may see :
 You'd die for me, I should not be surprised.
 Now then !

Secretary. Sir, look about and love yourself !
 Step after step, the Signory and you
 Tread gay till this tremendous point's to pass ;
 Which pass not, pass not, ere you ask your-
 self,—

Bears the brain steadily such draughts of fire,
 Or too delicious may not prove the pride
 Of this long secret trial you dared plan,
 Dare execute, you solitary here,
 With the grey-headed toothless fools at home,
 Who think themselves your lords, such slaves are they ?

If they pronounce this sentence as you bid,
 Declare the treason, claim its penalty,—
 And sudden out of all the blaze of life,
 On the best minute of his brightest day,
 From that adoring army at his back,
 Thro' Florence' joyous crowds before his face,
 Into the dark you beckon Luria . . .

Braccio. Then—

Why, Lapo, when the fighting-people vaunt,
 We of the other craft and mystery,
 May we not smile demure, the danger past ?

Secretary. Sir, no, no, no,—the danger, and your spirit

At watch and ward? Where's danger on your part,
 With that thin flitting instantaneous steel
 'Gainst the blind bull-front of a brute-for-
 world?

If Luria, that's to perish sure as fate,
 Should have been really guiltless after all ?

Braccio. Ah, you have thought that ?

Secretary. Here I sit, your scribe,
And in and out goes Luria, days and nights;
This Puccio comes; the Moor his other friend,
Husain; they talk—that's all feigned easily;
He speaks (I would not listen if I could),
Reads, orders, counsels:—but he rests sometimes,—

I see him stand and eat, sleep stretched an hour
On the lynx-skins yonder; hold his bared black arms

Into the sun from the tent-opening; laugh
When his horse drops the forage from his teeth
And neighs to hear him hum his Moorish songs.
That man believes in Florence, as the saint Tied to the wheel believes in God.

Braccio. How strange!
You too have thought that!

Secretary. Do but you think too,
And all is saved! I only have to write,
“The man seemed false awhile, proves true
at last,

“Bury it”—so I write the Signory—
“Bury this trial in your breast for ever,
“Blot it from things or done or dreamed about!
“So Luria shall receive his meed to-day
“With no suspicion what reverse was near,—
“As if no meteoric finger hushed
“The doom-word just on the destroyer's lip, “Motioned him off, and let life's sun fall
straight.”

Braccio [looks to the wall of the tent]. Did he draw that?

Secretary. With charcoal, when the watch
Made the report at midnight; Lady Domizia Spoke of the unfinished Duomo, you remember;
That is his fancy how a Moorish front Might join to, and complete, the body,—a sketch,—

And again where the cloak hangs, yonder in the shadow.

Braccio. He loves that woman.

Secretary. She is sent the spy
Of Florence,—spies on you as you on him:
Florence, if only for Domizia's sake,
Is surely safe. What shall I write?

Braccio. I see—
A Moorish front, nor of such ill design!

Lapo, there's one thing plain and positive;
Man seeks his own good at the whole world's cost.

What? If to lead our troops, stand forth our chiefs,

And hold our fate, and see us at their beck,
Yet render up the charge when peace return,
I have ever proved too much for Florentines,
Even for the best and bravest of ourselves—
If in the struggle when the soldier's sword
Should sink its point before the statish pen,
And the calm head replace the violent hand,
Virtue on virtue still have fallen away
Before ambition with unvarying fate,
Till Florence' self at last in bitterness

Be forced to own such falls the natural end,
And, sparing further to expose her sons
To a vain strife and profitless disgrace,
Declare, “The foreigner, one not my child, “Shall henceforth lead my troops, reach height by height

“The glory, then descend into the shame;
“So shall rebellion be less guilt in him,
“And punishment the easier task for me:”
—If on the best of us such brand she set,
Can I suppose an utter alien here,
This Luria, our inevitable foe,
Confessed a mercenary and a Moor,
Born free from many ties that bind the rest
Of common faith in Heaven or hope on earth,
No past with us, no future,—such a spirit Shall hold the path from which our staunchest
broke,

Stand firm where every famed precursor fell?
My Lapo, I will frankly say, these proofs
So duly noted of the man's intent,
Are for the doting fools at home, not me.
The charges here, they may be true or false:
—What is set down? Errors and oversights,
A dallying interchange of courtesies
With Pisa's General,—all that, hour by hour,
Puccio's pale discontent has furnished us,
Of petulant speeches, inconsiderate acts,
Now overhazard, overcaution now;
Even that he loves this lady who believes
She outwits Florence, and whom Florence posted

By my procurement here, to spy on me,

Lest I one minute lose her from my sight—
She who remembering her whole House's
fall,

That nest of traitors strangled in the birth,
Now labours to make Luria (poor device
As plain) the instrument of her revenge —That she is ever at his ear to prompt
Inordinate conceptions of his worth,
Exorbitant belief in worth's reward,
And after, when sure disappointment follows,
Proportionable rage at such a wrong—
Why, all these reasons, while I urge them
most,
Weigh with me less than least—as nothing weigh.

Upon that broad man's-heart of his, I go :
On what I know must be, yet, while I live,
Shall never be, because I live and know.
Brute-force shall not rule Florence ! Intellect
May rule her, bad or good as chance supplies :
But intellect it shall be, pure if bad,
And intellect's tradition so kept up.
Till the good come—'twas intellect that ruled,
Not brute-force bringing from the battle-field
The attributes of wisdom, foresight's graces
We lent it there to lure its grossness on ;
All which it took for earnest and kept safe
To show against us in our market-place,
Just as the plumes and tags and swordsman'sgear

(Fetched from the camp where, at their foolish best,

When all was done they frightened nobody)
Perk in our faces in the street, forsooth,
With our own warrant and allowance. No !
The whole procedure's overcharged,—its end
In too strict keeping with the bad first step.
To conquer Pisa was sheer inspiration ?
Well then, to perish for a single fault,
Let that be simple justice ! There, my Lapo !

A Moorish front ill suits our Duomo's body :
Blot it out—and bid Luria's sentence come !

[LURIA, who, with DOMIZIA, has entered unobserved at the close of the last phrase, now advances.

Luria. And Luria, Luria, what of Luria
now ?

Braccio. Ah, you so close, sir ? Lady Domizia too ?

I said it needs must be a busy moment
For one like you : that you were now 't the thick
Of your duties, doubtless, while we idlers sat . . .

Luria. No—in that paper,—it was in that paper

What you were saying !

Braccio. Oh—my day's despatch !

I censure you to Florence : will you see ?

Luria. See your despatch, your last, for the first time ?

Well, if I should, now ? For in truth,
Domizia,

He would be forced to set about another,
In his sly cool way, the true Florentine,
To mention that important circumstance.
So, while he wrote I should gain time, such
time !

Do not send this !

Braccio. And wherefore ?

Luria. These Lucchese

Are not arrived—they never will arrive !
And I must fight to-day, arrived or not,
And I shall beat Tiburzio, that is sure :
And then will be arriving his Lucchese,
But slowly, oh so slowly, just in time
To look upon my battle from the hills,
Like a late moon, of use to nobody !
And I must break my battle up, send forth,
Surround on this side, hold in check on that.
Then comes to-morrow, we negotiate,
You make me send for fresh instructions home,
—Incompleteness, incompleteness !

Braccio. Ah, we scribes !

Why, I had registered that very point,
The non-appearance of our foes' ally,
As a most happy fortune ; both at once
Were formidable : singly faced, each falls.

Luria. So, no great battle for my Florentines !

No crowning deed, decisive and complete,
For all of them, the simple as the wise,
Old, young, alike, that do not understand
Our wearisome pedantic art of war,
By which we prove retreat may be success,

Delay—best speed,—half loss, at times,—
whole gain :

They want results : as if it were their fault !
And you, with warmest wish to be my friend,
Will not be able now to simply say “Your servant has performed his task—
enough !

“You ordered, he has executed : good !
“Now walk the streets in holiday attire, “Congratulate your friends, till noon strikes
fierce,

“Then form bright groups beneath the Duomo’s shade !”

No, you will have to argue and explain,
Persuade them, all is not so ill in the end,
Tease, tire them out ! Arrive, arrive,
Lucchese !

Domizia. Well, you will triumph for the past enough,
Whatever be the present chance ; no service
Falls to the ground with Florence : she awaits
Her saviour, will receive him fittingly.

Luria. Ah Braccio, you know Florence !
Will she, think you,
Receive one . . . what means “fittingly
receive” ?

—Receive compatriots, doubtless—I am none :
And yet Domizia promises so much !

Braccio. Kind women still give men a woman’s prize.
I know not o’er which gate most boughs will
arch,

Nor if the Square will wave red flags or blue.
I should have judged, the fullest of rewards
Our state gave Luria, when she made him
chief

Of her whole force, in her best captain’s place.
Luria. That, my reward ? Florence on my account

Relieved Ser Puccio?—mark you, my reward !
And Puccio’s having all the fight’s true joy—
Goes here and there, gets close, may fight,
himself,

While I must order, stand aloof, o’ersee.
That was my calling, there was my true place !
I should have felt, in some one over me,
Florence impersonate, my visible head,
As I am over Puccio,—taking life

Directly from her eye ! They give me you :
But do you cross me, set me half to work ?
I enjoy nothing—though I will, for once !
Decide, shall we join battle ? may I wait ?

Braccio. Let us compound the matter ;
wait till noon :

Then, no arrival,—
Luria. Ah, noon comes too fast !

I wonder, do you guess why I delay
Involuntarily the final blow
As long as possible ? Peace follows it !
Florence at peace, and the calm studious heads
Come out again, the penetrating eyes ;
As if a spell broke, all’s resumed, each art
You boast, more vivid that it slept awhile.
’Gainst the glad heaven, o’er the white palace-front

The interrupted scaffold climbs anew ;
The walls are peopled by the painter’s brush ;
The statue to its niche ascends to dwell.
The present noise and trouble have retired
And left the eternal past to rule once more ;
You speak its speech and read its records
plain,
Greece lives with you, each Roman breathes
your friend :

But Luria—where will then be Luria’s place ?
Domizia. Highest in honour, for that past’s own sake,

Of which his actions, sealing up the sum
By saving all that went before from wreck,
Will range as part, with which be worshipped
too.

Luria. Then I may walk and watch you in your streets,
Lead the smooth life my rough life helps no
more,

So different, so new, so beautiful—
Nor fear that you will tire to see parade
The club that slew the lion, now that crooks
And shepherd-pipes come into use again ?
For very lone and silent seems my East
In its drear vastness : still it spreads, and still No Braccios, no Domizias anywhere—
Not ever more ! Well, well, to-day is ours !

Domizia [to BRACCIO]. Should he not have been one of us ?

Luria. Oh, no !

Not one of you, and so escape the thrill
Of coming into you, of changing thus,— Feeling a soul grow on me that restricts
The boundless unrest of the savage heart !
The sea heaves up, hangs loaded o'er the land, Breaks there and buries its tumultuous
strength ;

Horror, and silence, and a pause awhile :
Lo, inland glides the gulf-stream, miles away,
In rapture of assent, subdued and still,
'Neath those strange banks, those unimagined
skies.

Well, 'tis not sure the quiet lasts for ever !
Your placid heads still find rough hands new
work ;
Some minute's chance—there comes the need
of mine :

And, all resolved on, I too hear at last.
Oh, you must find some use for me, Ser
Braccio !

You hold my strength ; 'twere best dispose of it :
What you created, see that you find food for—
I shall be dangerous else !

Braccio. How dangerous, sir ?

Luria. There are so many ways, Domizia warns me,

And one with half the power that I possess,
—Grows very formidable. Do you doubt ?
Why, first, who holds the army . . .

Domizia. While we talk,
Morn wears ; we keep you from your proper
place,
The field.

Luria. Nay, to the field I move no more ;
My part is done, and Puccio's may begin :
I cannot trench upon his province longer
With any face.—You think yourselves so safe ?
Why, see—in concert with Tiburzio, now—
One could . . .

Domizia. A trumpet !

Luria. My Lucchese at last !
Arrived, as sure as Florence stands ! Your leave ! [Springs out.]

Domizia. How plainly is true greatness charactered

By such unconscious sport as Luria's here,
Strength sharing least the secret of itself !
Be it with head that schemes or hand that acts,

Such save the world which none but they could save,
Yet think whate'er they did, that world could do.

Braccio. Yes : and how worthy note, that these same great ones

In hand or head, with such unconsciousness
And all its due entailed humility,
Should never shrink, so far as I perceive,
From taking up whatever tool there be
Effects the whole world's safety or mishap,
Into their mild hands as a thing of course !
The statist finds it natural to lead
The mob who might as easily lead him—
The captain marshals troops born skilled in war—

Statist and captain verily believe !
While we poor scribes . . . you catch me thinking now,

That I shall in this very letter write
What none of you are able ! To it, Lapo !

[DOMIZIA goes.]

This last worst all-affected childish fit
Of Luria's, this he-praised unconsciousness,
Convinces me ; the past was no child's play :
It was a man beat Pisa,—not a child.

All's mere dissimulation^u to remove
The fear, he best knows we should entertain.

The utmost danger was at hand. Is't written?
Now make a duplicate, lest this should fail,
And speak your fullest on the other side.

Secretary. I noticed he was busily repairing
My half-effacement of his Duomo sketch,
And, while he spoke of Florence, turned to it,
As the Mage Negro king to Christ the babe.
I judge his childishness the mere relapse
To boyhood of a man who has worked lately,
And presently will work, so, meantime,
plays :

Whence, more than ever I believe in him.

Braccio [after a pause]. The sword ! At best, the soldier, as he says,
In Florence—the black face, the barbarous
name,

For Italy to boast her show of the age,
Her man of men ! To Florence with each letter !

ACT II.

NOON.

Domizia. Well, Florence, shall I reach thee, pierce thy heart Thro' all its safeguards? Hate is said to help—

Quicken the eye, invigorate the arm ;
And this my hate, made up of many hates,
Might stand in scorn of visible instrument,
And will thee dead : yet do I trust it not.
Nor man's devices nor Heaven's memory
Of wickedness forgot on earth so soon,
But thy own nature,—hell and thee I trust,
To keep thee constant in that wickedness,
Where my revenge may meet thee. Turn aside

A single step, for gratitude or shame,—
Grace but this Luria,—this wild mass of rage
I have prepared to launch against thee now,—
With other payment than thy noblest found,—
Give his desert for once its due reward,—
And past thee would my sure destruction roll.
But thou, who mad'st our House thy sacrifice,
It cannot be thou wilt except this Moor
From the accustomed fate of zeal and truth :
Thou wilt deny his looked-for recompense,
And then—I reach thee. Old and trained,
my sire

Could bow down on his quiet broken heart,
Die awe-struck and submissive, when at last
The strange blow came for the expected wreath ;

And Porzio passed in blind bewilderment
To exile, never to return,—they say,
Perplexed in his frank simple honest soul,
As if some natural law had changed,—how
else

Could Florence, on plain fact pronouncing
thus,

Judge Porzio's actions worthy such reward ?
But Berto, with the ever-passionate pulse,
—Oh that long night, its dreadful hour on
hour,

In which no way of getting his fair fame
From their inexplicable charges free,

Was found, save pouring forth the impatient
blood

To show its colour whether false or no !
My brothers never had a friend like me
Close in their need to watch the time, then
speak,

—Burst with a wakening laughter on their
dream,

Cry, " Florence was all falseness, so, false
here ! "

And show them what a simple task remained—

To leave dreams, risc, and punish in God's name

The city wedded to the wickedness.

None stood by them as I by Luria stand.

So, when the stranger cheated of his due

Turns on thee as his rapid nature bids,

Then, Florence, think, a hireling at thy throat

For the first outrage, think who bore thy last,
Yet mutely in forlorn obedience died !

He comes—his friend—black faces in the camp

Where moved those peerless brows and eyes of old.

Enter LURIA and HUSAIN.

Domizia. Well, and the movement—is it as you hope ?

'Tis Lucca ?

Luria. Ah, the Pisan trumpet incresly !
Tiburzio's envoy, I must needs receive.

Domizia. Whom I withdraw before ; tho'
if I lingered

You could not wonder, for my time fleets fast.
The overtaking night brings such reward !

And where will then be room for me ? Yet, praised,

Remember who was first to promise praise,
And envy those who also can perform !

[Goes.

Luria. This trumpet from the Pisans ?—

Husan. In the camp ;

A very noble presence—Braccio's visage

On Puccio's body—calm and fixed and good ;

A man I seem as I had seen before :

Most like, it was some statue had the face.

Luria. Admit him ! This will prove the last delay.

Husain. Ay, friend, go on, and die thou going on !

Thou heardest what the grave woman said but now :

To-night rewards thee. That is well to hear ; But stop not therefore : hear it, and go on !

Luria. Oh, their reward and triumph and the rest

They round me in the ears with, all day long ? All that, I never take for earnest, friend ! Well would it suit us,—their triumphal arch Or storied pillar,—thee and me, the Moors ! But gratitude in those Italian eyes— That, we shall get ?

Husain. It is too cold an air. Our sun rose out of yonder mound of mist : Where is he now ? So, I trust none of them.

Luria. Truly ?

Husain. I doubt and fear. There stands a wall

'Twixt our expansive and explosive race And those absorbing, concentrating men. They use thee.

Luria. And I feel it, Husain ! yes, And care not—yes, an alien force like mine Is only called to play its part outside Their different nature ; where its sole use seems

To fight with and keep off an adverse force, As alien,—which repelled, mine too withdraws :

Inside, they know not what to do with me. Thus I have told them laughingly and oft, But long since am prepared to learn the worst.

Husain. What is the worst ?

Luria. I will forestall them, Husain, Will speak the destiny they dare not speak— Banish myself before they find the heart.

I will be first to say, " The work rewards !

" I know, for all your praise, my use is over,

" So may it prove !—meanwhile 'tis best I go,

" Go carry safe my memories of you all

" To other scenes of action, newer lands !—

Thus leaving them confirmed in their belief

They would not easily have tired of me.

You think this hard to say ?

Husain.

Say or not say,

So thou but go, so they but let thee go !

This hating people, that hate each the other, And in one blandness to us Moors unite—

Locked each to each like slippery snakes, I say,

Which still in all their tangles, hissing tongue And threatening tail, ne'er do each other harm ;

While any creature of a better blood,

They seem to fight for, while they circle safe And never touch it,—pines without a wound, Withers away beside their eyes and breath.

See thou, if Puccio come not safely out Of Braccio's grasp, this Braccio sworn his foe, As Braccio safely from Domizia's toils

Who hates him most ! But thou, the friend of all,

. . . Come out of them !

Luria. The Pisan trumpet now !

Husain. Breathe free—it is an enemy, no friend !

Luria. He keeps his instincts, no new culture mars

Their perfect use in him ; just so the brutes Rest not, are anxious without visible cause, When change is in the elements at work, Which man's trained senses fail to apprehend. But here,—he takes the distant chariot wheel For thunder, festal flame for lightning's flash, The finer traits of cultivated life For treachery and malevolence : I see !

Enter TIBURZIO.

Luria. Quick, sir, your message ! I but wait your message

To sound the charge. You bring no overture For truce ? I would not, for your General's sake,

You spoke of truce : a time to fight is come, And, whatso'er the fight's event, he keeps His honest soldier's-name to beat me with, Or leaves me all himself to beat, I trust !

Tiburzio. I am Tiburzio.

Luria. You ? 'Tis—yes

. . . Tiburzio !

You were the last to keep the ford i' the valley From Puccio, when I threw in succours there

Why, I was on the heights—through the defile
Ten minutes after, when the prey was lost !
You wore an open skull-cap with a twist
Of water-reeds—the plume being hewn away ;
While I drove down my battle from the heights,
I saw with my own eyes !

Tiburzio. And you are Luria
Who sent my cohort, that laid down its arms
In error of the battle-signal's sense,
Back safely to me at the critical time—
One of a hundred deeds. I know you.

Therefore
To none but you could I . . .

Luria. No truce, Tiburzio !

Tiburzio. Luria, you know the peril imminent

On Pisa,—that you have us in the toils,
Us her last safeguard, all that intercepts
The rage of her implacablest of foes
From Pisa : if we fall to-day, she falls.
Tho' Lucca will arrive, yet, 'tis too late.
You have so plainly here the best of it,
That you must feel, brave soldier as you
are,

How dangerous we grow in this extreme,
How truly formidable by despair.
Still, probabilities should have their weight :
The extreme chance is ours, but, that chance failing,

You win this battle. Wherefore say I this ?
To be well apprehended when I add,
This danger absolutely comes from you.
Were you, who threaten thus, a Florentine . . .

Luria. Sir, I am nearer Florence than her sons.

I can, and have perhaps obliged the State,
Nor paid a mere son's duty.

Tiburzio. Even so.
Were you the son of Florence, yet endured
With all your present nobleness of soul,
No question, what I must communicate
Would not detach you from her.

Luria. Me, detach ?

Tiburzio. Time urges. You will ruin
presently
Pisa, you never knew, for Florence' sake

You think you know. I have from time to
time

Made prize of certain secret missives sent
From Braccio here, the Commissary, home :
And knowing Florence otherwise, I piece
The entire chain out, from these its scattered links.

Your trial occupies the Signory ;
They sit in judgment on your conduct now.
When men at home inquire into the acts
Which in the field e'en foes appreciate . . .
Brief, they are Florentines ! You, saving
them,

Seek but the sure destruction saviours find.

Luria. Tiburzio !

Tiburzio. All the wonder is of course.
I am not here to teach you, nor direct,
Only to loyally apprise—scarce that.
This is the latest letter, sealed and safe,
As it left here an hour ago. One way
Of two thought free to Florence, I command.
The duplicate is on its road ; but this,—
Read it, and then I shall have more to say.

Luria. Florence !

Tiburzio. Now, were yourself a Florentine,

This letter, let it hold the worst it can,
Would be no reason you should fall away.
The mother city is the mother still,
And recognition of the children's service
Her own affair ; reward—there's no reward !
But you are bound by quite another tie.
Nor nature shows, nor reason, why at first
A foreigner, born friend to all alike,
Should give himself to any special State
More than another, stand by Florence' side
Rather than Pisa ; 'tis as fair a city
You war against as that you fight for—famed
As well as she in story, graced no less
With noble heads and patriotic hearts :
Nor to a stranger's eye would either cause,
Stripped of the cumulative loves and hates
Which take importance from familiar view,
Stand as the right and sole to be upheld.
Therefore, should the preponderating gift
Of love and trust, Florence was first to throw,
Which made you hers, not Pisa's, void the scale,—

Old ties dissolving, things resume their place
And all begins again. Break seal and read !
At least let Pisa offer for you now !
And I, as a good Pisan, shall rejoice—
Though for myself I lose, in gaining you,
This last fight and its opportunity ;
The chance it brings of saving Pisa yet,
Or in the turn of battle dying so
That shame should want its extreme bitterness.

Luria. Tiburzio, you that fight for Pisa now
As I for Florence . . . say my chance were
yours !

You read this letter, and you find . . . no,
no !

Too mad !

Tiburzio. I read the letter, find they purpose

When I have crushed their foe, to crush me :
well ?

Luria. You, being their captain, what is it you do ?

Tiburzio. Why, as it is, all cities are alike ;
As Florence pays you, Pisa will pay me.
I shall be as belied, whate'er the event,
As you, or more : my weak head, they will say,
Prompted this last expedient, my faint heart
Entailed on them indelible disgrace,
Both which defects ask proper punishment.
Another tenure of obedience, mine !
You are no son of Pisa's : break and read !

Luria. And act on what I read ? What act were fit ?

If the firm-fixed foundation of my faith
In Florence, who to me stands for mankind,
—If that break up and, disimprisoning
From the abyss . . . Ah friend, it cannot be !
You may be very sage, yet—all the world
Having to fail, or your sagacity,
You do not wish to find yourself alone !
What would the world be worth ? Whose love be sure ?

The world remains : you are deceived !

Tiburzio. Your hand !
I lead the vanguard.—If you fall, beside,
The better : I am left to speak ! For me,
This was my duty, nor would I rejoice
If I could help, it misses its effect ;

And after all you will look gallantly Found dead here with that letter in your breast.

Luria. Tiburzio—I would see these people
once

And test them ere I answer finally !
At your arrival let the trumpet sound :
If mine return not then the wonted cry
It means that I believe—am Pisa's !

Tiburzio.

Well !

[Goes.

Luria. My heart will have it he speaks true ! My blood

Beats close to this Tiburzio as a friend.
If he had stept into my watch-tent, night
And the wild desert full of foes around,
I should have broke the bread and given the salt

Secure, and, when my hour of watch was done,
Taken my turn to sleep between his knees,
Safe in the untroubled brow and honest cheek.
Oh world, where all things pass and nought abides,

Oh life, the long mutation—is it so ?
Is it with life as with the body's change ?
—Where, e'en tho' better follow, good must
pass,

Nor manhood's strength can mate with boy-hood's grace,

Nor age's wisdom, in its turn, find strength,
But silently the first gift dies away,
And though the new stays, never both at once.
Life's time of savage instinct o'er with me,
It fades and dies away, past trusting more,
As if to punish the ingratitude
With which I turned to grow in these new lights,

And learned to look with European eyes.
Yet it is better, this cold certain way,
Where Braccio's brow tells nothing, Puccio's
mouth,

Domizia's eyes reject the searcher : yes !
For on their calm sagacity I lean,
Their sense of right, deliberate choice of good,
Sure, as they know my deeds, they deal with me.
Yes, that is better—that is best of all !
Such faith stays when mere wild belief would go.

Yes—when the desert creature's heart, at fault

Amid the scattering tempest's pillared sands,
Betrays its step into the pathless drift—

The calm instructed eye of man holds fast
By the sole bearing of the visible star,
Sure that when slow the whirling wreck sub-
side,

The boundaries, lost now, shall be found
again,—

The palm-trees and the pyramid over all.

Yes: I trust Florence: Pisa is deceived.

Enter BRACCIO, PUCCIO, and DOMIZIA.

Braccio. Noon's at an end: no Lucca?
You must fight.

Luria. Do you remember ever, gentle
friends,

I am no Florentine?

Domizia. It is yourself

Who still are forcing us, importunately,
To bear in 'mind what else we should forget.

Luria. For loss!—for what I lose in being none!

No shrewd man, such as you yourselves
respect,

But would remind you of the stranger's loss

In natural friends and advocates at home,

Hereditary loves, even rivalships

With precedent for honour and reward.

Still, there's a gain, too! If you take it so,

The stranger's lot has special gain as well.

Do you forget there was my own far East

I might have given away myself to, once,

As now to Florence, and for such a gift,

Stood there like a descended deity?

There, worship waits us: what is it waits here?

[Shows the letter.]

See! Chance has put into my hand the means

Of knowing what I earn, before I work.

Should I fight better, should I fight the
worse,

With payment palpably before me? See!

Here lies my whole reward! Best learn it
now

Or keep it for the end's entire delight?

Braccio. If you serve Florence as the vulgar
serve,

For swordsman's-pay alone,—break seal and read!

In that case, you will find your full desert.

Luria. Give me my one last happy moment,
friends!

You need me now, and all the graciousness

This letter can contain will hardly balance.

The after-feeling that you need no more.

This moment . . . oh, the East has use with
you!

Its sword still flashes—is not flung aside

With the past praise, in a dark corner yet!

How say you? 'Tis not so with Florentines,

Captains of yours: for them, the ended war

Is but a first step to the peace begun:

He who did well in war, just earns the
right

To begin doing well in peace, you know:

And certain my precursors,—would not such

Look to themselves in such a chance as
mine,

Secure the ground they trod upon, perhaps?

For I have heard, by fits, or seemed to
hear,

Of strange mishap, mistake, ingratitude,

Treachery even. Say that one of you

Surmised this letter carried what might turn

To harm hereafter, cause him prejudice:

What would he do?

Domizia [hastily]. Thank God and take revenge!

Hurl her own force against the city straight

And, even at the moment when the foe

Sounded defiance . . .

[TIBURZIO'S trumpet sounds in the distance.]

Luria. Ah, you Florentines!

So would you do? Wisely for you, no
doubt.

My simple Moorish instinct bids me clench

The obligation you relieve me from,

Still deeper! [To PUCCIO.] Sound our answer,
I should say,

And thus:—[tearing the paper.]—The battle!
That solves every doubt.

ACT III.

AFTERNOON.

PUCCIO, as making a report to JACOPO.

Puccio. And here, your captain must report the rest ;

For, as I say, the main engagement over
And Luria's special part in it performed,
How could a subaltern like me expect
Leisure or leave to occupy the field
And glean what dropped from his wide harvesting ?

I thought, when Lucca at the battle's end
Came up, just as the Pisan centre broke,
That Luria would detach me and prevent
The flying Pisans seeking what they found,
Friends in the rear, a point to rally by.
But no, more honourable proved my post !
I had the august captive to escort
Safe to our camp ; some other could pursue,
Fight, and be famous ; gentler chance was
mine—

Tiburzio's wounded spirit must be soothed !
He's in the tent there.

Jacopo. Is the substance down ?
I write—"The vanguard beaten and both wings
"In full retreat, Tiburzio prisoner"—
And now,—“That they fell back and formed
again

“On Lucca's coming.” Why then, after all,
’Tis half a victory, no conclusive one ?

Puccio. Two operations where a sole had served.

Jacopo. And Luria's fault was—?

Puccio. Oh, for fault—not much !
He led the attack, a thought impetuously,
—There's commonly more prudence ; now,
he seemed

To hurry measures, otherwise well judged.
By over-concentrating strength at first
Against the enemy's van, both wings escaped :
That's reparable, yet it is a fault.

Enter BRACCIO.

Jacopo. As good as a full victory to
Florence,

With the advantage of a fault beside—
What is it, Puccio?—that by pressing forward
With too impetuous . . .

Braccio. The report anon !

Thanks, sir—you have elsewhere a charge, I know. [PUCCIO goes.]

There's nothing done but I would do again ;
Yet, Lapo, it may be the past proves nothing,
And Luria has kept faithful to the close.

Jacopo. I was for waiting.

Braccio. Yes : so was not I.
He could not choose but tear that letter—
true !

Still, certain of his tones, I mind, and looks :—
You saw, too, with a fresher soul than I.
So, Porzio seemed an injured man, they say !
Well, I have gone upon the broad, sure
ground.

Enter LURIA, PUCCIO, and DOMIZIA

Luria [to PUCCIO]. Say, at his pleasure I will see Tiburzio !
All's at his pleasure.

Domizia [to LURIA]. Were I not forewarned

You would reject, as you do constantly,
Praise,—I might tell you how you have deserved

Of Florence by this last and crowning feat :
But words offend.

Luria. Nay, you may praise me now.
I want instruction every hour, I find,
On points where once I saw least need of it ;
And praise, I have been used to slight
perhaps,

Seems scarce so easily dispensed with now.
After a battle half one's strength is gone ;
The glorious passion in us once appeased,
Our reason's calm cold dreadful voice begins.
All justice, power and beauty scarce appear
Monopolized by Florence, as of late,
To me, the stranger : you, no doubt, may know
Why Pisa needs must bear her rival's yoke.
And peradventure I grow nearer you,
For I, too, want to know and be assured.
When a cause ceases to reward itself,
Its friend seeks fresh sustainments ; praise is
one.

And here stand you—you, lady, praise me well.

But yours—(your pardon)—is unlearned praise.

To the motive, the endeavour, the heart's self, Your quick sense looks: 'you crown and call aright

The soul o' the purpose, ere 'tis shaped as act, Takes flesh i' the world, and clothes itself a king.

But when the act comes, stands for what 'tis worth,

—Here's Puccio, the skilled soldier, he's my judge!

Was all well, Puccio?

Puccio. All was . . . must be well: If we beat Lucca presently, as doubtless . . .

—No, there's no doubt, we must—all was well done.

Luria. In truth? Still you are of the trade, my Puccio!

You have the fellow-craftsman's sympathy. There's none cares, like a fellow of the craft, For the all-unestimated sum of pains That go to a success the world can see: They praise then, but the best they never know

—While you know! So, if envy mix with it, Hate even, still the bottom-praise of all, Whatever be the dregs, that drop's pure gold! —For nothing's like it; nothing else records Those daily, nightly drippings in the dark Of the heart's blood, the world lets drop away

For ever—so, pure gold that praise must be! And I have yours, my soldier! yet the best Is still to come. There's one looks on apart Whom all refers to, failure or success;

What's done might be our best, our utmost work,

And yet inadequate to serve his need.

Here's Braccio now, for Florence—here's our service—

Well done for us, seems it well done for him? His chosen engine, tasked to its full strength Answers the end? Should he have chosen higher?

Does he help Florence, now our best is wrought?

Braccio. This battle, with the foregone services, Saves Florence.

Luria. Why then, all is very well! Here am I in the middle of my friends, Who know me and who love me, one and all. And yet . . . 'tis like . . . this instant while

I speak
Is like the turning-moment of a dream
When . . . Ah, you are not foreigners like me!

Well then, one always dreams of friends at home;

And always comes, I say, the turning-point
When something changes in the friendly eyes
That love and look on you . . . so slight, so slight . . .

And yet it tells you they are dead and gone,
Or changed and enemies, for all their words,
And all is mockery and a maddening show.
You now, so kind here, all you Florentines,
What is it in your eyes . . . those lips, those brows . . .

Nobody spoke it, yet I know it well!
Come now—this battle saves you, all's at end,

Your use of me is o'er, for good, for ill,—
Come now, what's done against me, while I speak,

In Florence? Come! I feel it in my blood,
My eyes, my hair, a voice is in my ears
That spite of all this smiling and soft speech
You are betraying me. What is it you do?
Have it your way, and think my use is over—
Think you are saved and may throw off the mask—

Have it my way, and think more work remains

Which I could do,—so, show you fear me not!
Or prudent be, or daring, as you choose,
But tell me—tell what I refused to know
At noon, lest heart should fail me! Well?
That letter?

My fate is sealed at Florence! What is it?
Braccio. Sir, I shall not deny what you divine.

It is no novelty for innocence
To be suspected, but a privilege:

The after certain compensation comes.
Charges, I say not whether false or true,
Have been preferred against you some time
since,

Which Florence was bound, plainly, to receive,
And which are therefore undergoing now
The due investigation. That is all.
I doubt not but your innocence will prove Apparent and illustrious, as to me,
To them this evening, when the trial ends.

Luria. My trial?

Domizia. Florence, Florence to the end,

My whole heart thanks thee!

Puccio [to BRACCIO]. What is "trial,"
sir?

It was not for a trial—surely, no—
I furnished you those notes from time to time?
I held myself aggrieved—I am a man—
And I might speak,—ay, and speak mere truth, too,

And yet not mean at bottom of my heart
What should assist a—trial, do you say?
You should have told me!

Domizia. Nay, go on, go on!
His sentence! Do they sentence him? What is it?

The block—wheel?

Braccio. Sentence there is none as yet,
Nor shall I give my own opinion now
Of what it should be, or is like to be.
When it is passed, applaud or disapprove!

Up to that point, what is there to impugn?

Luria. They are right, then, to try me?

Braccio. I assert,
Maintain and justify the absolute right
Of Florence to do all she can have done
In this procedure,—standing on her guard,
Receiving even services like yours
With utmost fit suspicious wariness.

In other matters, keep the mummy up!
Take all the experiences of all the world,
Each knowledge that broke through a heart to life,

Each reasoning which, to reach, burnt out a brain,

—In other cases, know these, warrant these,
And then dispense with these—'tis very well!

Let friend trust friend, and love demand love's like,

And gratitude be claimed for benefits,— There's grace in that,—and when the fresh heart breaks,

The new brain proves a ruin, what of them?
Where is the matter of one moth the more
Singed in the candle, at a summer's end?

But Florence is no simple John or James
To have his toy, his fancy, his conceit
That he's the one excepted man by fate,
And, when fate shows him he's mistaken
there,

Die with all good men's praise, and yield his
place

To Paul and George intent to try their chance!
Florence exists because these pass away.

She's a contrivance to supply a type
Of man, which men's deficiencies refuse;
She binds so many, that she grows out of
them—

Stands steady o'er their numbers, though they
change

And pass away—there's always what upholds
Always enough to fashion the great show.

As see, yon hanging city, in the sun,
Of shapely cloud substantially the same!
A thousand vapours rise and sink again,
Are interfused, and live their life and die,—
Yet ever hangs the steady show i' the air,
Under the sun's straight influence: that is well,
That is worth heaven should hold, and God should bless!

And so is Florence,—the unseen sun above,
Which draws and holds suspended all of us,
Binds transient vapours into a single cloud
Differing from each and better than they all.
And shall she dare to stake this permanence
On any one man's faith? Man's heart is weak,
And its temptations many: let her prove
Each servant to the very uttermost
Before she grant him her reward, I say!

Domizia. And as for hearts she chances to mistake,

Wronged hearts, not destined to receive
reward,

Though they deserve it, did she only know,
—What should she do for these?

Braccio.

What does she not?

Say, that she gives them but herself to serve!
Here's Luria—what had profited his strength,
When half an hour of sober fancying
Had shown him step by step the uselessness
Of strength exerted for strength's proper sake?
But the truth is, she did create that strength,
Draw to the end the corresponding means.
The world is wide—are we the only men?
Oh, for the time, the social purpose' sake,
Use words agreed on, bandy epithets,
Call any man the sole great wise and good!
But shall we therefore, standing by ourselves,
Insult our souls and God with the same speech?
There, swarm the ignoble thousands under
him:

What marks us from the hundreds and the tens?
Florence took up, turned all one way the soul
Of Luria with its fires, and here he glows!
She takes me out of all the world as him,
Fixing my coldness till like ice it checks
The fire! So, Braccio, Luria, which is best?

Luria. Ah, brave me? And is this indeed the way

To gain your good word and sincere esteem?
Am I the baited animal that must turn
And fight his baiters to deserve their praise?
Obedience is mistake then? Be it so!
Do you indeed remember I stand here
The captain of the conquering army,—mine—
With all your tokens, praise and promise, ready To show for what their names meant when you gave,

Not what you style them now you take away?
If I call in my troops to arbitrate,
And dash the first enthusiastic thrill
Of victory with this you menace now—
Commend to the instinctive popular sense,
My story first, your comment afterward,—
Will they take, think you, part with you or me?
If I say—I, the labourer they saw work,
Ending my work, ask pay, and find my lords
Have all this while provided silently
Against the day of pay and proving faith,
By what you call my sentence that's to come—
Will friends advise I wait complacently?
If I meet Florence half way at their head,
What will you do, my mild antagonist?

Braccio. I will rise up like fire, proud and triumphant

That Luria knew you thoroughly and by
me,

And so was saved. "See, Italy," I'll say,
"The crown of our precautions! Here's a
man

"Was far advanced, just touched on the belief
"Less subtle cities had accorded long;

"But we were wiser: at the end comes this!"
And from that minute, where is Luria? Lost!

The very stones of Florence cry against

The all-exacting, nought-enduring fool

Who thus resents her first probation, flouts

As if he, only, shone and cast no shade,

He, only, walked the earth with privilege

Against suspicion, free where angels fear:

He, for the first inquisitive mother's-word,

Must turn, and stand on his defence, forsooth!

Reward? You will not be worth punishment!

Luria. And Florence knew me thus!

Thus I have lived,—

And thus you, with the clear fine intellect,

Braccio, the cold acute instructed mind,

Out of the stir, so calm and unconfused,

Reported me—how could you otherwise!

Ay?—and what dropped from you, just now, moreover?

Your information, Puccio?—Did your skill,

Your understanding sympathy approve

Such a report of me? Was this the end?

Or is even this the end? Can I stop here?

You, lady, with the woman's stand apart,

The heart to see with, past man's brain and eyes,

. . . I cannot fathom why you should destroy

The unoffending one, you call your friend—

Still, lessoned by the good examples here

Of friendship, 'tis but natural I ask—

Had you a further aim, in aught you urged,

Than your friend's profit—in all those instances

Of perfidy, all Florence wrought of wrong—

All I remember now for the first time?

Domizia. I am a daughter of the Traversari,
Sister of Porzio and of Berto both,

So, have foreseen all that has come to pass.

I knew the Florence that could doubt their faith,

Must needs mistrust a stranger's—dealing them

Punishment, would deny him his reward.

And I believed, the shame they bore and died,
He would not bear, but live and fight against—
Seeing he was of other stuff than they.

Luria. Hear them ! All these against one foreigner !

And all this while, where is, in the whole world,
To his good faith a single witness ?

Tiburzio [who has entered unseen during the preceding dialogue]. Here !

Thus I bear witness, not in word but deed.

I live for Pisa ; she's not lost to-day

By many chances—much prevents from that !

Her army has been beaten, I am here,

But Lucca comes at last, one happy chance !

I rather would see Pisa three times lost

Than saved by any traitor, even by you ;

The example of a traitor's happy fortune

Would bring more evil in the end than good ;—

Pisa rejects the traitor, craves yourself !

I, in her name, resign forthwith to you

My charge,—the highest office, sword and shield !

You shall not, by my counsel, turn on Florence

Your army, give her calumny that ground—

Nor bring one soldier : be you all we gain !

And all she'll lose,—a head to deck some
bridge,

And save the cost o' the crown should deck
the head.

Leave her to perish in her perfidy,

Plague-stricken and stripped naked to all eyes,

A proverb and by-word in all mouths !

Go you to Pisa ! Florence is my place—

Leave me to tell her of the rectitude,

I, from the first, told Pisa, knowing it.

To Pisa !

Domitia. Ah my Braccio, are you caught ?

Braccio. Puccio, good soldier and good citizen,

Whom I have ever kept beneath my eye,

Ready as fit, to serve in this event

Florence, who clear foretold it from the first—

Through me, she gives you the command and
charge

She takes, through me, from him who held it
late !

A painful trial, very sore, was yours :

All that could draw out, marshal in array

The selfish passions 'gainst the public good—Slights, scorns, neglects, were heaped on you to bear :

And ever you did bear and bow the head !

It had been sorry trial, to precede

Your feet, hold up the promise of reward

For luring gleam ; your footsteps kept the track

Thro' dark and doubt : take all the light at
once !

Trial is over, consummation shines ;

Well have you served, as well henceforth command !

Puccio. No, no . . . I dare not ! I am grateful, glad ;

But Luria—you shall understand he's wronged :

And he's my captain : this is not the way

We soldiers climb to fortune : think again !

The sentence is not even passed, beside !

I dare not : where's the soldier could ?

Luria.

Now, Florence—

Is it to be ? You will know all the strength

O' the savage—to your neck the proof must go !

You will prove the brute nature ? Ah, I see !

The savage plainly is impossible :

He keeps his calm way through insulting words,

Sarcastic looks, sharp gestures—one of which

Would stop you, fatal to your finer sense,

But if he stolidly advance, march mute

Without a mark upon his callous hide,

Through the mere brushwood you grow angry
with,

And leave the tatters of your flesh upon,

—You have to learn that when the true bar
comes,

The murk mid-forest, the grand obstacle,

Which when you reach, you give the labour up,

Nor dash on, but lie down composed before,

—He goes against it, like the brute he is :

It falls before him, or he dies in his course.

I kept my course through past ingratitude :

I saw—it does seem, now, as if I saw,

Could not but see, those insults as they fell,

—Ay, let them glance from off me, very like,

Laughing, perhaps, to think the quality

You grew so bold on, while you so despised

The Moor's dull mute inapprehensive mood,

Was saving you : I bore and kept my course.
Now real wrong fronts me : see if I succumb !
Florence withstands me ? I will punish her.

At night my sentence will arrive, you say.
Till then I cannot, if I would, rebel —Unauthorized to lay my office down,
Retaining my full power to will and do :
After—it is to see. Tiburzio, thanks !
Go ; you are free : join Lucca ! I suspend
All further operations till to-night.
Thank you, and for the silence most of all !
[To BRACCIO.] Let my complacent bland accuser go

Carry his self-approving head and heart
Safe through the army which would trample
him

Dead in a moment at my word or sign !
Go, sir, to Florence ; tell friends what I say—
That while I wait my sentence, theirs waits
them !

[To DOMIZIA.] You, lady,—you have black Italian eyes !

I would be generous if I might : oh, yes—
For I remember how so oft you seemed Inclined at heart to break the barrier down
Which Florence finds God built between us
both.

Alas, for generosity ! this hour
Asks retribution : bear it as you may,
I must—the Moor—the savage,—pardon you !
Puccio, my trusty soldier, see them forth !

ACT IV.

EVENING.

Enter PUCCIO and JACOPO.

Puccio. What Luria will do ? Ah, 'tis yours, fair sir,
Your and your subtle-witted master's part,
To tell me that ; I tell you what he can.

Jacopo. Friend, you mistake my station :
I observe
The game, watch how my betters play, no
more.

Puccio. But mankind are not pieces—there's your fault !

You cannot push them, and, the first move
made,

Lean back and study what the next shall be,
In confidence that, when 'tis fixed upon,
You find just where you left them, blacks and whites :

Men go on moving when your hand's away.
You build, I notice, firm on Luria's faith
This whole time,—firmer than I choose to build,

Who never doubted it—of old, that is—
With Luria in his ordinary mind.

But now, oppression makes the wise man
mad :

How do I know he will not turn and stand
And hold his own against you, as he may ?
Suppose he but withdraw to Pisa—well,—
Then, even if all happen to your wish,
Which is a chance . . .

Jacopo. Nay—'twas an oversight,
Not waiting till the proper warrant came :
You could not take what was not ours to give.
But when at night the sentence really comes,
Our city authorizes past dispute
Luria's removal and transfers the charge,
You will perceive your duty and accept ?

Puccio. Accept what ? muster-rolls of soldiers' names ?

An army upon paper ? I want men,
The hearts as well as hands—and where's a
heart

But beats with Luria, in the multitude
I come from walking through by Luria's side ?
You gave them Luria, set him thus to grow,
Head-like, upon their trunk ; one heart feeds
both,

They feel him there, live twice, and well know why.

—For they do know, if you are ignorant,
Who kept his own place and respected theirs, Managed their sweat, yet never spared his blood.

All was your act : another might have served—
There's peradventure no such dearth of heads—
But you chose Luria : so, they grew one flesh,
And now, for nothing they can understand,

Luria removed, off is to roll the head ;
The body's mine—much I shall do with it !

Jacopo. That's at the worst.

Puccio. No—at the best, it is !

Best, do you hear ? I saw them by his side.
Only we two with Luria in the camp
Are left that keep the secret ? You think that ?
I hear what I know : from rear to van, no heart
But felt the quiet patient hero there
Was wronged, nor in the moveless ranks an eye
But glancing told its fellow the whole story
Of that convicted silent knot of spies
Who passed thro' them to Florence ; they might pass—

No breast but gladlier beat when free of such !
Our troops will catch up Luria, close him round,
Bear him to Florence as their natural lord,
Partake his fortune, live or die with him.

Jacopo. And by mistake catch up along with him

Puccio, no doubt, compelled in self despite
To still continue second in command !

Puccio. No, sir, no second nor so fortunate !
Your tricks succeed with me too well for that !
I am as you have made me, live and die
To serve your end—a mere trained fighting-hack,

With words, you laugh at while they leave your mouth

For my life's rule and ordinance of God !

I have to do my duty, keep my faith,
And earn my praise, and guard against my
blame,

As I was trained. I shall accept your charge,
And fight against one better than myself,
Spite of my heart's conviction of his worth—
That, you may count on !—just as hitherto
I have gone on, persuaded I was wronged,
Slighted, insulted, terms we learn by rote,—
All because Luria superseded me—

Because the better nature, fresh-inspired,
Mounted above me to its proper place !
What mattered all the kindly graciousness,
The cordial brother's-bearing ? This was clear—

I, once the captain, now was subaltern,
And so must keep complaining like a fool !
Go, take the curse of a lost soul, I say !

You neither play your puppets to the end,
Nor treat the real man,—for his realness' sake Thrust rudely in their place,—with such regard

As might console them for their altered rank.
Me, the mere steady soldier, you depose
For Luria, and here's all your pet deserves !
Of what account, then, is your laughing-stock ?
One word for all : whatever Luria does,
—If backed by his indignant troops he turn,
Revenge himself, and Florence go to ground,—
Or, for a signal everlasting shame,
He pardon you, simply seek better friends,
Side with the Pisans and Lucchese for change
—And if I, pledged to ingrates past belief,
Dare fight against a man such fools call false,
Who, inasmuch as he was true, fights me,—
Whichever way he win, he wins for worth,
For every soldier, for all true and good !
Sir, chronicling the rest, omit not this !

As they go, enter LURIA and HUSAIN.

Husain. Saw'st thou ?—For they are gone
The world lies bare

Before thee, to be tasted, felt and seen
Like what it is, now Florence goes away !
Thou livest now, with men art man again !
Those Florentines were all to thee of old ;
But Braccio, but Domizia, gone is each,
There lie beneath thee thine own multitudes !
Saw'st thou ?

Luria. I saw.

Husain. Then, ho'd thy course, my king !

The years return. Let thy heart have its
way :

Ah, they would play with thee as with all else,
Turn thee to use, and fashion thee anew,
Find out God's fault in thee as in the rest ?
Oh watch, oh listen only to these fiends
Once at their occupation ! Ere we know,
The free great heaven is shut, their stifling pall
Drops till it frets the very tingling hair,
So weighs it on our head,—and, for the earth,
Our common earth is tethered up and down,
Over and across—"here shalt thou move,"
they cry !

Luria. Ay, Husain ?

Husain. So have they spoiled all beside !
 So stands a man girt round with Florentines,
 Priests, greybeards, Braccios, women, boys and spies,
 All in one tale, all singing the same song,
 How thou must house, and live at bed and board,
 Take pledge and give it, go their every way,
 Breathe to their measure, make thy blood beat time
 With theirs—or, all is nothing—thou art lost—
 A savage, how shouldst thou perceive as they?
 Feel glad to stand 'neath God's close naked
 hand !
 Look up to it ! Why, down they pull thy neck,
 Lest it crush thee, who feel'st it and wouldst
 kiss,
 Without their priests that needs must glove
 it first,
 Lest peradventure flesh offend thy lip.
 Love woman ! Why, a very beast thou art !
 Thou must . . .

Luria. Peace, Husain !

Husain. Ay but, spoiling all,
 For all, else true things, substituting false,
 That they should dare spoil, of all instincts,
 thine !
 Should dare to take thee with thine instincts
 up,
 Thy battle-ardours, like a ball of fire,
 And class them and allow them place and
 play
 So far, no farther—unabashed the while !
 Thou with the soul that never can take rest—
 Thou born to do, undo, and do again,
 And never to be still,—wouldst thou make
 war ?
 Oh, that is commendable, just and right !
 "Come over," say they, "have the honour
 due
 "In living out thy nature ! Fight thy best :
 "It is to be for Florence, not thyself !
 "For thee, it were a horror and a plague ;
 "For us, when war is made for Florence, see,
 "How all is changed : the fire that fed on earth
 "Now towers to heaven !" —

Luria. And what sealed up so long
 My Husain's mouth ?

Husain. Oh friend, oh lord—for me,
 What am I ?—I was silent at thy side,
 Who am a part of thee. It is thy hand,
 Thy foot that glows when in the heart fresh
 blood

Boils up, thou heart of me ! Now, live again,
 Again love as thou likest, hate as free !
 Turn to no Braccios nor Domizias now,
 To ask, before thy very limbs dare move,
 If Florence' welfare be concerned thereby !

Luria. So clear what Florence must expect of me ?

Husain. Both armies against Florence !
 Take revenge !

Wide, deep—to live upon, in feeling now,—
 And, after live, in memory, year by year—
 And, with the dear conviction, die at last !
 She lies now at thy pleasure : pleasure have !
 Their vaunted intellect that gilds our sense,
 And blends with life, to show it better by,
 —How think'st thou?—I have turned that light on them !

They called our thirst of war a transient thing ;
 "The battle-element must pass away
 "From life," they said, "and leave a tranquil world."

—Master, I took their light and turned it full
 On that dull turgid vein they said would burst
 And pass away ; and as I looked on life,
 Still everywhere I tracked this, though it hid
 And shifted, lay so silent as it thought,
 Changed shape and hue yet ever was the same.
 Why, 'twas all fighting, all their nobler life !
 All work was fighting, every harm—defeat,
 And every joy obtained—a victory !
 Be not their dupe !

—Their dupe ? That hour is past !
 Here stand'st thou in the glory and the calm :
 All is determined. Silence for me now !

[HUSAIN goes.]

Luria. Have I heard all ?

Domizia [advancing from the background].

No, Luria, I remain !
 Not from the motives these have urged on thee,
 Ignoble, insufficient, incomplete,
 And pregnant each with sure seeds of decay,

As failing of sustainment from thyself,
 —Neither from low revenge, nor selfishness,
 Nor savage lust of power, nor one, nor all,
 Shalt thou abolish Florence! I proclaim
 The angel in thee, and reject the sprites
 Which ineffectual crowd about his strength,
 And mingle with his work and claim a share!
 Inconsciously to the augustest end
 Thou hast arisen: second not in rank
 So much as time, to him who first ordained
 That Florence, thou art to destroy, should be.
 Yet him a star, too, guided, who broke first
 The pride of lonely power, the life apart,
 And made the eminences, each to each,
 Lean o'er the level world and let it lie
 Safe from the thunder henceforth 'neath their tops;

So the few famous men of old combined,
 And let the multitude rise underneath,
 And reach them and unite—so Florence grew:
 Braccio speaks true, it was well worth the price.
 But when the sheltered many grew in pride
 And grudged the station of the elected ones,
 Who, greater than their kind, are truly great
 Only in voluntary servitude—
 Time was for thee to rise, and thou art here.
 Such plague possessed this Florence: who can tell

The mighty girth and greatness at the heart
 Of those so perfect pillars of the grove
 She pulled down in her envy? Who as I,
 The light weak parasite born but to twine
 Round each of them and, measuring them,
 live?

My light love keeps the matchless circle safe,
 My slender life proves what has passed away.
 I lived when they departed; lived to cling
 To thee, the mighty stranger; thou wouldst rise

And burst the thralldom, and avenge, I knew.
 I have done nothing; all was thy strong bolc.
 But a bird's weight can break the infant tree
 Which after holds an aery in its arms,
 And 'twas my care that nought should warp thy spire

From rising to the height; the roof is reached O' the forest, break through, see extend the sky!

Go on to Florence, Luria! 'Tis man's cause!
 Fail thou, and thine own fall were least to dread:

Thou keepest Florence in her evil way,
 Encouragest her sin so much the more—
 And while the ignoble past is justified,
 Thou all the surelier warp'st the future growth,
 The chiefs to come, the Lurias yet unborn,
 That, greater than thyself, are reached o'er
 thee

Who giv'st the vantage-ground their foes require

As o'er my prostrate House thyself wast
 reached.

Man calls thee, God requites thee! All is
 said,

The mission of my House fulfilled at last:
 And the mere woman, speaking for herself,
 Reserves speech—it is now no woman's time.

[DOMIZIA goes.]

Luria. Thus at the last must figure Luria,
 then!

Doing the various work of all his friends,
 And answering every purpose save his own.
 No doubt, 'tis well for them to wish; but
 him—

After the exploit what were left? Perchance
 A little pride upon the swarthy brow,
 At having brought successfully to bear
 'Gainst Florence' self her own especial arms,—
 Her craftiness, impelled by fiercer strength
 From Moorish blood than feeds the northern wit

But after!—once the easy vengeance willed,
 Beautiful Florence at a word laid low
 —(Not in her domes and towers and palaces,
 Not even in a dream, that outrage!)—low,
 As shamed in her own eyes henceforth for ever,

Low, for the rival cities round to laugh,
 Conquered and pardoned by a hireling Moor!
 —For him, who did the irreparable wrong,
 What would be left, his life's illusion fled,—
 What hope or trust in the forlorn wide world?
 How strange that Florence should mistake me
 so!

Whence grew this? What withdrew her faith from me?

Some cause ! These fretful-blooded children talk

Against their mother, — they are wronged, they say—

Notable wrongs her smile makes up again !
So, taking fire at each supposed offence,
They may speak rashly, suffer for their speech :
But what could it have been in word or deed
Thus injured me ? Some one word spoken
more

Out of my heart, and all had changed perhaps.
My fault, it must have been,—for, what gain
they ?

Why risk the danger ? See, what I could do !
And my fault, wherefore visit upon them,
My Florentines ? The notable revenge
I meditated ! To stay passively,
Attend their summons, be as they dispose !
Why, if my very soldiers keep the rank,
And if my chieftains acquiesce, what then ?
I ruin Florence, teach her friends mistrust,
Confirm her enemies in harsh belief,
And when she finds one day, as find she must,
The strange mistake, and how my heart was
hers,

Shall it console me, that my Florentines
Walk with a sadder step, in graver guise,
Who took me with such frankness, praised me so,

At the glad outset ? Had they loved me less,
They had less feared what seemed a change in me.

And after all, who did the harm ? Not they !
How could they interpose with those old fools
I' the council ? Suffer for those old fools'
sake—

They, who made pictures of me, sang the songs

About my battles ? Ah, we Moors get blind
Out of our proper world, where we can see !
The sun that guides is closer to us ! There—There, my own orb ! He sinks from out the sky.

Why, there ! a whole day has he blessed the
land,

My land, our Florence all about the hills,
The fields and gardens, vineyards, olive-grounds,

All have been blest : and yet we Florentines
With souls intent upon our battle here,
Found that he rose too soon, or set too late,
Gave us no vantage, or gave Pisa much—Therefore we wronged him ! Does he turn in ire
To burn the earth that cannot understand ?
Or drop out quietly, and leave the sky,
His task once ended ? Night wipes blame
away.

Another morning from my East shall spring
And find all eyes at leisure, all disposed
To watch and understand its work, no doubt.
So, praise the new sun, the successor praise,
Praise the new Luria and forget the old !

Strange ! This is all I brought from my own land

To help me : Europe would supply the
rest,

All needs beside, all other helps save one !
I thought of adverse fortune, battle lost,
The natural upbraiding of the loser,
And then this quiet remedy to seek
At end of the disastrous day. [He drinks.

'Tis sought !
This was my happy triumph-morning : Florence

Is saved : I drink this, and ere night,—die !
Strange !

ACT V.

NIGHT.

LURIA and PUCCIO.

Luria. I thought to do this, not to talk this : well,

Such were my projects for the city's good,
To help her in attack or by defence.
Time, here as elsewhere, soon or late may take

Our foresight by surprise thro' chance and
change ;

But not a little we provide against
—If you see clear on every point.
Puccio. Most clear.

Luria. Then all is said—not much, if you count words,

Yet to an understanding ear enough
And all that my brief stay permits, beside.
Nor must you blame me, as I sought to teach

My elder in command, or threw a doubt
Upon the very skill, it comforts me
To know I leave,—your steady soldiery
Which never failed me: yet, because it seemed
A stranger's eye might haply note defect
That skill, through use and custom, overlooks—

I have gone into the old cares once more,
As if I had to come and save again
Florence—that May—that morning! 'Tis night now.

Well—I broke off with? . . .

Puccio. Of the past campaign
You spoke—of measures to be kept in mind
For future use.

Luria. True, so . . . but, time—no time!
As well end here: remember this, and me!
Farewell now!

Puccio. Dare I speak?

Luria. South o' the river—
How is the second stream called . . . no,
—the third?

Puccio. Pesa.

Luria. And a stone's cast from the fording-place,
To the east,—the little mount's name?

Puccio. Lupo.

Luria. Ay!
Ay—there the tower, and all that side is safe!
With San Romano, west of Evola,
San Miniato, Scala, Empoli,
Five towers in all,—forget not!

Puccio. Fear not me!

Luria.—Nor to memorialize the Council
now,
I' the easy hour, on those battalions' claim,
Who forced a pass by Staggia on the hills,
And kept the Sienese at check!

Puccio. One word—
Sir, I must speak! That you submit yourself
To Florence' bidding, howsoe'er it prove,
And give up the command to me—is much,

Too much, perhaps: but what you tell me
now,

Even will affect the other course you choose—
Poor as it may be, perils even that!
Refuge you seek at Pisa: yet these plans
All militate for Florence, all conclude
Your formidable work to make her queen
O' the country,—which her rivals rose against
When you began it,—which to interrupt,
Pisa would buy you off at any price!
You cannot mean to sue for Pisa's help,
With this made perfect and on record?

Luria. I—

At Pisa, and for refuge, do you say?

Puccio. Where are you going, then? You must decide

On leaving us, a silent fugitive,
Alone, at night—you, stealing through our lines,

Who were this morning's Luria,—you escape
To painfully begin the world once more,
With such a past, as it had never been!
Where are you going?

Luria. Not so far, my Puccio,
But that I hope to hear, enjoy and praise
(If you mind praise from your old captain yet)
Each happy blow you strike for Florence.

Puccio. Ay,—
But ere you gain your shelter, what may
come?

For see—though nothing's surely known as
yet,

Still—truth must out—I apprehend the worst.
If mere suspicion stood for certainty

Before, there's nothing can arrest the step
Of Florence toward your ruin, once on foot.
Forgive her fifty times, it matters not!
And having disbelieved your innocence,
How can she trust your magnanimity?

You may do harm to her—why then, you will!
And Florence is sagacious in pursuit.

Have you a friend to count on?

Luria. One sure friend.

Puccio. Potent?

Luria. All-potent.

Puccio. And he is apprised?

Luria. He waits me.

Puccio. So!—Then I, put in your place,

Making my profit of all done by you,
 Calling your labours mine, reaping their fruit,
 To this, the State's gift, now add yours
 beside—

That I may take as my peculiar store
 These your instructions to work Florence
 good.

And if, by putting some few happily
 In practice, I should both advantage her
 And draw down honour on myself,—what
 then?

Luria. Do it, my Puccio! I shall know and praise.

Puccio. Though so, men say, "mark what we gain by change

"—A Puccio for a Luria!"

Luria. Even so.

Puccio. Then, not for fifty hundred Florences,

Would I accept one office save my own,
 Fill any other than my rightful post
 Here at your feet, my captain and my lord!
 That such a cloud should break, such trouble
 be,

Ere a man settle, soul and body, down
 Into his true place and take rest for ever!

Here were my wise eyes fixed on your right-
 hand,

And so the bad thoughts came and the worse
 words,

And all went wrong and painfully enough,—
 No wonder,—till, the right spot stumbled on,
 All the jar stops, and there is peace at once!
 I am yours now,—a tool your right-hand wields!

God's love, that I should live, the man I am,
 On orders, warrants, patents, and the like,
 As if there were no glowing eye in the world
 To glance straight inspiration to my brain,
 No glorious heart to give mine twice the beats!

For, see—my doubt, where is it?—fear? 'tis flown!

And Florence and her anger are a tale
 To scare a child. Why, half-a-dozen words
 Will tell her, spoken as I now can speak,
 Her error, my past folly—and all's right,
 And you are Luria, our great chief again!

Or at the worst—which worst were best of
 all—

To exile or to death I follow you.

Luria. Thanks, Puccio! Let me use the privilege

You grant me: if I still command you,—stay!
 Remain here—my vicegerent, it shall be,
 And not successor: let me, as of old,
 Still serve the State, my spirit prompting
 yours—

Still triumph, one for both. There! Leave me now!

You cannot disobey my first command?
 Remember what I spoke of Jacopo,
 And what you promised to concert with him!
 Send him to speak with me—nay, no fare-
 well!

You shall be by me when the sentence comes.
 [PUCCIO goes.

So, there's one Florentine returns again!
 Out of the genial morning-company,
 One face is left to take into the night.

Enter JACOPO.

Jacopo. I wait for your command, sir.

Luria. What, so soon?
 I thank your ready presence and fair word.

I used to notice you in early days
 As of the other species, so to speak,
 Those watchers of the lives of us who act—
 That weigh our motives, scrutinize our thoughts.

So, I propound this to your faculty
 As you would tell me, were a town to take
 . . . That is, of old. I am departing hence
 Under these imputations; that is nought—
 I leave no friend on whom they may rebound,
 Hardly a name behind me in the land,
 Being a stranger: all the more behoves
 That I regard how altered were the case
 With natives of the country, Florentines
 On whom the like mischance should fall: the roots

O' the tree survive the ruin of the trunk—
 No root of mine will throb, you understand.
 But I had predecessors, Florentines,
 Accused as I am now, and punished so—
 The Traversari: you know more than I

How stigmatized they are, and lost in shame.
 Now Puccio, who succeeds me in command,
 Both served them and succeeded, in due time;
 He knows the way, holds proper documents,
 And has the power to lay the simple truth
 Before an active spirit, as I count yours:
 And also there's Tiburzio, my new friend,
 Will, at a word, confirm such evidence,
 He being the great chivalric soul we know.
 I put it to your tact, sir—were't not well,
 —A grace, though but for contrast's sake,
 no more,—

If you who witness, and have borne a share
 Involuntarily in my mischance,
 Should, of your proper motion, set your skill
 To indicate—that is, investigate
 The right or wrong of what mischance befell
 Those famous citizens, your countrymen?
 Nay, you shall promise nothing: but reflect,
 And if your sense of justice prompt you—
 good!

Jacopo. And if, the trial past, their fame stand clear
 To all men's eyes, as yours, my lord, to
 mine—

Their ghosts may sleep in quiet satisfied!
 For me, a straw thrown up into the air,
 My testimony goes for a straw's worth.
 I used to hold by the instructed brain,
 And move with Braccio as my master-wind;
 The heart leads surelier: I must move with
 you—

As greatest now, who ever were the best.
 So, let the last and humblest of your servants
 Accept your charge, as Braccio's heretofore,
 And tender homage by obeying you!

[JACOPO goes.]

Luria. Another! Luria goes not poorly
 forth.

If we could wait! The only fault's with time;
 All men become good creatures: but so slow!

Enter DOMIZIA.

Luria. Ah, you once more?

Domizia. Domizia, whom you knew,
 Performed her task, and died with it. 'Tis I,
 Another woman, you have never known.
 Let the past sleep now!

Luria.

I have done with it.
Domizia. How inexhaustibly the spirit grows!

One object, she seemed erewhile born to reach
 With her whole energies and die content,—
 So like a wall at the world's edge it stood,
 With nought beyond to live for,—is that reached?

Already are new undreamed energies
 Outgrowing under, and extending farther
 To a new object; there's another world.
 See! I have told the purpose of my life;
 'Tis gained: you are decided, well or ill—
 You march on Florence, or submit to her—
 My work is done with you, your brow declares.

But—leave you? More of you seems yet to reach:

I stay for what I just begin to see.

Luria. So that you turn not to the past!

Domizia. You trace

Nothing but ill in it—my selfish impulse,
 Which sought its end and disregarded yours?

Luria. Speak not against your nature:
 best, each keep

His own—you, yours—most, now that I keep
 mine,

—At least, fall by it, having too weakly stood.
 God's finger marks distinctions, all so fine,
 We would confound: the lesser has its use,
 Which, when it apes the greater, is forgone.
 I, born a Moor, lived half a Florentine;
 But, punished properly, can end, a Moor.
 Beside, there's something makes me understand

Your nature: I have seen it.

Domizia. Aught like mine?

Luria. In my own East . . . if you would stoop and help

My barbarous illustration! It sounds ill;
 Yet there's no wrong at bottom: rather,
 praise.

Domizia. Well?

Luria. We have creatures there, which if you saw

The first time, you would doubtless marvel at
 For their surpassing beauty, craft and strength.

And though it were a lively moment's shock
When you first found the purpose of forked
tongues

That seem innocuous in their lambent play,
Yet, once made know such grace requires such guard,

Your reason soon would acquiesce, I think,
In wisdom which made all things for the best—

So, take them, good with ill, contentedly,
The prominent beauty with the latent sting.
I am glad to have seen you wondrous Florentines :

Yet . . .

Domizia. I am here to listen.

Luria. My own East !

How nearer God we were ! He glows above
With scarce an intervention, presses close
And palpitatingly, his soul o'er ours :

We feel him, nor by painful reason know !

The everlasting minute of creation

Is felt there ; now it is, as it was then ;

All changes at his instantaneous will,

Not by the operation of a law

Whose maker is elsewhere at other work.

His hand is still engaged upon his world—

Man's praise can forward it, man's prayer
suspend,

For is not God all-mighty ? To recast

The world, erase old things and make them
new,

What costs it Him ? So, man breathes nobly there.

And inasmuch as feeling, the East's gift,

Is quick and transient—comes, and lo, is gone—

While Northern thought is slow and durable,
Surely a mission was reserved for me,

Who, born with a perception of the power

And use of the North's thought for us of the East,

Should have remained, turned knowledge to account,

Giving thought's character and permanence

To the too transitory feeling there—

Writing God's message plain in mortal words.

Instead of which, I leave my fated field

For this where such a task is needed least,

Where all are born consummate in the art

I just perceive a chance of making mine,—

And then, deserting thus my early post,

I wonder that the men I come among Mistake me ! There, how all had understood,

Still brought fresh stuff for me to stamp and keep,

Fresh instinct to translate them into law !

Me, who . . .

Domizia. Who here the greater task achieve,

More needful even : who have brought fresh stuff

For us to mould, interpret and prove right,—

New feeling fresh from God, which, could we know

O' the instant, where had been our need of it ?

—Whose life re-teaches us what life should be,

What faith is, loyalty and simpleness,

All, once revealed but taught us so long since

That, having mere tradition of the fact,—

Truth copied falteringly from copies faint,

The early traits all dropped away,—we said

On sight of faith like yours, " So looks not
faith

" We understand, described and praised
before."

But still, the feat was dared ; and though at
first

It suffered from our haste, yet trace by trace

Old memories reappear, old truth returns,

Our slow thought does its work, and all's re-knownn.

Oh noble Luria ! What you have decreed

I see not, but no animal revenge,

No brute-like punishment of bad by worse—

It cannot be, the gross and vulgar way

Traced for me by convention and mistake,

Has gained that calm approving eye and
brow !

Spare Florence, after all ! Let Luria trust

To his own soul, he whom I trust with mine !

Luria. In time !

Domizia. How, Luria ?

Luria.

It is midnight now,

And they arrive from Florence with my fate.

Domizia. I hear no step.

Luria. I feel one, as you say.

Enter HUSAIN.

Husain. The man returned from Florence!

Luria. As I knew.

Husain. He seeks thee.

Luria. And I only wait for him.

Aught else?

Husain. A movement of the Lucchese troops
Southward—

Luria. Toward Florence? Have out instantly . . .

Ah, old use clings! Puccio must care hence-
forth.

In—quick—'tis nearly midnight! Bid him
come!

Enter TIBURZIO, BRACCIO, and PUCCIO.

Tiburzio?—not at Pisa?

Tiburzio. I return

From Florence: I serve Pisa, and must think
By such procedure I have served her best.

A people is but the attempt of many

To rise to the completer life of one;

And those who live as models for the mass

Are singly of more value than they all.

Such man are you, and such a time is this,

That your sole fate concerns a nation more

Than much apparent welfare: that to prove

Your rectitude, and duly crown the same,

Imports us far beyond to-day's event,

A battle's loss or gain: man's mass remains,—

Keep but God's model safe, new men will rise

To take its mould, and other days to prove

How great a good was Luria's glory. True—

I might go try my fortune as you urged,

And, joining Lucca, helped by your disgrace,

Repair our harm—so were to-day's work
done;

But where leave Luria for our sons to see?

No, I look farther. I have testified

(Declaring my submission to your arms)

Her full success to Florence, making clear

Your probity, as none else could: I spoke,

And out it shone!

Luria. Ah—until Braccio spoke!

Braccio. Till Braccio told in just a word
the whole—

His lapse to error, his return to knowledge:

Which told . . . Nay, Luria, I should droop
the head,

I whom shame rests with! Yet I dare look up,

Sure of your pardon now I sue for it,

Knowing you wholly. Let the midnight
end!

'Tis morn approaches! Still you answer
not?

Sunshine succeeds the shadow past away;

Our faces, which phantasmal grew and false,

Are all that felt it: they change round you,
turn

Truly themselves now in its vanishing.

Speak, Luria! Here begins your true career:

Look up, advance! All now is possible,

Fact's grandeur, no false dreaming! Dare and do!

And every prophecy shall be fulfilled

Save one—(nay, now your word must come
at last)

—That you would punish Florence!

Husain [pointing to LURIA's dead body].

That is done.

A SOUL'S TRAGEDY.

1846.

ACT FIRST, BEING WHAT WAS CALLED THE POETRY OF CHIAPPINO'S LIFE : AND ACT SECOND, ITS PROSE.

A SOUL'S TRAGEDY.

PERSONS.

LUITOLFO and EULALIA, betrothed lovers.

OGNIBEN, the Pope's Legate.
Citizens of Faenza.

TIME, 15—. PLACE, Faenza.

ACT I.

SCENE.—Inside LUITOLFO'S house.

CHIAPPINO, EULALIA.

Eulalia. What is it keeps Luitolfo?
Night's fast falling,
And 'twas scarce sunset . . . had the ave-bell

Sounded before he sought the Provost's house?
I think not : all he had to say would take
Few minutes, such a very few, to say !
How do you think, Chiappino ? If our lord
The Provost were less friendly to your friend
Than everybody here professes him,
I should begin to tremble—should not you ?
Why are you silent when so many times
I turn and speak to you ?

Chiappino. That's good !

Eulalia. You laugh !

Chiappino. Yes. I had fancied nothing that bears price
In the whole world was left to call my own ;
And, may be, felt a little pride thereat.
Up to a single man's or woman's love,
Down to the right in my own flesh and blood,
There's nothing mine, I fancied,—till you spoke :

VOL. I.

—Counting, you see, as “ nothing ” the permission

To study this peculiar lot of mine
In silence : well, go silence with the rest Of the world's good ! What can I say, shall serve ?

Eulalia. This,—lest you, even more than needs, embitter

Our parting : say your wrongs have cast, for
once,

A cloud across your spirit !

Chiappino. How a cloud ?

Eulalia. No man nor woman loves you, did you say ?

Chiappino. My God, were't not for thee !

Eulalia. Ay, God remains,
Even did men forsake you.

Chiappino. Oh, not so !

Were't not for God, I mean, what hope of
truth—

Speaking truth, hearing truth, would stay with man ?

I, now—the homeless friendless penniless
Proscribed and exiled wretch who speak to
you,—

Ought to speak truth, yet could not, for my
death,

(The thing that tempts me most) help speaking lies

About your friendship and Luitolfo's courage
And all our townsfolk's equanimity—

Through sheer incompetence to rid myself
Of the old miserable lying trick

Caught from the liars I have lived with,—
God,

Did I not turn to thee ! It is thy prompting
I dare to be ashamed of, and thy counsel

Would die along my coward lip, I know.

But I do turn to thee. This craven tongue,
These features which refuse the soul its way,
Reclaim thou! Give me truth—truth, power to speak—

And after be sole present to approve
The spoken truth! Or, stay, that spoken truth,
Who knows but you, too, may approve?

Eulalia. Ah, well—
Keep silence then, Chiappino!

Chiappino. You would hear,
You shall now,—why the thing we please to style

My gratitude to you and all your friends
For service done me, is just gratitude
So much as yours was service: no whit more.
I was born here, so was Luitolfo; both
At one time, much with the same circumstance
Of rank and wealth; and both, up to this
night

Of parting company, have side by side
Still fared, he in the sunshine—I, the shadow.
“Why?” asks the world. “Because,” replies
the world

To its complacent self, “these playfellows,
“Who took at church the holy-water drop
“Each from the other’s finger, and so forth,—
“Were of two moods: Luitolfo was the proper “Friend-making, everywhere friend-finding
soul,

“Fit for the sunshine, so, it followed him.
“A happy-tempered bringer of the best “Out of the worst; who bears with what’s past cure,

“And puts so good a face on’t—wisely passive
“Where action’s fruitless, while he remedies
“In silence what the foolish rail against;
“A man to smoothe such natures as parade
“Of opposition must exasperate;
“No general gauntlet-gatherer for the weak
“Against the strong, yet over-scrupulous
“At lucky junctures: one who won’t forego
“The after-battle work of binding wounds,
“Because, forsooth he’d have to bring himself “To side with wound-inflictors for their leave!”

—Why do you gaze, nor help me to repeat
What comes so glibly from the common mouth,
About Luitolfo and his so-styled friend?

Eulalia. Because that friend’s sense is obscured . . .

Chiappino. I thought
You would be readier with the other half
Of the world’s story, my half! Yet, ’tis true.
For all the world does say it. Say your worst!
True, I thank God, I ever said “you sin,”
When a man did sin: if I could not say it,
I glared it at him; if I could not glare it,
I prayed against him; then my part seemed over.

God’s may begin yet: so it will, I trust.

Eulalia. If the world outraged you, did we?
Chiappino. What’s “me”

That you use well or ill? It’s man, in me,
All your successes are an outrage to,
You all, whom sunshine follows, as you say!
Here’s our Faenza birthplace; they send
here

A provost from Ravenna: how he rules,
You can at times be eloquent about.
“Then, end his rule!”—“Ah yes, one stroke does that!

“But patience under wrong works slow and
sure.

“Must violence still bring peace forth? He,
beside,

“Returns so blandly one’s obeisance! ah—
“Some latent virtue may be lingering yet,

“Some human sympathy which, once excite,
“And all the lump were leavened quietly:

“So, no more talk of striking, for this time!”
But I, as one of those he rules, won’t bear

These pretty takings-up and layings-down
Our cause, just as you think occasion suits.
Enough of earnest, is there? You’ll play,
will you?

Diversify your tactics, give submission,
Obsequiousness and flattery a turn,
While we die in our misery patient deaths?
We all are outraged then, and I the first:
I, for mankind, resent each shrug and smirk
Each beck and bend, each . . . all you do and are,

I hate!

Eulalia. We share a common censure, then.
’Tis well you have not poor Luitolfo’s part
Nor mine to point out in the wide offence.

Chiappino. Oh, shall I let you so escape me, lady?

Come, on your own ground, lady,—from yourself,

(Leaving the people's wrong, which most is mine)

What have I got to be so grateful for?

These three last fines, no doubt, one on the other

Paid by Luitolfo?

Eulalia. Shame, Chiappino!

Chiappino. Shame

I'll presently on who deserves it most!

—Which is to see. He paid my fines—my friend,

Your prosperous smooth lover presently,
Then, scarce your wooer,—soon, your husband: well—

I loved you.

Eulalia. Hold!

Chiappino. You knew it, years ago.

When my voice faltered and my eye grew dim
Because you gave me your silk mask to hold—
My voice that greatens when there's need to curse

The people's Provost to their heart's content,
—My eye, the Provost, who bears all men's eyes,

Banishes now because he cannot bear,—
You knew . . . but you do your parts—my part, I:

So be it! You flourish, I decay: all's well.

Eulalia. I hear this for the first time.

Chiappino. The fault's there?

Then my days spoke not, and my nights of fire
Were voiceless? Then the very heart may burst,

Yet all prove nought, because no mincing speech

Tells leisurely that thus it is and thus?

Eulalia. Truce with toying for this once!

A banished fool, who troubles you to-night
For the last time—why, what's to fear from me?
You knew I loved you!

Eulalia. Not so, on my faith!

You were my now-affianced lover's friend—
Came in, went out with him, could speak as he.

All praise your ready parts and pregnant wit;
See how your words come from you in a crowd!

Luitolfo's first to place you o'er himself

In all that challenges respect and love:

Yet you were silent then, who blame me now.

I say all this by fascination, sure:

I, all but wed to one I love, yet listen!

It must be, you are wronged, and that the wrongs

Luitolfo pities . . .

Chiappino. —You too pity? Do!

But hear first what my wrongs are; so began

This talk and so shall end this talk. I say,

Was't not enough that I must strive (I saw)

To grow so far familiar with your charms

As next contrive some way to win them—
which

To do, an age seemed far too brief—for, see!

We all aspire to heaven; and there lies heaven

Above us: go there! Dare we go? no, surely!

How dare we go without a reverent pause,

A growing less unfit for heaven? Just so,

I dared not speak: the greater fool, it seems!

Was't not enough to struggle with such folly,

But I must have, beside, the very man

Whose slight free loose and incapacious soul

Gave his tongue scope to say what'er he would

—Must have him load me with his benefits

For fortune's fiercest stroke?

Eulalia. Justice to him

That's now entreating, at his risk perhaps,

Justice for you! Did he once call those acts

Of simple friendship—bounties, benefits?

Chiappino. No: the straight course had been to call them thus.

Then, I had flung them back, and kept myself

Unhampered, free as he to win the prize

We both sought. But "the gold was dross,"

he said:

'He loved me, and I loved him not: why spurn

'A trifle out of superfluity?

'He had forgotten he had done as much."

So had not I! Henceforth, try as I could

To take him at his word, there stood by you

My benefactor; who might speak and laugh

And urge his nothings, even banter me

Before you—but my tongue was tied. A dream!

Let's wake: your husband . . . how you shake at that!

Good—my revenge!

Eulalia. Why should I shake?

What forced

Or forces me to be Luitolfo's bride?

Chiappino. There's my revenge, that nothing forces you.

No gratitude, no liking of the eye
Nor longing of the heart, but the poor bond
Of habit—here so many times he came,
So much he spoke,—all these compose the tie
That pulls you from me. Well, he paid my fines,

Nor missed a cloak from wardrobe, dish from table;

He spoke a good word to the Provost here,
Held me up when my fortunes fell away—
—It had not looked so well to let me drop—
Men take pains to preserve a tree-stump, even,
Whose boughs they played beneath—much more a friend.

But one grows tired of seeing, after the first,
Pains spent upon impracticable stuff
Like me. I could not change: you know the rest.

I've spoke my mind too fully out, by chance,
This morning to our Provost; so, ere night
I leave the city on pain of death. And now

On my account there's gallant intercession
Goes forward—that's so graceful!—and anon
He'll noisily come back: "the intercession
"Was made and fails; all's over for us both;
"'Tis vain contending; I would better go."
And I do go—and straight to you he turns
Light of a load; and ease of that permits
His visage to repair the natural bland
Economy, sore broken late to suit
My discontent. Thus, all are pleased—you, with him,

He with himself, and all of you with me—
—"Who," say the citizens, "had done far better
"In letting people sleep upon their woes,
"If not possessed with talent to relieve them

"When once awake;—but then I had," they'll say,
"Doubtless some unknown compensating pride
"In what I did; and as I seem content
"With ruining myself, why, so should they be."

And so they are, and so be with his prize
The devil, when he gets them speedily!
Why does not your Luitolfo come? I long
To don this cloak and take the Lugo path.
It seems you never loved me, then?

Eulalia. Chiappino!

Chiappino. Never?

Eulalia. Never.

Chiappino. That's sad.

Say what I might,
There was no help from being sure this while
You loved me. Love like mine must have return,

I thought: no river starts but to some sea.
And had you loved me, I could soon devise
Some specious reason why you stifled love,
Some fancied self-denial on your part,
Which made you choose Luitolfo; so, excepting

From the wide condemnation of all here,
One woman. Well, the other dream may break!

If I knew any heart, as mine loved you,
Loved me, though in the vilest breast 'twere lodged,

I should, I think, be forced to love again:
Else there's no right nor reason in the world.

Eulalia. "If you knew," say you,—but I did not know.

That's where you're blind, Chiappino!—a disease

Which if I may remove, I'll not repent
The listening to. You cannot, will not, see How, place you but in every circumstance
Of us, you are just now indignant at,
You'd be as we.

Chiappino. I should be? . . . that; again!

I, to my friend, my country and my love,
Be as Luitolfo and these Faentines?

Eulalia. As we.

Chiappino. Now, I'll say something to remember.

I trust in nature for the stable laws
Of beauty and utility.—Spring shall plant,
And Autumn garner to the end of time :
I trust in God—the right shall be the right
And other than the wrong, while he endures :
I trust in my own soul, that can perceive
The outward and the inward, nature's good
And God's : so, seeing these men and myself,

Having a right to speak, thus do I speak.
I'll not curse—God bears with them, well may I—

But I—protest against their claiming me.
I simply say, if that's allowable,
I would not (broadly) do as they have done.
—God curse this townful of born slaves, bred slaves,
Branded into the blood and bone, slaves !
Curse

Whoever loves, above his liberty,
House, land or life ! and . . .

[A knocking without.
—bless my hero-friend,

Luitolfo !

Eulalia. How he knocks !

Chiappino. The peril, lady !

"Chiappino, I have run a risk—a risk !

"For when I prayed the Provost (he's my friend)

"To grant you a week's respite of the sentence

"That confiscates your goods, exiles yourself,

"He shrugged his shoulder—I say, shrugged it ! Yes,

"And fright of that drove all else from my head.

"Here's a good purse of scudi: off with you,

"Lest of that shrug come what God only knows !

"The scudi—friend, they're trash—no thanks,
I beg !

"Take the north gate,—for San Vitale's suburb,

"Whose double taxes you appealed against,

"In discomposure at your ill-success

"Is apt to stone you : there, there—only go !

"Beside, Eulalia here looks sleepily.

"Shake . . . oh, you hurt me, so you squeeze my wrist !"

—Is it not thus you'll speak, adventurous friend ?

[As he opens the door, LUITOLFO rushes in, his garments disordered.

Eulalia. Luitolfo ! Blood ?

Luitolfo.

There's more

—and more of it !

Eulalia—take the garment ! No—you, friend !
You take it and the blood from me—you dare !

Eulalia. Oh, who has hurt you ? where's the wound ?

Chiappino.

"Who," say you ?

The man with many a touch of virtue yet !

The Provost's friend has proved too frank of speech,

And this comes of it. Miserable hound !

This comes of temporizing, as I said !

Here's fruit of your smooth speeches and soft looks !

Now see my way ! As God lives, I go straight
To the palace and do justice, once for all !

Luitolfo. What says he ?

Chiappino.

I'll do justice on him.

Luitolfo.

Him ?

Chiappino. The Provost.

Luitolfo. I've just killed him.

Eulalia.

Oh, my God !

Luitolfo. My friend, they're on my trace ;
they'll have me—now !

They're round him, busy with him : soon they'll find

He's past their help, and then they'll be on me !

Chiappino, save Eulalia ! I forget . . .

Were you not bound for . . .

Chiappino.

Lugo ?

Luitolfo.

Ah—yes—yes !

That was the point I prayed of him to change.

Well, go—be happy ! Is Eulalia safe ?

They're on me !

Chiappino. 'Tis through me they reach you, then !

Friend, see the man you are ! Lock arms
—that's right !

Now tell me what you've done ; explain how
you

That still professed forbearance, still preached
peace,

Could bring yourself . . .

Luitolfo. What was peace for, Chiappino?

I tried peace: did that promise, when peace
failed,

Strife should not follow? All my peaceful days

Were just the prelude to a day like this.

I cried "You call me 'friend': save my true friend!

"Save him, or lose me!"

Chiappino. But you never said
You meant to tell the Provost thus and
thus.

Luitolfo. Why should I say it? What else did I mean?

Chiappino. Well? He persisted?

Luitolfo. —"Would so order it
"You should not trouble him too soon again."

I saw a meaning in his eye and lip;

I poured my heart's store of indignant words
Out on him: then—I know not! He retorted,

And I . . . some staff lay there to hand—I think

He bade his servants thrust me out—I struck . . .

Ah, they come! Fly you, save yourselves, you two!

The dead back-weight of the beheading axe!
The glowing trip-hook, thumbscrews and the gadgets!

Eulalia. They do come! Torches in the Place! Farewell,

Chiappino! You can work no good to us—
Much to yourself; believe not, all the world
Must needs be cursed henceforth!

Chiappino. And you?

Eulalia. I stay.

Chiappino. Ha, ha! Now, listen! I am master here!

This was my coarse disguise; this paper shows
My path of flight and place of refuge—see—
Lugo, Argenta, past San Nicolo,
Ferrara, then to Venice and all's safe!

Put on the cloak! His people have to fetch
A compass round about. There's time enough

Ere they can reach us, so you straightway
make

For Lugo . . . nay, he hears not! On with it—

The cloak, Luitolfo, do you hear me? See—
He obeys he knows not how. Then, if I must—

Answer me! Do you know the Lugo gate?
Eulalia. The north-west gate, over the bridge?

Luitolfo. I know.

Chiappino. Well, there—you are not frightened? all my route

Is traced in that: at Venice you escape

Their power. Eulalia. I am master here!

[Shouts from without. He pushes out LUITOLFO, who complies mechanically.

In time! Nay, help me with him—so!
He's gone.

Eulalia. What have you done? On you, perchance, all know

The Provost's hater, will men's vengeance
fall

As our accomplice.

Chiappino. Mere accomplice? See!
[Putting on LUITOLFO's vest.

Now, lady, am I true to my profession,

Or one of these?

Eulalia. You take Luitolfo's place?

Chiappino. Die for him.

Eulalia. Well done!

[Shouts increase.

Chiappino. How the people tarry!

I can't be silent; I must speak: or sing—

How natural to sing now!

Eulalia. Hush and pray!

We are to die; but even I perceive

'Tis not a very hard thing so to die.

My cousin of the pale-blue tearful eyes,

Poor Cesca, suffers more from one day's life

With the stern husband; Tisbe's heart goes
forth

Each evening after that wild son of hers,
To track his thoughtless footstep through the streets:

How easy for them both to die like this!

I am not sure that I could live as they.

Chiappino. Here they come, crowds!
 They pass the gate? Yes!—No!—
 One torch is in the courtyard. Here flock all.
Eulalia. At least Luitolfo has escaped.
 What cries!
Chiappino. If they would drag one to the market-place,
 One might speak there!
Eulalia. List, list!
Chiappino. They mount the steps.

Enter the Populace.

Chiappino. I killed the Provost!
The Populace [speaking together]. 'Twas
 Chiappino, friends!
 Our saviour! The best man at last as first!
 He who first made us feel what chains we
 wore,
 He also strikes the blow that shatters them,
 He at last saves us—our best citizen!
 —Oh, have you only courage to speak now?
 My eldest son was christened a year since
 "Cino" to keep Chiappino's name in mind—
 Cino, for shortness merely, you observe!
 The city's in our hands. The guards are fled.
 Do you, the cause of all, come down—come
 up—
 Come out to counsel us, our chief, our king, Whate'er rewards you! Choose your own reward!
 The peril over, its reward begins!
 Come and harangue us in the market-place!
Eulalia. Chiappino?
Chiappino. Yes—I understand your
 eyes!
 You think I should have promptly disowned
 This deed with its strange unforeseen success,
 In favour of Luitolfo. But the peril,
 So far from ended, hardly seems begun.
 To-morrow, rather, when a calm succeeds,
 We easily shall make him full amends:
 And meantime—if we save them as they pray,
 And justify the deed by its effects?
Eulalia. You would, for worlds, you had denied at once.
Chiappino. I know my own intention, be assured!
 All's well. Precede us, fellow-citizens!

ACT II.

SCENE.—The Market-place. LUITOLFO in disguise mingling with the Populace assembled opposite the Provost's Palace.

1st Bystander [to LUITOLFO]. You, a friend of Luitolfo's? Then, your friend is vanished, —in all probability killed on the night that his patron the tyrannical Provost was loyally suppressed here, exactly a month ago, by our illustrious fellow-citizen, thrice-noble saviour, and new Provost that is like to be, this very morning,—Chiappino!

Luitolfo. He the new Provost?

2nd Bystander. Up those steps will he go, and beneath yonder pillar stand, while Ogniben, the Pope's Legate from Ravenna, reads the new dignitary's title to the people, according to established custom: for which reason, there is the assemblage you inquire
 about.

Luitolfo. Chiappino—the late Provost's successor? Impossible! But tell me of that presently. What I would know first of all is; wherefore Luitolfo must so necessarily have been killed on that memorable night?

3rd Bystander. You were Luitolfo's friend?
 So was I. Never, if you will credit me, did there exist so poor-spirited a milksop. He, with all the opportunities in the world, furnished by daily converse with our oppressor, would not stir a finger to help us: and, when Chiappino rose in solitary majesty and . .
 how does one go on saying? . . . dealt the godlike blow,—this Luitolfo, not unreasonably fearing the indignation of an aroused and liberated people, fled precipitately. He may have got trodden to death in the press at the south-east gate, when the Provost's guards fled through it to Ravenna, with their wounded master,—if he did not rather hang himself under some hedge.

Luitolfo. Or why not simply have lain perdue in some quiet corner,—such as San Cassiano, where his estate was,—receiving daily intelligence from some sure friend,

meanwhile, as to the turn matters were taking here—how, for instance, the Provost was not dead, after all, only wounded—or, as to-day's news would seem to prove, how Chiappino was not Brutus the Elder, after all, only the new Provost—and thus Luitolfo be enabled to watch a favourable opportunity for returning? Might it not have been so?

3rd Bystander. Why, he may have taken that care of himself, certainly, for he came of a cautious stock. I'll tell you how his uncle, just such another gingerly treader on tiptoes with finger on lip,—how he met his death in the great plague-year: dico vobis! Hearing that the seventeenth house in a certain street was infected, he calculates to pass it in safety by taking plentiful breath, say, when he shall arrive at the eleventh house; then scouring by, holding that breath, till he be got so far on the other side as number twenty-three, and thus elude the danger.—And so did he begin; but, as he arrived at thirteen, we will say,—thinking to improve on his precaution by putting up a little prayer to St. Nepomucene¹ of Prague, this exhausted so much of his lungs' reserve, that at sixteen it was clean spent,—consequently at the fatal seventeen he inhaled with a vigour and persistence enough to suck you any latent venom out of the heart of a stone—Ha, ha!

Luitolfo [aside]. (If I had not lent that man the money he wanted last spring, I should fear this bitterness was attributable to me.) Luitolfo is dead then, one may conclude?

3rd Bystander. Why, he had a house here, and a woman to whom he was affianced; and as they both pass naturally to the new Provost, his friend and heir . . .

Luitolfo. Ah, I suspected you of imposing on me with your pleasantry! I know Chiappino better.

1st Bystander. (Our friend has the bile! After all, I do not dislike finding somebody vary a little this general gape of admiration at Chiappino's glorious qualities.) Pray, how much may you know of what has taken place in Faenza since that memorable night?

Luitolfo. It is most to the purpose, that I know Chiappino to have been by profession a hater of that very office of Provost, you now charge him with proposing to accept.

1st Bystander. Sir, I'll tell you. That night was indeed memorable. Up we rose, a mass of us, men, women, children; out fled the guards with the body of the tyrant; we were to defy the world: but, next grey morning, "What will Rome say?" began everybody. You know we are governed by Ravenna, which is governed by Rome. And quietly into the town, by the Ravenna road, comes on muleback a portly personage, Ogniben by name, with the quality of Pontifical Legate; trots briskly through the streets humming a "Cur fremuere gentes," and makes directly for the Provost's Palace—there it faces you. "One Messer Chiappino is your leader? I have known three-and-twenty leaders of revolts!" (laughing gently to himself)—"Give me the help of your arm from my mule to yonder steps under the pillar—So! And now, my revolvers and good friends, what do you want? The guards burst into Ravenna last night bearing your wounded Provost; and, having had a little talk with him, I take on myself to come and try appease the disorderliness, before Rome, hearing of it, resort to another method: 'tis I come, and not another, from a certain love I confess to, of composing differences. So, do you understand, you are about to experience this unheard-of tyranny from me, that there shall be no heading nor hanging, no confiscation nor exile: I insist on your simply pleasing yourselves. And now, pray, what does please you? To live without any government at all? Or having decided for one, to see its minister murdered by the first of your body that chooses to find himself wronged, or disposed for reverting to first principles and a justice anterior to all institutions,—and so will you carry matters, that the rest of the world must at length unite and put down such a den of wild beasts? As for vengeance on what has just taken place,—once for all, the wounded man assures me he cannot conjecture who struck him; and this so earnestly, that one may be sure he knows perfectly well what intimate acquaintance could find admission to speak with him late last evening. I come not for vengeance therefore, but from pure curiosity to hear what you will do next.” And thus he ran on, on, easily and volubly, till he seemed to arrive quite naturally at the praise of law, order, and paternal government by somebody from rather a distance. All our citizens were in the snare, and about to be friends with so congenial an adviser; but that Chiappino suddenly stood forth, spoke out indignantly, and set things right again.

Luitolfo. Do you see? I recognize him there!

3rd Bystander. Ay but, mark you, at the end of Chiappino's longest period in praise of a pure republic,—“And by whom do I desire such a government should be administered, perhaps, but by one like yourself?”—returns the Legate: thereupon speaking for a quarter of an hour together, on the natural and only legitimate government by the best and wisest. And it should seem there was soon discovered to be no such vast discrepancy at bottom between this and Chiappino's theory, place but each in its proper light. “Oh, are you there?” quoth Chiappino: “Ay, in that, I agree,” returns Chiappino: and so on.

Luitolfo. But did Chiappino cede at once to this?

1st Bystander. Why, not altogether at once. For instance, he said that the difference between him and all his fellows was, that they seemed all wishing to be kings in one or another way,—“whereas what right,” asked he, “has any man to wish to be superior to another?”—whereat, “Ah, sir,” answers the Legate, “this is the death of me, so often as I expect something is really going to be revealed to us by you clearer-seers, deeper-thinkers—this—that your right-hand (to speak by a figure) should be found taking up the weapon it displayed so ostentatiously, not to destroy any dragon in our path, as was prophesied, but simply to cut off its own fellow left-hand: yourself set about attacking yourself. For see now! Here are you who, I make sure, glory exceedingly in knowing the noble nature of the soul, its divine impulses, and so forth; and with such a knowledge you stand, as it were, armed to encounter the natural doubts and fears as to that same inherent nobility, which are apt to waylay us, the weaker ones, in the road of life. And when we look eagerly to see them fall before you, lo, round you wheel, only the left-hand gets the blow; one proof of the soul's nobility destroys simply another proof, quite as good, of the same, for you are found delivering an opinion like this! Why, what is this perpetual yearning to exceed, to subdue, to be better than, and a king over, one's fellows,—all that you so disclaim,—but the very tendency yourself are most proud of, and under another form, would oppose to it,—only in a lower stage of manifestation? You don't want to be vulgarly superior to your fellows after their poor fashion—to have me hold solemnly up your gown's tail, or hand you an express of the last importance from the Pope, with all these bystanders noticing how unconcerned you look the while: but neither does our gaping friend, the burgess yonder, want the other kind of kingship, that consists in understanding better than his fellows this and similar points of human nature, nor to roll under his tongue this sweeter morsel still,—the feeling that, through immense philosophy, he does not feel, he rather thinks, above you and me!” And so chatting, they glided off arm-in-arm.

Luitolfo. And the result is . . .

1st Bystander. Why that, a month having gone by, the indomitable Chiappino, marrying as he will Luitolfo's love—at all events succeeding to Luitolfo's wealth—becomes the first inhabitant of Faenza, and a proper aspirant to the Provostship; which we assemble here to see conferred on him this morning. The Legate's Guard to clear the way! He will follow presently.

Luitolfo [withdrawing a little]. I understand the drift of Eulalia's communications less than ever. Yet she surely said, in so many words, that Chiappino was in urgent danger: wherefore, disregarding her injunction to continue in my retreat and await the result of—what she called, some experiment yet in process—I hastened here without her leave or knowledge: how could I else? But if this they say be true—if it were for such a purpose, she and Chiappino kept me away . . . Oh, no, no! I must confront him and her before I believe this of them. And at the word, see!

Enter CHIAPPINO and EULALIA.

Eulalia. We part here, then? The change in your principles would seem to be complete.

Chiappino. Now, why refuse to see that in my present course I change no principles, only re-adapt them and more adroitly? I had despaired of, what you may call the material instrumentality of life; of ever being able to rightly operate on mankind through such a deranged machinery as the existing modes of government: but now, if I suddenly discover how to inform these perverted institutions with fresh purpose, bring the functionary limbs once more into immediate communication with, and subjection to, the soul I am about to bestow on them—do you see? Why should one desire to invent, as long as it remains possible to renew and transform? When all further hope of the old organization shall be extinct, then, I grant you, it may be time to try and create another.

Eulalia. And there being discoverable some hope yet in the hitherto much-abused old system of absolute government by a Provost here, you mean to take your time about endeavouring to realize those visions of a perfect State, we once heard of?

Chiappino. Say, I would fain realize my conception of a palace, for instance, and that there is, abstractedly, but a single way of erecting one perfectly. Here, in the marketplace is my allotted building-ground; here I stand without a stone to lay, or a labourer to help me,—stand, too, during a short day of life, close on which the night comes. On the other hand, circumstances suddenly offer me (turn and see it!) the old Provost's house to experiment upon—ruinous, if you please, wrongly constructed at the beginning, and ready to tumble now. But materials abound, a crowd of workmen offer their services; here, exists yet a Hall of Audience of originally noble proportions, there a Guest-chamber of symmetrical design enough: and I may restore, enlarge, abolish or unite these to heart's content. Ought I not make the best of such an opportunity, rather than continue to gaze disconsolately with folded arms on the flat pavement here, while the sun goes slowly down, never to rise again? Since you cannot understand this nor me, it is better we should part as you desire.

Eulalia. So, the love breaks away too!

Chiappino. No, rather my soul's capacity for love widens—needs more than one object to content it,—and, being better instructed, will not persist in seeing all the component parts of love in what is only a single part,—nor in finding that so many and so various loves are all united in the love of a woman,—manifold uses in one instrument, as the savage has his sword, staff, sceptre and idol, all in one club-stick. Love is a very compound thing. The intellectual part of my love I shall give to men, the mighty dead or the illustrious living; and determine to call a mere sensual instinct by as few fine names as possible. What do I lose?

Eulalia. Nay, I only think, what do I lose? and, one more word—which shall complete my instruction—does friendship go too? What of Luitolfo, the author of your present prosperity?

Chiappino. How the author?

Eulalia. That blow now called yours . . .

Chiappino. Struck without principle or purpose, as by a blind natural operation: yet to which all my thought and life directly and advisedly tended. I would have struck it, and could not: he would have done his utmost to avoid striking it, yet did so. I dispute his right to that deed of mine—a final action with him, from the first effect of which he fled away,—a mere first step with me, on which I base a whole mighty superstructure of good to follow. Could he get good from it?

Eulalia. So we profess, so we perform!

Enter OGNIBEN. EULALIA stands apart.

Ogniben. I have seen three-and-twenty leaders of revolts. By your leave, sir! Perform? What does the lady say of performing?

Chiappino. Only the trite saying, that we must not trust profession, only performance.

Ogniben. She'll not say that, sir, when she knows you longer; you'll instruct her better. Ever judge of men by their professions! For though the bright moment of promising is but a moment and cannot be prolonged, yet, if sincere in its moment's extravagant goodness, why, trust it and know the man by it, I say—not by his performance; which is half the world's work, interfere as the world needs must, with its accidents and circumstances: the profession was purely the man's own. I judge people by what they might be,—not are, nor will be.

Chiappino. But have there not been found, too, performing natures, not merely promising?

Ogniben. Plenty. Little Bindo of our town, for instance, promised his friend, great ugly Masaccio, once, "I will repay you!"—for a favour done him. So, when his father came to die, and Bindo succeeded to the inheritance, he sends straightway for Masaccio and shares all with him—gives him half the land, half the money, half the kegs of wine in the cellar. "Good," say you: and it is good. But had little Bindo found himself possessor of all this wealth some five years before—on the happy night when Masaccio procured him that interview in the garden with his pretty cousin Lisa—instead of being the beggar he then was,—I am bound to believe that in the warm moment of promise he would have given away all the wine-kegs and all the money and all the land, and only reserved to himself some hut on a hill-top hard by, whence he might spend his life in looking and seeing his friend enjoy himself: he meant fully that much, but the world interfered.—To our business! Did I understand you just now within-doors? You are not going to marry your old friend's love, after all?

Chiappino. I must have a woman that can sympathize with, and appreciate me, I told you.

Ogniben. Oh, I remember! you, the greater nature, needs must have a lesser one (—avowedly lesser—contest with you on that score would never do)—such a nature must comprehend you, as the phrase is, accompany and testify of your greatness from point to point onward. Why, that were being not merely as great as yourself, but greater considerably! Meantime, might not the more bounded nature as reasonably count on your appreciation of it, rather?—on your keeping close by it, so far as you both go together, and then going on by yourself as far as you please? Thus God serves us.

Chiappino. And yet a woman that could understand the whole of me, to whom I could reveal alike the strength and the weakness—

Ogniben. Ah, my friend, wish for nothing so foolish! Worship your love, give her the best of you to see; be to her like the western lands (they bring us such strange news of, to the Spanish Court; send her only your lumps of gold, fans of feathers, your spirit-like birds, and fruits and gems! So shall you, what is unseen of you, be supposed altogether a paradise by her,—as these western lands by Spain: though I warrant there is filth, red baboons, ugly reptiles and squalor enough, which they bring Spain as few samples of as possible. Do you want your mistress to respect your body generally? Offer her your mouth to kiss: don't strip off your boot and put your foot to her lips! You understand my humour by this time? I help men to carry out their own principles: if they please to say two and two make five, I assent, so they will but go on and say, four and four make ten.

Chiappino. But these are my private affairs; what I desire you to occupy yourself about, is my public appearance presently: for when the people hear that I am appointed Provost, though you and I may thoroughly discern—and easily, too—the right principle at bottom of such a movement, and how my republicanism remains thoroughly unaltered, only takes a form of expression hitherto commonly judged (and heretofore by myself) incompatible with its existence,—when thus I reconcile myself to an old form of government instead of proposing a new one . . .

Ogniben. Why, you must deal with people broadly. Begin at a distance from this matter and say,—New truths, old truths! sirs, there is nothing new possible to be revealed to us in the moral world; we know all we shall ever know: and it is for simply reminding us, by their various respective expedients, how we do know this and the other matter, that men get called prophets, poets and the like. A philosopher's life is spent in discovering that, of the half-dozen truths he knew when a child, such an one is a lie, as the world states it in set terms; and then, after a weary lapse of years, and plenty of hard-thinking, it becomes a truth again after all, as he happens to newly consider it and view it in a different relation with the others: and so he restates it, to the confusion of somebody else in good time. As for adding to the original stock of truths,—impossible! Thus, you see the expression of them is the grand business:—you have got a truth in your head about the right way of governing people, and you took a mode of expressing it which now you confess to be imperfect. But what then? There is truth in falsehood, falsehood in truth. No man ever told one great truth, that I know, without the help of a good dozen of lies at least, generally unconscious ones. And as when a child comes in breathlessly and relates a strange story, you try to conjecture from the very falsities in it, what the reality was,—do not conclude that he saw nothing in the sky, because he assuredly did not see a flying horse there as he says,—so, through the contradictory expression, do you see, men should look painfully for, and trust to arrive eventually at, what you call the true principle at bottom. Ah, what an answer is there! to what will it not prove applicable?—"Contradictions? Of course there were," say you!

Chiappino. Still, the world at large may call it inconsistency, and what shall I urge in reply?

Ogniben. Why, look you, when they tax you with tergiversation or duplicity, you may answer—you begin to perceive that, when all's done and said, both great parties in the State, the advocates of change in the present system of things, and the opponents of it, patriot and anti-patriot, are found working together for the common good; and that in the midst of their efforts for and against its progress, the world somehow or other still advances: to which result they contribute in equal proportions, those who spend their life in pushing it onward, as those who give theirs to the business of pulling it back. Now, if you found the world stand still between the opposite forces, and were glad, I should conceive you: but it steadily advances, you rejoice to see! By the side of such a rejoicer, the man who only winks as he keeps cunning and quiet, and says, "Let yonder hot-headed fellow fight out my battle! I, for one, shall win in the end by the blows he gives, and which I ought to be giving"—even he seems graceful in his avowal, when one considers that he might say, "I shall win quite as much by the blows our antagonist gives him, blows from which he saves me—I thank the antagonist equally!" Moreover, you may enlarge on the loss of the edge of party-animosity with age and experience . . .

Chiappino. And naturally time must wear off such asperities: the bitterest adversaries get to discover certain points of similarity between each other, common sympathies—do they not?

Ogniben. Ay, had the young David but sat first to dine on his cheeses with the Philistine, he had soon discovered an abundance of such common sympathies. He of Gath, it is recorded, was born of a father and mother, had brothers and sisters like another man,—they, no more than the sons of Jesse, were used to eat each other. But, for the sake of one broad antipathy that had existed from the beginning, David slung the stone, cut off the giant's head, made a spoil of it, and after ate his cheeses alone, with the better appetite, for all I can learn. My friend, as you, with a quickened eye-sight, go on discovering much good on the worse side, remember that the same process should proportionably magnify and demonstrate to you the much more good on the better side! And when I profess no sympathy for the Goliaths of our time, and you object that a large nature should sympathize with every form of intelligence, and see the good in it, however limited—I answer, “So I do; but preserve the proportions of my sympathy, however finelier or widelier I may extend its action.” I desire to be able, with a quickened eye-sight, to descry beauty in corruption where others see foulness only: but I hope I shall also continue to see a redoubled beauty in the higher forms of matter, where already everybody sees no foulness at all. I must retain, too, my old power of selection, and choice of appropriation, to apply to such new gifts; else they only dazzle instead of enlightening me. God has his archangels and consorts with them: though he made too, and intimately sees what is good in, the worm. Observe, I speak only as you profess to think and, so, ought to speak: I do justice to your own principles, that is all.

Chiappino. But you very well know that the two parties do, on occasion, assume each other's characteristics. What more disgusting, for instance, than to see how promptly the newly emancipated slave will adopt, in his own favour, the very measures of precaution, which pressed soreliest on himself as institutions of the tyranny he has just escaped from? Do the classes, hitherto without opinion, get leave to express it? there follows a confederacy immediately, from which—exercise your individual right and dissent, and woe be to you!

Ogniben. And a journey over the sea to you! That is the generous way. Cry—“Emancipated slaves, the first excess, and off I go!” The first time a poor devil, who has been bastinadoed steadily his whole life long, finds himself let alone and able to legislate, so, begins pettishly, while he rubs his soles, “Woe be to whoever brings anything in the shape of a stick this way!”—you, rather than give up the very innocent pleasure of carrying one to switch flies with,—you go away, to everybody's sorrow. Yet you were quite reconciled to staying at home while the governors used to pass, every now and then, some such edict as “Let no man indulge in owning a stick which is not thick enough to chastise our slaves, if need require!” Well, there are pre-ordained hierarchies among us, and a profane vulgar subjected to a different law altogether; yet I am rather sorry you should see it so clearly: for, do you know what is to—all but save you at the Day of Judgment, all you men of genius? It is this: that, while you generally began by pulling down God, and went on to the end of your life, in one effort at setting up your own genius in his place,—still, the last, bitterest concession wrung with the utmost unwillingness from the experience of the very loftiest of you, was invariably—would one think it?—that the rest of mankind, down to the lowest of the mass, stood not, nor ever could stand, just on a level and equality with yourselves. That will be a point in the favour of all such, I hope and believe.

Chiappino. Why, men of genius are usually charged, I think, with doing just the reverse; and at once acknowledging the natural inequality of mankind, by themselves participating in the universal craving after, and deference to, the civil distinctions which represent it. You wonder they pay such undue respect to titles and badges of superior rank.

Ogniben. Not I (always on your own ground and showing, be it noted!) Who doubts that, with a weapon to brandish, a man is the more formidable? Titles and badges are exercised as such a weapon, to which you and I look up wistfully. We could pin lions with it moreover, while in its present owner's hands it hardly prods rats. Nay, better than a mere weapon of easy mastery and obvious use, it is a mysterious divining rod that may serve us in undreamed-of ways. Beauty, strength, intellect—men often have none of these, and yet conceive pretty accurately what kind of advantages they would bestow on the possessor. We know at least what it is we make up our mind to forego, and so can apply the fittest substitute in our power. Wanting beauty, we cultivate good humour; missing wit, we get riches: but the mystic unimaginable operation of that gold collar and string of Latin names which suddenly turned poor stupid little peevish Cecco of our town into natural lord of the best of us—a Duke, he is now—there indeed is a virtue to be revered!

Chiappino. Ay, by the vulgar: not by Messere Stiatta the poet, who pays more assiduous court to him than anybody.

Ogniben. What else should Stiatta pay court to? He has talent, not honour and riches: men naturally covet what they have not.

Chiappino. No, or Cecco would covet talent, which he has not, whereas he covets more riches, of which he has plenty, already.

Ogniben. Because a purse added to a purse makes the holder twice as rich: but just such another talent as Stiatta's, added to what he now possesses, what would that profit him? Give the talent a purse indeed, to do something with! But lo, how we keep the good people waiting! I only desired to do justice to the noble sentiments which animate you, and which you are too modest to duly enforce.

Come, to our main business: shall we ascend the steps? I am going to propose you for Provost to the people; they know your antecedents, and will accept you with a joyful unanimity: whereon I confirm their choice. Rouse up! Are you nerving yourself to an effort? Beware the disaster of Messere Stiatta we were talking of! who, determining to keep an equal mind and constant face on whatever might be the fortune of his last new poem with our townsmen, heard too plainly "hiss, hiss, hiss," increase every moment. Till at last the man fell senseless: not perceiving that the portentous sounds had all the while been issuing from between his own nobly clenched teeth, and nostrils narrowed by resolve.

Chiappino. Do you begin to throw off the mask?—to jest with me, having got me effectually into your trap?

Ogniben. Where is the trap, my friend? You hear what I engage to do, for my part: you, for yours, have only to fulfil your promise made just now within doors, of professing unlimited obedience to Rome's authority in my person. And I shall authorize no more than the simple re-establishment of the Provostship and the conferment of its privileges upon yourself: the only novel stipulation being a birth of the peculiar circumstances of the time.

Chiappino. And that stipulation?

Ogniben. Just the obvious one—that in the event of the discovery of the actual assailant of the late Provost . . .

Chiappino. Ha!

Ogniben. Why, he shall suffer the proper penalty, of course; what did you expect?

Chiappino. Who heard of this?

Ogniben. Rather, who needed to hear of this?

Chiappino. Can it be, the popular rumour never reached you . . .

Ogniben. Many more such rumours reach me, friend, than I choose to receive; those which wait longest have best chance. Has the present one sufficiently waited? Now is its time for entry with effect. See the good people crowding about yonder palace-steps—which we may not have to ascend, after all. My good friends ! (nay, two or three of you will answer every purpose)—who was it fell upon and proved nearly the death of your late Provost ? His successor desires to hear, that his day of inauguration may be graced by the act of prompt bare justice we all anticipate. Who dealt the blow that night, does anybody know ?

Luitolfo [coming forward]. I !

All. Luitolfo !

Luitolfo. I avow the deed, justify and approve it, and stand forth now, to relieve my friend of an unearned responsibility. Having taken thought, I am grown stronger : I shall shrink from nothing that awaits me. Nay, Chiappino—we are friends still : I dare say there is some proof of your superior nature in this starting aside, strange as it seemed at first. So, they tell me, my horse is of the right stock, because a shadow in the path frightens him into a frenzy, makes him dash my brains out. I understand only the dull mule's way of standing stockishly, plodding soberly, suffering on occasion a blow or two with due patience.

Eulalia. I was determined to justify my choice, Chiappino,—to let Luitolfo's nature vindicate itself. Henceforth we are undivided, whatever be our fortune.

Ogniben. Now, in these last ten minutes of silence, what have I been doing, deem you ? Putting the finishing stroke to a homily of mine, I have long taken thought to perfect, on the text, "Let whoso thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall." To your house, Luitolfo ! Still silent, my patriotic friend ? Well, that is a good sign however. And you will go aside for a time ? That is better still.

I understand : it would be easy for you to die of remorse here on the spot and shock us all ; but you mean to live and grow worthy of coming back to us one day. There, I will tell everybody ; and you only do right to believe you must get better as you get older. All men do so : they are worst in childhood, improve in manhood, and get ready in old age for another world. Youth, with its beauty and grace, would seem bestowed on us for some such reason as to make us partly endurable till we have time for really becoming so of ourselves, without their aid ; when they leave us. The sweetest child we all smile on for his pleasant want of the whole world to break up, or suck in his mouth, seeing no other good in it—would be rudely handled by that world's inhabitants, if he retained those angelic infantine desires when he had grown six feet high, black and bearded. But, little by little, he sees fit to forego claim after claim on the world, puts up with a less and less share of its good as his proper portion ; and when the octogenarian asks barely a sup of gruel and a fire of dry sticks, and thanks you as for his full allowance and right in the common good of life,—hoping nobody may murder him,—he who began by asking and expecting the whole of us to bow down in worship to him,—why, I say he is advanced, far onward, very far, nearly out of sight like our friend Chiappino yonder. And now—(ay, good-bye to you ! He turns round the north-west gate : going to Lugo again ? Good-bye !)—and now give thanks to God, the keys of the Provost's palace to me, and yourselves to profitable meditation at home ! I have known Four-and-twenty leaders of revolts.

CHRISTMAS-EVE AND EASTER-DAY.

1850.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

I.

OUT of the little chapel I burst
Into the fresh night-air again.
Five minutes full, I waited first
In the doorway, to escape the rain
That drove in gusts down the common's
centre

At the edge of which the chapel stands,
Before I plucked up heart to enter.

Heaven knows how many sorts of hands
Reached past me, groping for the latch
Of the inner door that hung on catch
More obstinate the more they fumbled,

Till, giving way at last with a scold
Of the crazy hinge, in squeezed or tumbled

One sheep more to the rest in fold,
And left me irresolute, standing sentry
In the sheepfold's lath-and-plaster entry,
Six feet long by three feet wide,
Partitioned off from the vast inside—

I blocked up half of it at least.
No remedy; the rain kept driving.

They eyed me much as some wild beast,
That congregation, still arriving,
Some of them by the main road, white
A long way past me into the night,
Skirting the common, then diverging;
Not a few suddenly emerging
From the common's self thro' the palinggaps,

—They house in the gravel-pits perhaps,
Where the road stops short with its safeguard border

Of lamps, as tired of such disorder;—
But the most turned in yet more abruptly

From a certain squalid knot of alleys,
Where the town's bad blood once slept corruptly,

Which now the little chapel rallies

And leads into day again,—its priestliness
Lending itself to hide their beastliness
So cleverly (thanks in part to the mason),
And putting so cheery a whitewashed face on Those neophytes too much in lack of it,

That, where you cross the common as I
did,

And meet the party thus presided,
Mount Zion" with Love-lane at the back
of it,

They front you as little disconcerted
As, bound for the hills, her fate averted,
And her wicked people made to mind him,
Lot might have marched with Gomorrah behind him.

II.

Well, from the road, the lanes or the common,

In came the flock: the fat weary woman,
Panting and bewildered, down-clapping
Her umbrella with a mighty report,
Grounded it by me, wry and flapping,

A wreck of whalebones; then, with a snort,

Like a startled horse, at the interloper
(Who humbly knew himself improper,
But could not shrink up small enough)
—Round to the door, and in,—the gruff
Hinge's invariable scold
Making my very blood run cold.

Prompt in the wake of her, up-pattered
On broken clogs, the many-tattered
Little old-faced peaking sister-turned-mother
Of the sickly babe she tried to smother
Somehow up, with its spotted face,
From the cold, on her breast, the one warm
place;

She too must stop, wring the poor ends dry
Of a draggled shawl, and add thereby
Her tribute to the door-mat, sopping
Already from my own clothes' dropping,

Which yet she seemed to grudge I should stand on :

Then, stooping down to take off her pattens,

She bore them defiantly, in each hand one,
Planted together before her breast

And its babe, as good as a lance in rest.

Close on her heels, the dingy satins
Of a female something, past me flitted,

With lips as much too white, as a streak

Lay far too red on each hollow cheek ;

And it seemed the very door-hinge pitied

All that was left of a woman once,

Holding at least its tongue for the nonce.

Then a tall yellow man, like the Penitent Thief,

With his jaw bound up in a handkerchief,
And eyelids screwed together tight,

Led himself in by some inner light.

And, except from him, from each that entered,

I got the same interrogation—

"What, you the alien, you have ventured

"To take with us, the elect, your station ?

"A carer for none of it, a Gallio !"—

Thus, plain as print, I read the glance

At a common prey, in each countenance

As of huntsman giving his hounds the tallyho.

And, when the door's cry drowned their wonder,

The draught, it always sent in shutting,

Made the flame of the single tallow candle

In the cracked square lantern I stood under,

Shoot its blue lip at me, rebutting

As it were, the luckless cause of scandal :

I verily fancied the zealous light

(In the chapel's secret, too !) for spite

Would shudder itself clean off the wick,

With the airs of a Saint John's Candlestick.¹

There was no standing it much longer.

"Good folks," thought I, as resolve grew stronger,

"This way you perform the Grand-Inquisitor

"When the weather sends you a chance visitor ?

"You are the men, and wisdom shall die with you,

"And none of the old Seven Churches vie with you !

"But still, despite the pretty perfection

"To which you carry your trick of exclusiveness,

"And, taking God's word under wise protection,

"Correct its tendency to diffusiveness,

"And bid one reach it over hot ploughshares,—

"Still, as I say, though you've found salvation,

"If I should choose to cry, as now, 'Shares !'—

"See if the best of you bars me my ration !

"I prefer, if you please, for my expounder

"Of the laws of the feast, the feast's own Founder ;

"Mine's the same right with your poorest and sickliest

"Supposing I don the marriage vestiment:

"So, shut your mouth and open your Testament,

"And carve me my portion at your quickest !"

Accordingly, as a shoemaker's lad

With wizened face in want of soap,

And wet apron wound round his waist like a rope,

(After stopping outside, for his cough was bad,

To get the fit over, poor gentle creature,

And so avoid disturbing the preacher)

—Passed in, I sent my elbow spikewise

At the shutting door, and entered likewise,

Received the hinge's accustomed greeting,

And crossed the threshold's magic pentacle,

And found myself in full convective,

—To wit, in Zion Chapel Meeting,

On the Christmas-Eve of 'Forty-nine,

Which, calling its flock to their special clover,

Found all assembled and one sheep over,
Whose lot, as the weather pleased, was mine.

III.

I very soon had enough of it.

The hot smell and the human noises,
And my neighbour's coat, the greasy cuff of it,
Were a pebble-stone that a child's hand
poises,

Compared with the pig-of-lead-like pressure
Of the preaching man's immense stupidity,
As he poured his doctrine forth, full measure,
To meet his audience's avidity.

You needed not the wit of the Sibyl

To guess the cause of it all, in a twinkling:

No sooner our friend had got an inkling
Of treasure hid in the Holy Bible,
(Whene'er 'twas the thought first struck him,
How death, at unawares, might duck him
Deeper than the grave, and quench
The gin-shop's light in hell's grim drench)
Than he handled it so, in fine irreverence,

As to hug the book of books to pieces :
And, a patchwork of chapters and texts in severance,

Not improved by the private dog's-ears
and creases,
Having clothed his own soul with, he'd fain
see equipt yours,—

So tossed you again your Holy Scriptures.

And you picked them up, in a sense, no
doubt :

Nay, had but a single face of my neighbours
Appeared to suspect that the preacher's labours

Were help which the world could be saved
without,

'Tis odds but I might have borne in quiet

A qualm or two at my spiritual diet,

Or (who can tell ?) perchance even mustered

Somewhat to urge in behalf of the sermon :

But the flock sat on, divinely flustered,

Sniffing, methought, its dew of Hermon

With such content in every snuffle,

As the devil inside us loves to ruffle.

My old fat woman purred with pleasure,

And thumb round thumb went twirling
faster,

While she, to his periods keeping measure,

Maternally devoured the pastor.

The man with the handkerchief untied it,
Showed us a horrible wen inside it,
Gave his eyelids yet another screwing,
And rocked himself as the woman was doing.
The shoemaker's lad, discreetly choking,
Kept down his cough. 'Twas too provoking !
My gorge rose at the nonsense and stuff of it ;

So, saying like Eve when she plucked the apple,

"I wanted a taste, and now there's enough
of it,"

I flung out of the little chapel.

IV.

There was a lull in the rain, a lull

In the wind too ; the moon was risen,
And would have shone out pure and full,

But for the ramparted cloud-prison,
Block on block built up in the West,

For what purpose the wind knows best,

Who changes his mind continually.

And the empty other half of the sky

Seemed in its silence as if it knew

What, any moment, might look through

A chance gap in that fortress massy :—

Through its fissures you got hints

Of the flying moon, by the shifting tints,

Now, a dull lion-colour, now, brassy

Burning to yellow, and whitest yellow,

Like furnace-smoke just ere flames bellow,

All a-simmer with intense strain

To let her through,—then blank again,

At the hope of her appearance failing.

Just by the chapel, a break in the railing

Shows a narrow path directly across ;

'Tis ever dry walking there, on the moss—

Besides, you go gently all the way uphill.

I stooped under and soon felt better ;

My head grew lighter, my limbs more supple,

As I walked on, glad to have slipped the fetter.

My mind was full of the scene I had left,

That placid flock, that pastor vociferant,

—How this outside was pure and different !

The sermon, now—what a mingled west

Of good and ill ! Were either less,

Its fellow had coloured the whole distinctly ;

But alas for the excellent earnestness,
And the truths, quite true if stated succinctly,
But as surely false, in their quaint presentment,
However to pastor and flock's contentment !
Say rather, such truths looked false to your eyes,
With his provings and parallels twisted and twined,

Till how could you know them, grown double their size

In the natural fog of the good man's mind,
Like yonder spots of our roadside lamps,
Haloed about with the common's damps ?
Truth remains true, the fault's in the prover ;
The zeal was good, and the aspiration ;
And yet, and yet, yet, fifty times over,
Pharaoh received no demonstration,
By his Baker's dream of Baskets Three,
Of the doctrine of the Trinity,—
Although, as our preacher thus embellished it,
Apparently his hearers relished it
With so unfeigned a gust—who knows if
They did not prefer our friend to Joseph ?
But so it is everywhere, one way with all of them !

These people have really felt, no doubt,
A something, the motion they style the Call of them ;

And this is their method of bringing about,
By a mechanism of words and tones,
(So many texts in so many groans)
A sort of reviving and reproducing,
• More or less perfectly, (who can tell ?)

The mood itself, which strengthens by using ;
And how that happens, I understand well.

A tune was born in my head last week,
Out of the thump-thump and shriek-shriek
Of the train, as I came by it, up from Manchester ;

And when, next week, I take it back again,
My head will sing to the engine's clack again,
While it only makes my neighbour's haunches stir,
—Finding no dormant musical sprout
In him, as in me, to be jolted out.

'Tis the taught already that profits by teaching ;
He gets no more from the railway's preaching
Than, from this preacher who does the rail's office, I :
Whom therefore the flock cast a jealous eye on.
Still, why paint over their door "Mount Zion,"
To which all flesh shall come, saith the prophecy ?

v.

But wherefore be harsh on a single case ?
After how many modes, this Christmas-Eve,
Does the self-same weary thing take place ?

The same endeavour to make you believe,
And with much the same effect, no more :
Each method abundantly convincing,
As I say, to those convinced before,
But scarce to be swallowed without wincing
By the not-as-yet-convinced. For me,
I have my own church equally :
And in this church my faith sprang first !
(I said, as I reached the rising ground,
And the wind began again, with a burst
Of rain in my face, and a glad rebound
From the heart beneath, as if, God speeding
me,

I entered his church-door, nature leading me)
—In youth I looked to these very skies,
And probing their immensities,
I found God there, his visible power ;
Yet felt in my heart, amid all its sense
Of the power, an equal evidence
That his love, there too, was the nobler dower.

For the loving worm within its clod,
Were diviner than a loveless god
Amid his worlds, I will dare to say.

You know what I mean : God's all, man's
nought :

But also, God, whose pleasure brought
Man into being, stands away
As it were a handbreadth off, to give
Room for the newly-made to live,
And look at him from a place apart,
And use his gifts of brain and heart,
Given, indeed, but to keep for ever.
Who speaks of man, then, must not sever

Man's very elements from man,
 Saying, "But all is God's"—whose plan
 Was to create man and then leave him
 Able, his own word saith, to grieve him,
 But able to glorify him too,
 As a mere machine could never do,
 That prayed or praised, all unaware
 Of its fitness for aught but praise and prayer,
 Made perfect as a thing of course.
 Man, therefore, stands on his own stock
 Of love and power as a pin-point rock :
 And, looking to God who ordained divorce
 Of the rock from his boundless continent,
 Sees, in his power made evident,
 Only excess by a million-fold
 O'er the power God gave man in the mould.
 For, note : man's hand, first formed to carry
 A few pounds' weight, when taught to marry
 Its strength with an engine's, lifts a mountain,
 —Advancing in power by one degree ;
 And why count steps through eternity ?
 But love is the ever-springing fountain :
 Man may enlarge or narrow his bed
 For the water's play, but the water-head—
 How can he multiply or reduce it ?
 As easy create it, as cause it to cease ;
 He may profit by it, or abuse it,
 But 'tis not a thing to bear increase
 As power does : be love less or more
 In the heart of man, he keeps it shut
 Or opes it wide, as he pleases, but Love's sum remains what it was before.
 So, gazing up, in my youth, at love
 As seen through power, ever above
 All modes which make it manifest,
 My soul brought all to a single test—
 That he, the Eternal First and Last,
 Who, in his power, had so surpassed
 All man conceives of what is might,— Whose wisdom, too, showed infinite,
 —Would prove as infinitely good ;
 Would never, (my soul understood,)
 With power to work all love desires,
 Bestow e'en less than man requires ;
 That he who endlessly was teaching,
 Above my spirit's utmost reaching,
 What love can do in the leaf or stone,
 (So that to master this alone,

This done in the stone or leaf for me,
 I must go on learning endlessly)
 Would never need that I, in turn,
 Should point him out defect unheeded,
 And show that God had yet to learn
 What the meanest human creature needed,
 —Not life, to wit, for a few short years,
 Tracking his way through doubts and fears,
 While the stupid earth on which I stay
 Suffers no change, but passive adds
 Its myriad years to myriads,
 Though I, he gave it to, decay,
 Seeing death come and choose about me,
 And my dearest ones depart without me.
 No : love whith, on earth, amid all the shows of it,
 Has ever been seen the sole good of life
 in it,
 The love, ever growing there, spite of the strife in it,
 Shall arise, made perfect, from death's repose of it.
 And I shall behold thee, face to face,
 O God, and in thy light retrace
 How in all I loved here, still wast thou !
 Whom pressing to, then, as I fain would
 now,
 I shall find as able to satiate
 The love, thy gift, as my spirit's wonder
 Thou art able to quicken and sublimiate,
 With this sky of thine, that I now walk
 under,
 And glory in thee for, as I gaze
 Thus, thus ! Oh, let men keep their ways
 Of seeking thee in a narrow shrine—
 Be this my way ! And this is mine !

For lo, what think you ? suddenly
 The rain and the wind ceased, and the sky
 Received at once the full fruition
 Of the moon's consummate apparition.
 The black cloud-barricade was riven,
 Ruined beneath her feet, and driven
 Deep in the West ; while, bare and breathless,
 North and South and East lay ready
 For a glorious thing that, dauntless, deathless,
 Sprang across them and stood steady.

'Twas a moon-rainbow, vast and perfect,
From heaven to heaven extending, perfect
As the mother-moon's self, full in face.
It rose, distinctly at the base

With its seven proper colours chorded,
Which still, in the rising, were compressed,
Until at last they coalesced,

And supreme the spectral creature lorded
In a triumph of whitest white,—
Above which intervened the night.

But above night too, like only the next,

The second of a wondrous sequence,
Reaching in rare and rarer frequency,
Till the heaven of heavens were circum-
flexed,

Another rainbow rose, a mightier,
Fainter, flushier and flightier,—
Rapture dying along its verge.
Oh, whose foot shall I see emerge,
Whose, from the straining topmost dark,
On to the keystone of that arc?

VII.

This sight was shown me, there and then,—
Me, one out of a world of men,
Singled forth, as the chance might hap
To another if, in a thunderclap
Where I heard noise and you saw flame,
Some one man knew God called his name.
For me, I think I said, "Appear !

"Good were it to be ever here.

"If thou wilt, let me build to thee

"Service-tabernacles three,

"Where, forever in thy presence,

"In ecstatic acquiescence,

"Far alike from thriftless learning

"And ignorance's undiscerning,

"I may worship and remain !"

Thus at the show above me, gazing
With upturned eyes, I felt my brain

Glutted with the glory, blazing Throughout its whole mass, over and under
Until at length it burst asunder

And out of it bodily there streamed,

The too-much glory, as it seemed,

Passing from out me to the ground,

*Then palely serpentine round
Into the dark with mazy error.

VIII

All at once I looked up with terror.

He was there,

He himself with his human air.

On the narrow pathway, just before.

I saw the back of him, no more—

He had left the chapel, then, as I.

I forgot all about the sky.

No face : only the sight

Of a sweepy garment, vast and white,

With a hem that I could recognize.

I felt terror, no surprise ;

My mind filled with the cataract,

At one bound of the mighty fact.

"I remember, he did say

"Doubtless that, to this world's end,

"Where two or three should meet and
pray,

"He would be in the midst, their friend ;

"Certainly he was there with them !"

And my pulses leaped for joy

Of the golden thought without alloy,

That I saw his very vesture's hem.

Then rushed the blood back, cold and
clear,

With a fresh enhancing shiver of fear ;

And I hastened, cried out while I pressed

To the salvation of the vest,

"But not so, Lord ! It cannot be

"That thou, indeed, art leaving me—

"Me, that have despised thy friends !

"Did my heart make no amends?

"Thou art the love of God—above

"His power, didst hear me place his
love,

"And that was leaving the world for thee.

"Therefore thou must not turn from me

"As I had chosen the other part !

"Folly and pride o'ercame my heart.

"Our best is bad, nor bears thy test ;

"Still, it should be our very best.

"I thought it best that thou, the spirit,

"Be worshipped in spirit and in truth,

"And in beauty, as even we require it—

"Not in the forms burlesque, uncouth,

"I left but now, as scarcely fitted

"For thee : I knew not what I pited.

CHRISTMAS-EVE AND EASTER-DAY

But, all I felt there, right or wrong,
 "What is it to thee, who curest sinning?
 Am I not weak as thou art strong?
 "I have looked to thee from the beginning,
 Straight up to thee through all the world
 Which, like an idle scroll, lay furled
 To nothingness on either side :
 And since the time thou wast descried,
 Spite of the weak heart, so have I
 Lived ever, and so fain would die,
 Living and dying, thee before !
 But if thou leavest me——"

Less or more,

I suppose that I spoke thus.
 When,—have mercy, Lord, on us !
 The whole face turned upon me full.
 And I spread myself beneath it,
 As when the bleacher spreads, to seethe it
 In the cleansing sun, his wool,—
 Steeps in the flood of noontide whiteness
 Some defiled, discoloured web—
 So lay I, saturate with brightness.
 And when the flood appeared to ebb,
 Lo, I was walking, light and swift,
 With my senses settling fast and steadying,
 But my body caught up in the whirl and drift
 Of the vesture's amplitude, still eddying
 On, just before me, still to be followed,
 As it carried me after with its motion :
 What shall I say?—as a path were hollowed
 And a man went weltering through the ocean,
 Sucked along in the flying wake
 Of the luminous water-snake.
 Darkness and cold were cloven, as through
 I passed, upborne yet walking too.
 And I turned to myself at intervals,—
 "So he said, so it befalls.
 "God who registers the cup
 "Of mere cold water, for his sake
 "To a disciple rendered up,
 "Disdains not his own thirst to slake
 "At the poorest love was ever offered :
 "And because my heart I proffered,
 "With true love trembling at the brim,
 "He suffers me to follow him

"For ever, my own way,—dispensed
 "From seeking to be influenced "By all the less immediate ways
 "That earth, in worships manifold,
 "Adopts to reach, by prayer and praise,
 "The garment's hem, which, lo, I hold !"

And so we crossed the world and stopped.
 For where am I, in city or plain,
 Since I am 'ware of the world again?
 And what is this that rises propped
 With pillars of prodigious girth?
 Is it really on the earth,
 This miraculous Dome of God?
 Has the angel's measuring-rod
 Which numbered cubits, gem from gem,
 'Twixt the gates of the New Jerusalem,
 Meted it out,—and what he meted,
 Have the sons of men completed?
 —Binding, ever as he bade,
 Columns in the colonnade
 With arms wide open to embrace
 The entry of the human race
 To the breast of . . . what is it, yon building,
 Ablaze in front, all paint and gilding,
 With marble for brick, and stones of price
 For garniture of the edifice?
 Now I see ; it is no dream ;
 It stands there and it does not seem ;
 For ever, in pictures, thus it looks,
 And thus I have read of it in books
 Often in England, leagues away,
 And wondered how these fountains play,
 Growing up eternally
 Each to a musical water-tree,
 Whose blossoms drop, a glittering boon,
 Before my eyes, in the light of the moon,
 To the granite lavers underneath.
 Liar and dreamer in your teeth !
 I, the sinner that speak to you,
 Was in Rome this night, and stood, and knew
 Both this and more. For see, for see,
 The dark is rent, mine eye is free
 To pierce the crust of the outer wall,
 And I view inside, and all there, all,
 As the swarming hollow of a hive,
 The whole Basilica alive !

Men in the chancel, body and nave,
 Men on the pillars' architrave,
 Men on the statues, men on the tombs
 With popes and kings in their porphyry wombs,
 All famishing in expectation
 Of the main-altar's consummation.
 For see, for see, the rapturous moment
 Approaches, and earth's best endowment
 Blends with heaven's; the taper-fires
 Pant up, the winding brazen spires
 Heave loftier yet the baldachin;¹
 The incense-gasings, long kept in,
 Suspire in clouds; the organ blatant
 Holds his breath and grovels latent,
 As if God's hushing finger grazed him,
 (Like Behemoth when he praised him)
 At the silver bell's shrill tinkling,
 Quick cold drops of terror sprinkling
 On the sudden pavement strewed
 With faces of the multitude.
 Earth breaks up, time drops away,
 In flows heaven, with its new day
 Of endless life, when He who trod,
 Very man and very God,
 This earth in weakness, shame and pain,
 Dying the death whose signs remain
 Up yonder on the accursed tree,—
 Shall come again, no more to be
 Of captivity the thrall,
 But the one God, All in all,
 King of kings, Lord of lords,
 As His servant John received the words,
 "I died, and live for evermore!"

XI.

Yet I was left outside the door.
 "Why sit I here on the threshold-stone
 "Left till He return, alone
 "Save for the garment's extreme fold
 "Abandoned still to bless my hold?"
 My reason, to my doubt, replied,
 As if a book were opened wide,
 And at a certain page I traced
 Every record undefaced,
 Added by successive years,—
 The harvestings of truth's stray ears

Singly gleaned, and in one sheaf
 Bound together for belief.
 Yes, I said—that he will go
 And sit with these in turn, I know.
 Their faith's heart beats, though her head swims
 Too giddily to guide her limbs;
 Disabled by their palsy-stroke
 From propping mine. Though Rome's gross yoke
 Drops off, no more to be endured,
 Her teaching is not so obscured
 By errors and perversities,
 That no truth shines athwart the lies:
 And he, whose eye detects a spark
 Even where, to man's, the whole seems dark,
 May well see flame where each beholder
 Acknowledges the embers smoulder.
 But I, a mere man, fear to quit
 The clue God gave me as most fit
 To guide my footsteps through life's maze,
 Because himself discerns all ways
 Open to reach him: I, a man
 Able to mark where faith began
 To swerve aside, till from its summit
 Judgment drops her damning plummet,
 Pronouncing such a fatal space
 Departed from the founder's base:
 He will not bid me enter too,
 But rather sit, as now I do,
 Awaiting his return outside.
 —'Twas thus my reason straight replied
 And joyously I turned, and pressed
 The garment's skirt upon my breast,
 Until, afresh its light suffusing me,
 My heart cried—What has been abusing me
 That I should wait here lonely and coldly,
 Instead of rising, entering boldly,
 Baring truth's face, and letting drift
 Her veils of lies as they choose to shift?
 Do these men praise him? I will raise
 My voice up to their point of praise!
 I see the error; but above
 The scope of error, see the love.—
 Oh, love of those first Christian days!
 —Fanned so soon into a blaze,
 From the spark preserved by the trampled sect,
 That the antique sovereign intellect

Which then sat ruling in the world,
 Like a change in dreams, was hurled
 From the throne he reigned upon :
 You looked up and he was gone.
 Gone, his glory of the pen !
 —Love, with Greece and Rome in ken,
 Bade her scribes abhor the trick
 Of poetry and rhetoric,
 And exult with hearts set free,
 In blessed imbecility
 Scrawled, perchance, on some torn sheet
 Leaving Sallust incomplete.
 Gone, his pride of sculptor, painter !
 —Love, while able to acquaint her
 While the thousand statues yet
 Fresh from chisel, pictures wet
 From brush, she saw on every side,
 Chose rather with an infant's pride
 To frame those portents which impart
 Such unction to true Christian Art.
 Gone, music too ! The air was stirred
 By happy wings : Terpander's ¹ bird
 (That, when the cold came, fled away)
 Would tarry not the wintry day,—
 As more-enduring sculpture must,
 Till filthy saints rebuked the gust
 With which they chanced to get a sight
 Of some dear naked Aphrodite
 They glanced a thought above the toes of,
 By breaking zealously her nose off.
 Love, surely, from that music's lingering,
 Might have filched her organ-fingering,
 Nor chosen rather to set prayings
 To hog-grunts, praises to horse-neighings.
 Love was the startling thing, the new :
 Love was the all-sufficient too ;
 And seeing that, you see the rest :
 As a babe can find its mother's breast
 As well in darkness as in light,
 Love shut our eyes, and all seemed right.
 True, the world's eyes are open now :
 —Less need for me to disallow
 Some few that keep Love's zone unbuckled,
 Peevish as ever to be suckled,
 Lulled by the same old baby-prattle
 With intermixture of the rattle,
¹ Terpander, a famous Lesbian musician and lyric poet, 670 B.C.

When she would have them creep, stand steady
 Upon their feet, or walk already,
 Not to speak of trying to climb.
 I will be wise another time,
 And not desire a wall between us,
 When next I see a church-roof cover
 So many species of one genus,
 All with foreheads bearing lover
 Written above the earnest eyes of them ;
 All with breasts that beat for beauty,
 Whether sublimed, to the surprise of them,
 In noble daring, steadfast duty,
 The heroic in passion, or in action,—
 Or, lowered for sense's satisfaction,
 To the mere outside of human creatures,
 Mere perfect form and faultless features.
 What ? with all Rome here, whence to levy
 Such contributions to their appetite,
 With women and men in a gorgeous bevy,
 They take, as it were, a padlock, clap it tight
 On their southern eyes, restrained from feeding
 On the glories of their ancient reading,
 On the beauties of their modern singing,
 On the wonders of the builder's bringing,
 On the majesties of Art around them,—
 And, all these loves, late struggling incessant,
 When faith has at last united and bound them,
 They offer up to God for a present ?
 Why, I will, on the whole, be rather proud
 of it,—
 And, only taking the act in reference To the other recipients who might have allowed it,
 I will rejoice that God had the preference.

So I summed up my new resolves :
 Too much love there can never be.
 And where the intellect devotes
 Its function on love exclusively,
 I, a man who possesses both,
 Will accept the provision, nothing loth,
 —Will feast my love, then depart elsewhere,
 That my intellect may find its share.

And ponder, O soul, the while thou departest,
And see thou applaud the great heart of the artist,

Who, examining the capabilities
Of the block of marble he has to fashion
Into a type of thought or passion,—
Not always, using obvious facilities,
Shapes it, as any artist can,
Into a perfect symmetrical man,
Complete from head to foot of the life-size,
Such as old Adam stood in his wife's eyes,—
But, now and then, bravely aspires to consummate

A Colossus by no means so easy to come at,
And uses the whole of his block for the bust,
Leaving the mind of the public to finish it,
Since cut it ruefully short he must :

On the face alone he expends his devotion,
He rather would mar than resolve to diminish it,

—Saying, "Applaud me for this grand notion "Of what a face may be! As for completing it "In breast and body and limbs, do that,
you!"

All hail! I fancy how, happily meeting it,
A trunk and legs would perfect the statue,
Could man carve so as to answer volition.

And how much nobler than petty cavils,
Were a hope to find, in my spirit-travels,
Some artist of another ambuion,
Who having a block to carve, no bigger,
Has spent his power on the opposite quest,
And believed to begin at the feet was best—
For so may I see, ere I die, the whole figure!

XIII.

No sooner said than out in the night!
My heart beat lighter and more light:
And still, as before, I was walking swift,
With my senses settling fast and steady,
But my body caught up in the whirl and drift
Of the vesture's amplitude, still eddying
On just before me, still to be followed,
As it carried me after with its motion,
—What shall I say?—as a path were hollowed,
And a man went weltering through the ocean,
Sucked along in the flying wake
Of the luminous water-snake.

XIV.

Alone! I am left alone once more—
(Save for the garment's extreme fold
Abandoned still to bless my hold)
Alone, beside the entrance-door
Of a sort of temple,—perhaps a college,
—Like nothing I ever saw before
At home in England, to my knowledge.
The tall old quaint irregular town!
It may be . . . though which, I can't affirm . . . any

Of the famous middle-age towns of Germany;
And this flight of stairs where I sit down,
Is it Halle, Weimar, Cassel, Frankfort
Or Göttingen, I have to thank for't?
It may be Göttingen,—most likely.
Through the open door I catch obliquely
Glimpses of a lecture-hall;

And not a bad assembly neither,
Ranged decent and symmetrical
On benches, waiting what's to see there;
Which, holding still by the vesture's hem,
I also resolve to see with them,
Cautious this time how I suffer to slip
The chance of joining in fellowship
With any that call themselves his friends;

As these folk do, I have a notion.
But hush—a buzzing and emotion!
All settle themselves, the while ascends
By the creaking rail to the lecture-desk,
Step by step, deliberate
Because of his cranium's over-freight,
Three parts sublime to one grotesque,
If I have proved an accurate guesser,
The hawk-nosed high-cheek-boned Professor
I felt at once as if there ran

A shoot of love from my heart to the man—
That sallow virgin-minded studious
Martyr to mild enthusiasm,
As he uttered a kind of cough-preludious
That woke my sympathetic spasm,
(Beside some spitting that made me sorry)
And stood, surveying his auditory
With a wan pure look, well nigh celestial,—
Those blue eyes had survived so much!

While, under the foot they could not smutch,
Lay all the fleshly and the bestial.

Over he bowed, and arranged his notes,
Till the auditory's clearing of throats
Was done with, died into a silence ;

And, when each glance was upward sent,
Each bearded mouth composed intent,
And a pin might be heard drop half a mile
hence,—

He pushed back higher his spectacles,
Let the eyes stream out like lamps from cells,
And giving his head of hair—a hake

Of undressed tow, for colour and quantity—
One rapid and impatient shake,

(As our own Young England adjusts a jaunty tie

When about to impart, on mature digestion,
Some thrilling view of the surplice-question)
—The Professor's grave voice, sweet though hoarse,

Broke into his Christmas-Eve discourse.

And he began it by observing

How reason dictated that men
Should rectify the natural swerving,
By a reversion, now and then,
To the well-heads of knowledge, few
And far away, whence rolling grew
The life-stream wide whereat we drink,
Commingled, as we needs must think,
With waters alien to the source ;
To do which, aimed this eve's discourse ;

Since, where could be a fitter time
For tracing backward to its prime
This Christianity, this lake,
This reservoir, whereat we slake,
From one or other bank, our thirst ?
So, he proposed inquiring first
Into the various sources whence

This Myth of Christ is derivable ;
Demanding from the evidence,

(Since plainly no such life was liveable)

How these phenomena should class ?
Whether 'twere best opine Christ was,
Or never was at all, or whether
He was and was not, both together—
It matters little for the name,
So the idea be left the same.

Only, for practical purpose' sake,
'Twas obviously as well to take
The popular story,—understanding
How the ineptitude of the time,
And the penman's prejudice, expanding
Fact into fable fit for the clime,
Had, by slow and sure degrees, translated it
Into this myth, this Individuum,—
Which, when reason had strained and abated it
Of foreign matter, left, for residuum,
A Man !—a right true man, however,
Whose work was worthy a man's endeavour :
Work, that gave warrant almost sufficient
To his disciples, for rather believing
He was just omnipotent and omniscient,
As it gives to us, for as frankly receiving
His word, their tradition,—which, though it meant

Something entirely different
From all that those who only heard it,
In their simplicity thought and averred it,
Had yet a meaning quite as respectable :
For, among other doctrines delectable,
Was he not surely the first to insist on
The natural sovereignty of our race ?—
Here the lecturer came to a pausing-place.
And while his cough, like a drouthy piston,
Tried to dislodge the husk that grew to him,
I seized the occasion of bidding adieu to him,
The vesture still within my hand.

I could interpret its command.
This time he would not bid me enter
The exhausted air-bell of the Critic.
Truth's atmosphere may grow mephitic
When Papist struggles with Dissenter, Impregnating its pristine clarity,
—One, by his daily fare's vulgarity,
Its gust of broken meat and garlic ;
—One, by his soul's too-much presuming
To turn the frankincense's fuming
And vapours of the candle starlike
Into the cloud her wings she buoys on.
Each, that thus sets the pure air seething,
May poison it for healthy breathing—
But the Critic leaves no air to poison ;

Pumps out with ruthless ingenuity
 Atom by atom, and leaves you—vacuity.
 Thus much of Christ does he reject?
 And what retain? His intellect?
 What is it I must reverence duly?
 Poor intellect for worship, truly,
 Which tells me simply what was told
 (If mere morality, bereft

Of the God in Christ, be all that's left)
 Elsewhere by voices manifold;

With this advantage, that the stater
 Made nowise the important stumble
 Of adding, he, the sage and humble,
 Was also one with the Creator.

You urge Christ's followers' simplicity:
 But how does shifting blame, evade it?
 Have wisdom's words no more felicity?

The stumbling-block, his speech—who laid
 it?

How comes it that for one found able
 To sift the truth of it from fable,
 Millions believe it to the letter?
 Christ's goodness, then—does that fare better?
 Strange goodness, which upon the score

Of being goodness, the mere due
 Of man to fellow-man, much more

To God,—should take another view
 Of its possessor's privilege,
 And bid him rule his race! You pledge
 Your fealty to such rule? What, all—
 From heavenly John and Attic Paul,
 And that brave weather-battered Peter,
 Whose stout faith only stood completer
 For buffets, sinning to be pardoned,
 As, more his hands hauled nets, they hardened,—

All, down to you, the man of men,
 Professing here at Göttingen,
 Compose Christ's flock! They, you and I,
 Are sheep of a good man! And why?
 The goodness,—how did he acquire it?
 Was it self-gained, did God inspire it?
 Choose which; then tell me, on what ground
 Should its possessor dare propound
 His claim to rise o'er us an inch?

Were goodness all some man's invention,
 Who arbitrarily made mention
 What we should follow, and whence flinch,—

What qualities might take the style
 Of right and wrong,—and had such guessing

Met with as general acquiescing
 As graced the alphabet erewhile,
 When A got leave an Ox to be,
 No Camel (quoth the Jews) like G,¹—
 For thus inventing thing and title
 Worship were that man's fit requital.
 But if the common conscience must
 Be ultimately judge, adjust
 Its apt name to each quality
 Already known,—I would decree
 Worship for such mere demonstration

And simple work of nomenclature,
 Only the day I praised, not nature,
 But Harvey, for the circulation.

I would praise such a Christ, with pride
 And joy, that he, as none beside,
 Had taught us how to keep the mind
 God gave him, as God gave his kind,
 Freer than they from fleshly taint:
 I would call such a Christ our Saint,
 As I declare our Poet, him
 Whose insight makes all others dim:
 A thousand poets pried at life,
 And only one amid the strife
 Rose to be Shakespeare: each shall take
 His crown, I'd say, for the world's sake—
 Though some objected—"Had we seen
 "The heart and head of each, what screen

"Was broken there to give them light,
 "While in ourselves it shuts the sight,
 "We should no more admire, perchance,
 "That these found truth out at a glance,
 "Than marvel how the bat discerns
 "Some pitch-dark cavern's fifty turns,
 "Led by a finer tact, a gift
 "He boasts, which other birds must shift
 "Without, and grope as best they can."
 No, freely I would praise the man,—
 Nor one whit more, if he contended
 That gift of his, from God descended.
 Ah friend, what gift of man's does not?
 No nearer something, by a jot,

Rise an infinity of nothings

Than one : take Euclid for your teacher :

Distinguish kinds : do crownings, clothings,

Make that creator which was creature ?

Multiply gifts upon man's head,

And what, when all's done, shall be said

But—the more gifted he, I ween !

That one's made Christ, this other, Pilate,

And this might be all that has been,—

So what is there to frown or smile at ?

What is left for us, save, in growth

Of soul, to rise up, far past both,

From the gift looking to the giver,

And from the cistern to the river,

And from the finite to infinity,

And from man's dust to God's divinity ?

Take all in a word : the truth in God's breast

Lies trace for trace upon ours impressed :

Though he is so bright and we so dim,

We are made in his image to witness him :

And were no eye in us to tell,

Instructed by no inner sense,

The light of heaven from the dark of hell,

That light would want its evidence,—

Though justice, good and truth were still

Divine, if, by some demon's will,

Hatred and wrong had been proclaimed

Law through the worlds, and right misnamed.

No mere exposition of morality

Made or in part or in totality,

Should win you to give it worship, therefore :

And, if no better proof you will care for,

—Whom do you count the worst man upon
earth ?

Be sure, he knows, in his conscience, more
Of what right is, than arrives at birth

In the best man's acts that we bow before :

This last knows better—true, but my fact is,

'Tis one thing to know, and another to practise.

And thence I conclude that the real God-function

Is to furnish a motive and injunction

For practising what we know already.

And such an injunction and such a motive

As the God in Christ, do you waive, and “heady,

“High-minded,” hang your tablet-votive

Outside the fane on a finger-post ?

Morality to the uttermost,

Supreme in Christ as we all confess,

Why need we prove would avail no jot

To make him God, if God he were not ?

What is the point where himself lays stress ?

Does the precept run “Believe in good,

“In justice, truth, now understood

“For the first time ?”—or, “Believe in me,

“Who lived and died, yet essentially

“Am Lord of Life ?” Whoever can take

The same to his heart and for mere love's sake

Conceive of the love,—that man obtains

A new truth ; no conviction gains

Of an old one only, made intense

By a fresh appeal to his faded sense.

XVIII.

Can it be that he stays inside ?

Is the vesture left me to commune with ?

Could my soul find aught to sing in tune
with

Even at this lecture, if she tried ?

Oh, let me at lowest sympathize

With the lurking drop of blood that lies

In the desiccated brain's white roots

Without throb for Christ's attributes,

As the lecturer makes his special boast !

If love's dead there, it has left a ghost.

Admire we, how from heart to brain

(Though to say so strike the doctors dumb)

One instinct rises and falls again,

Restoring the equilibrium.

And how when the Critic had done his best,

And the pearl of price, at reason's test,

Lay dust and ashes levigable

On the Professor's lecture-table,—

When we looked for the inference and monition

That our faith, reduced to such condition,

Be swept forthwith to its natural dust-hole,—

He bids us, when we least expect it,

Take back our faith,—if it be not just whole,

Yet a pearl indeed, as his tests affect it,

Which fact pays damage done rewardingly,

So, prize we our dust and ashes accordingly !

"Go home and venerate the myth
 "I thus have experimented with—
 "This man, continue to adore him
 "Rather than all who went before him,
 "And all who ever followed after!"—
 Surely for this I may praise you, my brother!
 Will you take the praise in tears or laughter?
 That's one point gained: can I compass
 another?

Unlearned love was safe from spurning—
 Can't we respect your loveless learning?
 Let us at least give learning honour!
 What laurels had we showered upon her,
 Girding her loins up to perturb
 Our theory of the Middle Verb;
 Or Turk-like brandishing a scimitar
 O'er anapaests in comic-trimeter;
 Or curing the halt and maimed 'Iketides,'¹
 While we lounged on at our indebted ease:
 Instead of which, a tricky demon
 Sets her at Titus or Philemon!
 When ignorance wags his ears of leather
 And hates God's word, 'tis altogether;
 Nor leaves he his congenial thistles
 To go and browse on Paul's Epistles.
 —And you, the audience, who might ravage
 The world wide, enviably savage,
 Nor heed the cry of the retriever,
 More than Herr Heine (before his fever),—
 I do not tell a lie so arrant

As say my passion's wings are furled up,
 And, without plainest heavenly warrant,
 I were ready and glad to give the world up—
 But still, when you rub brow meticulous,
 And ponder the profit of turning holy

If not for God's, for your own sake solely,
 —God forbid I should find you ridiculous!
 Deduce from this lecture all that eases you,
 Nay, call yourselves, if the calling pleases you,
 "Christians,"—abhor the deist's pravity,—
 Go on, you shall no more move my gravity
 Than, when I see boys ride a-cockhorse,
 I find it in my heart to embarrass them
 By hinting that their stick's a mock horse,
 And they really carry what they say carries
 them.

XIX.

So sat I talking with my mind.
 I did not long to leave the door
 And find a new church, as before,
 But rather was quiet and inclined
 To prolong and enjoy the gentle resting
 From further tracking and trying and testing.
 "This tolerance is a genial mood!"
 (Said I, and a little pause ensued).
 "One trims the bark 'twixt shoal and shelf,
 "And sees, each side, the good effects of it,
 "A value for religion's self,
 "A carelessness about the sects of it.
 "Let me enjoy my own conviction,
 "Not watch my neighbour's faith with fretfulness,
 "Still spying there some dereliction
 "Of truth, perversity, forgetfulness!
 "Better a mild indifferentism,
 "Teaching that both our faiths (though duller
 "His shine through a dull spirit's prism)
 "Originally had one colour!
 "Better pursue a pilgrimage
 "Through ancient and through modern times
 "To many peoples, various climes,
 "Where I may see saint, savage, sage
 "Fuse their respective creeds in one
 "Before the general Father's throne!"

XX.

—'Twas the horrible storm began afresh!
 The black night caught me in his mesh,
 Whirled me up, and flung me prone:
 I was left on the college-step alone.
 I looked, and far there, ever fleeting
 Far, far away, the receding gesture,
 And looming of the lessening vesture!—
 Swept forward from my stupid hand,
 While I watched my foolish heart expand
 In the lazy glow of benevolence,
 O'er the various modes of man's belief.
 I sprang up with fear's vehemence.
 Needs must there be one way, our chief
 Best way of worship: let me strive
 To find it, and when found, contrive

My fellows also take their share !
 This constitutes my earthly care :
 God's is above it and distinct.
 For I, a man, with men am linked
 And not a brute with brutes ; no gain
 That I experience, must remain
 Unshared : but should my best endeavour
 To share it, fail—subsisteth ever
 God's care above, and I exult
 That God, by God's own ways occult,
 May—doth, I will believe—bring back
 All wanderers to a single track.
 Meantime, I can but testify
 God's care for me—no more, can I—
 It is but for myself I know ;

The world rolls witnessing around me
 Only to leave me as it found me ;
 Men cry there, but my ear is slow :
 Their races flourish or decay
 —What boots it, while yon lucid way
 Loaded with stars divides the vault ?
 But soon my soul repairs its fault
 When, sharpening sense's hebetude,
 She turns on my own life ! So viewed,
 No mere mote's-breadth but teems immense
 With witnessings of providence :
 And woe to me if when I look Upon that record, the sole book
 Unsealed to me, I take no heed
 Of any warning that I read !
 Have I been sure, this Christmas-Eve,
 God's own hand did the rainbow weave,
 Whereby the truth from heaven slid
 Into my soul ?—I cannot bid
 The world admit he stooped to heal
 My soul, as if in a thunder-peal
 Where one heard noise, and one saw flame,
 I only knew he named my name :
 But what is the world to me, for sorrow
 Or joy in its censure, when to-morrow
 It drops the remark, with just-turned head
 Then, on again, ' That man is dead ' ?
 Yes, but for me—my name called,—drawn
 As a conscript's lot from the lap's black yawn,
 He has dipt into on a battle-dawn :
 Bid out of life by a nod, a glance,—
 Stumbling, mute-mazed, at nature's chance,—

With a rapid finger circled round,
 Fixed to the first poor inch of ground
 To fight from, where his foot was found ;
 Whose ear but a minute since lay free
 To the wide camp's buzz and gossipry—
 Summoned, a solitary man
 To end his life where his life began,
 From the safe glad rear, to the dreadful van !
 Soul of mine, hadst thou caught and held
 By the hem of the vesture !—

XXI.

And I caught

At the flying robe, and unrepelled
 Was lapped again in its folds full-fraught
 With warmth and wonder and delight,
 God's mercy being infinite.
 For scarce had the words escaped my tongue,
 When, at a passionate bound, I sprung,
 Out of the wandering world of rain,
 Into the little chapel again.

How else was I found there, bolt upright
 On my bench, as if I had never left it ?
 —Never flung out on the common at night,
 Nor met the storm and wedge-like cleft it,
 Seen the raree-show of Peter's successor,
 Or the laboratory of the Professor !
 For the Vision, that was true, I wist,
 True as that heaven and earth exist.
 There sat my friend, the yellow and tall,
 With his neck and its wen in the selfsame
 place ;
 Yet my nearest neighbour's cheek showed gall.

She had slid away a contemptuous space :
 And the old fat woman, late so placable,
 Eyed me with symptoms, hardly mistakable,
 Of her milk of kindness turning rancid.
 In short, a spectator might have fancied
 That I had nodded, betrayed by slumber,
 Yet kept my seat, a warning ghastly,
 Through the heads of the sermon, nine in number,
 And woke up now at the tenth and lastly.

But again, could such disgrace have happened
Each friend at my elbow had surely nudged
it ;

And, as for the sermon, where did my nap end?

Unless I heard it, could I have judged it?

Could I report as I do at the close,

First, the preacher speaks through his nose :

Second, his gesture is too emphatic :

Thirdly, to waive what's pedagogic,

The subject-matter itself lacks logic :

Fourthly, the English is ungrammatic.

Great news ! the sermon proves no Pascal,

Whom, if I pleased, I might to the task call

Of making square to a finite eye

The circle of infinity,

And find so all-but-just-succeeding !

Great news ! the sermon proves no reading

Where bee-like in the flowers I bury me,

Like Taylor's the immortal Jeremy !

And now that I know the very worst of him,

What was it I thought to obtain at first of him ?

Ha ! Is God mocked, as he asks ?

Shall I take on me to change his tasks,

And dare, despatched to a river-head

For a simple draught of the element,

Neglect the thing for which he sent,

And return with another thing instead ?—

Saying, " Because the water found

" Welling up from underground,

" Is mingled with the taints of earth,

" While thou, I know, dost laugh at dearth,

" And couldst, at wink or word, convulse

" The world with the leap of a river-pulse,—

" Therefore I turned from the oozeings muddy,

" And bring thee a chalice I found, instead :

" See the brave veins in the breccia ruddy !

" One would suppose that the marble bled.

" What matters the water ? A hope I have nursed :

" The waterless cup will quench my thirst."

—Better have knelt at the poorest stream

That trickles in pain from the straitest rift !

For the less or the more is all God's gift,

Who blocks up or breaks wide the granite-seam.

And here, is there water or not, to drink ?

I then, in ignorance and weakness,

Taking God's help, have attained to think

My heart does best to receive in meekness

That mode of worship, as most to his mind,

Where earthly aids being cast behind,

His All in All appears serene

With the thinnest human veil between,

Letting the mystic lamps, the seven,

The many motions of his spirit,

Pass, as they list, to earth from heaven.

For the preacher's merit or demerit,

It were to be wished the flaws were fewer :

In the earthen vessel, holding treasure

Which lies as safe in a golden ewer ;

But the main thing is, does it hold good measure ?

Heaven soon sets right all other matters !—

Ask, else, these ruins of humanity,

This flesh worn out to rags and tatters,

This soul at struggle with insanity,

Who thence take comfort—can I doubt ?—

Which an empire gained, were a loss without.

May it be mine ! And let us hope

That no worse blessing befall the Pope,

Turned sick at last of to-day's buffoonery,

Of posturings and petticoatings,

Beside his Bourbon bully's gloatings

In the bloody orgies of drunk poltroonery !

Nor may the Professor forego its peace

At Göttingen presently, when, in the dusk

Of his life, if his cough, as I fear, should increase,

Prophesied of by that horrible husk—

When thicker and thicker the darkness fills

The world through his misty spectacles,

And he gropes for something more substantial

Than a fable, myth or personification,—

May Christ do for him what no mere man

shall,

And stand confessed as the God of salvation !

Meantime, in the still recurring fear

Lest myself, at unawares, be found,

While attacking the choice of my neighbours

round,

With none of my own made—I choose here !

The giving out of the hymn reclaims me ;

I have done : and if any blames me,

Thinking that merely to touch in brevity

The topics I dwell on, were unlawful,—

Or worse, that I trench, with undue levity,

On the bounds of the holy and the awful,—

I praise the heart, and pity the head of
him,

And refer myself to THEE, instead of him,
Who head and heart alike discernest,

Looking below light speech we utter,

When frothy spume and frequent sputter

Prove that the soul's depths boil in earnest !

May truth shine out, stand ever before us !

I put up pencil and join chorus

To Hepzibah Tune, without further apology,

The last five verses of the third section

Of the seventeenth hymn of Whitfield's

Collection,

To conclude with the doxology.

EASTER-DAY.

How very hard it is to be

A Christian ! Hard for you and me,

—Not the mere task of making real

That duty up to its ideal,

Effecting thus, complete and whole,

A purpose of the human soul—

For that is always hard to do ;

But hard, I mean, for me and you

To realize it, more or less,

With even the moderate success

Which commonly repays our strife

To carry out the aims of life.

"This aim is greater," you will say,

"And so more arduous every way."

—But the importance of their fruits

Still proves to man, in all pursuits,

Proportional encouragement.

"Then, what if it be God's intent

"That labour to this one result

"Should seem unduly difficult?"

Ah, that's a question in the dark—

And the sole thing that I remark

Upon the difficulty, this ;

We do not see it where it is,

At the beginning of the race :

As we proceed, it shifts its place,

And where we looked for crowns to fall,

We find the tug's to come,—that's all.

II.

At first you say, "The whole, or chief

"Of difficulties, is belief.

"Could I believe once thoroughly,

"The rest were simple. What? Am I

"An idiot, do you think,—a beast?

"Prove to me, only that the least

"Command of God is God's indeed,

"And what injunction shall I need "To pay obedience? Death so nigh,

"When time must end, eternity

"Begin,—and cannot I compute,

"Weigh loss and gain together, suit

"My actions to the balance drawn,

"And give my body to be sawn

"Asunder, hacked in pieces, tied

"To horses, stoned, burned, crucified,

"Like any martyr of the list?

"How gladly!—if I make acquit,

"Through the brief minute's fierce annoy,

"Of God's eternity of joy."

III.

—And certainly you name the point

Whereon all turns : for could you joint

This flexible finite life once tight

Into the fixed and infinite,

You, safe inside, would spurn what's out,

With carelessness enough, no doubt—

Would spurn mere life : but when time brings

To their next stage your reasonings,

Your eyes, late wide, begin to wink

Nor see the path so well, I think.

You say, "Faith may be, one agrees,

"A touchstone for God's purposes,

"Even as ourselves conceive of them.

"Could he acquit us or condemn

"For holding what no hand can loose.

"Rejecting when we can't but choose?

"As well award the victor's wreath

"To whosoever should take breath

"Duly each minute while he lived—

"Grant heaven, because a man contrived

"To see its sunlight every day

"He walked forth on the public way.

"You must mix some uncertainty
 "With faith, if you would have faith be.
 "Why, what but faith, do we abhor
 "And idolize each other for—
 "Faith in our evil or our good,
 "Which is or is not understood
 "Aright by those we love or those "We hate, thence called our friends or foes?

"Your mistress saw your spirit's grace,
 "When, turning from the ugly face,
 "I found belief in it too hard;
 "And she and I have our reward.
 "—Yet here a doubt peeps: well for us
 "Weak beings, to go using thus
 "A touchstone for our little ends,
 "Trying with faith the foes and friends;
 "—But God, bethink you! I would fain
 "Conceive of the Creator's reign
 "As based upon exacter laws
 "Than creatures build by with applause.
 "In all God's acts—(as Plato cries
 "He doth)—he should geometrize.
 "Whence, I desiderate . . ."

V.

I see!

You would grow as a natural tree,
 Stand as a rock, soar up like fire.
 The world's so perfect and entire,
 Quite above faith, so right and fit!
 Go there, walk up and down in it!
 No. The creation travails, groans—
 Contrive your music from its moans,
 Without or let or hindrance, friend!
 That's an old story, and its end
 As old—you come back (be sincere)
 With every question you put here (Here where there once was, and is still,
 We think, a living oracle,
 Whose answers you stand carping at)
 This time flung back unanswered flat,—
 Beside, perhaps, as many more
 As those that drove you out before,
 Now added, where was little need.
 Questions impossible, indeed,
 To us who sat still, all and each
 Persuaded that our earth had speech,

VOL. 1.

Of God's, writ down, no matter if
 In cursive type or hieroglyph,—
 Which one fact freed us from the yoke
 Of guessing why He never spoke.
 You come back in no better plight
 Than when you left us,—am I right?

VI.

So, the old process, I conclude,
 Goes on, the reasoning's pursued Further. You own, "'Tis well averred,
 "A scientific faith's absurd,
 "—Frustrates the very end 'twas meant
 "To serve. So, I would rest content
 "With a mere probability,
 "But, probable; the chance must lie
 "Clear on one side,—lie all in rough,
 "So long as there be just enough
 "To pin my faith to, though it hap
 "Only at points: from gap to gap
 "One hangs up a huge curtain so,
 "Grandly, nor seeks to have it go
 "Foldless and flat along the wall.
 "What care I if some interval
 "Of life less plainly may depend "On God? I'd hang there to the end;
 "And thus I should not find it hard
 "To be a Christian and debarred
 "From trailing on the earth, till furled
 "Away by death.—Renounce the world!
 "Were that a mighty hardship? Plan
 "A pleasant life, and straight some man
 "Beside you, with, if he thought fit,
 "Abundant means to compass it,
 "Shall turn deliberate aside
 "To try and live as, if you tried
 "You clearly might, yet most despise.
 "One friend of mine wears out his eyes,
 "Slighting the stupid joys of sense,
 "In patient hope that, ten years hence,
 "'Somewhat completer,' he may say,
 "'My list of coleoptera!'¹
 "While just the other who most laughs
 "At him, above all epitaphs
 "Aspires to have his tomb describe "Himself as sole among the tribe

¹ Beetles.

"Of snuffbox-fanciers, who possessed
 "A Grignon with the Regent's crest.
 "So that, subduing, as you want,
 "Whatever stands predominant
 "Among my earthly appetites
 "For tastes and smells and sounds and sights,
 "I shall be doing that alone,
 "To gain a palm-branch and a throne.
 "Which fifty people undertake "To do, and gladly, for the sake
 "Of giving a Semitic guess,
 "Or playing pawns at blindfold chess."

VII.

Good : and the next thing is,—look round
 For evidence enough ! 'Tis found,
 No doubt : as is your sort of mind,
 So is your sort of search : you'll find
 What you desire, and that's to be
 A Christian. What says history ?
 How comforting a point it were
 To find some mummy-scrap declare
 There lived a Moses ! Better still,
 Prove Jonah's whale translatable
 Into some quicksand of the seas,
 Isle, cavern, rock, or what you please,
 That faith might flap her wings and crow
 From such an eminence ! Or, no—
 The human heart's best ; you prefer
 Making that prove the minister
 To truth ; you probe its wants and needs,
 And hopes and fears, then try what creeds
 Meet these most aptly,—resolute
 That faith plucks such substantial fruit
 Wherever these two correspond,
 She little needs to look beyond,
 And puzzle out who Orpheus was,
 Or Dionysius Zagrias.¹
 You'll find sufficient, as I say,
 To satisfy you either way ;
 You wanted to believe ; your pains
 Are crowned—you do : and what remains ?
 "Renounce the world !"—Ah, were it done
 By merely cutting one by one
 Your limbs off, with your wise head last,
 How easy were it !—how soon past,

If once in the believing mood !
 "Such is man's usual gratitude,
 "Such thanks to God do we return,
 "For not exacting that we spurn
 "A single gift of life, forego
 "One real gain,—only taste them so
 "With gravity and temperance,
 "That those mild virtues may enhance
 "Such pleasures, rather than abstract—
 "Last spice of which, will be the fact "Of love discerned in every gift ;
 "While, when the scene of life shall shift
 "And the gay heart be taught to ache,
 "As sorrows and privations take "The place of joy,—the thing that seems
 "Mere misery, under human schemes,
 "Becomes, regarded by the light
 "Of love, as very near, or quite
 "As good a gift as joy before.
 "So plain is it that, all the more
 "A dispensation's merciful,
 "More pettishly we try and cull
 "Briers, thistles, from our private plot,
 "To mar God's ground where thorns are not !"

VIII.

Do you say this, or I ?—Oh, you !
 Then, what, my friend ?—(thus I pursue
 Our parley)—you indeed opine
 That the Eternal and Divine
 Did, eighteen centuries ago,
 In very truth . . . Enough ! you know
 The all-stupendous tale,—that Birth,
 That Life, that Death ! And all, the earth
 Shuddered at,—all, the heavens grew black
 Rather than see ; all, nature's rack
 And throe at dissolution's brink
 Attested,—all took place, you think,
 Only to give our joys a zest,
 And prove our sorrows for the best ?
 We differ, then ! Where I, still pale
 And heartstruck at the dreadful tale,
 Waiting to hear God's voice declare
 What horror followed for my share,
 As implicated in the deed,
 Apart from other sins,—concede
 That if He blacked out in a blot
 My brief life's pleasantness, 'twere not

¹ A name for the god.

So very disproportionate !
 Or there might be another fate—
 I certainly could understand
 (If fancies were the thing in hand)
 How God might save, at that day's price,
 The impure in their impurities,
 Give licence formal and complete
 To choose the fair and pick the sweet.
 But there be certain words, broad, plain,
 Uttered again and yet again,
 Hard to mistake or overgloss—
 Announcing this world's gain for loss,
 And bidding us reject the same :
 The whole world lieth (they proclaim)
 In wickedness,—come out of it !
 Turn a deaf ear, if you think fit,
 But I who thrill through every nerve
 At thought of what deaf ears deserve—
 How do you counsel in the case ?

IX.

"I'd take, by all means, in your place,
 "The safe side, since it so appears :
 "Deny myself, a few brief years,
 "The natural pleasure, leave the fruit
 "Or cut the plant up by the root.
 "Remember what a martyr said
 "On the rude tablet overhead !
 "'I was born sickly, poor and mean,
 "'A slave : no misery could screen
 "'The holders of the pearl of price
 "'From Cæsar's envy ; therefore twice
 "'I fought with beasts, and three times saw
 "'My children suffer by his law ;
 "'At last my own release was earned :
 "'I was some time in being burned,
 "'But at the close a Hand came through
 "'The fire above my head, and drew
 "'My soul to Christ, whom now I see.
 "'Sergius, a brother, writes for me
 "'This testimony on the wall—
 "'For me, I have forgot it all.'
 "'You say right ; this were not so hard !
 "'And since one nowise is debarred
 "'From this, why not escape some sins
 "'By such a method ?"

X.

Then begins
 To the old point revulsion new—
 (For 'tis just this I bring you to)
 If after all we should mistake,
 And so renounce life for the sake
 Of death and nothing else ? You hear
 Each friend we jeered at, send the jeer
 Back to ourselves with good effect—
 "There were my beetles to collect !
 "My box—a trifle, I confess,
 "But here I hold it, ne'ertheless !"
 Poor idiots, (let us pluck up heart
 And answer) we, the better part
 Have chosen, though 'twere only hope,—
 Nor envy moles like you that grope
 Amid your veritable muck,
 More than the grasshoppers would truck,
 For yours, their passionate life away,
 That spends itself in leaps all day
 To reach the sun, you want the eyes
 To see, as they the wings to rise
 And match the noble hearts of them !
 Thus the contemner we condemn,—
 And, when doubt strikes us, thus we ward
 Its stroke off, caught upon our guard,
 Not struck enough to overturn
 Our faith, but shake it—make us learn
 What I began with, and, I wis,
 End, having proved,—how hard it is To be a Christian !

XI.

"Proved, or not,
 'Howe'er you wis, small thanks, I wot,
 'You get of mine, for taking pains
 'To make it hard to me. Who gains
 'By that, I wonder ? Here I live
 'In trusting ease ; and here you drive
 'At causing me to lose what most
 'Yourself would mourn for had you lost !"

XII.

But, do you see, my friend, that thus
 You leave Saint Paul for Æschylus ?
 —Who made his Titan's arch-device
 The giving men blind hopes to spice
 The meal of life with, else devoured
 In bitter haste, while lo, death loured

Before them at the platter's edge !
 If faith should be, as I allege,
 Quite other than a condiment
 To heighten flavours with, or meant
 (Like that brave curry of his Grace)
 To take at need the victuals' place ?
 If, having dined, you would digest
 Besides, and turning to your rest
 Should find instead . . .

XIII.

Now, you shall see

And judge if a mere foppery
 Pricks on my speaking ! I resolve
 To utter—yes, it shall devolve
 On you to hear as solemn, strange
 And dread a thing as in the range
 Of facts,—or fancies, if God will—E'er happened to our kind ! I still Stand in the cloud and, while it wraps
 My face, ought not to speak perhaps ;
 Seeing that if I carry through
 My purpose, if my words in you
 Find a live actual listener,
 My story, reason must aver
 False after all—the happy chance !
 While, if each human countenance
 I meet in London day by day,
 Be what I fear,—my warnings fray
 No one, and no one they convert,
 And no one helps me to assert
 How hard it is to really be
 A Christian, and in vacancy
 I pour this story !

XIV.

I commence

By trying to inform you, whence
 It comes that every Easter-night
 As now, I sit up, watch, till light,
 Upon those chimney-stacks and roofs,
 Give, through my window-pane, grey proofs
 That Easter-day is breaking slow.
 On such a night three years ago,
 It chanced that I had cause to cross
 The common, where the chapel was,
 Our friend spoke of, the other day—
 You've not forgotten, I dare say.

I fell to musing of the time.
 So close, the blessed matin-prime
 All hearts leap up at, in some guise—
 One could not well do otherwise.
 Insensibly my thoughts were bent
 Toward the main point ; I overwent
 Much the same ground of reasoning
 As you and I just now. One thing
 Remained, however—one that tasked
 My soul to answer ; and I asked,
 Fairly and frankly, what might be
 That History, that Faith, to me
 —Me there—not me in some domain
 Built up and peopled by my brain,
 Weighing its merits as one weighs Mere theories for blame or praise,
 —The kingcraft of the Lucumons,¹
 Or Fourier's scheme, its pros and cons,—
 But my faith there, or none at all.
 "How were my case, now, did I fall
 "Dead here, this minute—should I lie
 "Faithful or faithless?" Note that I Inclined thus ever !—little prone
 For instance, when I lay alone
 In childhood, to go calm to sleep
 And leave a closet where might keep
 Its watch perdue some murderer
 Waiting till twelve o'clock to stir,
 As good authentic legends tell :
 "He might : but how improbable !
 "How little likely to deserve
 "The pains and trial to the nerve
 "Of thrusting head into the dark !" —
 Urged my old nurse, and bade me mark
 Beside, that, should the dreadful scout
 Really lie hid there, and leap out
 At first turn of the rusty key,
 Mine were small gain that she could see,
 Killed not in bed but on the floor,
 And losing one night's sleep the more.
 I tell you, I would always burst
 The door ope, know my fate at first.
 This time, indeed, the closet penned
 No such assassin : but a friend
 Rather, peeped out to guard me, fit
 For counsel, Common Sense, to wit,

Who said a good deal that might pass,— Heartening, impartial too, it was,
 Judge else : “ For, soberly now,—who “ Should be a Christian if not you ? ” (Hear how he smoothed me down.) “ One takes
 “ A whole life, sees what course it makes “ Mainly, and not by fits and starts—
 “ In spite of stoppage which imparts
 “ Fresh value to the general speed.
 “ A life, with none, would fly indeed :
 “ Your progressing is slower—right !
 “ We deal with progress and not flight.
 “ Through baffling senses passionate,
 “ Fancies as restless,—with a freight
 “ Of knowledge cumbersome enough
 “ To sink your ship when waves grow rough,
 “ Though meant for ballast in the hold,—
 “ I find, ’mid dangers manifold,
 “ The good bark answers to the helm
 “ Where faith sits, easier to o’erwhelm
 “ Than some stout peasant’s heavenly guide,
 “ Whose hard head could not, if it tried,
 “ Conceive a doubt, nor understand “ How senses hornier than his hand
 “ Should ’tice the Christian off his guard.
 “ More happy ! But shall we award “ Less honour to the hull which, dogged
 “ By storms, a mere wreck, waterlogged,
 “ Masts by the board, her bulwarks gone
 “ And stanchions going, yet bears on,—
 “ Than to mere life-boats, built to save,
 “ And triumph o’er the breaking wave ?
 “ Make perfect your good ship as these,
 “ And what were her performances ! ”
 I added—“ Would the ship reach home !
 “ I wish indeed ‘ God’s kingdom come—’
 “ The day when I shall see appear
 “ His bidding, as my duty, clear “ From doubt ! And it shall dawn, that
 day,
 “ Some future season ; Easter may “ Prove, not impossibly, the time—
 “ Yes, that were striking—fates would chime
 “ So aptly ! Easter-morn, to bring
 “ The Judgment !—deeper in the spring
 “ Than now, however, when there’s snow
 “ Capping the hills ; for earth must show

“ All signs of meaning to pursue
 “ Her tasks as she was wont to do
 “ —The skylark, taken by surprise
 “ As we ourselves, shall recognize “ Sudden the end. For suddenly
 “ It comes ; the dreadfulness must be
 “ In that ; all warrants the belief—
 “ ‘ At night it cometh like a thief.’
 “ I fancy why the trumpet blows ;
 “ —Plainly, to wake one. From repose
 “ We shall start up, at last awake
 “ From life, that insane dream we take
 “ For waking now, because it seems.
 “ And as, when now we wake from dreams,
 “ We laugh, while we recall them, ‘ Fool,
 “ ‘ To let the chance slip, linger cool
 “ ‘ When such adventure offered ! Just “ ‘ A bridge to cross, a dwarf to thrust
 “ ‘ Aside, a wicked mage to stab—
 “ ‘ And, lo ye, I had kissed Queen Mab ! ’
 “ So shall we marvel why we grudged
 “ Our labour here, and idly judged “ Of heaven, we might have gained, but lose !
 “ Lose ? Talk of loss, and I refuse
 “ To plead at all ! You speak no worse
 “ Nor better than my ancient nurse
 When she would tell me in my youth
 “ I well deserved that shapes uncouth
 “ Frighted and teased me in my sleep :
 “ Why could I not in memory keep “ Her precept for the evil’s cure ?
 Pinch your own arm, boy, and be sure You’ll wake forthwith ! ”

And as I said

This nonsense, throwing back my head
 With light complacent laugh, I found
 Suddenly all the midnight round
 One fire. The dome of heaven had stood
 As made up of a multitude
 Of handbreadth cloudlets, one vast rack
 Of ripples infinite and black,
 From sky to sky. Sudden there went,
 Like horror and astonishment,
 A fierce vindictive scribble of red
 Quick flame across, as if one said

(The angry scribe of Judgment) "There—
 "Burn it!" And straight I was aware
 That the whole ribwork round, minute
 Cloud touching cloud beyond compute,
 Was tinted, each with its own spot
 Of burning at the core, till clot
 Jammed against clot, and spilt its fire
 Over all heaven, which 'gan suspire
 As fanned to measure equable,—
 Just so great conflagrations kill
 Night overhead, and rise and sink,
 Reflected. Now the fire would shrink
 And wither off the blasted face
 Of heaven, and I distinct might trace
 The sharp black ridgy outlines left
 Unburned like network—then, each cleft
 The fire had been sucked back into,
 Regorged, and out it surging flew
 Furiously, and night writhed inflamed,
 Till, tolerating to be tamed'
 No longer, certain rays world-wide
 Shot downwardly. On every side
 Caught past escape, the earth was lit;
 As if a dragon's nostril split
 And all his famished ire o'erflowed;
 Then, as he winced at his lord's goad,
 Back he inhaled: whereat I found
 The clouds into vast pillars bound,
 Based on the corners of the earth,
 Propping the skies at top: a dearth
 Of fire i' the violet intervals,
 Leaving exposed the utmost walls
 Of time, about to tumble in
 And end the world.

XVI.

I felt begin
 The Judgment-Day: to retrocede
 Was too late now. "In very deed,"
 (I uttered to myself) "that Day!"
 The intuition burned away
 All darkness from my spirit too:
 There, stood I, found and fixed, I knew,
 Choosing the world. The choice was made;
 And naked and disguiseless stayed,
 And unevadable, the fact.
 My brain held all the same compact
 Its senses, nor my heart declined
 Its office; rather, both combined

To help me in this juncture. I
 Lost not a second,—agony
 Gave boldness: since my life had end
 And my choice with it—best defend,
 Applaud both! I resolved to say,
 "So was I framed by thee, such way
 "I put to use thy senses here!
 "It was so beautiful, so near,
 "Thy world,—what could I then but choose
 "My part there? Nor did I refuse "To look above the transient boon
 "Of time; but it was hard so soon
 "As in a short life, to give up
 "Such beauty: I could put the cup
 "Undrained of half its fulness, by;
 "But, to renounce it utterly,
 "—That was too hard! Nor did the cry
 "Which bade renounce it, touch my brain
 "Authentically deep and plain
 "Enough to make my lips let go.
 "But Thou, who knowest all, dost know "Whether I was not, life's brief while,
 "Endeavouring to reconcile
 "Those lips (too tardily, alas!)
 "To letting the dear remnant pass,
 "One day,—some drops of earthly good
 "Untasted! Is it for this mood,
 "That Thou, whose earth delights so well,
 "Hast made its complement a hell?"

XVII.

A final belch of fire like blood,
 Overbroke all heaven in one flood
 Of doom. Then fire was sky, and sky
 Fire, and both, one brief ecstasy,
 Then ashes. But I heard no noise
 (Whatever was) because a voice
 Beside me spoke thus, "Life is done,
 "Time ends, Eternity's begun,
 "And thou art judged for evermore."

XVIII.

I looked up; all seemed as before;
 Of that cloud-Tophet overhead
 No trace was left: I saw instead
 The common round me, and the sky
 Above, stretched drear and empty

Of life. 'Twas the last watch of night,
Except what brings the morning quite;
When the armed angel, conscience-clear,
His task nigh done, leans o'er his spear
And gazes on the earth he guards,
Safe one night more through all its wards,
Till God relieve him at his post.

"A dream—a waking dream at most!"
(I spoke out quick, that I might shake
The horrid nightmare off, and wake.)

"The world gone, yet the world is here?"

"Are not all things as they appear?"

"Is Judgment past for me alone?"

"—And where had place the great white
throne?"

"The rising of the quick and dead?"

"Where stood they, small and great? Who read

"The sentence from the opened book?"

So, by degrees, the blood forsook
My heart, and let it beat afresh;
I knew I should break through the mesh
Of horror, and breathe presently:
When, lo, again, the voice by me!

I saw . . . Oh brother, 'mid far sands
The palm-tree-cinctured city stands,
Bright-white beneath, as heaven, bright-blue,
Leans o'er it, while the years pursue
Their course, unable to abate
Its paradisaal laugh at fate!
One morn,—the Arab staggers blind
O'er a new tract of death, calcined
To ashes, silence, nothingness,—
And strives, with dizzy wits, to guess
Whence fell the blow. What if, 'twixt skies
And prostrate earth, he should surprise
The imaged vapour, head to foot,
Surveying, motionless and mute,
Its work, ere, in a whirlwind rapt
It vanish up again?—So hapt
My chance. He stood there. Like the smoke
Pillared o'er Sodom, when day broke,—
I saw Him. One magnific pall
Mantled in massive fold and fall
His head, and coiled in snaky swaths
About His feet: night's black, that bathes

All else, broke, grizzled with despair,
Against the soul of blackness there.
A gesture told the mood within—
That wrapped right hand which bared the chin,
That intense meditation fixed
On His procedure,—pity mixed
With the fulfilment of decree.
Motionless, thus, He spoke to me,
Who fell before His feet, a mass,
No man now.

xx.

"All is come to pass.

"Such shows are over for each soul
"They had respect to. In the roll
"Of Judgment which convinced mankind
"Of sin, stood many, bold and blind,
"Terror must burn the truth into:
"Their fate for them!—thou hadst to do
"With absolute omnipotence,
"Able its judgments to dispense
"To the whole race, as every one
"Were its sole object. Judgment done,
"God is, thou art,—the rest is hurled
"To nothingness for thee. This world,
"This finite life, thou hast preferred,
"In disbelief of God's plain word,
"To heaven and to infinity.
"Here the probation was for thee,
"To show thy soul the earthly mixed
"With heavenly, it must choose betwixt.
"The earthly joys lay palpable,—
"A taint, in each, distinct as well;
"The heavenly flitted, faint and rare,
"Above them, but as truly were
"Taintless, so, in their nature, best.
"Thy choice was earth: thou didst attest
"Twas fitter spirit should subserve
"The flesh, than flesh refine to nerve "Beneath the spirit's play. Advance
"No claim to their inheritance
"Who chose the spirit's fugitive
"Brief gleams, and yearned, 'This were to live
"Indeed, if rays, completely pure
"From flesh that dulls them, could endure,—
"Not shoot in meteor-light athwart
"Our earth, to show how cold and swart
"It lies beneath their fire, but stand
"As stars do, destined to expand,

" 'Prove veritable worlds, our home !'
 "Thou saidst,— 'Let spirit star the dome
 " 'Of sky, that flesh may miss no peak,
 " 'No nook of earth,—I shall not seek
 " 'Its service further !' Thou art shut "Out of the heaven of spirit ; glut
 "Thy sense upon the world : 'tis thine
 "For ever—take it !"

XXI.

"How ? Is mine,
 "The world ?" (I cried, while my soul broke Out in a transport.) "Hast Thou spoke "Plainly in that ? Earth's exquisite "Treasures of wonder and delight,
 "For me ?"

XXII.

The austere voice returned,—
 "So soon made happy ? Hadst thou learned
 "What God accounteth happiness,
 "Thou wouldst not find it hard to guess
 "What hell may be his punishment
 "For those who doubt if God invent
 "Better than they. Let such men rest
 "Content with what they judged the best.
 "Let the unjust usurp at will :
 "The filthy shall be filthy still :
 "Miser, there waits the gold for thee !
 "Hater, indulge thine enmity !
 "And thou, whose heaven self-ordained
 "Was, to enjoy earth unrestrained,
 "Do it ! Take all the ancient show !
 "The woods shall wave, the rivers flow,
 "And men apparently pursue
 "Their works, as they were wont to do,
 "While living in probation yet.
 "I promise not thou shalt forget
 "The past, now gone to its account ;
 "But leave thee with the old amount
 "Of faculties, nor less nor more,
 "Unvisited, as heretofore,
 "By God's free spirit, that makes an end.
 "So, once more, take thy world ! Expend "Eternity upon its shows,
 "Flung thee as freely as one rose
 "Out of a summer's opulence,
 "Over the Eden-barrier whence
 "Thou art excluded. Knock in vain !"

XXIII.

I sat up. All was still again.
 I breathed free : to my heart, back fled
 The warmth. "But, all the world !"—I said,
 I stooped and picked a leaf of fern,
 And recollected I might learn
 From books, how many myriad sorts
 Of fern exist, to trust reports,
 Each as distinct and beautiful
 As this, the very first I cull.
 Think, from the first leaf to the last !
 Conceive, then, earth's resources ! Vast Exhaustless beauty, endless change
 Of wonder ! And this foot shall range
 Alps, Andes,—and this eye devour
 The bee-bird and the aloë-flower ?

XXIV.

Then the voice, "Welcome so to rate
 "The arras-folds that variegates
 "The earth, God's antechamber, well !
 "The wise, who waited there, could tell
 "By these, what royalties in store
 "Lay one step past the entrance-door.
 "For whom, was reckoned, not too much,
 "This life's munificence ? For such "As thou,—a race, whereof scarce one
 "Was able, in a million,
 "To feel that any marvel lay
 "In objects round his feet all day ;
 "Scarce one, in many millions more,
 "Willing, if able, to explore
 "The secreter, minuter charm !
 "—Brave souls, a fern-leaf could disarm
 "Of power to cope with God's intent,—
 "Or scared if the south firmament
 "With north-fire did its wings reflexed !
 "All partial beauty was a pledge "Of beauty in its plenitude :
 "But since the pledge sufficed thy mood,
 "Retain it ! plenitude be theirs
 "Who looked above !"

XXV.

Though sharp despairs
 Shot through me, I held up, bore on.
 "What matter though my trust were gone
 "From natural things ? Henceforth my part
 "Be less with nature than with art !"

'For art supplants, gives mainly worth
'To nature ; 'tis man stamps the earth—
'And I will seek his impress, seek
'The statuary of the Greek,
'Italy's painting—there my choice
'Shall fix !"

XXVI.

"Obtain it !" said the voice,
—The one form with its single act,
'Which sculptors laboured to abstract,
'The one face, painters tried to draw,
'With its one look, from throngs they saw.
'And that perfection in their soul,
'These only hinted at ? The whole,
'They were but parts of ? What each laid
'His claim to glory on ?—afraid
'His fellow-men should give him rank
'By mere tentatives which he shrank
'Smitten at heart from, all the more,
'That gazers pressed in to adore !
'Shall I be judged by only these ?'
'If such his soul's capacities,
'Even while he trod the earth,—think, now,
'What pomp in Buonarroti's brow,
'With its new palace-brain where dwells
'Superb the soul, unvexed by cells
'That crumbled with the transient clay !
'What visions will his right hand's sway
'Still turn to forms, as still they burst
'Upon him ? How will he quench thirst,
'Titanically infantine,
'Laid at the breast of the Divine ?
'Does it confound thee,—this first page
'Emblazoning man's heritage ?—
'Can this alone absorb thy sight,
'As pages were not infinite,—
'Like the omnipotence which tasks
'Itself to furnish all that asks
'The soul it means to satiate ?
'What was the world, the starry state
'Of the broad skies,—what, all displays
'Of power and beauty intermixed,
'Which now thy soul is chained betwixt,—
'What else than needful furniture
'For life's first stage ? God's work, be sure,
'No more spreads wasted, than falls scant !
'He filled, did not exceed, man's want

VOL. I.

"Of beauty in this life. But through 'Life pierce,—and what has earth to do,
'Its utmost beauty's appanage,
'With the requirement of next stage ?
'Did God pronounce earth 'very good' ?
'Needs must it be, while understood
'For man's preparatory state ;
'Nought here to heighten nor abate ;
'Transfer the same completeness here,
'To serve a new state's use,—and drear
'Deficiency gapes every side !
'The good, tried once, were bad, retired.
'See the enwrapping rocky niche,
'Sufficient for the sleep in which
'The lizard breathes for ages safe :
'Split the mould—and as light would chafe
'The creature's new world-widened sense,
'Dazzled to death at evidence
'Of all the sounds and sights that broke
'Innumerable at the chisel's stroke,—
'So, in God's eye, the earth's first stuff
'Was, neither more nor less, enough
'To house man's soul, man's need fulfil.
'Man reckoned it immeasurable ?
'So thinks the lizard of his vault !
'Could God be taken in default,
'Short of contrivances, by you,—
'Or reached, ere ready to pursue
'His progress through eternity ?
'That chambered rock, the lizard's world,
'Your easy mallet's blow has hurled
'To nothingness for ever ; so,
'Has God abolished at a blow
'This world, wherein his saints were pent,—
'Who, though found grateful and content,
'With the provision there, as thou,
'Yet knew he would not disallow
'Their spirit's hunger, felt as well,—
'Unsated,—not unsatable,
'As paradise gives proof. Deride
'Their choice now, thou who sit'st outside !"

XXVII.

I cried in anguish, "Mind, the mind,
'So miserably cast behind,
'To gain what had been wisely lost !
'Oh, let me strive to make the most "Of the poor stunted soul, I nipped

 "Of budding wings, else now equipped "For voyage from summer isle to isle !
 "And though she needs must reconcile
 "Ambition to the life on ground,
 "Still, I can profit by late found
 "But precious knowledge. Mind is best--
 "I will seize mind, forego the rest,
 "And try how far my tethered strength
 "May crawl in this poor breadth and length.
 "Let me, since I can fly no more,
 "At least spin dervish-like about "(Till giddy rapture almost doubt
 "I fly) through circling sciences,
 "Philosophies and histories
 "Should the whirl slacken there, then verse,
 "Fining to music, shall asperse
 "Fresh and fresh fire-dew, till I strain
 "Intoxicate, half-break my chain !
 "Not joyless, though more favoured feet
 "Stand calm, where I want wings to beat
 "The floor. At least earth's bond is broke !"

XXVIII

Then, (sickening even while I spoke)
 "Let me alone ! No answer, pray,
 "To this ! I know what Thou wilt say !
 "All still is earth's,--to know, as much
 "As feel its truths, which if we touch
 "With sense, or apprehend in soul,
 "What matter ? I have reached the goal--
 "'Where to does knowledge serve !' will burn
 "My eyes, too sure, at every turn !
 "I cannot look back now, nor stake
 "Bliss on the race, for running's sake.
 "The goal's a ruin like the rest !--
 "And so much worse thy latter quest," (Added the voice) "that even on earth
 "Whenever, in man's soul, had birth
 "Those intuitions, grasps of guess,
 "Which pull the more into the less,
 "Making the finite comprehend
 "Infinity,--the bard would spend
 "Such praise alone, upon his craft,
 "As, when wind-lyres obey the waft,
 "Goes to the craftsman who arranged
 "The seven strings, changed them and re-changed--

"Knowing it was the South that harped.
 "He felt his song, in singing, warped ;
 "Distinguished his and God's part : whence
 "A world of spirit as of sense
 "Was plain to him, yet not too plain,
 "Which he could traverse, not remain
 "A guest in :--else were permanent
 "Heaven on the earth its gleams were meant "To sting with hunger for full light,--
 "Made visible in verse, despite "The veiling weakness,--truth by means "Of fable, showing while it screens,--
 "Since highest truth, man e'er supplied,
 "Was ever fable on outside.
 "Such gleams made bright the earth an age ;
 "Now the whole sun's his heritage !
 "Take up thy world, it is allowed,
 "Thou who hast entered in the cloud !"

XXIX.

Then I--"Behold, my spirit bleeds,
 "Catches no more at broken reeds,--
 "But lilies flower those reeds above :
 "I let the world go, and take love !
 "Love survives in me, albeit those
 "I love be henceforth masks and shows,
 "Not living men and women : still
 "I mind how love repaired all ill,
 "Cured wrong, soothed grief, made earth amends
 "With parents, brothers, children, friends !
 "Some semblance of a woman yet
 "With eyes to help me to forget,
 "Shall look on me ; and I will match
 "De parted love with love, attach "Old memories to new dreams, nor scorn
 "The poorest of the grains of corn
 "I save from shipwreck on this isle,
 "Trusting its barrenness may smile
 "With happy foodful green one day,
 "More precious for the pains. I pray,--
 "I leave to love, only !"

XXX.

At the word,
 The form, I looked to have been stirred
 With pity and approval, rose
 O'er me, as when the headsmen throws

Axe over shoulder to make end—
 I fell prone, letting Him expend
 His wrath, while thus the inflicting voice
 Smote me. "Is this thy final choice?
 "Love is the best? 'Tis somewhat late!
 "And all thou dost enumerate
 "Of power and beauty in the world,
 "The mightiness of love was curled
 "Inextricably round about.
 "Love lay within it and without,
 "To clasp thee,—but in vain! Thy soul
 "Still shrunk from Him who made the whole,
 "Still set deliberate aside
 "His love!—Now take love! Well betide
 "Thy tardy conscience! Haste to take "The show of love for the name's sake,
 "Remembering every moment Who,
 "Beside creating thee unto
 "These ends, and these for thee, was said
 "To undergo death in thy stead
 "In flesh like thine: so ran the tale.
 "What doubt in thee could countervail
 "Belief in it? Upon the ground
 "'That in the story had been found "'Too much love! How could God love
 so?"
 "He who in all his works below
 "Adapted to the needs of man,
 "Made love the basis of the plan,—
 "Did love, as was demonstrated:
 "While man, who was so fit instead
 "To hate, as every day gave proof,—
 "Man thought man, for his kind's behoof,
 "Both could and did invent that scheme
 "Of perfect love: 'twould well bescem
 "Cain's nature thou wast wont to praise,
 "Not tally with God's usual ways!"

XXXI.

And I cowered deprecatingly—
 "Thou Love of God! Or let me die,
 "Or grant what shall seem heaven almost!
 "Let me not know that all is lost,
 "Though lost it be—leave me not tied
 "To this despair, this corpse-like bride!
 "Let that old life seem mine—no more—
 "With limitation as before,

"With darkness, hunger, toil, distress:
 "Be all the earth a wilderness!
 "Only let me go on, go on,
 "Still hoping ever and anon
 "To reach one eve the Better Land!"

XXXII.

Then did the form expand, expand—
 I knew Him through the dread disguise
 As the whole God within His eyes Embraced me.

XXXIII.

When I lived again,
 The day was breaking,—the grey plain
 I rose from, silvered thick with dew.
 Was this a vision? False or true?
 Since then, three varied years are spent,
 And commonly my mind is bent
 To think it was a dream—be sure
 A mere dream and distemperature—
 The last day's watching: then the night,—
 The shock of that strange Northern Light
 Set my head swimming, bred in me
 A dream. And so I live, you see,
 Go through the world, try, prove, reject,
 Prefer, still struggling to effect
 My warfare; happy that I can
 Be crossed and thwarted as a man,
 Not left in God's contempt apart,
 With ghastly smooth life, dead at heart,
 Fame in earth's paddock as her prize.
 Thank God, she still each method tries
 To catch me, who may yet escape,
 She knows,—the fiend in angel's shape!
 Thank God, no paradise stands barred
 To entry, and I find it hard
 To be a Christian, as I said!
 Still every now and then my head
 Raised glad, sinks mournful—all grows drear

Spite of the sunshine, while I fear
 And think, "How dreadful to be grudged
 No ease henceforth, as one that's judged.
 Condemned to earth for ever, shut
 From heaven!"

But Easter-Day breaks! But Christ rises! Mercy every way
 Is infinite,—and who can say?

MEN AND WOMEN.

184—185—

"TRANSCENDENTALISM: A POEM IN TWELVE BOOKS."

STOP playing, poet ! May a brother speak ?
'Tis you speak, that's your error. Song's our art :

Whereas you please to speak these naked
thoughts

Instead of draping them in sights and sounds.
—True thoughts, good thoughts, thoughts fit to treasure up !

But why such long prolusion and display,
Such turning and adjustment of the harp,
And taking it upon your breast, at length,
Only to speak dry words across its strings ?
Stark-naked thought is in request enough :
Speak prose and hollo it till Europe hears !
The six-foot Swiss tube, braced about with lark,

Which helps the hunter's voice from Alp to Alp—

Exchange our harp for that,—who hinders you ?

But here's your fault ; grown men want thought, you think ;

Thought's what they mean by verse, and seek in verse.

Boys seek for images and melody,
Men must have reason—so, you aim at men.
Quite otherwise ! Objects throng our youth,
'tis true ;

We see and hear and do not wonder much :
If you could tell us what they mean, indeed !
As German Boehme¹ never cared for plants
Until it happened, a-walking in the fields,
He noticed all at once that plants could speak,
Nay, turned with loosened tongue to talk
with him.

That day the daisy had an eye indeed—Colloquized with the cowslip on such themes !

We find them extant yet in Jacob's prose.
But by the time youth slips a stage or two While reading prose in that tough book he wrote

(Collating and emendating the same
And settling on the sense most to our
mind),

We shut the clasps and find life's summer
past.

Then, who helps more, pray, to repair our loss—

Another Boehme with a tougher book
And subtler meanings of what roses say,—
Or some stout Mage like him of Halberstadt,² John, who made things Boehme wrote thoughts about ?

He with a "look you !" vents a brace of
rhymes,

And in there breaks the sudden rose herself,
Over us, under, round us every side,
Nay, in and out the tables and the chairs
And musty volumes, Boehme's book and
all,—

Buries us with a glory, young once more,
Pouring heaven into this shut house of life.

So come, the harp back to your heart
again !

You are a poem, though your poem's naught.

The best of all you showed before, believe,
Was your own boy-face o'er the finer chords
Bent, following the cherub at the top
That points to God with his paired half-moon wings.

who turned William Law's head.

and a chymist.

HOW IT STRIKES A CONTEMPORARY.

I ONLY knew one poet in my life :
And this, or something like it, was his way.

You saw go up and down Valladolid,
A man of mark, to know next time you saw.
His very serviceable suit of black
Was courtly once and conscientious still,
And many might have worn it, though none
did :

The cloak, that somewhat shone and showed the threads,

Had purpose, and the ruff, significance.
He walked and tapped the pavement with his cane,

Scenting the world, looking it full in face,
An old dog, bald and blindish, at his heels.
They turned up, now, the alley by the church,

That leads nowhither ; now, they breathed themselves

On the main promenade just at the wrong
time :

You'd come upon his scrutinizing hat,
Making a peaked shade blacker than itself
Against the single window spared some house
Intact yet with its mouldered Moorish work,—
Or else surprise the ferrel of his stick

Trying the mortar's temper 'tween the chinks
Of some new shop a-building, French and fine.

He stood and watched the cobbler at his trade,

The man who slices lemons into drink,
The coffee-roaster's brazier, and the boys
That volunteer to help him turn its winch.
He glanced o'er books on stalls with half an
eye,

And fly-leaf ballads on the vendor's string,
And broad-edge bold-print posters by the wall.

He took such cognizance of men and things,
If any beat a horse, you felt he saw ;
If any cursed a woman, he took note ;
Yet stared at nobody,—you stared at him,

And found, less to your pleasure than surprise,
He seemed to know you and expect as much.
So, next time that a neighbour's tongue was loosed,

It marked the shameful and notorious fact,
We had among us, not so much a spy,
As a recording chief-inquisitor,
The town's true master if the town but knew !
We merely kept a governor for form,
While this man walked about and took account
Of all thought, said and acted, then went home,

And wrote it fully to our Lord the King
Who has an itch to know things, he knows
why,

And reads them in his bedroom of a night.
Oh, you might smile ! there wanted not a
touch,

A tang of . . . well, it was not wholly ease
As back into your mind the man's look came.

Stricken in years a little,—such a brow
His eyes had to live under !—clear as flint
On either side the formidable nose
Curved, cut and coloured like an eagle's claw.
Had he to do with A.'s surprising fate ?
When altogether old B. disappeared
And young C. got his mistress,—was't our
friend,

His letter to the King, that did it all ?
What paid the bloodless man for so much pains ?

Our Lord the King has favourites manifold,
And shifts his ministry some once a month ;
Our city gets new governors at whiles,—
But never word or sign, that I could hear,
Notified to this man about the streets
The King's approval of those letters conned
The last thing duly at the dead of night.
Did the man love his office ? Frowned our Lord,

Exhorting when none heard—"Beseech me
not !

"Too far above my people,—beneath me !
"I set the watch,—how should the people
know ?

"Forget them, keep me all the more in
mind !"

Was some such understanding 'twixt the two ?

I found no truth in one report at least—
That if you tracked him to his home, down lanes

Beyond the Jewry, and as clean to pace,
You found he ate his supper in a room
Blazing with lights, four Titians on the wall,
And twenty naked girls to change his plate!
Poor man, he lived another kind of life
In that new stuccoed third house by the bridge,

Fresh-painted, rather smart than otherwise!
The whole street might o'erlook him as he sat,
Leg crossing leg, one foot on the dog's back,
Playing a decent cribbage with his maid (Jacynth, you're sure her name was) o'er the cheese

And fruit, three red halves of starved winter-pears,
Or treat of radishes in April. Nine,
Ten, struck the church clock, straight to bed went he.

My father, like the man of sense he was,
Would point him out to me a dozen times;
"St—St," he'd whisper, "the Corregidor!"
I had been used to think that personage
Was one with lacquered breeches, lustrous belt,
And feathers like a forest in his hat,
Who blew a trumpet and proclaimed the news,
Announced the bull-fights, gave each church its turn,
And memorized the miracle in vogue!
He had a great observance from us boys;
We were in error; that was not the man.

I'd like now, yet had haply been afraid,
To have just looked, when this man came to
die,

And seen who lined the clean gay garret-sides
And stood about the neat low truckle-bed,
With the heavenly manner of relieving guard.
Here had been, mark, the general-in-chief,
Thro' a whole campaign of the world's life
and death,

Doing the King's work all the dim day long,
In his old coat and up to knees in mud,
Smoked like a herring, dining on a crust,—

And, now the day was won, relieved at once!
No further show or need for that old coat,
You are sure, for one thing! Bless us, all the while

How sprucely we are dressed out, you and I!
A second, and the angels alter that.

Well, I could never write a verse,—could you?
Let's to the Prado and make the most of time.

ARTEMIS PROLOGIZES.

I AM a goddess of the ambrosial courts,
And save by Here, Queen of Pride, surpassed
By none whose temples whiten this the world.
Through heaven I roll my lucid moon along;
I shed in hell o'er my pale people peace;
On earth I, caring for the creatures, guard
Each pregnant yellow wolf and fox-bitch sleek,
And every feathered mother's callow brood,
And all that love green haunts and loneliness.
Of men, the chaste adore me, hanging crowns
Of poppies red to blackness, bell and stem,
Upon my image at Athenai here;
And this dead Youth, Asclepios bends above,
Was dearest to me. He, my buskined step
To follow through the wild-wood leafy ways,
And chase the panting stag, or swift with darts
Stop the swift ounce, or lay the leopard low,
Neglected homage to another god:
Whence Aphrodite, by no midnight smoke
Of tapers lulled, in jealousy despatched
A noisome lust that, as the gadbee stings,
Possessed his stepdame Phaidra for himself.
The son of Theseus her great absent spouse.
Hippolitos exclaiming in his rage
Against the fury of the Queen, she judged
Life insupportable; and, pricked at heart
An Amazonian stranger's race should dare!
To scorn her, perished by the murderous cord:
Yet, ere she perished, blasted in a scroll
The fame of him her swerving made not swerve.

And Theseus, read, returning, and believed;
And exiled, in the blindness of his wrath,
The man without a crime who, last as first,
Loyal, divulged not to his sire the truth.

Now Theseus from Poseidon had obtained
That of his wishes should be granted three,
And one he imprecated straight—"Alive
"May ne'er Hippolotos reach other lands!"
Poseidon heard, ai ai! And scarce the prince
Had stepped into the fixed boots of the car
That give the feet a stay against the strength
Of the Henetian horses, and around His body flung the rein, and urged their speed

Along the rocks and shingles of the shore,
When from the gaping wave a monster flung
His obscene body in the coursers' path.
These, mad with terror, as the sea-bull sprawled

Wallowing about their feet, lost care of him
That reared them; and the master-chariotpole

Snapping beneath their plunges like a reed,
Hippolotos, whose feet were trammelled fast,
Was yet dragged forward by the circling rein
Which either hand directed; nor they quenched
The frenzy of their flight before each trace,
Wheel-spoke and splinter of the woeful car,
Each boulder-stone, sharp stub and spiny shell,
Huge fish-bone wrecked and wreathed amid the sands

On that detested beach, was bright with blood
And morsels of his flesh: then fell the steeds
Head foremost, crashing in their mooned fronts,

Shivering with sweat, each white eye horror-
fixed.

His people, who had witnessed all afar,
Bore back the ruins of Hippolotos.
But when his sire, too swollen with pride, rejoiced

(Indomitable as a man foredoomed)
That vast Poseidon had fulfilled his prayer,
I, in a flood of glory visible,
Stood o'er my dying votary and, deed
By deed, revealed, as all took place, the
truth.

Then Theseus lay the woefullest of men;
And worthily; but ere the death-veils hid
His face, the murdered prince full pardon breathed

To his rash sire. Whereat Athenai wails.

So I, who ne'er forsake my votaries,
Lest in the cross-way none the honey-cake
Should tender, nor pour out the dog's hot life;
Lest at my fane the priests disconsolate
Should dress my image with some faded poor
Few crowns, made favours of, nor dare object
Such slackness to my worshippers who turn
Elsewhere the trusting heart and loaded hand,
As they had climbed Olumpus to report
Of Artemis and nowhere found her throne—
I interposed: and, this eventful night,— (While round the funeral pyre the populace Stood with fierce light on their black robes which bound

Each sobbing head, while yet their hair they clipped

O'er the dead body of their withered prince,
And, in his palace, Theseus prostrated
On the cold hearth, his brow cold as the slab
'Twas bruised on, groaned away the heavy grief—

As the pyre fell, and down the cross logs crashed

Sending a crowd of sparkles through the night,
And the gay fire, clate with mastery,

Towered like a serpent o'er the clotted jars
Of wine, dissolving oils and frankincense,
And splendid gums like gold),—my potency
Conveyed the perished man to my retreat
In the thrice-venerable forest here.

And this white-bearded sage who squeezes
now

The berried plant, is Phoibos' son of fame,
Asclepios, whom my radiant brother taught
The doctrine of each herb and flower and root,
To know their secret'st virtue and express
The saving soul of all: who so has soothed
With lavers the torn brow and murdered cheeks,

Composed the hair and brought its gloss
again,

And called the red bloom to the pale skin back,
And laid the strips and jagged ends of flesh
Even once more, and slacked the sinew's knot
Of every tortured limb—that now he lies
As if mere sleep possessed him underneath
These interwoven oaks and pines. Oh cheer
Divine presenter of the healing rod,

Thy snake, with ardent throat and lulling
 eye,
 Twines his lithe spires around ! I say, much cheer !
 Proceed thou with thy wisest pharmacies !
 And ye, white crowd of woodland sisternymphs,
 Ply, as the sage directs, these buds and leaves
 That strew the turf around the twain ! While I Await, in fitting silence, the event.

AN EPISTLE

CONTAINING THE STRANGE MEDICAL EXPERIENCE OF KARSHISH, THE ARAB PHYSICIAN.

KARSHISH, the picker-up of learning's crumbs,
 The not-incurious in God's handiwork
 (This man's flesh he hath admirably made,
 Blown like a bubble, kneaded like a paste,
 To coop up and keep down on earth a space
 That puff of vapour from his mouth, man's
 soul)

—To Abib, all-sagacious in our art,
 Breeder in me of what poor skill I boast,
 Like me inquisitive how pricks and cracks Befall the flesh through too much stress and strain,

Whereby the wily vapour fain would slip
 Back and rejoin its source before the term,—
 And aptest in contrivance (under God)
 To baffle it by deftly stopping such :—
 The vagrant Scholar to his Sage at home Sends greeting (health and knowledge, fame with peace)

Three samples of true snakestone—rarer still,
 One of the other sort, the melon-shaped,
 (But fitter, pounded fine, for charms than drugs)
 And writeth now the twenty-second time.

My journeyings were brought to Jericho :
 Thus I resume. Who studious in our art
 Shall count a little labour unrepaid ?
 I have shed sweat enough, left flesh and bone
 On many a flinty furlong of this land.
 Also, the country-side is all on fire

With rumours of a marching hitherward :
 Some say Vespasian cometh, some, his son.
 A black lynx snarled and pricked a tufted ear ;
 Lust of my blood inflamed his yellow balls :
 I cried and threw my staff and he was gone.
 Twice have the robbers stripped and beaten me,
 And once a town declared me for a spy ;
 But at the end, I reach Jerusalem,
 Since this poor covert where I pass the night,
 This Bethany, lies scarce the distance thence
 A man with plague-sores at the third degree Runs till he drops down dead. Thou laughest
 here !

'Sooth, it elates me, thus reposed and safe,
 To void the stuffing of my travel-scrip
 And share with thee whatever Jewry yields.
 A viscid choler is observable
 In tertians, I was nearly bold to say ;
 And falling-sickness hath a happier cure
 Than our school wots of: there's a spider here
 Weaves no web, watches on the ledge of tombs,
 Sprinkled with mottles on an ash-grey back ;
 Take five and drop them . . but who knows his mind,

The Syrian runagate I trust this to ?
 His service payeth me a sublimate
 Blown up his nose to help the ailing eye.
 Best wait : I reach Jerusalem at morn,
 There set in order my experiences,
 Gather what most deserves, and give thee all—
 Or I might add, Judæa's gum-tragacanth¹
 Scales off in purer flakes, shines clearer-grained,
 Cracks 'twixt the pistle and the porphyry,
 In fine exceeds our produce. Scalp-disease
 Confounds me, crossing so with leprosy—
 Thou hadst admired one sort I gained at Zoar—
 But zeal outruns discretion. Here I end.

Yet stay : my Syrian blinketh gratefully,
 Protesteth his devotion is my price—
 Suppose I write what harms not, though he steal ?

I half resolve to tell thee, yet I blush,
 What set me off a-writing first of all.
 An itch I had, a sting to write, a tang !

¹ A thick mucilage useful in pharmacy and trade.

For, be it this town's barrenness—or else
 The Man had something in the look of him—
 His case has struck me far more than 'tis worth.
 So, pardon if—(lest presently I lose
 In the great press of novelty at hand
 The care and pains this somehow stole from me)
 I bid thee take the thing while fresh in mind,
 Almost in sight—for, wilt thou have the truth?
 The very man is gone from me but now,
 Whose ailment is the subject of discourse.
 Thus then, and let thy better wit help all !

'Tis but a case of mania—subinduced
 By epilepsy, at the turning-point
 Of trance prolonged unduly some three days :
 When, by the exhibition of some drug
 Or spell, exorcization, stroke of art
 Unknown to me and which 'twere well to know,
 The evil thing out-breaking all at once
 Left the man whole and sound of body indeed,—
 But, flinging (so to speak) life's gates too wide,
 Making a clear house of it too suddenly,
 The first conceit that entered might inscribe
 Whatever it was minded on the wall
 So plainly at that vantage, as it were,
 (First come, first served) that nothing subsequent

Attaineth to erase those fancy-scrawls
 The just-returned and new-established soul
 Hath gotten now so thoroughly by heart
 That henceforth she will read or these or none.
 And first—the man's own firm conviction rests
 That he was dead (in fact they buried him)
 —That he was dead and then restored to life
 By a Nazarene physician of his tribe :
 —'Sayeth, the same bade " Rise," and he did rise.

"Such cases are diurnal," thou wilt cry.
 Not so this figment !—not, that such a fume,
 Instead of giving way to time and health,
 Should eat itself into the life of life,
 As saffron tingeth flesh, blood, bones and all !
 For see, how he takes up the after-life.
 The man—it is one Lazarus a Jew,
 Sanguine, proportioned, fifty years of age,
 The body's habit wholly laudable,
 As much, indeed, beyond the common health
 As he were made and put aside to show.

Think, could we penetrate by any drug
 And bathe the wearied soul and worried flesh,
 And bring it clear and fair, by three days' sleep !
 Whence has the man the balm that brightens
 all ?

This grown man eyes the world now like a
 child.

Some elders of his tribe, I should premise,
 Led in their friend, obedient as a sheep,
 To bear my inquisition. While they spoke,
 Now sharply, now with sorrow,—told the case,—

He listened not except I spoke to him,
 But folded his two hands and let them talk,
 Watching the flies that buzzed : and yet no fool.
 And that's a sample how his years must go.
 Look, if a beggar, in fixed middle-life,
 Should find a treasure,—can he use the same
 With straitened habits and with tastes starved
 small,

And take at once to his impoverished brain
 The sudden element that changes things,
 That sets the undreamed-of rapture at his hand
 And puts the cheap old joy in the scorned dust?
 Is he not such an one as moves to mirth—
 Warily parsimonious, when no need,
 Wasteful as drunkenness at undue times ?
 All prudent counsel as to what befits
 The golden mean, is lost on such an one :
 The man's fantastic will is the man's law.
 So here—we call the treasure knowledge, say,
 Increased beyond the fleshly faculty—
 Heaven opened to a soul while yet on earth,
 Earth forced on a soul's use while seeing
 heaven :

The man is witless of the size, the sum,
 The value in proportion of all things,
 Or whether it be little or be much.
 Discourse to him of prodigious armaments
 Assembled to besiege his city now,
 And of the passing of a mule with gourds—
 'Tis one ! Then take it on the other side,
 Speak of some trifling fact,—he will gaze rapt
 With stupor at its very littleness,
 (Far as I see) as if in that indeed
 He caught prodigious import, whole results ;
 And so will turn to us the bystanders
 In ever the same stupor (note this point)

That we too see not with his opened eyes.
Wonder and doubt come wrongly into play,
Preposterously, at cross purposes.

Should his child sicken unto death,—why,
look

For scarce abatement of his cheerfulness,
Or pretermission of the daily craft!
While a word, gesture, glance from that same
child

At play or in the school or laid asleep,
Will startle him to an agony of fear,
Exasperation, just as like. Demand
The reason why—" 'tis but a word," object—
"A gesture"—he regards thee as our lord
Who lived there in the pyramid alone,
Looked at us (dost thou mind?) when, being
young,

We both would unadvisedly recite
Some charm's beginning, from that book of his,

Able to bid the sun throb wide and burst
All into stars, as suns grown old are wont.
Thou and the child have each a veil alike Thrown o'er your heads, from under which ye both

Stretch your blind hands and trifle with a match

Over a mine of Greek fire, did ye know!
He holds on firmly to some thread of life—
(It is the life to lead forcedly)
Which runs across some vast distracting orb
Of glory on either side that meagre thread,
Which, conscious of, he must not enter yet—
The spiritual life around the earthly life:
The law of that is known to him as this,
His heart and brain move there, his feet stay
here.

So is the man perplexed with impulses
Sudden to start off crosswise, not straight on,
Proclaiming what is right and wrong across,
And not along, this black thread through the blaze—

"It should be" baulked by "here it cannot
be."

And off the man's soul springs into his face
As if he saw again and heard again
His sage that bade him "Rise" and he did rise.

Something, a word, a tick o' the blood within Admonishes: then back he sinks at once
To ashes, who was very fire before,
In sedulous recurrence to his trade
Whereby he earneth him the daily bread;
And studiously the humbler for that pride,
Professedly the faultier that he knows God's secret, while he holds the thread of
life.

Indeed the especial marking of the man
Is prone submission to the heavenly will—Seeing it, what it is, and why it is.
'Sayeth, he will wait patient to the last
For that same death which must restore his being
To equilibrium, body loosening soul
Divorced even now by premature full growth:
He will live, nay, it pleaseth him to live
So long as God please, and just how God
please.

He even seeketh not to please God more (Which meaneth, otherwise) than as God
please.

Hence, I perceive not he affects to preach
The doctrine of his sect whate'er it be,
Make proselytes as madmen thirst to do:
How can he give his neighbour the real
ground,

His own conviction? Ardent as he is—
Call his great truth a lie, why, still the old
"Be it as God please" reassureth him.
I probed the sore as thy disciple should:
"How, beast," said I, "this stolid carelessness

"Sufficeth thee, when Rome is on her march
"To stamp out like a little spark thy town,
"Thy tribe, thy crazy tale and thee at once?"
He merely looked with his large eyes on me.
The man is apathetic, you deduce?
Contrariwise, he loves both old and young,
Able and weak, affects the very brutes
And birds—how say I? flowers of the field—
As a wise workman recognizes tools
In a master's workshop, loving what they make.

Thus is the man as harmless as a lamb:
Only impatient, let him do his best,
At ignorance and carelessness and sin—

An indignation which is promptly curbed :
As when in certain travel I have feigned
To be an ignoramus in our art
According to some preconceived design,
And happed to hear the land's practitioners
Steeped in conceit sublimed by ignorance,
Prattle fantastically on disease,
Its cause and cure—and I must hold my peace !

Thou wilt object—Why have I not ere this Sought out the sage himself, the Nazarene
Who wrought this cure, inquiring at the source,

Conferring with the frankness that befits ?
Alas ! it grieveth me, the learned leech
Perished in a tumult many years ago,
Accused,—our learning's fate,—of wizardry,
Rebellion, to the setting up a rule
And creed prodigious as described to me.
His death, which happened when the earthquake fell

(Prefiguring, as soon appeared, the loss
To occult learning in our lord the sage
Who lived there in the pyramid alone)
Was wrought by the mad people—that's their wont !

On vain recourse, as I conjecture it,
To his tried virtue, for miraculous help—
How could he stop the earthquake ? That's their way !

The other imputations must be lies :
But take one, though I loathe to give it
thee,

In mere respect for any good man's fame.
(And after all, our patient Lazarus Is stark mad ; should we count on what he says ?

Perhaps not : though in writing to a leech
'Tis well to keep back nothing of a case.)
This man so cured regards the curer, then,
As—God forgive me !—who but God himself,
Creator and sustainer of the world,
That came and dwelt in flesh on it awhile !
—Sayeth that such an one was born and
lived,
Taught, healed the sick, broke bread at his own house,

Then died, with Lazarus by, for aught I know,

And yet was . . . what I said nor choose
repeat ;

And must have so avouched himself, in fact,
In hearing of this very Lazarus
Who saith—but why all this of what he saith ?
Why write of trivial matters, things of price
Calling at every moment for remark ?
I noticed on the margin of a pool
Blue-flowering borage, the Aleppo sort,
Aboundeth, very nitrous. It is strange !

Thy pardon for this long and tedious case,
Which, now that I review it, needs must seem Unduly dwelt on, prolixly set forth !
Nor I myself discern in what is writ
Good cause for the peculiar interest
And awe indeed this man has touched me
with.

Perhaps the journey's end, the weariness
Had wrought upon me first. I met him thus :
I crossed a ridge of short sharp broken hills
Like an old lion's cheek teeth. Out there came

A moon made like a face with certain spots
Multiform, manifold and menacing :
Then a wind rose behind me. So we met
In this old sleepy town at unaware,
The man and I. I send thee what is writ.
Regard it as a chance, a matter risked
To this ambiguous Syrian—he may lose,
Or steal, or give it thee with equal good.
Jerusalem's repose shall make amends
For time this letter wastes, thy time and
mine ;

Till when, once more thy pardon and farewell !

The very God ! think, Abib ; dost thou
think ?

So, the All-Great, were the All-Loving too—
So, through the thunder comes a human voice Saying, " O heart I made, a heart beats here !
" Face, my hands fashioned, see it in myself !
" Thou hast no power nor mayst conceive of
mine,

" But love I gave thee, with myself to love,
" And thou must love me who have died for
thee ! "

The madman saith He said so : it is strange.

JOHANNES AGRICOLA IN MEDITATION.

THERE'S heaven above, and night by night
I look right through its gorgeous roof;
No suns and moons though e'er so bright
Avail to stop me; splendour-proof
I keep the broods of stars aloof:
For I intend to get to God,
For 'tis to God I speed so fast,
For in God's breast, my own abode,
Those shoals of dazzling glory, passed,
I lay my spirit down at last.
I lie where I have always lain,
God smiles as he has always smiled;
Ere suns and moons could wax and wane,
Ere stars were thundergirt, or piled
The heavens, God thought on me his
child;
Ordained a life for me, arrayed
Its circumstances every one
To the minutest; ay, God said
This head this hand should rest upon
Thus, ere he fashioned star or sun.
And having thus created me,
Thus rooted me, he bade me grow,
Guiltless for ever, like a tree
That buds and blooms, nor seeks to
know
The law by which it prospers so:
But sure that thought and word and deed
All go to swell his love for me,
Me, made because that love had need
Of something irreversibly
Pledged solely its content to be.
Yes, yes, a tree which must ascend,
No poison-gourd foredoomed to stoop!
I have God's warrant, could I blend
All hideous sins, as in a cup,
To drink the mingled venoms up;
Secure my nature will convert
The draught to blossoming gladness fast:
While sweet dew turns to the gourd's hurt,
And bloat, and while they bloat it, blast,
As from the first its lot was cast.
For as I lie, smiled on, full-fed
By unexhausted power to bless,

I gaze below on hell's fierce bed,
And those its waves of flame oppress,
Swarming in ghastly wretchedness;
Whose life on earth aspired to be
One altar-smoke, so pure!—to win
If not love like God's love for me,
At least to keep his anger in;
And all their striving turned to sin.
Priest, doctor, hermit, monk grown white
With prayer, the broken-hearted nun,
The martyr, the wan acolyte,
The incense-swinging child,—undone
Before God fashioned star or sun!
God, whom I praise; how could I praise,
If such as I might understand,
Make out and reckon on his ways,
And bargain for his love, and stand,
Paying a price, at his right hand?

PICTOR IGNOTUS.

FLORENCE, 15—.

I COULD have painted pictures like that youth's
Ye praise so. How my soul springs up!
No bar
Stayed me—ah, thought which saddens while it soothes!
—Never did fate forbid me, star by star,
To outburst on your night with all my gift
Of fires from God: nor would my flesh have shrunk
From seconding my soul, with eyes uplift
And wide to heaven, or, straight like thunder, sunk
To the centre, of an instant; or around
Turned calmly and inquisitive, to scan
The licence and the limit, space and bound,
Allowed to truth made visible in man.
And, like that youth ye praise so, all I saw,
Over the canvas could my hand have flung;
Each face obedient to its passion's law,
Each passion clear proclaimed without a
tongue;
Whether Hope rose at once in all the blood,
A-tiptoe for the blessing of embrace,

Or Rapture drooped the eyes, as when her brood
 Pull down the nesting dove's heart to its
 place ;
 Or Confidence lit swift the forehead up,
 And locked the mouth fast, like a castle braved,—
 O human faces, hath it spilt, my cup?
 What did ye give me that I have not saved Nor will I say I have not dreamed (how
 well!)
 Of going—I, in each new picture,—forth,
 As, making new hearts beat and bosoms
 swell,
 To Pope or Kaiser, East, West, South, or North,
 Bound for the calmly-satisfied great State,
 Or glad aspiring little burgh, it went,
 Flowers cast upon the car which bore the freight,
 Through old streets named afresh from the event,
 Till it reached home, where learned age should greet
 My face, and youth, the star not yet distinct
 Above his hair, lie learning at my feet!—
 Oh, thus to live, I and my picture, linked With love about, and praise, till life should
 end,
 And then not go to heaven, but linger here,
 Here on my earth, earth's every man my
 friend,—
 The thought grew frightful, 'twas so wildly
 dear!
 But a voice changed it. Glimpses of such sights
 Have scared me, like the revels through a door
 Of some strange house of idols at its rites!
 This world seemed not the world it was
 before :
 Mixed with my loving trusting ones, there trooped
 . . . Who summoned those cold faces that began
 To press on me and judge me? Though I stooped
 Shrinking, as from the soldiery a nun,
 They drew me forth, and spite of me . . .
 enough!
 These buy and sell our pictures, take and give,
 Count them for garniture and household-stuff,
 And where they live needs must our pictures live
 And see their faces, listen to their prate,
 Partakers of their daily pettiness,
 Discussed of,—“ This I love, or this I hate,
 “ This likes me more, and this affects me
 less ! ”
 Wherefore I chose my portion. If at whiles
 My heart sinks, as monotonous I paint
 These endless cloisters and eternal aisles
 With the same series, Virgin, Babe and
 Saint,
 With the same cold calm beautiful regard,—
 At least no merchant traffics in my heart ;
 The sanctuary's gloom at least shall ward
 Vain tongues from where my pictures stand
 apart :
 Only prayer breaks the silence of the shrine
 While, blackening in the daily candle-
 smoke,
 They moulder on the damp wall's travertine,¹
 ' Mid echoes the light footstep never woke.
 So, die my pictures ! surely, gently die !
 O youth, men praise so,—holds their praise its worth ?
 Blown harshly, keeps the trump its golden cry ?
 Tastes sweet the water with such specks of earth ?

FRA LIPPO LIPPI.

[Florentine painter, 1412–1469. See Vasari.]

I AM poor brother Lippo, by your leave !
 You need not clap your torches to my face.
 Zooks, what's to blame? you think you see a monk !
 What, 'tis past midnight, and you go the rounds,
 And here you catch me at an alley's end

Where sportive ladies leave their doors ajar?
 The Carmine's my cloister: hunt it up,
 Do,—harry out, if you must show your zeal,
 Whatever rat, there, haps on his wrong hole,
 And nip each softling of a wee white mouse,
Weke, weke, that's crept to keep him company!
 Aha, you know your betters! Then, you'll take

Your hand away that's fiddling on my throat,
 And please to know me likewise. Who am I?
 Why, one, sir, who is lodging with a friend
 Three streets off—he's a certain . . . how d'ye call?

Master—a . . . Cosimo of the Medici,
 I' the house that caps the corner. Boh! you were best!

Remember and tell me, the day you're hanged,
 How you affected such a gullet's-gripe!
 But you, sir, it concerns you that your knaves
 Pick up a manner nor discredit you:
 Zooks, are we pilchards, that they sweep the streets

And count fair prize what comes into their net?
 He's Judas to a tittle, that man is!

Just such a face! Why, sir, you make amends.
 Lord, I'm not angry! Bid your handdogs go
 Drink out this quarter-florin to the health
 Of the munificent House that harbours me
 (And many more beside, lads! more beside!)
 And all's come square again. I'd like his
 face—

His, elbowing on his comrade in the door
 With the pike and lantern,—for the slave that holds

John Baptist's head a-dangle by the hair
 With one hand ("Look you, now," as who should say)

And his weapon in the other, yet unwiped!
 It's not your chance to have a bit of chalk,
 A wood-coal or the like? or you should see!
 Yes, I'm the painter, since you style me so.
 What, brother Lippo's doings, up and down,
 You know them and they take you? like
 enough!

I saw the proper twinkle in your eye—
 Tell you, I liked your looks at very first.
 Let's sit and set things straight now, hip to haunch.

Here's spring come, and the nights one makes up bands

To roam the town and sing out carnival,
 And I've been three weeks shut within thymew,
 A-painting for the great man, saints and saints
 And saints again. I could not paint all night—
 Ouf! I leaned out of window for fresh air.
 There came a hurry of feet and little feet,
 A sweep of lute-strings, laughs, and whiffs of
 song,—

*Flower o' the broom,
 Take away love, and our earth is a tomb!
 Flower o' the quince,
 I let Lisa go, and what good in life since?
 Flower o' the thyme*—and so on. Round they went.

Scarce had they turned the corner when a titter
 Like the skipping of rabbits by moonlight,— three slim shapes,
 And a face that looked up . . . zooks, sir,
 flesh and blood,

That's all I'm made of! Into shreds it went,
 Curtain and counterpane and coverlet,
 All the bed-furniture—a dozen knots,
 There was a ladder! Down I let myself,
 Hands and feet, scrambling somehow, and so
 dropped,

And after them. I came up with the fun
 Hard by Saint Laurence, hail fellow, well met,—

*Flower o' the rose,
 If I've been merry, what matter who knows?*
 And so as I was stealing back again
 To get to bed and have a bit of sleep
 Ere I rise up to-morrow and go work
 On Jerome knocking at his poor old breast
 With his great round stone to subdue the
 flesh,

You snap me of the sudden. Ah, I see!
 Though your eye twinkles still, you shake your head—
 Mine's shaved—a monk, you say—the sting's in that!

If Master Cosimo announced himself,
 Mum's the word naturally; but a monk!
 Come, what am I a beast for? tell us, now!
 I was a baby when my mother died
 And father died and left me in the street.

I starved there, God knows how, a year or two

On fig-skins, melon-parings, rinds and shucks,
Refuse and rubbish. One fine frosty day,
My stomach being empty as your hat,
The wind doubled me up and down I went.
Old Aunt Lapaccia trussed me with one hand,
(Its fellow was a stinger as I knew)
And so along the wall, over the bridge,
By the straight cut to the convent. Six words there,

While I stood munching my first bread that month :

"So, boy, you're minded," quoth the good fat father

Wiping his own mouth, 'twas refection-time,—
"To quit this very miserable world ?

"Will you renounce ? . . . "the mouthful of bread ?" thought I ;

By no means ! Brief, they made a monk of me ;

I did renounce the world, its pride and greed,
Palace, farm, villa, shop and banking-house,
Trash, such as these poor devils of Medici
Have given their hearts to—all at eight years old.

Well, sir, I found in time, you may be sure,
'Twas not for nothing—the good bellyful,
The warm serge and the rope that goes all round,

And day-long blessed idleness beside !

"Let's see what the urchin's fit for"—that came next.

Not overmuch their way, I must confess.

Such a to-do ! They tried me with their books :

Lord, they'd have taught me Latin in pure waste !

Flower o' the clove,

All the Latin I construe is, "amo" I love !

But, mind you, when a boy starves in the streets

Eight years together, as my fortune was,
Watching folk's faces to know who will fling
The bit of half-stripped grape-bunch he desires,
And who will curse or kick him for his pains,—
Which gentleman processional and fine,
Holding a candle to the Sacrament,

Will wink and let him lift a plate and catch
The droppings of the wax to sell again,
Or holla for the Eight and have him whipped,—

How say I?—nay, which dog bites, which lets drop

His bone from the heap of offal in the street,—
Why, soul and sense of him grow sharp alike,
He learns the look of things, and none the less
For admonition from the hunger-pinch.

I had a store of such remarks, be sure,
Which, after I found leisure, turned to use.

I drew men's faces on my copy-books,
Scrawled them within the antiphony's¹ marge,

Joined legs and arms to the long music-notes,
Found eyes and nose and chin for A's and B's,
And made a string of pictures of the world
Betwixt the ins and outs of verb and noun,
On the wall, the bench, the door. The monks looked black.

"Nay," quoth the Prior, "turn him out, d'ye say ?

"In no wise. Lose a crow and catch a lark.

"What if at last we get our man of parts,

"We Carmelites, like those Camaldolese

"And Preaching Friars, to do our church up fine

"And put the front on it that ought to be !"

And hereupon he bade me daub away.

Thank you ! my head being crammed, the walls a blank,

Never was such prompt disburdening.

First, every sort of monk, the black and white,
I drew them, fat and lean : then, folk at church,

From good old gossips waiting to confess
Their cribs of barrel-droppings, candle-ends,—

To the breathless fellow at the altar-foot,
Fresh from his murder, safe and sitting there
With the little children round him in a row
Of admiration, half for his beard and half
For that white anger of his victim's son
Shaking a fist at him with one fierce arm,
Signing himself with the other because of Christ

(Whose sad face on the cross sees only this After the passion of a thousand years)
Till some poor girl, her apron o'er her head, (Which the intense eyes looked through) came at eve

On tiptoe, said a word, dropped in a loaf,
Her pair of earrings and a bunch of flowers
(The brute took growling), prayed, and so was gone.

I painted all, then cried "'Tis ask and
have;

"Choose, for more's ready!"—laid the ladder flat,

And showed my covered bit of cloister-wall.
The monks closed in a circle and praised loud Till checked, taught what to see and not to see,

Being simple bodies,— "That's the very man!
"Look at the boy who stoops to pat the dog!
"That woman's like the Prior's niece who comes

"To care about his asthma: it's the life!"
But there my triumph's straw-fire flared and funked;

Their betters took their turn to see and say:
The Prior and the learned pulled a face
And stopped all that in no time. "How?
what's here?

"Quite from the mark of painting, bless us
all!

"Faces, arms, legs and bodies like the true
"As much as pea and pea! it's devil's-game!

"Your business is not to catch men with show,
"With homage to the perishable clay,

"But lift them over it, ignore it all,
"Make them forget there's such a thing as flesh.

"Your business is to paint the souls of men—
"Man's soul, and it's a fire, smoke . . . no, it's not . . .

"It's vapour done up like a new-born babe—
"(In that shap when you die it leaves your mouth)

"It's . . . well, what matters talking, it's the soul!

"Give us no more of body than shows soul!
"Here's Giotto, with his Saint a-praising
God,

"That sets us praising,—why not stop with
him?

"Why put all thoughts of praise out of our
head

"With wonder at lines, colours, and what
not?

"Paint the soul, never mind the legs and arms!

"Rub all out, try at it a second time.

"Oh, that white smallish female with the breasts,

"She's just my niece . . . Herodias, I would say,—

"Who went and danced and got men's heads cut off!

"Have it all out!" Now, is this sense, I
ask?

A fine way to paint soul, by painting body
So ill, the eye can't stop there, must go further

And can't fare worse! Thus, yellow does for white

When what you put for yellow's simply black,
And any sort of meaning looks intense

When all beside itself means and looks
nought.

Why can't a painter lift each foot in turn,
Left foot and right foot, go a double step,
Make his flesh liker and his soul more like,
Both in their order? Take the prettiest face,
The Prior's niece . . . patron-saint—is it so pretty

You can't discover if it means hope, fear,
Sorrow or joy? won't beauty go with these?
Suppose I've made her eyes all right and blue,
Can't I take breath and try to add life's flash,
And then add soul and heighten them threefold?

Or say there's beauty with no soul at all—
(I never saw it—put the case the same—)
If you get simple beauty and nought else,
You get about the best thing God invents:
That's somewhat: and you'll find the soul
you have missed,

Within yourself, when you return him thanks.
"Rub all out!" Well, well, there's my life,
in short,

And so the thing has gone on ever since.

I'm grown a man no doubt, I've broken bounds :

You should not take a fellow eight years old
And make him swear to never kiss the girls.
I'm my own master, paint now as I please—
Having a friend, you see, in the Corner-house !

Lord, it's fast holding by the rings in front—
Those great rings serve more purposes than just

To plant a flag in, or tie up a horse !
And yet the old schooling sticks, the old grave eyes

Are peeping o'er my shoulder as I work,
The heads shake still—"It's art's decline, my son !

"You're not of the true painters, great and old ;

"Brother Angelico's the man, you'll find ;

"Brother Lorenzo¹ stands his single peer :

"Fag on at flesh, you'll never make the third !"

Flower o' the pine,

You keep your mistr . . . manners, and I'll stick to mine !

I'm not the third, then : bless us, they must know !

Don't you think they're the likeliest to know,
They with their Latin ? So, I swallow my rage,

Clench my teeth, suck my lips in tight, and paint

To please them—sometimes do and sometimes don't ;

For, doing most, there's pretty sure to come
A turn, some warm eve finds me at my saints—

A laugh, a cry, the business of the world—

(Flower o' the peach,

Death for us all, and his own life for each !)

And my whole soul revolves, the cup runs over,

The world and life's too big to pass for a dream,

And I do these wild things in sheer despite,
And play the fooleries you catch me at,

In pure rage ! The old mill-horse, out at grass
After hard years, throws up his stiff heels so,
Although the miller does not preach to him
The only good of grass is to make chaff.
What would men have ? Do they like grass or no—

May they or mayn't they ? all I want's the thing Settled for ever one way. As it is,
You tell too many lies and hurt yourself :
You don't like what you only like too much,
You do like what, if given you at your word,
You find abundantly detestable.

For me, I think I speak as I was taught ;
I always see the garden and God there
A-making man's wife : and, my lesson learned,
The value and significance of flesh,
I can't unlearn ten minutes afterwards,

You understand me : I'm a beast, I know.
But see, now—why, I see as certainly
As that the morning-star's about to shine,
What will hap some day. We've a youngstea
here

Comes to our convent, studies what I do,
Slouches and starcs and lets no atom drop :
His name is Guidi²—he'll not mind the monks—

They call him Hulking Tom, he lets them talk—

He picks my practice up—he'll paint apace,
I hope so—though I never live so long,
I know what's sure to follow. You be judge !
You speak no Latin more than I, belike ;
However, you're my man, you've seen the world

—The beauty and the wonder and the power,
The shapes of things, their colours, lights and shades,

Changes, surprises,—and God made it all !

—For what ? Do you feel thankful, ay or no,
For this fair town's face, yonder river's line,
The mountain round it and the sky above,
Much more the figures of man, woman, child,
These are the frame to ? What's it all about ?
To be passed over, despised ? or dwelt upon Wondered at ? oh, this last of course !—you
say.

² Tommaso Guidi, a painter.

But why not do as well as say,—paint these
Just as they are, careless what comes of it?
God's works—paint anyone, and count it crime
To let a truth slip. Don't object, "His works

"Are here already; nature is complete:

"Suppose you reproduce her—(which you can't)

"There's no advantage! you must beat her,
then."

For, don't you mark? we're made so that we
love

First when we see them painted, things we have passed

Perhaps a hundred times nor cared to see;

And so they are better, painted—better to us,
Which is the same thing. Art was given for
that;

God uses us to help each other so,

Lending our minds out. Have you noticed,
now,

Your cullion's hanging face? A bit of chalk,
And trust me but you should, though! How much more,

If I drew higher things with the same truth!

That were to take the Prior's pulpit-place,

Interpret God to all of you! Oh, oh,

It makes me mad to see what men shall do

And we in our graves! This world's no blot
for us,

Nor blank; it means intensely, and means
good:

To find its meaning is my meat and drink.

"Ay, but you don't so instigate to prayer!"

Strikes in the Prior: "when your meaning's
plain

"It does not say to folk—remember matins,

"Or, mind you fast next Friday!" Why,
for this

What need of art at all? A skull and bones,
Two bits of stick nailed crosswise, or, what's
best,

A bell to chime the hour with, does as well.

I painted a Saint Laurence six months since

At Prato, splashed the fresco in fine style:

"How looks my painting, now the scaffold's
down?"

I ask a brother: "Hugely," he returns—

"Already not one phiz of your three slaves

"Who turn the Deacon off his toasted side,
"But's scratched and prodded to our heart's content,

"The pious people have so eased their own

"With coming to say prayers there in a rage:

"We get on fast to see the bricks beneath.

"Expect another job this time next year,

"For pity and religion grow i' the crowd—

"Your painting serves its purpose!" Hang the fools!

—That is—you'll not mistake an idle word
Spoke in a huff by a poor monk, Got wot,
Tasting the air this spicy night which turns
The unaccustomed head like Chianti wine!
Oh, the church knows! don't misreport me,
now!

It's natural a poor monk out of bounds

Should have his apt word to excuse himself:
And hearken how I plot to make amends.

I have bethought me: I shall paint a piece

. . . There's for you! Give me six months, then go, see

Something in Sant' Ambrogio's! Bless the nuns!

They want a cast o' my office. I shall paint

God in the midst, Madonna and her babe,

Ringed by a bowery flowery angel-brood,

Lilies and vestments and white faces, sweet

As puff on puff of grated orris-root

When ladies crowd to Church at midsummer!

And then i' the front, of course a saint or two—

Saint John, because he saves the Florentines,

Saint Ambrose, who puts down in black and white

The convent's friends and gives them a long
day,

And Job, I must have him there past mistake,

The man of Uz (and Us without the z, Painters who need his patience). Well, all these

Secured at their devotion, up shall come

Out of a corner when you least expect;

As one by a dark stair into a great light,

Musie and talking, who but Lippo! I!

Mazed, motionless and moonstruck—I'm the
man!

Back I shrink—what is this I see and hear?

I, caught up with my monk's things by mistake,
My old serge gown and rope that goes all round,

I, in this presence, this pure company!
Where's a hole, where's a corner for escape?
Then steps a sweet angelic slip of a thing
Forward, puts out a soft palm—"Not so fast!"
—Addresses the celestial presence, "nay—
"He made you and devised you, after all,
"Though he's none of you! Could Saint John there draw—

"His camel-hair make up a painting-brush?
"We come to brother Lippo for all that,
"Iste perfecit opus!" So, all smile—
I shuffle sideways with my blushing face
Under the cover of a hundred wings
Thrown like a spread of kirtles when you're gay
And play hot cockles, all the doors being shut,
Till, wholly unexpected, in there pops
The hothead husband! Thus I scuttle off
To some safe bench behind, not letting go
The palm of her, the little lily thing
That spoke the good word for me in the nick,
Like the Prior's niece . . . Saint Lucy, I would say.

And so all's saved for me, and for the church
A pretty picture gained. Go, six months
hence!

Your hand, sir, and good-bye: no lights, no
lights!

The street's lushed, and I know my own way back,

Don't fear, me! There's the grey beginning.
Zooks!

ANDREA DEL SARTO. ✓

(CALLED "THE FAULTLESS PAINTER.")

[Famous painter, died 1531, aged 43:]

BUT do not let us quarrel any more,
No, my Lucrezia; bear with me for once:
Sit down and all shall happen as you wish.
You turn your face, but does it bring your heart?

I'll work then for your friend's friend, never
fear,

Treat his own subject after his own way,
Fix his own time, accept too his own price,
And shut the money into this small hand
When next it takes mine. Will it? tenderly?

Oh, I'll content him,—but to-morrow, Love!

I often am much wearier than you think,

This evening more than usual, and it seems

As if—forgive now—should you let me sit

Here by the window with your hand in mine

And look a half-hour forth on Fiesole,

Both of one mind, as married people use,

Quietly, quietly the evening through,

I might get up to-morrow to my work

Cheerful and fresh as ever. Let us try.

To-morrow, how you shall be glad for this!

Your soft hand is a woman of itself,

And mine the man's bared breast she curls inside.

Don't count the time lost, neither; you must serve

For each of the five pictures we require:

It saves a model. So! keep looking so—

My serpentine beauty, rounds on rounds!

—How could you ever prick those perfect ears,

Even to put the pearl there! oh, so sweet—

My face, my moon, my everybody's moon,

Which everybody looks on and calls his

And, I suppose, is looked on by in turn,

While she looks—no one's: very dear, no
less.

You smile? why, there's my picture ready
made,

There's what we painters call our harmony!

A common greyiness silvers everything,—

All in a twilight, you and I alike

—You, at the point of your first pride in me

(That's gone you know),—but I, at every point;

My youth, my hope, my art, being all toned
down

To yonder sober pleasant Fiesole.

There's the bell clinking from the chapel-top;

That length of convent-wall across the way

Holds the trees safer, huddled more inside;

The last monk leaves the garden; days decrease,

And autumn grows, autumn in everything.

Eh? the whole seems to fall into a shape

As if I saw alike my work and self
And all that I was born to be and do,
A twilight-piece. Love, we are in God's
hand.

How strange now, looks the life he makes us
lead ;

So free we seem, so fettered fast we are !

I feel he laid the fetter : let it lie !

This chamber for example—turn your head—

All that's behind us ! You don't understand

Nor care to understand about my art,

But you can hear at least when people speak :

And that cartoon, the second from the door

—It is the thing, Love ! so such things should be—

Behold Madonna !—I am bold to say.

I can do with my pencil what I know,

What I see, what at bottom of my heart

I wish for, if I ever wish so deep—

Do easily, too—when I say, perfectly,

I do not boast, perhaps : yourself are judge,

Who listened to the Legate's talk last week,

And just as much they used to say in France.

At any rate 'tis easy, all of it !

No sketches first, no studies, that's long past :

I do what many dream of, all their lives,

—Dream ? strive to do, and agonize to do,

And fail in doing. I could count twenty such

On twice your fingers, and not leave this town,

Who strive—you don't know how the others

strive

To paint a little thing like that you smeared

Carelessly passing with your robes afloat,—

Yet do much less, so much less, Someone

says,

(I know his name, no matter)—so much less !

Well, less is more, Lucrezia : I am judged.

There burns a truer light of God in them,

In their vexed beating stuffed and stopped-up
brain,

Heart, or whate'er else, than goes on to prompt

This low-pulsed forthright craftsman's hand
of mine.

Their works drop groundward, but themselves, I know,

Reach many a time a heaven that's shut to
me,

Enter and take their place there sure enough,
Though they come back and cannot tell the
world.

My works are nearer heaven, but I sit here.

The sudden blood of these men ! at a word—

Praise them, it boils, or blame them, it boils
too.

I, painting from myself and to myself,

Know what I do, am unmoved by men's
blame

Or their praise either. Somebody remarks

Morello's outline there is wrongly traced,

His hue mistaken ; what of that ? or else,

Rightly traced and well ordered ; what of
that ?

Speak as they please, what does the mountain
care ?

Ah, but a man's reach should exceed his grasp,

Or what's a heaven for ? All is silver-grey

Placid and perfect with my art : the worse !

I know both what I want and what might
gain,

And yet how profitless to know, to sigh

“ Had I been two, another and myself,

“ Our head would have o'erlooked the world ! ” No doubt.

Yonder's a work now, of that famous youth

The Urbinate who died five years ago.

('Tis copied, George Vasari sent it me.)

Well, I can fancy how he did it all,

Pouring his soul, with kings and popes to see,

Reaching, that heaven might so replenish him,

Above and through his art—for it gives way ;

That arm is wrongly put—and there again—

A fault to pardon in the drawing's lines,

Its body, so to speak : its soul is right,

He means right—that, a child may understand.

Still, what an arm ! and I could alter it :

But all the play, the insight and the stretch—

Out of me, out of me ! And wherefore out ?

Had you enjoined them on me, given me
soul,

We might have risen to Rafael, I and you !

Nay, Love, you did give all I asked, I think—

More than I merit, yes, by many times.

But had you—oh, with the same perfect brow,

And perfect eyes, and more than perfect
mouth,

And the low voice my soul hears, as a bird
The fowler's pipe, and follows to the snare—
Had you, with these the same, but brought a
mind!

Some women do so. Had the mouth there urged

"God and the glory! never care for gain.

"The present by the future, what is that?

"Live for fame, side by side with Agnolo!

"Rafael is waiting: up to God, all three!"

I might have done it for you. So it seems:

Perhaps not. All is as God over-rules.

Beside, incentives come from the soul's self;

The rest avail not. Why do I need you?

What wife had Rafael, or has Agnolo?

In this world, who can do a thing, will not;

And who would do it, cannot, I perceive:

Yet the will's somewhat—somewhat, too, the
power—

And thus we half-men struggle. At the end,
God, I conclude, compensates, punishes.

'Tis safer for me, if the award be strict,

That I am something underrated here,

Poor this long while, despised, to speak the
truth.

I dared not, do you know, leave home all day,
For fear of chancing on the Paris lords.

The best is when they pass and look aside;

But they speak sometimes; I must bear it all.

Well may they speak! That Francis, that first time,

And that long festal year at Fontainebleau!

I surely then could sometimes leave the
ground,

Put on the glory, Rafael's daily wear,

In that humane great monarch's golden
look,—

One finger in his beard or twisted curl

Over his mouth's good mark that made the
smile,

One arm about my shoulder, round my neck,

The jingle of his gold chain in my ear,

I painting proudly with his breath on me,

All his court round him, seeing with his eyes,

Such frank French eyes, and such a fire of souls

Profuse, my hand kept plying by those hearts,—

And, best of all, this, this, this face beyond,
This in the background, waiting on my work,
To crown the issue with a last reward!
A good time, was it not, my kingly days?

And had you not grown restless . . . but I
know—

'Tis done and past; 'twas right, my instinct
said;

Too live the life grew, golden and not grey,
And I'm the weak-eyed bat no sun should tempt

Out of the grange whose four walls make his world.

How could it end in any other way?

You called me, and I came home to your heart.

The triumph was—to reach and stay there;
since

I reached it ere the triumph, what is lost?

Let my hands frame your face in your hair's
gold,

You beautiful Lucrezia that are mine!

"Rafael did this, Andrea painted that;

"The Roman's is the better when you pray,
"But still the other's Virgin was his wife—"

Men will excuse me. I am glad to judge
Both pictures in your presence; clearer grows
My better fortune, I resolve to think.

For, do you know, Lucrezia, as God lives,

Said one day Agnolo, his very self,

To Rafael . . . I have known it all these years . . .

(When the young man was flaming out his thoughts

Upon a palace-wall for Rome to see,

Too lifted up in heart because of it)

"Friend, there's a certain sorry little scrub

"Goes up and down our Florence, none cares
how,

"Who, were he set to plan and execute

"As you are, pricked on by your popes and
kings,

"Would bring the sweat into that brow of
yours!"

To Rafael's!—And indeed the arm is wrong.

I hardly dare . . . yet, only you to see,

Give the chalk here—quick, thus the line should go!

Ay, but the soul! he's Rafael! rub it out!
 Still, all I care for, if he spoke the truth,
 What he? why, who but Michel Agnolo?
 Do you forget already words like those?
 If really there was such a chance, so lost,—
 Is, whether you're—not grateful—but more pleased.

Well, let me think so. And you smile indeed!
 This hour has been an hour! Another smile?
 If you would sit thus by me every night
 I should work better, do you comprehend?
 I mean that I should earn more, give you
 more.

See, it is settled dusk now; there's a star;
 Morello's¹ gone, the watch-lights show the wall,

The cue-owls speak the name we call them by.
 Come from the window, love,—come in, at
 last,

Inside the melancholy little house
 We built to be so gay with. God is just.
 King Francis may forgive me: oft at nights
 When I look up from painting, eyes tired out,
 The walls become illumined, brick from brick Distinct, instead of mortar, fierce bright
 gold,

That gold of his I did cement them with!
 Let us but love each other. Must you go?
 That Cousin here again? he waits outside?
 Must see you—you, and not with me? Those loans?

More gaming debts to pay? you smiled for
 that?

Well, let smiles buy me! have you more to spend?

While hand and eye and something of a heart
 Are left me, work's my ware, and what's it worth?

I'll pay my fancy. Only let me sit
 The grey remainder of the evening out,
 Idle, you call it, and muse perfectly
 How I could paint, were I but back in France,
 One picture, just one more—the Virgin's
 face,

Not yours this time! I want you at my side
 To hear them—that is, Michel Agnolo—

Judge all I do and tell you of its worth.
 Will you? To-morrow, satisfy your friend.
 I take the subjects for his corridor,
 Finish the portrait out of hand—there—
 there,

And throw him in another thing or two
 If he demurs; the whole should prove enough
 To pay for this same Cousin's freak. Beside,
 What's better and what's all I care about,
 Get you the thirteen scudi for the ruff!
 Love, does that please you? Ah, but what does he,

The Cousin! what does he to please you
 more?

I am grown peaceful as old age to-night.
 I regret little, I would change still less.
 Since there my past life lies, why alter it?
 The very wrong to Francis!—it is true
 I took his coin, was tempted and complied,
 And built this house and sinned, and all is
 said.

My father and my mother died of want.
 Well, had I riches of my own? you see How one gets rich! Let each one bear his lot.

They were born poor, lived poor, and poor they died:
 And I have laboured somewhat in my time
 And not been paid profusely. Some good son

Paint my two hundred pictures—let him
 try!

No doubt, there's something strikes a balance.
 Yes,

You loved me quite enough, it seems to-night.
 This must suffice me here. What would one
 have?

In heaven, perhaps, new chances, one more
 chance—

Four great walls in the New Jerusalem,
 Meted on each side by the angel's reed,
 For Leonard, Rafael, Agnolo and me
 To cover—the three first without a wife,
 While I have mine! So—still they overcome
 Because there's still Lucrezia,—as I choose.

Again the Cousin's whistle! Go, my Love.

THE BISHOP ORDERS HIS TOMB
AT SAINT PRAXED'S CHURCH.

ROME, 15—.

VANITY, saith the preacher, vanity !

Draw round my bed : is Anselm keeping back ?Nephews—sons mine . . . ah God, I know not ! Well—

She, men would have to be your mother once,
Old Gandolf envied me, so fair she was !
What's done is done, and she is dead beside.
Dead long ago, and I am Bishop since,
And as she died so must we die ourselves,
And thence ye may perceive the world's a dream.

Life, how and what is it ? As here I lie
In this state-chamber, dying by degrees,
Hours and long hours in the dead night, I ask
"Do I live, am I dead ?" Peace, peace seems all.

Saint Praxed's ever was the church for peace ;
And so, about this tomb of mine. I fought
With tooth and nail to save my niche, ye
know :

—Old Gandolf cozened me, despite my care ;
Shrewd was that snatch from out the corner
South

He graced his carrion with, God curse the same !

Yet still my niche is not so cramped but thence

One sees the pulpit o' the epistle-side,
And somewhat of the choir, those silent seats,
And up into the airy dome where live
The angels, and a sunbeam's sure to lurk :
And I shall fill my slab of basalt there,
And 'neath my tabernacle take my rest,
With those nine columns round me, two and
two,

The odd one at my feet where Anselm stands :
Peach-blossom marble all, the rare, the ripe
As fresh-poured red wine of a mighty pulse.
—Old Gandolf with his paltry onion-stone, Put me where I may look at him ! True peach,

Rosy and flawless : how I earned the prize !

Draw close : that conflagration of my church
—What then ? So much was saved if aught were missed !

My sons, ye would not be my death ? Go dig
The white-grape vineyard where the oil-press
stood,

Drop water gently till the surface sink,
And if ye find . . . Ah God, I know not,
I ! . . .

Bedded in store of rotten fig-leaves soft,
And corded up in a tight olive-frail,
Some lump, ah God, of lapis lazuli,
Big as a Jew's head cut off at the nape,
Blue as a vein o'er the Madonna's breast . . .
Sons, all have I bequeathed you, villas, all,
That brave Frascati villa with its bath,
So, let the blue lump poise between my knees,
Like God the Father's globe on both his hands

Ye worship in the Jesu Church so gay,
For Gandolf shall not choose but see and burst !

Swift as a weaver's shuttle fleet our years :
Man goeth to the grave, and where is he ?
Did I say basalt for my slab, sons ? Black—
'Twas ever antique-black I meant ! How else
Shall ye contrast my frieze to come beneath ?
The bas-relief in bronze ye promised me,
Those Pans and Nymphs ye wot of, and
perchance

Some tripod, thyrsus, with a vase or so,
The Saviour at his sermon on the mount,
Saint Praxed in a glory, and one Pan
Ready to twitch the Nymph's last garment off,
And Moses with the tables . . . but I know Ye mark me not ! What do they whisper
thee,

Child of my bowels, Anselm ? Ah, ye hope
To revel down my villas while I gasp
Bricked o'er with beggar's mouldy travertine
Which Gandolf from his tomb-top chuckles at !
Nay, boys, ye love me—all of jasper, then !
'Tis jasper ye stand pledged to, lest I grieve.
My bath must needs be left behind, alas !
One block, pure green as a pistachio-nut,
There's plenty jasper somewhere in the world—
And have I not Saint Praxed's ear to pray
Horses for ye, and brown Greek manuscripts,

And mistresses with great smooth marbly limbs?

—That's if ye carve my epitaph aright,
Choice Latin, picked phrase, Tully's every
word,

No gaudy ware like Gandolf's second line—
Tully, my masters? Ulpian serves his need!
And then how I shall lie through centuries,
And hear the blessed mutter of the mass,
And see God made and eaten all day long,
And feel the steady candle-flame, and taste
Good strong thick stupefying incense-smoke!
For as I lie here, hours of the dead night,
Dying in state and by such slow degrees,
I fold my arms as if they clasped a crook,
And stretch my feet forth straight as stone
can point,

And let the bedclothes, for a mortcloth, drop
Into great laps and folds of sculptor's-work:
And as yon tapers dwindle, and strange
thoughts

Grow, with: a certain humming in my ears,
About the life before I lived this life,
And this life too, popes, cardinals and priests,
Saint Praxed at his sermon on the mount,
Your tall pale mother with her talking eyes,
And new-found agate urns as fresh as day,
And marble's language, Latin pure, discreet,
—Aha, ELUCESCEBAT quoth our friend?
No Tully, said I, Ulpian at the best!
Evil and brief hath been my pilgrimage.
All lapis, all, sons! Else I give the Pope
My villas! Will ye ever eat my heart?
Ever your eyes were as a lizard's quick,
They glitter like your mother's for my soul,
Or ye would heighten my impoverished frieze,

Piece out its starved design, and fill my vase
With grapes, and add a vizor and a Term,¹
And to the tripod ye would tie a lynx
That in his struggle throws the thyrsus down,
To comfort me on my entablature
Whereon I am to lie till I must ask “Do I live, am I dead?” There, leave me,
there!

For ye have stabbed me with ingratitude

¹ A bust ending in a square block of stone, like those of the god Terminus.

To death—ye wish it—God, ye wish it!
Stone—

Gritstone, a-crumble! Clammy squares which sweat
As if the corpse they keep were oozing
through—

And no more lapis to delight the world!
Well go! I bless ye. Fewer tapers there,
But in a row: and, going, turn your backs
—Ay, like departing altar-ministrants,
And leave me in my church, the church for
peace,

That I may watch at leisure if he leers—
Old Gandolf, at me, from his onion-stone,
As still he envied me, so fair she was!

BISHOP BLOUGRAM'S APOLOGY.

No more wine? then we'll push back chairs and talk.

A final glass for me, though: cool, i' faith!
We ought to have our Abbey back, you see.
It's different, preaching in basilicas,
And doing duty in some masterpiece
Like this of brother Pugin's, bless his heart!
I doubt if they're half baked, those chalk rosettes,

Ciphers and stucco-twiddlings everywhere;
It's just like breathing in a lime-kiln: eh?
These hot long ceremonies of our church
Cost us a little—oh, they pay the price,
You take me—amply pay it! Now, we'll talk.

So, you despise me, Mr. Gigadibs.
No deprecation,—nay, I beg you, sir!
Beside 'tis our engagement: don't you know,
I promised, if you'd watch a dinner out,
We'd see truth dawn together?—truth that peeps
Over the glasses' edge when dinner's done,
And body gets its sop and holds its noise
And leaves soul free a little. Now's the
time:

Truth's break of day! You do despise me
then.

And if I say, “despise me,”—never fear!

I know you do not in a certain sense—
Not in my arm-chair, for example : here,
I well imagine you respect my place
(Status, entourage, worldly circumstance)
Quite to its value—very much indeed :
—Are up to the protesting eyes of you
In pride at being seated here for once—
You'll turn it to such capital account !
When somebody, through years and years to
come,

Hints of the bishop,—names me—that's
enough :

"Blougram? I knew him"—(into it you slide)

"Dined with him once, a Corpus Christi
Day,

"All alone, we two ; he's a clever man :

"And after dinner,—why, the wine you
know,—

"Oh, there was wine, and good !—what with the wine . . .

"Faith, we began upon all sorts of talk !

"He's no bad fellow, Blougram ; he had seen

"Something of mine he relished, some review :

"He's quite above their humbug in his heart,

"Half-said as much, indeed—the thing's his trade.

"I warrant, Blougram's sceptical at times :

"How otherwise? I liked him, I confess !"

Che che, my dear sir, as we say at Rome,

Don't you protest now ! It's fair give and take ;

You have had your turn and spoken your home-truths :

The hand's mine now, and here you follow suit.

Thus much conceded, still the first fact stays—

You do despise me ; your ideal of life

Is not the bishop's : you would not be I.

You would like better to be Goethe, now,

Or Buonaparte, or, bless me, lower still,

Count D'Orsay,—so you did what you preferred,

Spoke as you thought, and, as you cannot help,

VOL. I.

Believed or disbelieved, no matter what,
So long as on that point, whate'er it was,
You loosed your mind, were whole and sole yourself.

—That, my ideal never can include,
Upon that element of truth and worth

Never be based ! for say they make me Pope—
(They can't—suppose it for our argument !)

Why, there I'm at my tether's end, I've reached

My height, and not a height which please
you :

An unbelieving Pope won't do, you say.

It's like those eerie stories nurses tell,

Of how some actor on a stage played Death,
With pasteboard crown, sham orb and tin-

selled dart,

And called himself the monarch of the world ;

Then, going in the tire-room afterward,

Because the play was done, to shift himself,

Got touched upon the sleeve familiarly,

The moment he had shut the closet door,

By Death himself. Thus God might touch
a Pope

At unawares, ask what his baubles mean,

And whose part he presumed to play just now.

Best be yourself, imperial, plain and true !

So, drawing comfortable breath again,

You weigh and find, whatever more or less

I boast of my ideal realized

Is nothing in the balance when opposed

To your ideal, your grand simple life,

Of which you will not realize one jot.

I am much, you are nothing ; you would be
all,

I would be merely much : you beat me there.

No, friend, you do not beat me : hearken
why !

The common problem, yours, mine, every one's,

Is—not to fancy what were fair in life

Provided it could be,—but, finding first

What may be, then find how to make it fair

Up to our means : a very different thing !

No abstract intellectual plan of life

Quite irrespective of life's plainest laws,

But ~~one, a man~~, who is man and nothing
 more,
 May lead within a world which (by your leave)
 Is Rome or London, not Fool's-paradise.
 Embellish Rome, idealize away,
 Make paradise of London if you can,
 You're welcome, nay, you're wise.

A simile !

We mortals cross the ocean of this world
 Each in his average cabin of a life ;
 The best's not big, the worst yields elbow-
 room.

Now for our six months' voyage—how prepare ?

You come on shipboard with a landsman's list

Of things he calls convenient : so they are !
 An India screen is pretty furniture,
 A piano-forte is a fine resource,
 All Balzac's novels occupy one shelf,
 The new edition fifty volumes long ;
 And little Greek books, with the funny type
 They get up well at Leipsic, fill the next :
 Go on ! slabbed marble, what a bath it makes !
 And Parma's pride, the Jerome, let us add !
 'Twere pleasant could Correggio's fleeting glow

Hang full in face of one where'er one roams,
 Since he more than the others brings with him
 Italy's self,—the marvellous Modenese !—
 Yet was not on your list before, perhaps.

—Alas, friend, here's the agent . . . is't
 the name ?

The captain, or whoever's master here—
 You see him screw his face up ; what's his cry

Ere you set foot on shipboard ? "Six feet square !"

If you won't understand what six feet mean,
 Compute and purchase stores accordingly—
 And if, in pique because he overhauls
 Your Jerome, piano, bath, you come on board
 Bare—why, you cut a figure at the first
 While sympathetic landsmen see you off ;
 Not afterward, when long ere half seas over,
 You peep up from your utterly naked boards

Into some snug and well-appointed berth,
 Like mine for instance (try the cooler jug—
 Put back the other, but don't jog the ice !)
 And mortified you mutter "Well and good ;
 "He sits enjoying his sea-furniture ;
 "'Tis stout and proper, and there's store of
 it :

"Though I've the better notion, all agree,
 "Of fitting rooms up. Hang the carpenter,
 "Neat ship-shape fixings and contrivances—
 "I would have brought my Jerome, frame and all !"

And meantime you bring nothing : never
 mind—

You've proved your artist-nature : what you don't

You might bring, so despise me, as I say.

Now come, let's backward to the starting-
 place.

See my way : we're two college friends,
 suppose.

Prepare together for our voyage, then ;
 Each note and check the other in his work,—
 Here's mine, a bishop's outfit ; criticize !
 What's wrong ? why won't you be a bishop
 too ?

Why first, you don't believe, you don't and can't,

(Not stately, that is, and fixedly
 And absolutely and exclusively)
 In any revelation called divine.

No dogmas nail your faith ; and what remains
 But say so, like the honest man you are ?

First, therefore, overhaul theology !

Nay, I too, not a fool, you please to think,
 Must find believing every whit as hard :

And if I do not frankly say as much,
 The ugly consequence is clear enough.

Now wait, my friend : well, I do not believe—

If you'll accept no faith that is not fixed,
 Absolute and exclusive, as you say.

You're wrong—I mean to prove it in due
 time.

Meanwhile, I know where difficulties lie

BISHOP BLOUGRAM'S APOLOGY

I could not, cannot solve, nor ever shall,
So give up hope accordingly to solve—
(To you, and over the wine). Our dogmas
then

With both of us, though in unlike degree,
Missing full credence—overboard with them!
I mean to meet you on your own premise:
Good, there go mine in company with yours!

And now what are we? unbelievers both,
Calm and complete, determinately fixed
To-day, to-morrow and for ever, pray?
You'll guarantee me that? Not so, I think!
In no wise! all we've gained is, that belief,
As unbelief before, shakes us by fits,
Confounds us like its predecessor. Where's
The gain? how can we guard our unbelief,
Make it bear fruit to us?—the problem here.
Just when we are safest, there's a sunset-
touch,

A fancy from a flower-bell, some one's death,
A chorus-ending from Euripides,—
And that's enough for fifty hopes and fears
As old and new at once as nature's self,
To rap and knock and enter in our soul,
Take hands and dance there, a fantastic ring,
Round the ancient idol, on his base again,—
The grand Perhaps! We look on helplessly.
There the old misgivings, crooked questions
are—

This good God,—what he could do, if he would,

Would, if he could—then must have done
long since:

If so, when, where and how? some way must be,—

Once feel about, and soon or late you hit
Some sense, in which it might be, after all.
Why not, "The Way, the Truth, the Life?"

—That way

Over the mountain, which who stands upon
Is apt to doubt if it be meant for a road;
While, if he views it from the waste itself,
Up goes the line there, plain from base to
brow,
Not vague, mistakeable! what's a break or two

Seen from the unbroken desert either side?
And then (to bring in fresh philosophy)
What if the breaks themselves should prove
at last

The most consummate of contrivances
To train a man's eye, teach him what is faith?
And so we stumble at truth's very test!
All we have gained then by our unbelief
Is a life of doubt diversified by faith,
For one of faith diversified by doubt:
We called the chess-board white,—we call it black.

"Well," you rejoins, "the end's no worse,
at least."
"We've reason for both colours on the board:
"Why not confess then, where I drop the faith
"And you the doubt, that I'm as right as
you?"

Because, friend, in the next place, this being so,
And both things even,—faith and unbelief
Left to a man's choice,—we'll proceed a step,
Returning to our image, which I like.

A man's choice, yes—but a cabin-pas-senger's—

The man made for the special life o' the world—
Do you forget him? I remember though!
Consult our ship's conditions and you find
One and but one choice suitable to all;
The choice, that you unluckily prefer,
Turning things topsy-turvy—they of it
Going to the ground. Belief or unbelief
Bears upon life, determines its whole course,
Begins at its beginning. See the world
Such as it is,—you made it not, nor I;
I mean to take it as it is,—and you,
Not so you'll take it,—though you get nought
else.

I know the special kind of life I like,
What suits the most my idiosyncrasy,
Brings out the best of me and bears me fruit
In power, peace, pleasantness and length of days.

I find that positive belief does this

For me, and unbelief, no whit of this.

—For you, it does, however?—that, we'll try!

'Tis clear, I cannot lead my life, at least,

Induce the world to let me peaceably,

Without declaring at the outset, "Friends,"

"I absolutely and peremptorily

"Believe!"—I say, faith is my waking life:

One sleeps, indeed, and dreams at intervals,

We know, but waking's the main point with us,

And my provision's for life's waking part.

Accordingly, I use heart, head and hand

All day, I build, scheme, study, and make friends;

And when night overtakes me, down I lie,

Sleep, dream a little, and get done with it,

The sooner the better, to begin afresh.

What's midnight doubt before the dayspring's faith?

You, the philosopher, that disbelieve,

That recognize the night, give dreams their weight—

To be consistent you should keep your bed,

Abstain from healthy acts that prove you man,

For fear you drowse perhaps at unawares!

And certainly at night you'll sleep and dream,

Live through the day and bustle as you please.

And so you live to sleep as I to wake,

To unbelieve as I to still believe?

Well, and the common sense o' the world calls you

Bed-ridden,—and its good things come to me.

Its estimation, which is half the fight,

That's the first-cabin comfort I secure:

The next . . . but you perceive with half an eye!

Come, come, it's best believing, if we may;

You can't but own that!

Next, concede again,

If once we choose belief, on all accounts

We can't be too decisive in our faith,

Conclusive and exclusive in its terms,

To suit the world which gives us the good things.

In every man's career are certain points

Whereon he dares not be indifferent;

The world detects him clearly, if he dare,

As baffled at the game, and losing life.

He may care little or he may care much

For riches, honour, pleasure, work, repose,

Since various theories of life and life's

Success are extant which might easily

Comport with either estimate of these;

And whoso chooses wealth or poverty,

Labour or quiet, is not judged a fool

Because his fellow would choose otherwise:

We let him choose upon his own account

So long as he's consistent with his choice.

But certain points, left wholly to himself,

When once a man has arbitrated on,

We say he must succeed there or go hang.

Thus, he should wed the woman he loves most

Or needs most, whatsoe'er the love or need—

For he can't wed twice. Then, he must avouch,

Or follow, at the least, sufficiently,

The form of faith his conscience holds the best,

Whate'er the process of conviction was:

For nothing can compensate his mistake

On such a point, the man himself being judge:

He cannot wed twice, nor twice lose his soul.

Well now, there's one great form of Christian faith

I happened to be born in—which to teach

Was given me as I grew up, on all hands,

As best and readiest means of living by;

The same on examination being proved

The most pronounced moreover, fixed, precise

And absolute form of faith in the whole world—

Accordingly, most potent of all forms

For working on the world. Observe, my friend!

Such as you know me, I am free to say,

In these hard latter days which hamper one,

Myself—by no immoderate exercise

Of intellect and learning, but the tact

To let external forces work for me,

—Bid the street's stones be bread and they are bread;

Bid Peter's creed, or rather, Hildebrand's,

Exalt me o'er my fellows in the world . . .

And make my life an ease and joy and pride;

It does so,—which for me's a great point gained,

Who have a soul and body that exact

A comfortable care in many ways.

There's power in me and will to dominate
Which I must exercise, they hurt me else :
In many ways I need mankind's respect,
Obedience, and the love that's born of fear :
While at the same time, there's a taste I have,
A toy of soul, a titillating thing,
Refuses to digest these dainties crude.
The naked life is gross till clothed upon :
I must take what men offer, with a grace
As though I would not, could I help it, take !
An uniform I wear, though over-rich—
Something imposed on me, no choice of mine :
No fancy-dress worn for pure fancy's sake
And despicable therefore ! now folk kneel
And kiss my hand—of course the Church's
hand.

Thus I am made, thus life is best for me,
And thus that it should be I have procured ;
And thus it could not be another way,
I venture to imagine.

You'll reply,

So far my choice, no doubt, is a success ;
But were I made of better elements,
With nobler instincts, purer tastes, like you,
I hardly would account the thing success
Though it did all for me I say.

But, friend,

We speak of what is ; not of what might be,
And how 'twere better if 'twere otherwise.
I am the man you see here plain enough :
Grant I'm a beast, why, beasts must lead beasts' lives !

Suppose I own at once to tail and claws ;
The tailless man exceeds me : but being tailed I'll lash out lion fashion, and leave apes
To dock their stump and dress their haunches up.

My business is not to remake myself,
But make the absolute best of what God made.
Or—our first simile—though you prove me doomed

To a viler berth still, to the steerage-hole,
The sheep-pen or the pig-stye, I should strive
To make what use of each were possible ;
And as this cabin gets upholstery,
That hutch should rustle with sufficient straw.

But, friend, I don't acknowledge quite so fast

I fail of all your manhood's lofty tastes
Enumerated so complacently,
On the mere ground that you forsooth can find
In this particular life I choose to lead.
No fit provision for them. Can you not ?
Say you, my fault is I address myself
To grosser estimators than should judge ?
And that's no way of holding up the soul,
Which, nobler, needs men's praise perhaps,
yet knows

One wise man's verdict outweighs all the fools'—

Would like the two, but, forced to choose, takes that.

I pine among my million imbeciles
(You think) aware some dozen men of sense
Eye me and know me, whether I believe
In the last winking Virgin, as I vow,
And am a fool, or disbelieve in her
And am a knave,—approve in neither case, Withhold their voices though I look their
way :

Like Verdi when, at his worst opera's end
(The thing they gave at Florence,—what's its name ?)

While the mad houseful's plaudits near out-bang

His orchestra of salt-box, tongs and bones,
He looks through all the roaring and the wreaths

Where sits Rossini patient in his stall.

Nay, friend, I meet you with an answer
here—

That even your prime men who appraise their kind

Are men still, catch a wheel within a wheel,
See more in a truth than the truth's simple
self,

Confuse themselves. You see lads walk the street

Sixty the minute ; what's to note in that ?

You see one lad o'erstride a chimney-stack ;
Him you must watch—he's sure to fall, yet
stands !

Our interest's on the dangerous edge of things.

The honest thief, the tender murderer,
The superstitious atheist, demirep
That loves and saves her soul in new French
books—

We watch while these in equilibrium keep
The giddy line midway : one step aside,
They're classed and done with. I, then,
keep the line

Before your sages,—just the men to shrink
From the gross weights, coarse scales and labels broad

You offer their refinement. Fool or knave?
Why needs a bishop be a fool or knave
When there's a thousand diamond weights between?

So, I enlist them. Your picked twelve, you'll find,

Profess themselves indignant, scandalized
At thus being held unable to explain
How a superior man who disbelieves
May not believe as well : that's Schelling's way!
It's through my coming in the tail of time,
Nicking the minute with a happy tact.
Had I been born three hundred years ago They'd say, "What's strange? Blougram of course believes ;"

And, seventy years since, "disbelieves of
course."

But now, "He may believe; and yet, and yet
"How can he?" All eyes turn with interest.
Whereas, step off the line on either side—

You, for example, clever to a fault,
The rough and ready man who write apace,
Read somewhat seldomer, think perhaps even
less—

You disbelieve! Who wonders and who cares?
Lord So-and-so—his coat bedropped with wax,
All Peter's chains about his waist, his back
Brave with the needlework of Noodledom—
Believes! Again, who wonders and who cares?
But I, the man of sense and learning too,
The able to think yet act, the this, the that,
I, to believe at this late time of day!
Enough; you see, I need not fear contempt.

—Except it's yours! Admire me as these
may,

You don't. But whom at least do you admire?

Present your own perfection, your ideal,
Your pattern man for a minute—oh, make haste,

Is it Napoleon you would have us grow?
Concede the means; allow his head and hand,
(A large concession, clever as you are)
Good! In our common-primal element
Of unbelief (we can't believe, you know—
We're still at that admission, recollect!)

Where do you find—apart from, towering o'er
The secondary temporary aims
Which satisfy the gross taste you despise—
Where do you find his star?—his crazy trust
God knows through what or in what? it's alive
And shines and leads him, and that's all we want.

Have we aught in our sober night shall point
Such ends as his were, and direct the means
Of working out our purpose straight as his,
Nor bring a moment's trouble on success
With after-care to justify the same?
—Be a Napoleon, and yet disbelieve—
Why, the man's mad, friend, take his light
away!

What's the vague good o' the world, for which you dare

With comfort to yourself blow millions up?
We neither of us see it! we do see
The blown-up millions—spatter of their brains
And writhing of their bowels and so forth,
In that bewildering entanglement
Of horrible eventualities

Past calculation to the end of time!
Can I mistake for some clear word of God
(Which were my ample warrant for it all)
His puff of hazy instinct, idle talk,
"The State, that's I," quack-nonsense about crowns,

And (when one beats the man to his last hold)
A vague idea of setting things to rights,
Policing people efficaciously,
More to their profit, most of all to his own;
The whole to end that dismallest of ends
By an Austrian marriage, cant to us the Church,
And resurrection of the old régime?

Would I, who hope to live a dozen years,
Fight Austerlitz for reasons such and such?
No: for, concede me but the merest chance

Doubt may be wrong—there's judgment, life to come !

With just that chance, I dare not. Doubt proves right ?

This present life is all ?—you offer me
Its dozen noisy years, without a chance
That wedding an archduchess, wearing lace,
And getting called by divers new-coined names,
Will drive off ugly thoughts and let me dine,
Sleep, read and chat in quiet as I like !
Therefore I will not.

Take another case ;

Fit up the cabin yet another way.

What say you to the poets ? shall we write
Hamlet, Othello—make the world our own,
Without a risk to run of either sort ?

I can't !—to put the strongest reason first.

"But try," you urge, "the trying shall suffice ;

"The aim, if reached or not, makes great the life :

"Try to be Shakespeare, leave the rest to fate !"

Spare my self-knowledge—there's no fooling
me !

If I prefer remaining my poor self,
I say so not in self-dispraise but praise.

If I'm a Shakespeare, let the well alone ;

Why should I try to be what now I am ?

If I'm no Shakespeare, as too probable,—

His power and consciousness and self-delight

And all we want in common, shall I find—

Trying for ever ? while on points of taste

Wherewith, to speak it humbly, he and I

Are dowered alike—I'll ask you, I or he,

Which in our two lives realizes most ?

Much, he imagined—somewhat, I possess.

He had the imagination ; stick to that !

Let him say, "In the face of my soul's works

"Your world is worthless and I touch it not

"Lest I should wrong them"—I'll withdraw my plea.

But does he say so ? look upon his life !

Himself, who only can, gives judgment there.

He leaves his towers and gorgeous palaces

To build the trimmest house in Stratford town ;

Saves money, spends it, owns the worth of
things,

Giulio Romano's pictures, Dowland's lute ;

Enjoys a show, respects the puppets, too,

And none more, had he seen its entry once,

Than "Pandulph, of fair Milan cardinal."

Why then should I who play that personage,

The very Pandulph Shakespeare's fancy made,

Be told that had the poet chanced to start

From where I stand now (some degree like
mine

Being just the goal he ran his race to reach) :

He would have run the whole race back,
forsooth,

And left being Pandulph, to begin write plays ?

Ah, the earth's best can be but the earth's
best !

Did Shakespeare live, he could but sit at home

And get himself in dreams the Vatican,

Greek busts, Venetian paintings, Roman walls,

And English books, none equal to his own ;

Which I read, bound in gold (he never did),

—Terni's fall, Naples' bay and Gothard's top—

Eh, friend ? I could not fancy one of these ;

But, as I pour this claret, there they are :

I've gained them—crossed St. Gothard last July

With ten mules to the carriage and a bed :

Slung inside ; is my hap the worse for that ?

We want the same things, Shakespeare and
myself,

And what I want, I have : he, gifted more,

Could fancy he too had them when he liked,

But not so thoroughly that, if fate allowed,

He would not have them also in my sense.

We play one game ; I send the ball aloft

No less adroitly that of fifty strokes

Scarce five go o'er the wall so wide and high

Which sends them back to me : I wish and get.

He struck balls higher and with better skill,

But at a poor fence level with his head,

And hit—his Stratford house, a coat of arms,

Successful dealings in his grain and wool,—

While I receive heaven's incense in my nose :

And style myself the cousin of Queen Bess.

Ask him, if this life's all, who wins the game ?

Believe—and our whole argument breaks up :
Enthusiasm's the best thing, I repeat ;

Only, we can't command it ; fire and life
Are all, dead matter's nothing, we agree :
And be it a mad dream or God's very breath,
The fact's the same,—belief's fire, once in us,
Makes of all else mere stuff to show itself :
We penetrate our life with such a glow
As fire lends wood and iron—this turns steel,
That burns to ash—all's one, fire proves its power

For good or ill, since men call flare success.
But paint a fire, it will not therefore burn.
Light one in me, I'll find it food enough !
Why, to be Luther—that's a life to lead,
Incomparably better than my own.
He comes, reclaims God's earth for God, he
says,

Sets up God's rule again by simple means,
Re-opens a shut book, and all is done.
He flared out in the flaring of mankind ;
Such Luther's luck was : how shall such be
mine ?

If he succeeded, nothing's left to do :
And if he did not altogether—well, . . .
Strauss is the next advance. All Strauss should be

I might be also. But to what result ?
He looks upon no future : Luther did.
What can I gain on the denying side ?
Ice makes no conflagration. State the facts,
Read the text right, emancipate the world—
The emancipated world enjoys itself
With scarce a thank-you : Blougram told it
first

It could not owe a farthing,—not to him
More than Saint Paul ! 'twould press its pay,
you think ?

Then add there's still that plaguy hundredth
chance

Strauss may be wrong. And so a risk is run—
For what gain ? not for Luther's, who secured

A real heaven in his heart throughout his life,
Supposing death a little altered things.

"Ay, but since really you lack faith," you
cry,

"You run the same risk really on all sides,

"In cool indifference as bold unbelief.

"As well be Strauss as swing 'twixt Paul and
him.

"It's not worth having, such imperfect faith,
"No more available to do faith's work

"Than unbelief like mine. Whole faith, or none !"

Softly, my friend ! I must dispute that point.

Once own the use of faith, I'll find you faith.
We're back on Christian ground. You call for faith :

I show you doubt, to prove that faith exists.
The more of doubt, the stronger faith, I say,
If faith o'ercomes doubt. How I know it does ?

By life and man's free will, God gave for that !
To mould life as we choose it, shows our choice :

That's our one act, the previous work's his
own.

You criticize the soul ? it reared this tree—
This broad life and whatever fruit it bears !
What matter though I doubt at every pore, Head-doubts, heart-doubts, doubts at my fingers' ends,

Doubts in the trivial work of every day,
Doubts at the very bases of my soul
In the grand moments when she probes her
self—

If finally I have a life to show,
The thing I did, brought out in evidence
Against the thing done to me underground
By hell and all its brood, for aught I know ?
I say, whence sprang this ? shows it faith or
doubt ?

All's doubt in me ; where's break of faith in
this ?

It is the idea, the feeling and the love, God means mankind should strive for and show forth

Whatever be the process to that end,—
And not historic knowledge, logic sound,
And metaphysical acumen, sure !

"What think ye of Christ," friend ? when all's done and said,

Like you this Christianity or not ?

It may be false, but will you wish it true ?

Has it your vote to be so if it can?
 Trust you an instinct silenced long ago
 That will break silence and enjoin you love
 What mortified philosophy is hoarse,
 And all in vain, with bidding you despise?
 If you desire faith—then you've faith enough:
 What else seeks God—nay, what else seek ourselves?

You form a notion of me, we'll suppose,
 On hearsay; it's a favourable one:
 "But still" (you add), "there was no such good man,

"Because of contradiction in the facts.

"One proves, for instance, he was born in Rome,

"This Blougram; yet throughout the tales of him

"I see he figures as an Englishman."

Well, the two things are reconcilable.

But would I rather you discovered that,
 Subjoining—"Still, what matter though they be?

"Blougram concerns me nought, born here or there."

Pure faith indeed—you know not what you ask!

Naked belief in God the Omnipotent,
 Omniscient, Omnipresent, sears too much
 The sense of conscious creatures to be borne.
 It were the seeing him, no flesh shall dare.
 Some think, Creation's meant to show him
 forth:

I say it's meant to hide him all it can,
 And that's what all the blessed evil's for.

Its use in Time is to environ us,
 Our breath, our drop of dew, with shield
 enough

Against that sight till we can bear its stress.
 Under a vertical sun, the exposed brain
 And lidless eye and disemprisoned heart
 And less certainly would wither up at once
 Than mind, confronted with the truth of him.
 But time and earth case-harden us to live;
 The feeblest sense is trusted most; the child
 Feels God a moment, ichors o'er the place,
 Plays on and grows to be a man like us.

With me, faith means perpetual unbelief

Kept quiet like the snake 'neath Michael's foot

Who stands calm just because he feels it writhe.

Or, if that's too ambitious,—here's my box—
 I need the excitation of a pinch

Threatening the torpor of the inside-nose
 Nigh on the imminent sneeze that never comes.

"Leave it in peace" advise the simple folk:

Make it aware of peace by itching-fits,
 Say I—let doubt occasion still more faith!

You'll say, once all believed, man, woman,
 child,

In that dear middle-age these noodles praise.

How you'd exult if I could put you back

Six hundred years, blot out cosmogony,

Geology, ethnology, what not,

(Greek endings, each the little passing-bell

That signifies some faith's about to die),

And set you square with Genesis again,—

When such a traveller told you his last news,

He saw the ark a-top of Ararat

But did not climb there since 'twas getting dusk

And robber-bands infest the mountain's foot!

How should you feel, I ask, in such an age,

How act? As other people felt and did;
 With soul more blank than this decanter's knob,

Believe—and yet lie, kill, rob, fornicate

Full in belief's face, like the beast you'd be!

No, when the fight begins within himself,
 A man's worth something. God stoops o'er his head,

Satan looks up between his feet—both tug—
 He's left, himself, i' the middle: the soul wakes

And grows. Prolong that battle through his
 life!

Never leave growing till the life to come!

Here, we've got callous to the Virgin's winks

That used to puzzle people wholesomely:

Men have outgrown the shame of being fools.

What are the laws of nature, not to bend

If the Church bid them?—brother Newman asks.

Up with the Immaculate Conception, then—
On to the rack with faith!—is my advice.
Will not that hurry us upon our knees,
Knocking our breasts, "It can't be—yet it shall!

"Who am I, the worm, to argue with my Pope?

"Low things confound the high things!"
and so forth.

That's better than acquitting God with grace
As some folk do. He's tried—no case is proved,
Philosophy is lenient—he may go!

You'll say, the old system's not so obsolete
But men believe still: ay, but who and where?

King Bomba's lazzaroni foster yet
The sacred flame, so Antonelli writes;
But even of these, what ragamuffin-saint
Believes God watches him continually,
As he believes in fire that it will burn,
Or rain that it will drench him? Break fire's law,

Sin against rain, although the penalty
Be just a singe or soaking? "No," he smiles;
"Those laws are laws that can enforce themselves."

The sum of all is—yes, my doubt is great,
My faith's still greater, then my faith's enough.
I have read much, thought much, experienced
much,

Yet would die rather than avow my fear
The Naples' liquefaction may be false,
When set to happen by the palace-clock
According to the clouds or dinner-time.
I hear you recommend, I might at least
Eliminate, declassify my faith
Since I adopt it; keeping what I must
And leaving what I can—such points as this.
I won't—that is, I can't throw one away.
Supposing there's no truth in what I hold
About the need of trial to man's faith,
Still, when you bid me purify the same,
To such a process I discern no end.

Clearing off one excrescence to see two,
There's ever a next in size, now grown as big,
That meets the knife: I cut and cut again!
First cut the Liquefaction, what comes last
But Fichte's clever cut at God himself?
Experimentalize on sacred things!
I trust nor hand nor eye nor heart nor brain
To stop betimes: they all get drunk alike.
The first step, I am master not to take.

You'd find the cutting-process to your taste
As much as leaving growths of lies unpruned,
Nor see more danger in it,—you retort.
Your taste's worth mine; but my taste proves more wise

When we consider that the steadfast hold
On the extreme end of the chain of faith
Gives all the advantage, makes the difference
With the rough purblind mass we seek to rule:
We are their lords, or they are free of us,
Just as we tighten or relax our hold.
So, other matters equal, we'll revert
To the first problem—which, if solved my way
And thrown into the balance, turns the scale—
How we may lead a comfortable life,
How suit our luggage to the cabin's size.

Of course you are remarking all this time
How narrowly and grossly I view life,
Respect the creature-comforts, care to rule
The masses, and regard complacently
"The cabin," in our old phrase. Well, I do.
I act for, talk for, live for this world now,
As this world prizes action, life and talk:
No prejudice to what next world may prove,
Whose new laws and requirements, my best pledge

To observe then, is that I observe these now,
Shall do hereafter what I do meanwhile.
Let us concede (gratuitously though)
Next life relieves the soul of body, yields
Pure spiritual enjoyment: well, my friend,
Why lose this life if the meantime, since its use
May be to make the next life more intense?

Do you know, I have often had a dream
(Work it up in your next month's article)
Of man's poor spirit in its progress, still

Losing true life for ever and a day.
 Through ever trying to be, and ever being—
 In the evolution of successive spheres—
Before its actual sphere and place of life,
 Halfway into the next, which having reached;
 It shoots with corresponding foolery.
 Halfway into the next still, on and off!
 As when a traveller, bound from North to South,
 Scouts fur in Russia: what's its use in France?
 In France spurns flannel: where's its need in Spain?
 In Spain drops cloth, too cumbrous for Algiers!
 Linen goes next, and last the skin itself,
 A superfluity at Timbuctoo.
 When, through his journey, was the fool at ease?
 I'm at ease now, friend; worldly in this world,
 I take and like its way of life; I think
 My brothers, who administer the means,
 Live better for my comfort—that's good too;
 And God, if he pronounce upon such life,
 Approves my service, which is better still.
 If he keep silence,—why, for you or me
 Or that brute beast pulled-up in to-day's
 "Times,"
 What odds is't, save to ourselves, what life
 we lead?

You meet me at this issue: you declare,—
 All special-pleading done with—truth is truth,
 And justifies itself by undreamed ways.
 You don't fear but it's better, if we doubt,
 To say so, act up to our truth perceived
 However feebly. Do then,—act away!
 'Tis there I'm on the watch for you. How one acts
 Is, both of us agree, our chief concern:
 And how you'll act is what I fain would see.
 If, like the candid person you appear,
 You dare to make the most of your life's scheme
 As I of mine, live up to its full law.
 Since there's no higher law that counter-checks.
 Put natural religion to the test

You've just demolished the revealed with—quick;
 Down to the root of all that checks your will
 All prohibition to lie, kill and thieve,
 Or even to be an atheistic priest:
 Suppose a pricking to incontinence—
 Philosophers deduce you chastity
 Or shame, from just the fact that at the first Whoso embraced a woman in the field,
 Threw club down and forewent his brains
 beside,
 So, stood a ready victim in the reach
 Of any brother-savage, club in hand;
 Hence saw the use of going out of sight
 In wood or cave to prosecute his loves:
 I read this in a French book t'other day.
 Does law so analysed coerce you much?
 Oh, men spin clouds of fuzz where matters end,
 But you who reach where the first thread
 begins,
 You'll soon cut that!—which means you can,
 but won't,
 Through certain instincts, blind, unreasoned-
 out,
 You dare not set aside, you can't tell why,
 But there they are, and so you let them rule.
 Then, friend, you seem as much a slave as I,
 A liar, conscious coward and hypocrite,
 Without the good the slave expects to get,
 In case he has a master after all!
 You own your instincts? why, what else do I,
 Who want, am made for, and must have a
 God.
 Ere I can be aught, do aught?—no mere name Want, but the true thing with what proves its truth,
 To wit, a relation from that thing to me,
 Touching from head to foot—which touch I
 feel,
 And with it take the rest, this life of ours!
 I live my life here; yours you dare not live!

—Not as I state it, who (you please subjoin)
 Disfigure such a life and call it names.
 While, to your mind, remains another way
 For simple men: knowledge and power have rights,
 But ignorance and weakness have rights too!

There needs no crucial effort to find truth
 If here or there or anywhere about :
 We ought to turn each side, try hard and see,
 And if we can't, be glad we've earned at least
 The right, by one laborious proof the more,
 To graze in peace earth's pleasant pasturage.
 Men are not angels, neither are they brutes :
 Something we may see, all we cannot see.
 What need of lying? I say, I see all,
 And swear to each detail the most minute
 In what I think a Pan's face—you, mere cloud :
 I swear I hear him speak and see him wink,
 For fear, if once I drop the emphasis,
 Mankind may doubt there's any cloud at all.
 You take the simple life—ready to see,
 Willing to see (for no cloud's worth a face)—
 And leaving quiet what no strength can move,
 And which, who bids you move? who has the right?

I bid you; but you are God's sheep, not mine :
 "Pastor est tui Dominus." You find
 In this the pleasant pasture of our life
 Much you may eat without the least offence.
 Much you don't eat because your maw objects,
 Much you would eat but that your fellow-
 flock

Open great eyes at you and even butt,
 And thereupon you like your mates so well
 You cannot please yourself, offending them ;
 'Though when they seem exorbitantly sheep,
 You weigh your pleasure with their butts and bleats

And strike the balance. Sometime certain fears

Restrain you, real checks since you find them so ;

Sometimes you please yourself and nothing
 checks :

And thus you graze through life with not one lie,

And like it best.

But do you, in truth's name?

If so, you beat—which means you are not I—
 Who needs must make earth mine and feed my fill

Not simply unbutted at, unbickered with,
 But motioned to the velvet of the sword

By those obsequious wethers' very selves.
 Look at me, sir ; my age is double yours ;
 At yours, I knew beforehand, so enjoyed,
 What now I should be—as, permit the word,
 I pretty well imagine your whole range
 And stretch of tether twenty years to come.
 We both have minds and bodies much alike :
 In truth's name, don't you want my bishopric,
 My daily bread, my influence and my state?
 You're young. I'm old ; you must be old one day ;

Will you find then, as I do hour by hour,
 Women their lovers kneel to, who cut curls
 From your fat lap-dog's ear to grace a brooch—
 Dukes, who petition just to kiss your ring—
 With much beside you know or may conceive?
 Suppose we die to-night : well, here am I,
 Such were my gains, life bore this fruit to me,
 While writing all the same my articles
 On music, poetry, the fictile vase
 Found at Albano, chess, Anacreon's Greek.
 But you—the highest honour in your life,
 The thing you'll crown yourself with, all your
 days,

Is—dining here and drinking this last glass
 I pour you out in sign of amity
 Before we part for ever. Of your power
 And social influence, worldly worth in short,
 Judge what's my estimation by the fact,
 I do not condescend to enjoin, beseech,
 Hint secrecy on one of all these words !
 You're shrewd and know that should you publish one

The world would brand the lie—my enemies
 first,

Who'd sneer—"the bishop's an arch-hypocrite

"And knave perhaps, but not so frank a fool."

Whereas I should not dare for both my ears Breathe one such syllable, smile one such
 smile,

Before the chaplain who reflects myself—
 My shade's so much more potent than your flesh.

What's your reward, self-abnegating friend?
 Stood you confessed of those exceptional
 And privileged great natures that dwarf mine—

A zealot with a mad ideal in reach,
A poet just about to print his ode,
A statesman with a scheme to stop this war,
An artist whose religion is his art—
I should have nothing to object : such men
Carry the fire, all things grow warm to them,
Their druggets' worth my purple, they beat
me.

But you,—you're just as little those as I—
You, Gigadibs, who, thirty years of age,
Write stately for Blackwood's Magazine,
Believe you see two points in Hamlet's soul
Unseized by the Germans yet—which view you'll print—

Meantime the best you have to show being
still

That lively lightsome article we took Almost for the true Dickens,—what's its name?

"The Slum and Cellar, or Whitechapel life
"Limned after dark!" it made me laugh, I
know,

And pleased a month, and brought you in ten pounds.

—Success I recognize and compliment,
And therefore give you, if you choose, three
words

(The card and pencil-scratch is quite enough)
Which whether here, in Dublin or New York,
Will get you, prompt as at my eyebrow's wink,
Such terms as never you aspired to get

In all our own reviews and some not ours.
Go write your lively sketches! be the first
"Blougram, or The Eccentric Confidence"—
Or better simply say, "The Outward-bound."

Why, men as soon would throw it in my teeth
As copy and quote the infamy chalked broad
About me on the church-door opposite.

You will not wait for that experience though,
I fancy, howsoever you decide,
To discontinue—not detesting, not
Defaming, but at least—despising me!

Over his wine so smiled and talked his hour
Sylvester Blougram, styled in partibus
Episcopis, nec non—(the deuce knows what It's changed to by our novel hierarchy)

With Gigadibs the literary man,
Who played with spoons, explored his plate's design,
And ranged the olive-stones about its edge,
While the great bishop rolled him out a mind
Long crumpled, till creased consciousness lay smooth.

For Blougram, he believed, say, half he spoke.

The other portion, as he shaped it thus
For argumentary purposes,
He felt his foe was foolish to dispute.
Some arbitrary accidental thoughts
That crossed his mind, amusing because new,
He chose to represent as fixtures there, Invariable convictions (such they seemed
Beside his interlocutor's loose cards
Flung daily down, and not the same way twice)

While certain hell-deep instincts, man's weak
tongue

Is never bold to utter in their truth
Because styled hell-deep ('tis an old mistake
To place hell at the bottom of the earth)
He ignored these,—not having in readiness
Their nomenclature and philosophy:

He said true things, but called them by wrong names.

"On the whole," he thought, "I justify myself

"On every point where cavillers like this
"Oppugn my life: he tries one kind of fence,

"I close, he's worsted, that's enough for
him.

"He's on the ground: if ground should break
away

"I take my stand on, there's a firmer yet
"Beneath it, both of us may sink and reach.

"His ground was over mine and broke 'the
first:

"So, let him sit with me this many a year!"

He did not sit five minutes. Just a week
Sufficed his sudden healthy vehemence.
Something had struck him in the "Outward-bound"

Another way than Blougram's purpose was:

And having bought, not cabin-furniture
 But settler's implements (enough for three)
 And started for Australia—there, I hope,
 By this time he has tested his first plough,
 And studied his last chapter of St. John.

CLEON.

"As certain also of your own poets have
 said"—

[An Imaginary person. The poet quoted by
 St. Paul was Aratus, a native of Tarsus.]

CLEON the poet (from the sprinkled isles,
 Lily on lily, that o'erlace the sea,
 And laugh their pride when the light wave lisps "Greece")—

To Protus in his Tyranny: much health!

They give thy letter to me, even now:
 I read and seem as if I heard thee speak.
 The master of thy galley still unloads
 Gift after gift; they block my court at last
 And pile themselves along its portico
 Royal with sunset, like a thought of thee:
 And one white she-slave from the group dispersed
 Of black and white slaves (like the chequer-
 work
 Pavement, at once my nation's work and gift,
 Now covered with this settle-down of doves),
 One lyric woman, in her crocus vest
 Woven of sea-wools, with her two white hands
 Commends to me the strainer and the cup
 Thy lip hath bettered ere it blesses mine.

Well-counselled, king, in thy munificence!
 For so shall men remark, in such an act
 Of love for him whose song gives life its joy,
 Thy recognition of the use of life;
 Nor call thy spirit barely adequate
 To help on life in straight ways, broad enough
 For vulgar souls, by ruling and the rest.
 Thou, in the daily building of thy tower,—
 Whether in fierce and sudden spasms of toil,
 Or through dim lulls of unapparent growth,
 Or when the general work had good acclaim

Climbed with the eye to cheer the architect,— Didst ne'er engage in work for mere work's
 sake—

Hadst ever in thy heart the luring hope
 Of some eventual rest a-top of it,
 Whence, all the tumult of the building hushed,
 Thou first of men mightst look out to the

East:

The vulgar saw thy tower, thou sawest the sun.
 For this, I promise on thy festival
 To pour libation, looking o'er the sea,
 Making this slave narrate thy fortunes, speak
 Thy great words, and describe thy royal face—
 Wishing thee wholly where Zeus lives the most,
 Within the eventual element of calm.

Thy letter's first requirement meets me here.
 It is as thou hast heard: in one short life

I, Cleon, have effected all those things
 Thou wonderingly dost enumerate.
 That epos on thy hundred plates of gold
 Is mine,—and also mine the little chant,
 So sure to rise from every fishing-bark
 When, lights at prow, the seamen haul their net.

The image of the sun-god on the phare,
 Men turn from the sun's self to see, is mine;
 The Poecile,¹ o'er-storied its whole length,
 As thou didst hear, with painting, is mine too.
 I know the true proportions of a man
 And woman also, not observed before;
 And I have written three books on the soul,
 Proving absurd all written hitherto,
 And putting us to ignorance again.
 Formusic,—why, I have combined the moods,
 Inventing one. In brief, all arts are mine;
 Thus much the people know and recognize,
 Throughout our seventeen islands. Marvel
 not.

We of these latter days, with greater mind
 Than our forerunners, since more composite;
 Look not so great, beside their simple way,
 To a judge who only sees one way at once,
 One mind-point and no other at a time,—
 Compares the small part of a man of us
 With some whole man of the heroic age,

¹ The famous painted Porch on the Agora in Athens.

Great in his way—not ours, nor meant for ours.
And ours is greater, had we skill to know :
For, what we call this life of men on earth,
This sequence of the soul's achievements here
Being, as I find much reason to conceive,
Intended to be viewed eventually
As a great whole, not analyzed to parts,
But each part having reference to all,—
How shall a certain part, pronounced complete,

Endure effacement by another part ?
Was the thing done?—then, what's to do
again ?

See, in the chequered pavement opposite,
Suppose the artist made a perfect rhomb,
And next a lozenge, then a trapezoid—
He did not overlay them, superimpose
The new upon the old and blot it out,
But laid them on a level in his work,
Making at last a picture ; there it lies.
So, first the perfect separate forms were made,
The portions of mankind ; and after, so,
Occurred the combination of the same.
For where had been a progress, otherwise ?
Mankind, made up of all the single men,—
In such a synthesis the labour ends.
Now mark me ! those divine men of old time
Have reached, thou sayest well, each at one point

The outside verge that rounds our faculty ;
And where they reached, who can do more than reach ?

It takes but little water just to touch
At some one point the inside of a sphere,
And, as we turn the sphere, touch all the rest
In due succession : but the finer air
Which not so palpably nor obviously,
Though no less universally, can touch
The whole circumference of that emptied
sphere,

Fills it more fully than the water did ;
Holds thrice the weight of water in itself
Resolved into a subtler element.
And yet the vulgar call the sphere first full
Up to the visible height—and after, void ;
Not knowing air's more hidden properties.
And thus our soul, misknown, cries out to Zeus

To vindicate his purpose in our life :
Why stay we on the earth unless to grow ?
Long since, I imaged, wrote the fiction out,
That he or other god descended here
And, once for all, showed simultaneously
What, in its nature, never can be shown,
Piecemeal or in succession ;—showed, I say,
The worth both absolute and relative :
Of all his children from the birth of time,
His instruments for all appointed work.
I now go on to image,—might we hear
The judgment which should give the due to each,

Show where the labour lay and where the ease,
And prove Zeus' self, the latent everywhere !
This is a dream :—but no dream, let us hope,
That years and days, the summers and the springs,

Follow each other with unwaning powers.
The grapes which dye thy wine are richer far,
Through culture, than the wild wealth of the
rock ;

The suave plum than the savage-tasted drupe ;
The pastured honey-bee drops choicer sweet ;
The flowers turn double, and the leaves turn
flowers ;

That young and tender crescent-moon, thy slave,

Sleeping above her robe as budged by clouds,
Refines upon the women of my youth.

What, and the soul alone deteriorates ?
I have not chanted verse like Homer, no—
Nor swept string like Terpander, no—nor carved

And painted men like Phidias and his friend :
I am not great as they are, point by point.

But I have entered into sympathy
With these four, running these into one soul,
Who, separate, ignored each other's art.

Say, is it nothing that I know them all ?
The wild flower was the larger ; I have dashed

Rose-blood upon its petals, pricked its cup's
Honey with wine, and driven its seed to fruit,
And show a better flower if not so large :
I stand myself. Refer this to the gods
Whose gift alone it is ! which, shall I dare
(All pride apart) upon the absurd pretext

That such a gift by chance lay in my hand,
Discourse of lightly or depreciate?
It might have fallen to another's hand : what
then?
I pass too surely : let at least truth stay !

And next, of what thou followest on to ask.
This being with me as I declare, O king,
My works, in all these varicoloured kinds,
So done by me, accepted so by men—
Thou askest, if (my soul thus in men's hearts)
I must not be accounted to attain
The very crown and proper end of life?
Inquiring thence how, now life closeth up,
I face death with success in my right hand ;
Whether I fear death less than dost thyself
The fortunate of men? "For" (writest thou)
"Thou leavest much behind, while I leave
nought."
"Thy life stays in the poems men shall sing,
"The pictures men shall study ; while my
life,
"Complete and whole now in its power and
joy,
"Dies altogether with my brain and arm,
"Is lost indeed ; since, what survives myself?
"The brazen statue to o'erlook my grave,
"Set on the promontory which I named.
"And that—some supple courtier of my heir
"Shall use its robed and sceptred arm, perhaps,
"To fix the rope to, which best drags it down.
"I go then : triumph thou, who dost not go !"

Nay, thou art worthy of hearing my whole
mind.

Is this apparent, when thou turn'st to muse
Upon the scheme of earth and man in chief,
That admiration grows as knowledge grows?
That imperfection means perfection hid,
Reserved in part, to grace the after-time?
If, in the morning of philosophy,
Ere aught had been recorded, nay perceived,
Thou, with the light now in thee, couldst have looked
On all earth's tenantry, from worm to bird,
Ere man, her last, appeared upon the stage—
Thou wouldst have seen them perfect, and deduced

The perfectness of others yet unseen.
Conceding which,—had Zeus then questioned
thee

"Shall I go on a step, improve on this,
"Do more for visible creatures than is done?"
Thou wouldst have answered, "Ay, by making each

"Grow conscious in himself—by that alone.
"All's perfect else : the shell sucks fast the
rock,

"The fish strikes through the sea, the snake
both swims

"And slides, forth range the beasts, the birds take flight,

"Till life's mechanics can no further go—

"And all this joy in natural life is put

"Like fire from off thy finger into each,

"So exquisitely perfect is the same.

"But 'tis pure fire, and they mere matter are

"It has them, not they it : and so I choose

"For man, thy last premeditated work

"(If I might add a glory to the scheme)

"That a third thing should stand apart from both,

"A quality arise within his soul,

"Which, intro-active, made to supervise

"And feel the force it has, may view itself,

"And so be happy." Man might live at first

The animal life : but is there nothing more?

In due time, let him critically learn

How he lives ; and, the more he gets to know

Of his own life's adaptabilities,

The more joy-giving will his life become.

Thus man, who hath this quality, is best.

But thou, king, hadst more reasonably said :

"Let progress end at once,—man make no step

"Beyond the natural man, the better beast,

"Using his senses, not the sense of sense."

In man there's failure, only since he left

The lower and inconscious forms of life.

We called it an advance, the rendering plain

Man's spirit might grow conscious of man's life,

And, by new lore so added to the old,

Take each step higher over the brute's head.

This grew the only life, the pleasure-house,

Watch-tower and treasure-fortress of the soul,

Which whole surrounding flats of natural life

Seemed only fit to yield subsistence to ;
 A tower that crowns a country. But alas,
 The soul now climbs it just to perish there !
 Forthence we have discovered ('tis no dream—
 We know this, which we had not else perceived)
 That there's a world of capability
 For joy, spread round about us, meant for us,
 Inviting us ; and still the soul craves all,
 And still the flesh replies, "Take no jot more "Than ere thou clombst the tower to look abroad !

"Nay, so much less as that fatigue has brought "Deduction to it." We struggle, fain to enlarge

Our bounded physical reciprocity,
 Increase our power, supply fresh oil to life,
 Repair the waste of age and sickness : no,
 It skills not ! life's inadequate to joy,
 As the soul sees joy, tempting life to take.
 They praise a fountain in my garden here
 Wherein a Naiad sends the water-bow
 Thin from her tube ; she smiles to see it rise.
 What if I told her, it is just a thread
 From that great river which the hills shut up,
 And mock her with my leave to take the same?
 The artificer has given her one small tube
 Past power to widen or exchange—what boots
 To know she might spout oceans if she could?
 She cannot lift beyond her first thin thread :
 And so a man can use but a man's joy
 While he sees God's. Is it for Zeus to boast,
 "See, man, how happy I live, and despair—
 "That I may be still happier—for thy use !"
 If this were so, we could not thank our lord,
 As hearts beat on to doing ; 'tis not so—
 Malice it is not. Is it carelessness?
 Still, no. If care—where is the sign? I ask,
 And get no answer, and agree in sum,
 O king, with thy profound discouragement,
 Who seest the wider but to sigh the more.
 Most progress is most failure : thou sayest well.

The last point now :—thou dost except a case—

Holding joy not impossible to one
 With artist-gifts—to such a man as I
 Who leave behind me living works indeed ;
 For, such a poem, such a painting lives.

What? dost thou verily trip upon a word,
 Confound the accurate view of what joy is (Caught somewhat clearer by my eyes than thine)

With feeling joy? confound the knowing how
 And showing how to live (my faculty)
 With actually living?—Otherwise
 Where is the artist's vantage o'er the king?
 Because in my great epos I display
 How divers men young, strong, fair, wise, can act—

Is this as though I acted? if I paint, Carve the young Phœbus, am I therefore young?

Methinks I'm older that I bowed myself
 The many years of pain that taught me art !
 Indeed, to know is something, and to prove
 How all this beauty might be enjoyed, is more :
 But, knowing nought, to enjoy is something
 too.

Yon rower, with the moulded muscles there,
 Lowering the sail, is nearer it than I.
 I can write love-odes : thy fair slave's an ode.
 I get to sing of love, when grown too grey
 For being beloved : she turns to that young
 man,

The muscles all a-ripple on his back.
 I know the joy of kingship : well, thou art king !

"But," sayest thou—(and I marvel, I
 repeat,
 To find thee trip on such a mere word) "what
 "Thou writest, paintest, stays ; that does
 not die :

"Sappho survives, because we sing her songs,
 "And Æschylus, because we read his plays!"
 Why, if they live still, let them come and take Thy slave in my despite, drink from thy cup, Speak in my place. Thou diest while I survive?

Say rather that my fate is deadlier still,
 In this, that every day my sense of joy Grows more acute, my soul (intensified
 By power and insight) more enlarged, more keen ;

While every day my hairs fall more and more,
 My hand shakes, and the heavy years increase—

The horror quickening still from year to year,
The consummation coming past escape
When I shall know most, and yet least enjoy—
When all my works wherein I prove my worth, Being present still to mock me in men's mouths,

Alive still, in the praise of such as thou,
I, I the feeling, thinking, acting man,
The man who loved his life so over-much,
Sleep in my urn. It is so horrible,
I dare at times imagine to my need
Some future state revealed to us by Zeus,
Unlimited in capability
For joy, as this is in desire for joy,
—To seek which, the joy-hunger forces us :
That, stung by straitness of our life, made strait

On purpose to make prized the life at large—
Freed by the throbbing impulse we call death,
We burst there as the worm into the fly,
Who, while a worm still, wants his wings.
But no !

Zeus has not yet revealed it ; and alas,
He must have done so, were it possible !

Live long and happy, and in that thought
die :

Glad for what was ! Farewell. And for the
rest,

I cannot tell thy messenger aright
Where to deliver what he bears of thine
To one called Paulus ; we have heard his fame

Indeed, if Christ be not one with him—
I know not, nor am troubled much to know.
Thou canst not think a mere barbarian Jew,
As Paulus proves to be, one circumcized,
Hath access to a secret shut from us ?
Thou wrongest our philosophy, O king,
In stooping to inquire of such an one,
As if his answer could impose at all !
He writeth, doth he ? well, and he may write.

Oh, the Jew findeth scholars ! certain slaves
Who touched on this same isle, preached him and Christ ;

And (as I gathered from a bystander)
Their doctrine could be held by no sane man.

RUDEL TO THE LADY OF TRIPOLI.

I KNOW a Mount, the gracious Sun perceives
First, when he visits, last, too, when he leaves
The world ; and, vainly favoured, it repays
The day-long glory of his steadfast gaze
By no change of its large calm front of snow.
And underneath the Mount, a Flower I
know,

He cannot have perceived, that changes ever
At his approach ; and, in the lost endeavour
To live his life, has parted, one by one,
With all a flower's true graces, for the grace
Of being but a foolish mimic sun,
With ray-like florets round a disk-like face.
Men nobly call by many a name the Mount
As over many a land of theirs its large
Calm front of snow like a triumphal targe
Is reared, and still with old names, fresh names vie,

Each to its proper praise and own account :
Men call the Flower, the Sunflower, sportively.

Oh, Angel of the East, one, one gold look Across the waters to this twilight nook,
—The far sad waters, Angel, to this nook !

Dear Pilgrim, art thou for the East indeed ?
Go !—saying ever as thou dost proceed,
That I, French Rudel, choose for my device
A sunflower outspread like a sacrifice
Before its idol. See ! These inexpert
And hurried fingers could not fail to hurt
The woven picture ; 'tis a woman's skill
Indeed ; but nothing baffled me, so, ill
Or well, the work is finished. Say, men feed
On songs I sing, and therefore bask the bees
On my flower's breast as on a platform broad :
But, as the flower's concern is not for these
But solely for the sun, so men applaud
In vain this Rudel, he not looking here,
But to the East—the East ! Go, say this,
Pilgrim dear !

ONE WORD MORE.¹

TO E. B. B.

1855.

THERE they are, my fifty men and women
Naming me the fifty poems finished !
Take them, Love, the book and me together :
Where the heart lies, let the brain lie also.

II.

Rafael made a century of sonnets,²
Made and wrote them in a certain volume
Dinted with the silver-pointed pencil
Else he only used to draw Madonnas :
These, the world might view—but one, the volume.

Who that one, you ask ? Your heart instructs you.

Did she live and love it all her life-time ?
Did she drop, his lady of the sonnets,³
Die, and let it drop beside her pillow
Where it lay in place of Rafael's glory,
Rafael's cheek so duteous and so loving—
Cheek, the world was wont to hail a painter's,
Rafael's cheek, her love had turned a poet's ?

You and I would rather read that volume,
(Taken to his beating bosom by it)
Lean and list the bosom-beats of Rafael,
Would we not ? than wonder at Madonnas—
Her, San Sisto⁴ names, and Her, Foligno,⁵
Her, that visits Florence⁶ in a vision,
Her, that's left with lilies in the Louvre⁷—
Seen by us and all the world in circle.

¹ [Originally appended to the collection of Poems called "Men and Women," the greater portion of which has now been, more correctly, distributed under the other titles of this edition.—R. B.]

² There is no reason to believe this to be the fact.

³ La Fornarina.

⁴ In Dresden. ⁵ In the Vatican.

⁶ In the Pitti Palace.

⁷ La Belle Jardinière, in the Louvre.

IV.

You and I will never read that volume.⁸
Guido Reni, like his own eye's apple
Guarded long the treasure-book and loved it,
Guido Reni dying, all Bologna Cried, and the world cried too, "Ours, the treasure !"

Suddenly, as rare things will, it vanished.

V.

Dante once prepared to paint an angel :
Whom to please ? You whisper "Beatrice."
While he mused and traced it and retraced it, (Peradventure with a pen corroded Still by drops of that hot ink he dipped for,
When, his left-hand i' the hair o' the wicked,
Back he held the brow and pricked its stigma,
Bit into the live man's flesh for parchment,
Loosed him, laughed to see the writing rattle,
Let the wretch go festering through
Florence)—

Dante, who loved well because he hated,
Hated wickedness that hinders loving,
Dante standing, studying his angel,—
In there broke the folk of his Inferno.
Says he—"Certain people of importance"
(Such he gave his daily dreadful line to)
"Entered and would seize, forsooth, the poet."
Says the poet—"Then I stopped my painting."

You and I would rather see that angel,
Painted by the tenderness of Dante,
Would we not ?—than read a fresh Inferno.

VII.

You and I will never see that picture.
While he mused on love and Beatrice,
While he softened o'er his outlined angel,
In they broke, those "people of importance,"
We and Bice⁹ bear the loss for ever.

What of Rafael's sonnets, Dante's picture ?
This : no artist lives and loves, that longs not
Once, and only once, and for one only,

⁸ Really a book of drawings, not sonnets.

⁹ Beatrice.

(Ah, the prize!) to find his love a language
Fit and fair and simple and sufficient—
Using nature that's an art to others,
Not, this one time, art that's turned his nature.

Ay, of all the artists living, loving,
None but would forego his proper dowry,—
Does he paint? he fain would write a poem,—
Does he write? he fain would paint a picture,
Put to proof art alien to the artist's,
Once, and only once, and for one only,
So to be the man and leave the artist,
Gain the man's joy, miss the artist's sorrow.

IX.

Wherefore? Heaven's gift takes earth's abatement!

He who smites the rock and spreads the water,

Bidding drink and live a crowd beneath him,
Even he, the minute makes immortal,
Proves, perchance, but mortal in the minute,
Desecrates, belike, the deed in doing.
While he smites, how can he but remember,
So he smote before, in such a peril,
When they stood and mocked—"Shall smiting help us?"

When they drank and sneered—"A stroke is easy!"

When they wiped their mouths and went their journey,

Throwing him for thanks—"But drought was

Thus old memories mar the actual triumph;
Thus the doing savours of disrelish;
Thus achievement lacks a gracious somewhat;

O'er-importuned brows becloud the mandate,
Carelessness or consciousness—the gesture.
For he bears an ancient wrong about him,
Sees and knows again those phalanxed faces,
Hears, yet one time more, the 'customed prelude—

"How shouldst thou, of all men, smite, and save us?"

Guesses what is like to prove the sequel—
"Egypt's flesh-pots—nay, the drought was better."

Oh, the crowd must have emphatic warrant!
Theirs, the Sinai-forehead's cloven brilliance,
Right-arm's rod-sweep, tongue's imperial fiat.
Never dares the man put off the prophet.

XI.

Did he love one face from out the thousands,
(Were she Jethro's daughter, white and wifely,
Were she but the Ethiopian bondslave,)
He would envy yon dumb patient camel,
Keeping a reserve of scanty water
Meant to save his own life in the desert;
Ready in the desert to deliver
(Kneeling down to let his breast be opened)
Hoard and life together for his mistress.

XII.

I shall never, in the years remaining,
Paint you pictures, no, nor carve you statues,
Make you music that should all-express me;
So it seems: I stand on my attainment.
This of verse alone, one life allows me;
Verse and nothing else have I to give you.
Other heights in other lives, God willing:
All the gifts from all the heights, your own,
Love!

XIII.

Yet a semblance of resource avails us—
Shade so finely touched, love's sense must seize it.

Take these lines, look lovingly and nearly,
Lines I write the first time and the last time.
He who works in fresco, steals a hair-brush,
Curbs the liberal hand, subservient proudly,
Cramps his spirit, crowds its all in little,
Makes a strange art of an art familiar,
Fills his lady's missal-marge with flowerets.
He who blows thro' bronze, may breathe
thro' silver,
Fittly serenade a slumbrous princess.
He who writes, may write for once as I do.

Love, you saw me gather men and women,
Live or dead or fashioned by my fancy,
Enter each and all, and use their service,
Speak from every mouth,—the speech, a poem.

ONE WORD MORE

Hardly shall I tell my joys and sorrows,
Hopes and fears, belief and disbelieving :
I am mine and yours—the rest be all men's,
Karshish, Cleon, Norbert and the fifty.
Let me speak this once in my true person,
Not as Lippo, Roland or Andrea,
Though the fruit of speech be just this sentence :

Pray you, look on these my men and women,
Take and keep my fifty poems finished ;
Where my heart lies, let my brain lie also !
Poor the speech ; be how I speak, for all things :

XV.

Not but that you know me ! Lo, the moon's
self !

Here in London, yonder late in Florence,
Still we find her face, the thrice-transfigured.
Curving on a sky imbrued with colour,
Drifted over Fiesole by twilight,
Came she, our new crescent of a hair's-
breadth.

Full she flared it, lamping Samminiato,¹
Rounder 'twixt the cypresses and rounder,
Perfect till the nightingales applauded.
Now, a piece of her old self, impoverished,
Hard to greet, she traverses the houseroofs,
Hurries with unhandsome thrift of silver,
Goes spiritedly, glad to finish.

What, there's nothing in the moon noteworthy ?

Nay : for if that moon could love a mortal,
Use, to charm him (so to fit a fancy),
All her magic ('tis the old sweet mythos),
She would turn a new side to her mortal,
Side unseen of herdsman, huntsman, steers-
man—

Blank to Zoroaster on his terrace,
Blind to Galileo on his turret,
Dumb to Homer, dumb to Keats—him, even !
Think, the wonder of the moonstruck mortal—
When she turns round, comes again in heaven,
Opens out anew for worse or better !

¹ San Miniato, the famous church in Florence.

Proves she like some portent of an iceberg
Swimming full upon the ship it founders,
Hungry with huge teeth of splintered crystals !
Proves she as the paved work of a sapphire Seen by Moses when he climbed the mountain ?

Moses, Aaron, Nadab and Abihu
Climbed and saw the very God, the Highest,
Stand upon the paved work of a sapphire.
Like the bodied heaven in his clearness
Shone the stone, the sapphire of that paved
work,
When they ate and drank and saw God also !

XVII.

What were seen ? None knows, none ever shall know.

Only this is sure—the sight were other,
Not the moon's same side, born late in
Florence,

Dying now impoverished here in London.
God be thanked, the meanest of his creatures
Boasts two soul-sides, one to face the world
with,

One to show a woman when he loves her !

XVIII.

This I say of me, but think of you, Love !
This to you—yourself my moon of poets !
Ah, but that's the world's side, there's the wonder,

Thus they see you, praise you, think they know you !

There, in turn I stand with them and praise
you—

Out of my own self, I dare to phrase it.
But the best is when I glide from out them,
Cross a step or two of dubious twilight,
Come out on the other side, the novel
Silent silver lights and darks undreamed of,
Where I hush and bless myself with silence.

XIX.

Oh, their Rafael of the dear Madonnas,
Oh, their Dante of the dread Inferno,
Wrote one song—and in my brain I sing it,
Drew one angel—borne, see, on my bosom !

IN A BALCONY.

1855.

IN A BALCONY.

PERSONS.

NORBERT.
CONSTANCE.
THE QUEEN.

CONSTANCE and NORBERT.

Norbert. Now!

Constance. Not now!

Norbert. Give me them again, those hands:

Put them upon my forehead, how it throbs!
Press them before my eyes, the fire comes through!

You cruellest, you dearest in the world,
Let me! The Queen must grant whate'er I ask—

How can I gain you and not ask the Queen?
There she stays waiting for me, here stand
you;

Some time or other this was to be asked;
Now is the one time—what I ask, I gain:
Let me ask now, Love!

Constance. Do, and ruin us.

Norbert. Let it be now, Love! All my soul breaks forth.

How I do love you! Give my love its way!
A man can have but one life and one death,
One heaven, one hell. Let me fulfil my fate—
Grant me my heaven now! Let me know you mine,

Prove you mine, write my name upon your
brow,

Hold you and have you, and then die away,
If God please, with completion in my soul!

Constance. I am not yours then? How content this man!

I am not his—who change into himself,
Have passed into his heart and beat its beats,

Who give my hands to him, my eyes, my
hair,

Give all that was of me away to him—

So well, that now, my spirit turned his own,

Takes part with him against the woman here,

Bids him not stumble at so mere a straw

As caring that the world be cognizant

How he loves her and how she worships him.

You have this woman, not as yet that world.

Go on, I bid, nor stop to care for me

By saying what I cease to care about,

The courtly name and pride of circumstance—

The name you'll pick up and be cumbered
with

Just for the poor parade's sake, nothing
more;

Just that the world may slip from under you—

Just that the world may cry "So much for
him—

"The man predestined to the heap of crowns:

"There goes his chance of winning one, at least!"

Norbert. The world!

Constance. You love it. Love me quite as well,

And see if I shall pray for this in vain!

Why must you ponder what it knows or thinks?

Norbert. You pray for—what, in vain?

Constance. Oh my heart's heart,

How I do love you, Norbert! That is right:

But listen, or I take my hands away!

You say, "let it be now": you would go now

And tell the Queen, perhaps six steps from us,

You love me—so you do, thank God!

Norbert. Thank God!

Constance. Yes, Norbert,—but you fain
would tell your love,

And, what succeeds the telling, ask of her

My hand. Now take this rose and look at it,

Listening to me. You are the minister,

The Queen's first favourite, nor without a cause.

To-night completes your wonderful year's-work

(This palace-feast is held to celebrate)

Made memorable by her life's success,

The junction of two crowns, on her sole head,

Her house had only dreamed of anciently :

That this mere dream is grown a stable truth,

To-night's feast makes authentic. Whose the praise ?

Whose genius, patience, energy, achieved

What turned the many heads and broke the hearts ?

You are the fate, your minute's in the heaven.

Next comes the Queen's turn. "Name your own reward !"

With leave to clench the past, chain the to-come,

Put out an arm and touch and take the sun

And fix it ever full-faced on your earth,

Possess yourself supremely of her life,—

You choose the single thing she will not grant ;

Nay, very declaration of which choice

Will turn the scale and neutralize your work :

At best she will forgive you, if she can.

You think I'll let you choose—her cousin's hand ?

Norbert. Wait. First, do you retain your old belief

The Queen is generous,—nay, is just ?

Constance. There, there !

So men make women love them, while they know

No more of women's hearts than . . . look you here,

You that are just and generous beside,

Make it your own case ! For example now,

I'll say—I let you kiss me, hold my hands—

Why? do you know why? I'll instruct you, then—

The kiss, because you have a name at court ;

This hand and this, that you may shut in each

A jewel, if you please to pick up such.

That's horrible? Apply it to the Queen—

Suppose I am the Queen to whom you speak :

"I was a nameless man ; you needed me :

"Why did I proffer you my aid ? there stood

"A certain pretty cousin at your side.

"Why did I make such common cause with you ?

"Access to her had not been easy else.

"You give my labour here abundant praise ?

"Faith, labour, which she overlooked, grew play.

"How shall your gratitude discharge itself ?

"Give me her hand !"

Norbert. And still I urge the same.

Is the Queen just ? just—generous or no !

Constance. Yes, just. You love a rose ; no harm in that :

But was it for the rose's sake or mine

You put it in your bosom ? mine, you said—

Then, mine you still must say or else be false.

You told the Queen you served her for herself ;

If so, to serve her was to serve yourself ;

She thinks, for all your unbelieving face !

I know her. In the hall, six steps from us,

One sees the twenty pictures ; there's a life

Better than life, and yet no life at all.

Conceive her born in such a magic dome,

Pictures all round her ! why, she sees the world,

Can recognize its given things and facts,

The fight of giants or the feast of gods,

Sages in senate, beauties at the bath,

Chases and battles, the whole earth's display,

Landscape and sea-piece, down to flowers and fruit—

And who shall question that she knows them all,

In better semblance than the things outside ?

Yet bring into the silent gallery

Some live thing to contrast in breath and blood,

Some lion, with the painted lion there—

You think she'll understand composedly ?

—Say, "that's his fellow in the hunting-piece

"Yonder, I've turned to praise a hundred times ?"

Not so. Her knowledge of our actual earth,

Its hopes and fears, concerns and sympathies,

Must be too far, too mediate, too unreal.

The real exists for us outside, not her :

How should it, with that life in these four walls—

That father and that mother, first to last

No father and no mother—friends, a heap,

Lovers, no lack—a husband in due time,
And every one of them alike a lie !
Things painted by a Rubens out of nought
Into what kindness, friendship, love should be ;
All better, all more grandiose than the life,
Only no life ; mere cloth and surface-paint,
You feel, while you admire. How should she feel ?

Yet now that she has stood thus fifty years
The sole spectator in that gallery,
You think to bring this warm real struggling
love

In to her of a sudden, and suppose She'll keep her state untroubled ? Here's the truth—

She'll apprehend truth's value at a glance,
Prefer it to the pictured loyalty ?

You only have to say, "so men are made,
"For this they act ; the thing has many names,
"But this the right one : and now, Queen, be just !"

Your life slips back ; you lose her at the word :
You do not even for amends gain me.
He will not understand ; oh, Norbert, Norbert,
Do you not understand ?

Norbert. The Queen's the Queen :
I am myself—no picture, but alive
In every nerve and every muscle, here
At the palace-window o'er the people's street,
As she in the gallery where the pictures glow :
The good of life is precious to us both.
She cannot love ; what do I want with rule ?
When first I saw your face a year ago
I knew my life's good, my soul heard one
voice—

"The woman yonder, there's no use of life
"But just to obtain her ! heap earth's woes
in one

"And bear them—make a pile of all earth's joys

"And spurn them, as they help or help not
this ;

"Only, obtain her !" How was it to be ?
I found you were the cousin of the Queen ;
I must then serve the Queen to get to you.
No other way. Suppose there had been one,
And I, by saying prayers to some white star
With promise of my body and my soul,

Might gain you,—should I pray the star or no ?
Instead, there was the Queen to serve ! I served,

Helped, did what other servants failed to do.
Neither she sought nor I declared my end.
Her good is hers, my recompense be mine,—
I therefore name you as that recompense.
She dreamed that such a thing could never be ?
Let her wake now. She thinks there was more cause

In love of power, high fame, pure loyalty ?
Perhaps she fancies men wear out their lives
Chasing such shades. Then, I've a fancy too ;
I worked because I want you with my soul :
I therefore ask your hand. Let it be now !

Constance. Had I not loved you from the very first,

Were I not yours, could we not steal out thus
So wickedly, so wildly, and so well,
You might become impatient. What's conceived

Of us without here, by the folk within ?
Where are you now ? immersed in cares of state—

Where am I now ? intent on festal robes—
We two, embracing under death's spread
hand !

What was this thought for, what that scruple of yours

Which broke the council up ?—to bring about
One minute's meeting in the corridor !

And then the sudden sleights, strange secrecies,

Complots inscrutable, deep telegraphs,
Long-planned chance-meetings, hazards of a
look,

"Does she know ? does she not know ? saved or lost ?"

A year of this compression's ecstasy
All goes for nothing ! you would give this up
For the old way, the open way, the world's,
His way who beats, and his who sells his wife !

What tempts you ?—their notorious happiness Makes you ashamed of ours ? The best you'll gain

Will be—the Queen grants all that you require,

Concedes the cousin, rids herself of you
And me at once, and gives us ample leave
To live like our five hundred happy friends.
The world will show us with officious hand
Our chamber-entry, and stand sentinel
Where we so oft have stolen across its traps !
Get the world's warrant, ring the falcons'
feet,

And make it duty to be bold and swift,
Which long ago was nature. Have it so !
We never hawked by rights till flung from fist ?

Oh, the man's thought ! no woman's such a fool.

Norbert. Yes, the man's thought and my thought, which is more—

One made to love you, let the world take note !

Have I done worthy work ? be love's the
praise,

Though hampered by restrictions, barred against

By set forms, blinded by forced secrecies !
Set free my love, and see what love can do Shown in my life—what work will spring from that !

The world is used to have its business done
On other grounds, find great effects produced
For power's sake, fame's sake, motives in men's mouth.

So, good : but let my low ground shame their ligh !

Truth is the strong thing. Let man's life be true !

And love's the truth of mine. Time prove
the rest !

I choose to wear you stamped all over me,
Your name upon my forehead and my breast,
You, from the sword's blade to the ribbon's
edge,

That men may see, all over, you in me—
That pale loves may die out of their pretence
In face of mine, shames thrown on love fall off.

Permit this, Constance ! Love has been so long
Subdued in me, eating me through and
through,

That now 'tis all of me and must have way.
Think of my work, that chaos of intrigues,
Those hopes and fears, surprises and delays,
That long endeavour, earnest, patient, slow,
Trembling at last to its assured result :
Then think of this revulsion ! I resume
Life after death, (it is no less than life,
After such long unlovely labouring days)
And liberate to beauty life's great need
O' the beautiful, which, while it prompted
work,

Suppressed itself erewhile. This eve's the
time,

This eve intense with yon first trembling star
We seem to pant and reach ; scarce aught
between

The earth that rises and the heaven that bends ;

All nature self-abandoned, every tree
Flung as it will, pursuing its own thoughts
And fixed so, every flower and every weed,
No pride, no shame, no victory, no defeat ;
All under God, each measured by itself.
These statues round us stand abrupt, distinct,
The strong in strength, the weak in weakness
fixed,

The Muse for ever wedded to her lyre,
Nymph to her fawn, and Silence to her rose :
See God's approval on his universe !
Let us do so—aspire to live as these

In harmony with truth, ourselves being true !
Take the first way, and let the second come !
My first is to possess myself of you ;

The music sets the march-step—forward,
then !

And there's the Queen, I go to claim you of,
The world to witness, wonder and applaud.
Our flower of life breaks open. No delay !

Constance. And so shall we be ruined, both of us.

Norbert. I know her to the skin and bone ;
You do not know her, were not born to it,
To feel what she can see or cannot see.
Love, she is generous,—ay, despite your
smile,

Generous as you are : for, in that thin frame
Pain-twisted, punctured through and through with cares,

There lived a lavish soul until it starved,
Debarred of healthy food. Look to the soul—
Pity that, stoop to that, ere you begin (The true man's-way) on justice and your rights,

Exactions and acquittance of the past !
Begin so—see what justice she will deal !
We women hate a debt as men a gift.
Suppose her some poor keeper of a school
Whose business is to sit thro' summer months
And dole out children leave to go and play,
Herself superior to such lightness—she
In the arm-chair's state and pedagogic pomp—
To the life, the laughter, sun and youth outside :

We wonder such a face looks black on us ?
I do not bid you wake her tenderness,
(That were vain truly—none is left to wake)
But let her think her justice is engaged
To take the shape of tenderness, and mark
If she'll not coldly pay its warmest debt !
Does she love me, I ask you ? not a whit :
Yet, thinking that her justice was engaged
To help a kinswoman, she took me up—
Did more on that bare ground than other loves
Would do on greater argument. For me,
I have no equivalent of such cold kind
To pay her with, but love alone to give
If I give anything. I give her love :
I feel I ought to help her, and I will.
So, for her sake, as yours, I tell you twice
That women hate a debt as men a gift.
If I were you, I could obtain this grace—
Could lay the whole I did to love's account,
Nor yet be very false as courtiers go—
Declaring my success was recompense ;
It would be so, in fact : what were it else ?
And then, once loose her generosity,—
Oh, how I see it !—then, were I but you,
To turn it, let it seem to move itself,
And make it offer what I really take,
Accepting just, in the poor cousin's hand,
Her value as the next thing to the Queen's—Since none love Queens directly, none dare
that,

And a thing's shadow or a name's mere echo
Suffices those who miss the name and thing !
You pick up just a ribbon she has worn,

To keep in proof how near her breath you
came.

Say, I'm so near I seem a piece of her—
Ask for me that way—(oh, you understand)
You'd find the same gift yielded with a grace,
Which, if you make the least show to extort . . .

—You'll see ! and when you have ruined
both of us,

Dissertate on the Queen's ingratitude !

Norbert. Then, if I turn it that way, you consent ?

'Tis not my way ; I have more hope in truth :
Still, if you won't have truth—why, this
indeed,

Were scarcely false, as I'd express the sense.
Will you remain here ?

Constance. O best heart of mine,
How I have loved you ! then, you take my
way ?

Are mine as you have been her minister,
Work out my thought, give it effect for me,
Paint plain my poor conceit and make it serve ?
I owe that withered woman everything—
Life, fortune, you, remember ! Take my part—

Help me to pay her ! Stand upon your rights ?

You, with my rose, my hands, my heart on
you ?

Your rights are mine—you have no rights but
mine.

Norbert. Remain here. How you know
me !

Constance. Ah, but still—

[He breaks from her : she remains.
Dance-music from within.

Enter the QUEEN.

Queen. Constance ? She is here as he said. Speak quick !

Is it so ? Is it true or false ? One word !

Constance. True.

Queen. Mercifullest Mother, thanks to thee !

Constance. Madam ?

Queen. I love you, Constance, from my soul.

Now say once more, with any words you will,
Tis true, all true, as true as that I speak.

Constance. Why should you doubt it?

Queen. Ah, why doubt?
why doubt?

Dear, make me see it! Do you see it so?
None see themselves; another sees them best.
You say "whydoubt it?"—you see him and me.
It is because the Mother has such grace
That if we had but faith—wherein we fail—
Whate'er we yearn for would be granted us;
Yet still we let our whims prescribe despair,
Our fancies thwart and cramp our will and
power,

And while, accepting life, abjure its use.
Constance. I had abjured the hope of love
And being loved, as truly as yon palm
The hope of seeing Egypt from that plot.

Constance. Heaven!

Queen. But it was so, Con- stance, it was so!

Men say—or do men say it? fancies say—
"Stop here, your life is set, you are grown old.
"Too late—no love for you, too late for
love—

"Leave love to girls. Be queen: let Con- stance love."

One takes the hint—half meets it like a child,
Ashamed at any feelings that oppose.

"Oh love, true, never think of love again!

"I am a queen: I rule, not love forsooth."

So it goes on; so a face grows like this,
Hair like this hair, poor arms as lean as
these,

Till,—nay, it does not end so, I thank God!

Constance. I cannot understand—

Queen. The happier you!

Constance. I know not how it is with men:

For women (I am a woman now like you)

There is no good of life but love—but love!

What else looks good, is some shade flung from love;

Love gilds it, gives it worth. Be warned by me,

Never you cheat yourself one instant! Love,
Give love, ask only love, and leave the rest!

O Constance, how I love you!

Constance.

I love you.

Queen. I do believe that all is come through
you.

I took you to my heart to keep it warm
When the last chance of love seemed dead in
me;

I thought your fresh youth warmed my withered heart.

Oh, I am very old now, am I not?

Not so! it is true and it shall be true!

Constance. Tell it me: let me judge if true or false.

Queen. Ah, but I fear you! you will look at me

And say, "she's old, she's grown unlovely
quite

"Who ne'er was beautiful: men want beauty
still."

Well, so I feared—the curse! so I felt sure!

Constance. Be calm. And now you feel not sure, you say?

Queen. Constance, he came,—the coming was not strange—

Do not I stand and see men come and go?

I turned a half-look from my pedestal Where I grow marble—"one young man the
more!

"He will love some one; that is nought to
me:

"What would he with my marble stateliness?"

Yet this seemed somewhat worse than heretofore;

The man more gracious, youthful, like a
god,

And I still older, with less flesh to change—

We two those dear extremes that long to touch.

It seemed still harder when he first began
To labour at those state-affairs, absorbed

The old way for the old end—interest.

Oh, to live with a thousand beating hearts

Around you, swift eyes, servicable hands,

Professing they've no care but for your cause,

Thought but to help you, love but for yourself,—

And you the marble statue all the time

They praise and point at as preferred to life,

Yet leave for the first breathing woman's

smile,

First dancer's, gipsy's or street baladine's !¹
 Why, how I have ground my teeth to hear men's speech

Stifled for fear it should alarm my ear,
 Their gait subdued lest step should startle me,
 Their eyes declined, such queendom to
 respect,

Their hands alert, such treasure to preserve,
 While not a man of them broke rank and
 spoke,

Wrote me a vulgar letter all of love,
 Or caught my hand and pressed it like a hand !
 There have been moments, if the sentinel
 Lowering his halbert to salute the queen,
 Had flung it brutally and clasped my knees,
 I would have stooped and kissed him with
 my soul.

Constance. Who could have comprehended?

Queen. Ay, who—who?

Why, no one, Constance, but this one who did.

Not they, not you, not I. Even now perhaps It comes too late—would you but tell the
 truth.

Constance. I wait to tell it.

Queen. Well, you see, he came,
 Outfaced the others, did a work this year
 Exceeds in value all was ever done,
 You know—it is not I who say it—all
 Say it. And so (a second pang and worse)
 I grew aware not only of what he did,
 But why so wondrously. Oh, never work
 Like his was done for work's ignoble sake—
 Souls need a finer aim to light and lure !
 I felt, I saw, he loved—loved somebody.

And Constance, my dear Constance, do you
 know,

I did believe this while 'twas you he loved.

Constance. Me, madam?

Queen. It did seem to me, your face Met him where'er he looked : and whom but
 you

Was such a man to love ? It seemed to me,
 You saw he loved you, and approved his love,
 And both of you were in intelligence.
 You could not loiter in that garden, step

Into this balcony, but I straight was stung
 And forced to understand. It seemed so true,
 So right, so beautiful, so like you both,
 That all this work should have been done by
 him

Not for the vulgar hope of recompense,
 But that at last—suppose, some night like
 this—

Borne on to claim his due reward of me,
 He might say "Give her hand and pay me
 so."

And I (O Constance, you shall love me now !)
 I thought, surmounting all the bitterness,
 —"And he shall have it. I will make her blest,
 "My flower of youth, my woman's self that
 was,

"My happiest woman's self that might have
 been !

"These two shall have their joy and leave me here."

Yes—yes !

Constance. Thanks !

Queen. And the word was on my lips
 When he burst in upon me. I looked to hear
 A mere calm statement of his just desire
 For payment of his labour. When—O heaven,
 How can I tell you ? lightning on my eyes
 And thunder in my ears proved that first word
 Which told 'twas love of me, of me, did all—
 He loved me—from the first step to the last,
 Loved me !

Constance. You hardly saw, scarce heard him speak

Of love : what if you should mistake ?

Queen. No, no—

No mistake ! Ha, there shall be no mistake !
 He had not dared to hint the love he felt—
 You were my reflex—(how I understood !)
 He said you were the ribbon I had worn,
 He kissed my hand, he looked into my eyes,
 And love, love came at end of every phrase.
 Love is begun ; this much is come to pass :
 The rest is easy. Constance, I am yours !

I will learn, I will place my life on you,
 Teach me but how to keep what I have won !
 Am I so old ? This hair was early grey ;
 But joy ere now has brought hair brown again,
 And joy will bring the cheek's red back, I feel.

¹ Dancers.

I could sing once too; that was in my youth.
Still, when men paint me, they declare me

. . . yes,
Beautiful—for the last French painter did !
I know they flatter somewhat ; you are frank—

I trust you. How I loved you from the first !
Some queens would hardly seek a cousin out
And set her by their side to take the eye :
I must have felt that good would come from
you.

I am not generous—like him—like you !
But he is not your lover after all :
It was not you he looked at. Saw you him ?
You have not been mistaking words or looks ?
He said you were the reflex of myself.

And yet he is not such a paragon
To you, to younger women who may choose Among a thousand Norberts. Speak the truth !

You know you never named his name to me :
You know, I cannot give him up—ah God,
Not up now, even to you !

Constance. Then calm yourself.

Queen. See, I am old—look here, you happy girl !

I will not play the fool, deceive—ah, whom ?
'Tis all gone : put your cheek beside my cheek
And what a contrast does the moon behold !
But then I set my life upon one chance,
The last chance and the best—am I not left,
My soul, myself ? All women love great men
If young or old ; it is in all the tales :
Young beauties love old poets who can love—
Why should not he, the poems in my soul,
The passionate faith, the pride of sacrifice,
Life-long, death-long ? I throw them at his feet.

Who cares to see the fountain's very shape,
Whether it be a Triton's or a Nymph's
That pours the foam, makes rainbows all around ?

You could not praise indeed the empty conch ;
But I'll pour floods of love and hide myself.
How I will love him ! Cannot men love love ?
Who was a queen and loved a poet once Humpbacked, a dwarf ? ah, women can do
that !

Well, but men too ; at least, they tell you so.
They love so many women in their youth,
And even in age they all love whom they
please ;

And yet the best of them confide to friends
That 'tis not beauty makes the lasting love—
They spend a day with such and tire the next :
They like soul,—well then, they like phantasy,
Novelty even. Let us confess the truth,
Horrible though it be, that prejudice,
Prescription . . . curses ! they will love a queen.

They will, they do : and will not, does not
—he ?

Constance. How can he ? You are wedded :
'tis a name

We know, but still a bond. Your rank
remains,

His rank remains. How can he, nobly souled
As you believe and I incline to think,
Aspire to be your favourite, shame and all ?

Queen. Hear her ! There, there now—could she love like me ?

What did I say of smooth-cheeked youth and
grace ?

See all it does or could do ! so youth loves !
Oh, tell him, Constance, you could never do
What I will—you, it was not born in ! I
Will drive these difficulties far and fast
As yonder mists curdling before the moon.
I'll use my light too, gloriously retrieve
My youth from its enforced calamity,
Dissolve that hateful marriage, and be his,
His own in the eyes alike of God and man.

Constance. You will do—dare do . . . pause on what you say !

Queen. Hear her ! I thank you, sweet, for that surprise.

You have the fair face : for the soul, see mine !
I have the strong soul : let me teach you, here.
I think I have borne enough and long enough,
And patiently enough, the world remarks,
To have my own way now, unblamed by all.
It does so happen (I rejoice for it)
This most unhop'd-for issue cuts the knot.
There's not a better way of settling claims
Than this ; God sends the accident express :
And were it for my subjects' good, no more,

'Twere best thus ordered. I am thankful now,
Mute, passive, acquiescent. I receive,
And bless God simply, or should almost fear
To walk so smoothly to my ends at last.
Why, how I baffle obstacles, spurn fate!
How strong I am! Could Norbert see me
now!

Constance. Let me consider. It is all too
strange.

Queen. You, Constance, learn of me; do you, like me!

You are young, beautiful: my own, best girl,
You will have many lovers, and love one—
Light hair, not hair like Norbert's, to suit
yours:

Taller than he is, since yourself are tall.
Love him, like me! Give all away to him;
Think never of yourself; throw by your pride,
Hope, fear,—your own good as you saw it once,
And love him simply for his very self.
Remember, I (and what am I to you?)

Would give up all for one, leave throne, lose
life,

Do all but just unlove him! He loves me.

Constance. He shall.

Queen. You, step inside my inmost heart!

Give me your own heart: let us have one heart!
I'll come to you for counsel; "this he says,
"This he does; what should this amount to,
pray?

"Beseech you, change it into current coin!

"Is that worth kisses? Shall I please him
there?"

And then we'll speak in turn of you—what else?
Your love, according to your beauty's worth,
For you shall have some noble love, all gold:
Whom choose you? we will get him at your choice.

—Constance, I leave you. Just a minute since,
I felt as I must die or be alone.

Breathing my soul into an ear like yours:
Now, I would face the world with my new life, Wear my new crown. I'll walk around the rooms.

And then come back and tell you how it feels.
How soon a smile of God can change the world!
How we are made for happiness—how work

Grows play, adversity a winning fight!
True, I have lost so many years: what then;
Many remain: God has been very good.
You, stay here! 'Tis as different from dreams,
From the mind's cold calm estimate of bliss,
As these stone statues from the flesh and blood.
The comfort thou hast caused mankind, God's moon!

[She goes out, leaving CONSTANCE.

Dance-music from within.

NORBERT enters.

Norbert. Well? we have but one minute and one word!

Constance. I am yours, Norbert!

Norbert. Yes, mine.

Constance. Not till now!

You were mine. Now I give myself to you.

Norbert. Constance?

Constance. Your own! I know the thriftier way

Of giving—haply, 'tis the wiser way.
Meaning to give a treasure, I might dole
Coin after coin out (each, as that were all,
With a new largess still at each despair)
And force you keep in sight the deed, preserve
Exhaustless till the end my part and yours,
My giving and your taking; both our joys
Dying together. Is it the wiser way?
I choose the simpler; I give all at once.
Know what you have to trust to, trade upon!
Use it, abuse it,—anything but think Hereafter, "Had I known she loved me so,
'And what my means, I might have thriven
with it."

This is your means. I give you all myself,

Norbert. I take you and thank God.

Constance. Look on through years!
We cannot kiss, a second day like this;

Else were this earth no earth.

Norbert. With this day's heat
We shall go on through years of cold.

Constance. So, best!

I try to see those years—I think I see.
You walk quick and new warmth comes; you look back.

And lay all to the first glow—not sit down
For ever brooding on a day like this.

While seeing embers whiten and love die.
Yes, love lives best in its effect ; and mine,
Full in its own life, yearns to live in yours.

Norbert. Just so. I take and know you all at once.

Your soul is disengaged so easily,
Your face is there, I know you ; give me time,
Let me be proud and think you shall know me.
My soul is slower : in a life I roll
The minute out whereto you condense yours—
The whole slow circle round you I must move,
To be just you. I look to a long life
To decompose this minute, prove its worth.
'Tis the sparks' long succession one by one Shall show you, in the end, what fire was crammed

In that mere stone you struck : how could
you know,

If it lay ever unproved in your sight,
As now my heart lies? your own warmth would hide

Its coldness, were it cold.

Constance. But how prove, how?

Norbert. Prove in my life, you ask?

Constance. Quick, Norbert—how?

Norbert. That's easy told. I count life just a stuff

To try the soul's strength on, educe the man.
Who keeps one end in view makes all things
serve.

As with the body—he who hurls a lance
Or heaps up stone on stone, shows strength alike :

So must I seize and task all means to prove
And show this soul of mine, you crown as yours,
And justify us both.

Constance. Could you write books,
Paint pictures ! One sits down in poverty
And writes or paints, with pity for the rich.

Norbert. And loves one's painting and one's writing, then,

And not one's mistress ! All is best, believe,
And we best as no other than we are.

We live, and they experiment on life—
Those poets, painters, all who stand aloof
To overlook the farther. Let us be The thing they look at ! I might take your
face

And write of it and paint it—to what end?
For whom? what pale dictatress in the air
Feeds, smiling sadly, her fine ghost-like form
With earth's real blood and breath, the beau-teous life

She makes despired for ever? You are mine,
Made for me, not for others in the world,
Nor yet for that which I should call my art,
The cold calm power to see how fair you look.
I come to you ; I leave you not, to write
Or paint. You are, I am : let Rubens there Paint us !

Constance. So, best !

Norbert. I understand your soul.
You live, and rightly sympathize with life,
With action, power, success. This way is
straight ;
And time were short beside, to let me change
The craft my childhood learnt : my craft shall serve.

Men set me here to subjugate, enclose,
Manure their barren lives, and force thence fruit

First for themselves, and afterward for me
In the due tithe ; the task of some one soul,
Through ways of work appointed by the world.
I am not bid create—men see no star
Transfiguring my brow to warrant that—
But find and bind and bring to bear their wills.
So I began : to-night sees how I end.
What if it see, too, power's first outbreak here
Amid the warmth, surprise and sympathy,
And instincts of the heart that teach the head?
What if the people have discerned at length
The dawn of the next nature, novel brain
Whose will they venture in the place of theirs, Whose work, they trust, shall find them as novel ways

To untried heights which yet he only sees?
I felt it when you kissed me. See this Queen,
This people—in our phrase, this mass of men—
See how the mass lies passive to my hand
Now that my hand is plastic, with you by
To make the muscles iron ! Oh, an end
Shall crown this issue as this crowns the first !
My will be on this people ! then, the strain
The grappling of the potter with his clay,
The long uncertain struggle,—the success

And consummation of the spirit-work,
Some vase shaped to the curl of the god's lip,
While rounded fair for human sense to see
The Graces in a dance men recognize
With turbulent applause and laughs of heart !
So triumph ever shall renew itself ;
Ever shall end in efforts higher yet,
Ever begin . . .

Constance. I ever helping ?

Norbert. Thus !

[As he embraces her, the QUEEN enters.]

Constance. Hist, madam ! So have I performed my part.

You see your gratitude's true decency,

Norbert ? A little slow in seeing it !

Begin, to end the sooner ! What's a kiss ?

Norbert. Constance ?

Constance. Why, must I teach it you again ?

You want a witness to your dulness, sir ?

What was I saying these ten minutes long ?

Then I repeat—when some young handsome
man

Like you has acted out a part like yours,

Is pleased to fall in love with one beyond,

So very far beyond him, as he says—

So hopelessly in love that but to speak

Would prove him mad,—he thinks judiciously,

And makes some insignificant good soul,

Like me, his friend, adviser, confidant,

And very stalking-horse to cover him

In following after what he dares not face.

When his end's gained—(sir, do you understand ?)

When she, he dares not face, has loved him first,

—May I not say so, madam ?—tops his hope,

And overpasses so his wildest dream,

With glad consent of all, and most of her

The confidant who brought the same about—

Why, in the moment when such joy explodes,

I do hold that the merest gentleman

Will not start rudely from the stalking-horse,

Dismiss it with a "There, enough of you !"

Forget it, show his back unmannerly :

But like a liberal heart will rather turn

And say, "A tingling time of hope was ours ;
"Betwixt the fears and falterings, we two lived
"A chanceful time in waiting for the prize :

"The confidant, the Constance, served not ill,

"And though I shall forget her in due time,

"Her use being answered now, as reason bids,

"Nay as herself bids from her heart of hearts,—

"Still, she has rights, the first thanks go to
her,

"The first good praise goes to the prosperous
tool,

"And the first—which is the last—rewarding
kiss."

Norbert. Constance, it is a dream—ah, see, you smile !

Constance. So, now his part being properly performed,

Madam, I turn to you and finish mine

As duly ; I do justice in my turn.

Yes, madam, he has loved you—long and
well ;

I he could not hope to tell you so—'twas I

Who served to prove your soul accessible,

I led his thoughts on, drew them to their
place

When they had wandered else into despair,

And kept love constant toward its natural aim.

Enough, my part is played ; you stoop half
way

And meet us royally and spare our fears :

'Tis like yourself. I he thanks you, so do I.

Take him—with my full heart ! my work is praised

By what comes of it. Be you happy, both !

Yourself—the only one on earth who can—

Do all for him, much more than a mere heart

Which though warm is not useful in its warmth

As the silk vesture of a queen ! fold that

Around him gently, tenderly. For him—

For him,—he knows his own part !

Norbert. Have you done ?

I take the jest at last. Should I speak now ?

Was yours the wager, Constance, foolish child,

Or did you but accept it ? Well—at least

You lose by it.

Constance. Nay, madam, 'tis your turn !

Restrain him still from speech a little more,

And make him happier as more confident !

Pity him, madam, he is timid yet !

Mark, Norbert ! Do not shrink now ! Here

I yield

My whole right in you to the Queen, observe !
 With her go put in practice the great schemes
 You teem with, follow the career else closed—
 Be all you cannot be except by her !
 Behold her !—Madam, say for pity's sake
 Anything—frankly say you love him ! Else
 He'll not believe it : there's more earnest in His fear than you conceive : I know the man !

Norbert. I know the woman somewhat,
 and confess

I thought she had jested better : she begins
 To overcharge her part. I gravely wait
 Your pleasure, madam : where is my reward ?

Queen. Norbert, this wild girl (whom I recognize

Scarce more than you do, in her fancy-fit,
 Eccentric speech and variable mirth,
 Not very wise perhaps and somewhat bold,
 Yet suitable, the whole night's work being strange)

—May still be right : I may do well to speak
 And make authentic what appears a dream
 To even myself. For, what she says, is true :
 Yes, Norbert—what you spoke just now of
 love,

Devotion, stirred no novel sense in me,
 But justified a warmth felt long before.
 Yes, from the first—I loved you, I shall say :
 Strange ! but I do grow stronger, now 'tis
 said.

Your courage helps mine : you did well to
 speak

To-night, the night that crowns your twelve-months' toil :

But still I had not waited to discern Your heart so long, believe me ! From the first

The source of so much zeal was almost plain,
 In absence even of your own words just now
 Which hazarded the truth. 'Tis very strange,
 But takes a happy ending—in your love
 Which mine meets : be it so ! as you chose me,
 So I choose you.

Norbert. And worthily you choose.
 I will not be unworthy your esteem,
 No, madam. I do love you ; I will meet
 Your nature, now I know it. This was well.
 I see,—you dare and you are justified :

VOL. I.

But none had ventured such experiment,
 Less versed than you in nobleness of heart,
 Less confident of finding such in me.
 I joy that thus you test me ere you grant
 The dearest richest beautifullest and best
 Of women to my arms : 'tis like yourself.
 So—back again into my part's set words—
 Devotion to the uttermost is yours,
 But no, you cannot, madam, even you,
 Create in me the love our Constance does.
 Or—something truer to the tragic phrase—
 Not yon magnolia-bell superb with scent
 Invites a certain insect—that's myself—
 But the small eye-flower nearer to the ground,
 I take this lady.

Constance. Stay—not hers, the trap—
 Stay, Norbert—that mistake were worst of all !
 He is too cunning, madam ! It was I,
 I, Norbert, who . . .

Norbert. You, was it, Constance ?

Then,
 But for the grace of this divinest hour
 Which gives me you, I might not pardon here !
 I am the Queen's ; she only knows my brain :
 She may experiment upon my heart
 And I instruct her too by the result.
 But you, sweet, you who know me, who so long
 Have told my heart-beats over, held my life
 In those white hands of yours,—it is not well !

Constance. Tush ! I have said it, did I not say it all ?

The life, for her—the heart-beats, for her sake !

Norbert. Enough ! my cheek grows red, I think. Your test ?

There's not the meanest woman in the world,
 Not she I least could love in all the world,
 Whom, did she love me, had love proved
 itself,

I dare insult as you insult me now.
 Constance, I could say, if it must be said,
 "Take back the soul you offer, I keep mine !"
 But—"Take the soul still quivering on your
 hand,

"The soul so offered, which I cannot use,
 'And, please you, give it to some playful
 friend,

"For—what's the trifle he requites me with ?"
 I, tempt a woman, to amuse a man,

That two may mock her heart if it succumb?
No: staring God and standing 'neath his
heaven,

I would not dare insult a woman so,
Were she the meanest woman in the world,
And he, I cared to please, ten emperors!

Constance. Norbert!

Norbert. I love once as I live but once.

What case is this to think or talk about?
I love you. Would it mend the case at all
If such a step as this killed love in me?
Your part were done: account to God for it!
But mine—could murdered love get up again,
And kneel to whom you please to designate,
And make you mirth? It is too horrible.

You did not know this, Constance? now you
know

That body and soul have each one life, but
one:

And here's my love, here, living, at your feet.

Constance. See the Queen! Norbert—this one more last word—

If thus you have taken jest for earnest—thus Loved me in earnest . . .

Norbert. Ah, no jest holds here!
Where is the laughter in which jests break up,
And what this horror that grows palpable?

Madam—why grasp you thus the balcony?
Have I done ill? Have I not spoken truth?

How could I other? Was it not your test,
To try me, what my love for Constance meant?
Madam, your royal soul itself approves,

The first, that I should choose thus: so one takes

A beggar,—asks him, what would buy his
child?

And then approves the expected laugh of scorn

Returned as something noble from the rags.

Speak, Constance, I'm the beggar! Ha, what's this?

You two glare each at each like panthers now.
Constance, the world fades; only you stand
there!

You did not, in to-night's wild whirl of things,
Sell me—your soul of souls, for any price?

No—no—'tis easy to believe in you!
Was it your love's mad trial to o'erstop

Mine by this vain self-sacrifice? well, still—
Though I might curse, I love you. I am love

And cannot change: love's self is at your feet!
[The QUEEN goes out.]

Constance. Feel my heart; let it die against your own!

Norbert. Against my own? Explain not;
let this be!

This is life's height.
Constance. Yours, yours, yours!

Norbert. You and I—

Why care by what meanders we are here
I' the centre of the labyrinth? Men have died

Trying to find this place, which we have found.

Constance. Found, found!

Norbert. Sweet, never fear what she can do!

We are past harm now.
Constance. On the breast of God.

I thought of men—as if you were a man.
Tempting him with a crown!

Norbert. This must end here:
It is too perfect.

Constance. There's the music stopped.
What measured heavy tread? It is one blaze
About me and within me.

Norbert. Oh, some death
Will run its sudden finger round this spark

And sever us from the rest!

Constance. And so do well.

Now the doors open.

Norbert. 'Tis the guard comes.

Constance. Kiss!

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

1864.

JAMES LEE'S WIFE.

I.—JAMES LEE'S WIFE SPEAKS AT THE WINDOW.

AH, Love, but a day
And the world has changed !
The sun's away,
And the bird estranged ;
The wind has dropped,
And the sky's deranged :
Summer has stopped.

II.

Look in my eyes !
Wilt thou change too ?
Should I fear surprise ?
Shall I find aught new
In the old and dear,
In the good and true,
With the changing year ?

III.

Thou art a man,
But I am thy love.
For the lake, its swan ;
For the dell, its dove ;
And for thee—(oh, haste !)
Me, to bend above,
Me, to hold embraced.

II.—BY THE FIRESIDE.

I.

Is all our fire of shipwreck wood,
Oak and pine ?
Oh, for the ill's half-understood,
The dim dead woe
Long ago

Befallen this bitter coast of France !
Well, poor sailors took their chance ;
I take mine.

II.

A ruddy shaft our fire must shoot
O'er the sea :
Do sailors eye the casement—mute,
Drenched and stark,
From their bark—
And envy, gnash their teeth for hate
O' the warm safe house and happy freight —Thee and me ?

III.

God help you, sailors, at your need !
Spare the curse !
For some ships, safe in port indeed,
Rot and rust,
Run to dust,
All through worms i' the wood, which crept,
Gnawed our hearts out while we slept :
That is worse.

Who lived here before us two ?
Old-world pairs.
Did a woman ever—would I knew !—
Watch the man
With whom began Love's voyage full-sail,—(now, gnash your teeth !)
When planks start, open hell beneath Unawares ?

III.—IN THE DOORWAY.

THE swallow has set her six young on the rail,
And looks sea-ward :

The water's in stripes like a snake, olive-pale

To the leeward,—

On the weather-side, black, spotted white with the wind.

"Good fortune departs, and disaster's behind,"—

Hark, the wind with its wants and its infinite wail !

II.

Our fig-tree, that leaned for the saltness, has furled

Her five fingers,

Each leaf like a hand opened wide to the
world

Where there lingers

No glint of the gold, Summer sent for her
sake :

How the vines writhe in rows, each impaled on its stake !

My heart shrivels up and my spirit shrinks curled.

III.

Yet here are we two ; we have love, house
enough,

With the field there,

This house of four rooms, that field red and rough,

Though it yield there,

For the rabbit that robs, scarce a blade or a
bent ;

If a magpie alight now, it seems an event ;

And they both will be gone at November's rebuff.

IV.

But why must cold spread ? but wherefore bring change

To the spirit,

God meant should mate his with an infinite range,

And inherit

His power to put life in the darkness and cold ?

Oh, live and love worthily, bear and be bold !

Whom Summer made friends of, let Winter estrangle !

IV.—ALONG THE BEACH.

I WILL be quiet and talk with you,

And reason why you are wrong.

You wanted my love—is that much true ?

And so I did love, so I do :

What has come of it all along ?

I took you—how could I otherwise ?

For a world to me, and more ;

For all, love greatens and glorifies

Till God's a-glow, to the loving eyes,

In what was mere earth before.

III.

Yes, earth—yes, mere ignoble earth !

Now do I mis-state, mistake ?

Do I wrong your weakness and call it worth ?

Expect all harvest, dread no dearth,

Seal my sense up for your sake ?

IV.

Oh, Love, Love, no, Love ! not so, indeed !

You were just weak earth, I knew :

With much in you waste, with many a weed,

And plenty of passions run to seed,

But a little good grain too.

And such as you were, I took you for mine :

Did not you find me yours,

To watch the olive and wait the vine,

And wonder when rivers of oil and wine

Would flow, as the Book assures ?

Well, and if none of these good things came,

What did the failure prove ?

The man was my whole world, all the same,

With his flowers to praise or his weeds to

blame,

And, either or both, to love.

Yet this turns now to a fault—there! there!

That I do love, watch too long,
And wait too well, and weary and wear;
And 'tis all an old story, and my despair
Fit subject for some new song:

VIII.

"How the light, light love, he has wings to fly

"At suspicion of a bond:

"My wisdom has bidden your pleasure goodbye,

"Which will turn up next in a laughing eye,

"And why should you look beyond?"

V.—ON THE CLIFF.

I.

I LEANED on the turf,
I looked at a rock
Left dry by the surf;
For the turf, to call it grass were to mock:
Dead to the roots, so deep was done
The work of the summer sun.

II.

And the rock lay flat
As an anvil's face:
No iron like that!
Baked dry; of a weed, of a shell, no trace:
Sunshine outside, but ice at the core,
Death's altar by the lone shore.

III.

On the turf, sprang gay
With his films of blue,
No cricket, I'll say,
But a warhorse, barded and chanfroned too,
The gift of a quixote-mage to his knight,
Real fairy, with wings all right.

IV.

On the rock, they scorch
Like a drop of fire

From a brandished torch,
Fall two red fans of a butterfly:
No turf, no rock: in their ugly stead,
See, wonderful blue and red!

V.

Is it not so
With the minds of men?
The level and low,
The burnt and bare, in themselves; but then
With such a blue and red grace, not theirs,—
Love settling unawares!

VI.—READING A BOOK, UNDER THE CLIFF.

I.

"STILL ailing, Wind? Wilt be appeased or no?
"Which needs the other's office, thou or I?
"Dost want to be disburthened of a woe,
"And can, in truth, my voice untie
"Its links, and let it go?

II.

"Art thou a dumb wronged thing that would be righted,
"Entrusting thus thy cause to me? Forbear!
"No tongue can mend such pleadings; faith, requited
"With falsehood,—love, at last aware
"Of scorn,—hopes, early blighted,—

III.

"We have them; but I know not any tone
"So fit as thine to falter forth a sorrow:
"Dost think men would go mad without a moan,
"If they knew any way to borrow
"A pathos like thy own?

IV.

"Which sigh wouldst mock, of all the sighs?
The one
"So long escaping from lips starved and
blue,

"That lasts while on her pallet-bed the nun

"Stretches her length; her foot comes through "The straw she shivers on;

V.

"You had not thought she was so tall; and spent,

"Her shrunk lids open, her lean fingers shut

"Close, close, their sharp and livid nails indent

"The clammy palm; then all is mute:

"That way, the spirit went.

VI.

"Or wouldst thou rather that I understand

"Thy will to help me?—like the dog I found

"Once, pacing sad this solitary strand,

"Who would not take my food, poor hound,

"But whined and licked my hand."

VII.

All this, and more, comes from some young man's pride

Of power to see,—in failure and mistake,

Relinquishment, disgrace, on every side,—

Merely examples for his sake,

Helps to his path untried:

VIII.

Instances he must—simply recognize?

Oh, more than so!—must, with a learner's zeal,

Make doubly prominent, twice emphasize,

By added touches that reveal

The god in babe's disguise.

IX.

Oh, he knows what defeat means, and the rest!

Himself the undefeated that shall be:

Failure, disgrace, he flings them you to test,—

His triumph, in eternity

Too plainly manifest!

Whence, judge if he learn forthwith what the wind

Means in its moaning—by the happy prompt Instinctive way of youth, I mean; for kind

Calm years, exacting their accompt Of pain, mature the mind:

XI.

And some midsummer morning, at the lull

Just about daybreak, as he looks across

A sparkling foreign country, wonderful

To the sea's edge for gloom and gloss,

Next minute must annul,—

XII.

Then, when the wind begins among the vines,

So low, so low, what shall it say but this?

"Here is the change beginning, here the lines

"Circumscribe beauty, set to bliss

"The limit time assigns."

XIII.

Nothing can be as it has been before;

Better, so call it, only not the same.

To draw one beauty into our hearts' core,

And keep it changeless! such our claim;

So answered,—Never more!

XIV.

Simple? Why this is the old woe o' the world;

Tune, to whose rise and fall we live and die.

Rise with it, then! Rejoice that man is hurled

From change to change unceasingly,

His soul's wings never furled!

That's a new question; still replies the fact, Nothing endures: the wind moans, saying

so;

We moan in acquiescence: there's life's pact

Perhaps probation—do I know?

God does: endure his act!

XVI.

Only, for man, how bitter not to grave
 On his soul's hands' palms one fair good wise thing
 Just as he grasped it ! For himself, death's wave ;
 While time first washes—ah, the sting !—
 O'er all he'd sink to save.

VII.—AMONG THE ROCKS,

OH, good gigantic smile o' the brown old
 earth,
 This autumn morning ! How he sets his bones
 To bask i' the sun, and thrusts out knees and feet
 For the ripple to run over in its mirth ;
 Listening the while, where on the heap of stones
 The white breast of the sea-lark twitters sweet.

II.

That is the doctrine, simple, ancient, true ;
 Such is life's trial, as old earth smiles and knows.
 If you loved only what were worth your love,
 Love were clear gain, and wholly well for
 you :
 Make the low nature better by your throes !
 Give earth yourself, go up for gain above !

VIII.—BESIDE THE DRAWING BOARD.

I.

"As like as a Hand to another Hand !"
 Whoever said that foolish thing,
 Could not have studied to understand
 The counsels of God in fashioning
 Out of the infinite love of his heart,
 This Hand, whose beauty I praise, apart
 From the world of wonder left to praise,
 If I tried to learn the other ways

Of love in its skill, or love in its power.
 "As like as a Hand to another Hand" :
 Who said that, never took his stand,
 Found and followed, like me, an hour,
 The beauty in this,—how free, how fine
 To fear, almost,—of the limit-line !
 As I looked at this, and learned and drew,
 Drew and learned, and looked again,
 While fast the happy minutes flew,
 Its beauty mounted into my brain,
 And a fancy seized me ; I was fain
 To efface my work, begin anew,
 Kiss what before I only drew ;
 Ay, laying the red chalk 'twixt my lips,
 With soul to help if the mere lips failed,
 I kissed all right where the drawing ailed,
 Kissed fast the grace that somehow slips
 Still from one's soulless finger-tips.

II.

'Tis a clay cast, the perfect thing,
 From Hand live once, dead long ago :
 Princess-like it wears the ring
 To fancy's eye, by which we know
 That here at length a master found.
 His match, a proud lone soul its mate,
 As soaring genius sank to ground,
 And pencil could not emulate
 The beauty in this,—how free, how fine
 To fear almost !—of the limit-line.
 Long ago the god, like me
 The worm, learned, each in our degree :
 Looked and loved, learned and drew,
 Drew and learned and loved again,
 While fast the happy minutes flew,
 Till beauty mounted into his brain
 And on the finger which outvied
 His art he placed the ring that's there,
 Still by fancy's eye descried,
 In token of a marriage rare :
 For him on earth, his art's despair,
 For him in heaven, his soul's fit bride.

III.

Little girl with the poor coarse hand,
 I turned from to a cold clay cast—
 I have my lesson, understand
 The worth of flesh and blood at last.

Nothing but beauty in a Hand?

Because he could not change the hue,
Mend the lines and make them true
To this which met his soul's demand,—
Would Da Vinci turn from you?
I hear him laugh my woes to scorn—
"The fool forsooth is all forlorn
"Because the beauty, she thinks best,
"Lived long ago or was never born,—
"Because no beauty bears the test
"In this rough peasant Hand! Confessed!
"Art is null and study void!"
"So sayest thou? So said not I,
"Who threw the faulty pencil by,
"And years instead of hours employed,
"Learning the veritable use
"Of flesh and bone and nerve beneath
"Lines and hue of the outer sheath,
"If haply I might reproduce
"One motive of the powers profuse,
"Flesh and bone and nerve that make
"The poorest coarsest human hand
"An object worthy to be scanned
"A whole life long for their sole sake.
"Shall earth and the cramped moment-space
"Yield the heavenly crowning grace?
"Now the parts and then the whole!
"Who art thou, with stunted soul
"And stunted body, thus to cry
"I love,—shall that be life's strait dole?
"I must live beloved or die!"
"This peasant hand that spins the wool
"And bakes the bread, why lives it on,
"Poor and coarse with beauty gone,—
"What use survives the beauty?" Fool!

Go, little girl with the poor coarse hand!
I have my lesson, shall understand.

IX.—ON DECK.

I.

THERE is nothing to remember in me,
Nothing I ever said with a grace,
Nothing I did that you care to see,
Nothing I was that deserves a place
In your mind, now I leave you, set you free.

II.

Conceded! In turn, concede to me,
Such things have been as a mutual flame.
Your soul's locked fast; but, love for a key,
You might let it loose, till I grew the same
In your eyes, as in mine you stand: strange plea!

III.

For then, then, what would it matter to me
That I was the harsh ill-favoured one?
We both should be like as pea and pea;
It was ever so since the world begun:
So, let me proceed with my reverie.

How strange it were if you had all me,
As I have all you in my heart and brain,
You, whose least word brought gloom or glee,
Who never lifted the hand in vain—
Will hold mine yet, from over the sea!

V.

Strange, if a face, when you thought of me,
Rose like your own face present now,
With eyes as dear in their due degree,
Much such a mouth, and as bright a
brow,
Till you saw yourself, while you cried "'Tis She!"

VI.

Well, you may, you must, set down to me
Love that was life, life that was love;
A tenure of breath at your lips' decree,
A passion to stand as your thoughts approve,
A rapture to fall where your foot might be.

VII.

But did one touch of such love for me
Come in a word or a look of yours,
Whose words and looks will, circling, flee
Round me and round while life endures,—
Could I fancy "As I feel, thus feels he";

VIII.

Why, fade you might to a thing like me,
 And your hair grow these coarse hanks of
 hair,
 Your skin, this bark of a gnarled tree,—
 You might turn myself!—should I know or care
 When I should be dead of joy, James Lee?

GOLD HAIR:

A STORY OF PORNIC.

I.

Oh, the beautiful girl, too white,
 Who lived at Pornic, down by the sea,
 Just where the sea and the Loire unite!
 And a boasted name in Brittany
 She bore, which I will not write.

II.

Too white, for the flower of life is red;
 Her flesh was the soft seraphic screen
 Of a soul that is meant (her parents said)
 To just see earth, and hardly be seen,
 And blossom in heaven instead.

III.

Yet earth saw one thing, one how fair!
 One grace that grew to its full on earth:
 Smiles might be sparse on her cheek so
 spare,
 And her waist want half a girdle's girth,
 But she had her great gold hair.

IV.

Hair, such a wonder of flax and floss,
 Freshness and fragrance—floods of it, too!
 Gold, did I say? Nay, gold's mere dross:
 Here, Life smiled, "Think what I meant
 to do!"
 And Love sighed, "Fancy my loss!"

V.

So, when she died, it was scarce more strange
 Than that, when delicate evening dies,

And you follow its spent sun's pallid range,
 There's a shoot of colour, startles the skies
 With sudden, violent change,—

VI.

That, while the breath was nearly to seek,
 As they put the little cross to her lips,
 She changed; a spot came out on her
 cheek,
 A spark from her eye in mid-eclipse,
 And she broke forth, "I must speak!"

VII.

"Not my hair!" made the girl her moan—
 "All the rest is gone or to go;
 "But the last, last grace, my all, my own,
 "Let it stay in the grave, that the ghosts may know!
 "Leave my poor gold hair alone!"

VIII.

The passion thus vented, dead lay she;
 Her parents sobbed their worst on that;
 All friends joined in, nor observed degree:
 For indeed the hair was to wonder at,
 As it spread—not flowing free,

IX.

But curled around her brow, like a crown,
 And coiled beside her cheeks, like a cap,
 And calmed about her neck—ay, down
 To her breast, pressed flat, without a gap
 I' the gold, it reached her gown.

All kissed that face, like a silver wedge
 'Mid the yellow wealth, nor disturbed its
 hair:
 E'en the priest allowed death's privilege,
 As he planted the crucifix with care
 On her breast, 'twixt edge and edge.

XI.

And thus was she buried, inviolate
 Of body and soul, in the very space
 By the altar; keeping saintly state.
 In Pornic church, for her pride of race,
 Pure life and piteous fate.

XII.

And in after-time would your fresh tear fall,
 Though your mouth might twitch with a dubious smile,
 As they told you of gold, both robe and pall,
 How she prayed them leave it alone awhile,
 So it never was touched at all.

XIII.

Years flew ; this legend grew at last
 The life of the lady ; all she had done,
 All been, in the memories fading fast
 Of lover and friend, was summed in one Sentence survivors !

XIV.

To wit, she was meant for heaven, not earth ;
 Had turned an angel before the time ;
 Yet, since she was mortal, in such dearth
 Of frailty, all you could count a crime
 Was—she knew her gold hair's worth.

XV.

At little pleasant Pornic church,
 It chanced, the pavement wanted repair,
 Was taken to pieces : left in the lurch,
 A certain sacred space lay bare,
 And the boys began research.

'Twas the space where our sires would lay a
 saint,
 A benefactor,—a bishop, suppose,
 A baron with armour-adornments quaint,
 Dame with chased ring and jewelled rose,
 Things sanctity saves from taint ;

XVII.

So we come to find them in after-days
 When the corpse is presumed to have done with gauds
 Of use to the living, in many ways ;
 For the boys get pelf, and the town applaude,
 And the church deserves the praise.

XVIII.

They grubbed with a will : and at length—
O cor Humanum, pectora caca, and the rest !—
 They found—no gaud they were prying for,
 No ring, no rose, but—who would have guessed ?—
 A double Louis-d'or !

XIX.

Here was a case for the priest : he heard,
 Marked, inwardly digested, laid
 Finger on nose, smiled, “ There's a bird “ Chirps in my ear ” : then, “ Bring a spade,
 “ Dig deeper ! ”—he gave the word.

XX.

And lo, when they came to the coffin-lid,
 Or rotten planks which composed it once,
 Why, there lay the girl's skull wedged amid
 A mint of money, it served for the nonce
 To hold in its hair-heaps hid !

XXI.

Hid there ? Why ? Could the girl be wont
 (She the stainless soul) to treasure up
 Money, earth's trash and heaven's affront ?
 Had a spider found out the communion-cup,
 Was a toad in the christening-font ?

XXII.

Truth is truth : too true it was.
 Gold ! She hoarded and hugged it first,
 Longed for it, leaned o'er it, loved it—
 alas—
 Till the humour grew to a head and burst,
 And she cried, at the final pass,—

XXIII.

“ Talk not of God, my heart is stone ;
 “ Nor lover nor friend—be gold for both !
 “ Gold I lack ; and, my all, my own,
 “ It shall hide in my hair. I scarce die loth
 “ If they let my hair alone ! ”

XXIV.

Louis d'Or, some six times five,
And duly double; every piece.
Now do you see? With the priest to thrive,
With parents preventing her soul's release
By kisses that kept alive,—

XXV.

With heaven's gold gates about to ope,
With friends' praise, gold-like, lingering
still,
An instinct had bidden the girl's hand grope
For gold, the true sort—"Gold in heaven,
if you will;
"But I keep earth's too, I hope."

Enough! The priest took the grave's grim
yield:

The parents, they eyed that price of sin
As if thirty pieces lay revealed
On the place to bury strangers in,
The hideous Potter's Field.

XXVII.

But the priest bethought him: "'Milk that's spilt'
"—You know the adage! Watch and
pray!
"Saints tumble to earth with so slight a tilt!
"It would build a new altar; that, we may!"
And the altar therewith was built.

XXVIII.

Why I deliver this horrible verse?
As the text of a sermon, which now I preach:
Evil or good may be better or worse
In the human heart, but the mixture of each
Is a marvel and a curse.

XXIX.

The candid incline to surmise of late
That the Christian faith proves false, I
find;

For our Essays-and-Reviews' debate
Begins to tell on the public mind,
And Colenso's words have weight:

XXX.

I still, to suppose it true, for my part,
See reasons and reasons; this, to begin:
'Tis the faith that launched point-blank her dart

At the head of a lie—taught Original Sin,
The Corruption of Man's Heart.

THE WORST OF IT.

WOULD it were I had been false, not you!
I that am nothing, not you that are all:
I, never the worse for a touch or two
On my speckled hide; not you, the pride
Of the day, my swan, that a first fleck's fall
On her wonder of white must undo, undo!

II.

I had dipped in life's struggle and, out
again,
Bore specks of it here, there, easy to see,
When I found my swan and the cure was
plain;
The dull turned bright as I caught your white
On my bosom: you saved me—saved in vain
If you ruined yourself, and all through me!

III.

Yes, all through the speckled beast that I am,
Who taught you to stoop; you gave me
yourself,
And bound your soul by the vows that damn:
Since on better thought you break, as you ought,
Vows—words, no angel set down, some elf
Mistook,—for an oath, an epigram!

IV.

Yes, might I judge you, here were my heart,
And a hundred its like, to treat as you pleased !

I choose to be yours, for my proper part,
Yours, leave or take, or mar me or make ;
If I acquiesce, why should you be teased
With the conscience-prick and the memory-smart ?

V.

But what will God say ? Oh, my sweet,
Think, and be sorry you did this thing Though earth were unworthy to feel your feet,
There's a heaven above may deserve your
love :
Should you forfeit heaven for a snapt gold
ring
And a promise broke, were it just or meet ?

VI.

And I to have tempted you ! I, who tired
Your soul, no doubt, till it sank ! Unwise,
I loved and was lowly, loved and aspired,
Loved, grieving or glad, till I made you
mad,
And you meant to have hated and despised—
Whereas, you deceived me nor inquired !

VII.

She, ruined ? How ? No heaven for her ?
Crowns to give, and none for the brow
That looked like marble and smelt like myrrh ?
Shall the robe be worn, and the palm-branch borne,
And she go graceless, she graced now
Beyond all saints, as themselves aver ?

VIII.

Hardly ! That must be understood !
The earth is your place of penance, then ;
And what will it prove ? I desire your good,
But, plot as I may, I can find no way
How a blow should fall, such as falls on
men,
Nor prove too much for your womanhood.

IX.

It will come, I suspect, at the end of life ;
When you walk alone, and review the past ;
And I, who so long shall have done with strife,
And journeyed my stage and earned my wage
And retired as was right,—I am called at last
When the devil stabs you, to lend the knife.

X.

He stabs for the minute of trivial wrong,
Nor the other hours are able to save,
The happy, that lasted my whole life long :
For a promise broke, not for first words
spoke,
The true, the only, that turn my grave
To a blaze of joy and a crash of song.

Witness beforehand ! Off I trip
On a safe path gay through the flowers you flung :
My very name made great by your lip,
And my heart a-glow with the good I know
Of a perfect year when we both were young,
And I tasted the angels' fellowship.

And witness, moreover . . . Ah, but wait !
I spy the loop whence an arrow shoots !
It may be for yourself, when you meditate,
That you grieve—for slain ruth, murdered
truth.
" Though falsehood escape in the end, what boots ?
" How truth would have triumphed !"— you sigh too late.

Ay, who would have triumphed like you, I
say !
Well, it is lost now ; well, you must bear,
Abide and grow fit for a better day :
You should hardly grudge, could I be your
judge !
But hush ! For you, can be no despair :
There's amends : 'tis a secret : hope and
pray !

For I was true at least—oh, true enough !
And, Dear, truth is not as good as it seems !

Commend me to conscience ! Idle stuff !
Much help is in mine, as I mope and pine,
And skulk through day, and scowl in my
dreams
At my swan's obtaining the crow's rebuff.

xv.

Men tell me of truth now—"False !" I cry :
Of beauty—"A mask, friend ! Look
beneath !"

We take our own method, the devil and I,
With pleasant and fair and wise and rare :

And the best we wish to what lives, is—death ;
Which even in wishing, perhaps we lie !

xvi.

Far better commit a fault and have done—
As you, Dear !—for ever ; and choose the pure,
And look where the healing waters run,
And strive and strain to be good again,
And a place in the other world ensure,
All glass and gold, with God for its sun.

xvii.

Misery ! What shall I say or do ?
I cannot advise, or, at least, persuade :
Most like, you are glad you deceived me—rue

No whit of the wrong : you endured too
long,
Have done no evil and want no aid,
Will live the old life out and chance the new.

xviii.

And your sentence is written all the same,
And I can do nothing,—pray, perhaps :
But somehow the world pursues its game,—
If I pray, if I curse,—for better or worse :
And my faith is torn to a thousand scraps,
And my heart feels ice while my words breathe flame.

xix.

Dear, I look from my hiding-place.
Are you still so fair ? Have you still the
eyes ?

Be happy ! Add but the other grace,
Be good ! Why want what the angels vaunt ?
I knew you once : but in Paradise,
If we meet, I will pass nor turn my face.

DÏS ALITER VISUM ; OR, LE BYRON
DE NOS JOURS.

STOP, let me have the truth of that !
Is that all true ? I say, the day
Ten years ago when both of us
Met on a morning, friends—as thus
We meet this evening, friends or what ?—

ii.

Did you—because I took your arm
And sillily smiled, "A mass of brass
"That sea looks, blazing underneath !"
While up the cliff-road edged with heath,
We took the turns nor came to harm—

iii.

Did you consider "Now makes twice
"That I have seen her, walked and talked
"With this poor pretty thoughtful thing,
"Whose worth I weigh : she tries to sing ;
"Draws, hopes in time the eye grows nice ;

iv.

"Reads verse and thinks she understands ;
"Loves all, at any rate, that's great,
"Good, beautiful ; but much as we
"Down at the bath-house love the sea,
"Who breathe its salt and bruise its sands :

v.

"While . . . do but follow the fishing-gull
"That flaps and floats from wave to cave !
"There's the sea-lover, fair my friend !
"What then ? Be patient, mark and mend !
"Had you the making of your skull ?"

VI.

And did you, when we faced the church
With spire and sad slate roof, aloof
From human fellowship so far,

Where a few graveyard crosses are,
And garlands for the swallows' perch,—

VII.

Did you determine, as we stepped

O'er the lone stone fence, "Let me get

"Her for myself, and what's the earth

"With all its art, verse, music, worth—

"Compared with love, found, gained, and kept?

VIII.

"Schumann's our music-maker now ;

"Has his march-movement youth and
mouth?

"Ingres's the modern man that paints ;

"Which will lean on me, of his saints?

"Heine for songs ; for kisses, how?"

And did you, when we entered, reached

The votive frigate, soft aloft

Riding on air this hundred years,

Safe-smiling at old hopes and fears,—

Did you draw profit while she preached?

X.

Resolving, "Fools we wise men grow !

"Yes, I could easily blurt out curt

"Some question that might find reply

"As prompt in her stopped lips, dropped eye,

"And rush of red to cheek and brow :

XI.

"Thus were a match made, sure and fast,

"Mid the blue weed-flowers round the moind

"Where, issuing, we shall stand and stay

"For one more look at baths and bay,

"Sands, sea-gulls, and the old church last—

XII.

"A match 'twixt me, bent, wigg'd and blamed,

"Famous, however, for verse and worse,

"Sure of the Fortieth spare Arm-chair

"When gout and glory seat me there,

"So, one whose love-freaks pass unblamed,—

XIII.

"And this young beauty, round and sound

"As a mountain-apple, youth and truth

"With loves and doves, at all events

"With money in the Three per Cents ;

"Whose choice of me would seem profound :—

XIV.

"She might take me as I take her.

"Perfect the hour would pass, alas !

"Climb high, love high, what matter? Still,

"Feet, feelings, must descend the hill :

"An hour's perfection can't recur.

XV.

"Then follows Paris and full time

"For both to reason : 'Thus with us !'

"She'll sigh, 'Thus girls give body and
soul

"At first word, think they gain the goal,

"When 'tis the starting-place they climb !

XVI.

"My friend makes verse and gets renown ;

"Have they all fifty years, his peers?

"He knows the world, firm, quiet and gay ;

"Boys will become as much one day :

"They're fools ; he cheats, with beard less brown.

XVII.

"For boys say, Love me or I die!

"He did not say, The truth is, youth

"I want, who am old and know too much ;

"*I'd catch youth : lend me sight and
touch!*

"Drop heart's blood where life's wheels grate dry!"

XVIII.

"While I should make rejoinder"—(then

It was, no doubt, you ceased that least

Light pressure of my arm in yours)

"I can conceive of cheaper cures"

"For a yawning-fit o'er books and men.

XIX.

"What? All I am, was, and might be,
"All, books taught, art brought, life's whole strife,

"Painful results since precious, just
"Were fitly exchanged, in wise disgust,
"For two cheeks freshened by youth and sea?

XX.

"All for a nosegay!—what came first;
"With fields on flower, untried each side;
"I rally, need my books and men,
"And find a nosegay! drop it, then,
"No match yet made for best or worst!"

That ended me. You judged the porch
We left by, Norman; took our look
At sea and sky; wondered so few
Find out the place for air and view;
Remarked the sun began to scorch;

XXII.

Descended, soon regained the baths,
And then, good-bye! Years ten since then:
Ten years! We meet: you tell me, now,
By a window-seat for that cliff-brow,
On carpet-stripes for those sand-paths.

XXIII.

Now I may speak: you fool, for all Your lore! Who made things plain in vain?
What was the sea for? What, the grey
Sad church, that solitary day,
Crosses and graves and swallows' call?

XXIV.

Was there nought better than to enjoy?
No feat which, done, would make time
break,
And let us pent-up creatures through
Into eternity, our due?
No forcing earth teach heaven's employ?

XXV.

No wise beginning, here and now,
What cannot grow complete (earth's feat)

And heaven must finish, there and then?
No tasting earth's true food for men,
Its sweet in sad, its sad in sweet?

XXVI.

No grasping at love, gaining a share
O' the sole spark from God's life at strife
With death, so, sure of range above
The limits here? For us and love,
Failure; but, when God fails, despair.

XXVII.

This you call wisdom? Thus you add
Good unto good again, in vain?
You loved, with body worn and weak;
I loved, with faculties to seek:
Were both loves worthless since ill-clad?

XXVIII.

Let the mere star-fish in his vault
Crawl in a wash of weed, indeed,
Rose-jacynth to the finger-tips:
He, whole in body and soul, outstrips
Man, found with either in default.

XXIX.

But what's whole, can increase no more,
Is dwarfed and dies, since here's its sphere.
The devil laughed at you in his sleeve!
You knew not? That I well believe;
Or you had saved two souls: nay, four.

XXX.

For Stephanie sprained last night her wrist,
Ankle or something. "Pooh," cry you?
At any rate she danced, all say,
Vilely; her vogue has had its day.
Here comes my husband from his whist.

TOO LATE.

I.

HERE was I with my arm and heart
And brain, all yours for a word, a want
Put into a look—just a look, your part,— While mine, to repay it . . . vainest
vaunt,

Were the woman, that's dead, alive to hear,
Had her lover, that's lost, love's proof to show !

But I cannot show it ; you cannot speak
From the churchyard neither, miles removed,

Though I feel by a pulse within my cheek,
Which stabs and stops, that the woman I loved

Needs help in her grave and finds none near,
Wants warmth from the heart which sends it—so !

II.

Did I speak once angrily, all the drear days
You lived, you woman I loved so well,
Who married the other ? Blame or praise,
Where was the use then ? Time would tell,

And the end declare what man for you,
What woman for me, was the choice of
God.

But, Edith dead ! no doubting more !
I used to sit and look at my life
As it rippled and ran till, right before,
A great stone stopped it : oh, the strife
Of waves at the stone some devil threw
In my life's midcurrent, thwarting God !

But either I thought, " They may churn and chide

" Awhile, my waves which came for their
joy

" And found this horrible stone full-tide :

" Yet I see just a thread escape, deploy

" Through the evening-country, silent and safe,

" And it suffers no more till it finds the sea."

Or else I would think, " Perhaps some night

" When new things happen, a meteor-ball

" May slip through the sky in a line of light,

" And earth breathe hard, and landmarks
fall,

" And my waves no longer champ nor chafe,

" Since a stone will have rolled from its place : let be !"

IV.

But, dead ! All's done with : wait who
may,

Watch and wear and wonder who will.

Oh, my whole life that ends to-day !

Oh, my soul's sentence, sounding still,

" The woman is dead that was none of his ;

" And the man that was none of hers may go !"

There's only the past left : worry that !

Wreak, like a bull, on the empty coat,

Rage, its late wearer is laughing at !

Tear the collar to rags, having missed his throat ;

Strike stupidly on—" This, this and this,

" Where I would that a bosom received the blow !"

I ought to have done more : once my speech,
And once your answer, and there, the end,
And Edith was henceforth out of reach !

Why, men do more to deserve a friend,

Be rid of a foe, get rich, grow wise,

Nor, folding their arms, stare fate in the
face.

Why, better even have burst like a thief

And borne you away to a rock for us two,

In a moment's horror, bright, bloody and
brief :

Then changed to myself again—" I slew

" Myself in that moment ; a ruffian lies

" Somewhere : your slave, see, born in his place !"

VI.

What did the other do ? You be judge !

Look at us, Edith ! Here are we both !

Give him his six whole years : I grudge

None of the life with you, nay, loathe

Myself that I grudged his start in advance

Of me who could overtake and pass.

But, as if he loved you ! No, not he,

Nor anyone else in the world, 'tis plain :

Who ever heard that another, free

As I, young, prosperous, sound and sane,

Poured life out, proffered it—" Half a glance

" Of those eyes of yours and I drop the glass !"

VII.

Handsome, were you? 'Tis more than they held,

More than they said; I was 'ware and watched:

I was the 'scapegrace, this rat belled

The cat, this fool got his whiskers scratched:

The others? No head that was turned, no heart

Broken, my lady, assure yourself!

Each soon made his mind up; so and so

Married a dancer, such and such

Stole his friend's wife, stagnated slow,

Or maundered, unable to do as much,

And muttered of peace where he had no part:

While, hid in the closet, laid on the shelf,—

VIII.

On the whole, you were let alone, I think!

So, you looked to the other, who acquiesced;

My rival, the proud man,—prize your pink

Of poets! A poet he was! I've guessed:

He rhymed you his rubbish nobody read,

Loved you and doted you—did not I laugh!

There was a prize! But we both were tried.

Oh, heart of mine, marked broad with her mark,

Tekel, found wanting, set aside,

Scorned! See, I bleed these tears in the dark

Till comfort come and the last be bled:

He? He is tagging your epitaph.

If it would only come over again!

—Time to be patient with me, and probe

This heart till you punctured the proper vein,
Just to learn what blood is: twitch the robe

From that blank lay-figure your fancy draped,
Prick the leathern heart till the—verses spirt!

And late it was easy; late, you walked

Where a friend might meet you; Edith's name

Arose to one's lip if one laughed or talked;

If I heard good news, you heard the same;

When I woke, I knew that your breath escaped;

I could bide my time, keep alive, alert.

X.

And alive I shall keep and long, you will see!

I knew a man, was kicked like a dog

From gutter to cesspool; what cared he

So long as he picked from the filth his prog?

He saw youth, beauty and genius die,

And jollily lived to his hundredth year.

But I will live otherwise: none of such life!

At once I begin as I mean to end.

Go on with the world, get gold in its strife,

Give your spouse the slip and betray your friend!

There are two who decline, a woman and I,

And enjoy our death in the darkness here.

I liked that way you had with your curls

Wound to a ball in a net behind:

Your cheek was chaste as a quaker-girl's,

And your mouth—there was never, to my mind,

Such a funny mouth, for it would not shut;

And the dented chin too—what a chin!

There were certain ways when you spoke, some words

That you know you never could pronounce:

You were thin, however; like a bird's

Your hand seemed—some would say, the pounce¹

Of a scaly-footed hawk—all but!

The world was right when it called you thin.

XII.

But I turn my back on the world: I take

Your hand, and kneel, and lay to my lips

Bid me live, Edith! Let me slake

Thirst at your presence! Fear no slips:

'Tis your slave shall pay, while his soul endures,

Full due, love's whole debt, summum jus.

¹ Talon.

My queen shall have high observance, planned
Courtship made perfect, no least line
Crossed without warrant. There you stand,
Warm too, and white too : would this wine
Had washed all over that body of yours,
Ere I drank it, and you down with it,
thus !

ABT VÖGLER.

(AFTER HE HAS BEEN EXTEMPORIZING
UPON THE MUSICAL INSTRUMENT OF HIS INVENTION.)

[The Abbé Vogler, born 1749. Court
Chaplain at Mannheim. Improved the organ.
Visited London, 1790. Died at Darmstadt, 1844.]

I.

Would that the structure brave, the manifold music I build,
Bidding my organ obey, calling its keys to their work,
Claiming each slave of the sound, at a touch,
as when Solomon willed Armies of angels that soar, legions of demons that lurk,
Man, brute, reptile, fly,—alien of end and
of aim;
Adverse, each from the other heaven-high,
hell-deep removed,—
Should rush into sight at once as he named the ineffable Name,
And pile him a palace straight, to pleasure the princess he loved !

II.

Would it might tarry like his, the beautiful building of mine,
This which my keys in a crowd pressed and importuned to raise !
Ah, one and all, how they helped, would dispart now and now combine,
Zealous to hasten the work, heighten their master his praise !
And one would bury his brow with a blind
plunge down to hell,
Burrow awhile and build, broad on the roots of things,

Then up again swim into sight, having based me my palace well,
Founded it, fearless of flame, flat on the nether springs.

III.

And another would mount and march, like the excellent minion he was,
Ay, another and yet another, one crowd
but with many a crest,
Raising my rampired walls of gold as transparent as glass,
Eager to do and die, yield each his place
to the rest :
For higher still and higher (as a runner tips
with fire,
When a great illumination surprises a festal
night—
Outlining round and round Rome's dome from space to spire)
Up, the pinnacled glory reached, and the pride of my soul was in sight.

IV.

In sight? Not half! for it seemed, it was certain, to match man's birth,
Nature in turn conceived, obeying an impulse as I ;
And the emulous heaven yearned down, made effort to reach the earth,
As the earth had done her best, in my passion, to scale the sky :
Novel splendours burst forth, grew familiar and dwelt with mine,
Not a point nor peak but found and fixed its wandering star ;
Meteor-moons, balls of blaze : and they did not pale nor pine,
For earth had attained to heaven, there was no more near nor far.

Nay more ; for there wanted not who walked in the glare and glow,
Presences plain in the place ; or, fresh from the Protoplast,

Furnished for ages to come, when a kindlier
wind should blow;
Lured now to begin and live, in a house
to their liking at last;
Or else the wonderful Dead who have passed through the body and gone,
But were back once more to breathe in an old world worth their new:
What never had been, was now; what was,
as it shall be anon;
And what is,—shall I say, matched both?
for I was made perfect too.

VI.

All through my keys that gave their sounds to a wish of my soul,
All through my soul that praised as its wish flowed visibly forth,
All through music and me! For think, had
I painted the whole,
Why, there it had stood, to see, nor the process so wonder-worth:
Had I written the same, made verse—still,
effect proceeds from cause,
Ye know why the forms are fair, ye hear how the tale is told;
It is all triumphant art, but art in obedience to laws,
Painter and poet are proud in the artist-list enrolled:—

VII.

But here is the finger of God, a flash of the will that can,
Existent behind all laws, that made them and, lo, they are!
And I know not if, save in this, such gift be allowed to man,
That out of three sounds he frame, not a fourth sound, but a star.
Consider it well: each tone of our scale in itself is nought;
It is everywhere in the world—loud, soft,
and all is said:
Give to me to use! I mix it with two in my thought:
And, there! Ye have heard and seen:
consider and bow the head!

VIII.

Well, it is gone at last, the palace of music I reared;
Gone! and the good tears start, the praises
that come too slow;
For one is assured at first, one scarce can say that he feared,
That he even gave it a thought, the gone
thing was to go.
Never to be again! But many more of the kind
As good, nay, better perchance: is this your comfort to me?
To me, who must be saved because I cling with my mind
To the same, same self, same love, same
God: ay, what was, shall be.

Therefore to whom turn I but to thee, the ineffable Name?
Builder and maker, thou, of houses not made with hands!
What, have fear of change from thee who art ever the same?
Doubt that thy power can fill the heart that thy power expands?
There shall never be one lost good! What was, shall live as before;
The evil is null, is nought, is silence
implying sound;
What was good shall be good, with, for evil,
so much good more;
On the earth the broken arcs; in the heaven, a perfect round.
All we have willed or hoped or dreamed of good shall exist;
Not its semblance, but itself; no beauty,
nor good, nor power
Whose voice has gone forth, but each survives for the melodist
When eternity affirms the conception of an hour.

The high that proved too high, the heroic for earth too hard,

The passion that left the ground to lose itself in the sky,

Are music sent up to God by the lover and the bard ;

Enough that he heard it once : we shall hear it by-and-by.

XI.

And what is our failure here but a triumph's evidence

For the fulness of the days ? Have we withered or agonized ?

Why else was the pause prolonged but that singing might issue thence ?

Why rushed the discords in but that harmony should be prized ?

Sorrow is hard to bear, and doubt is slow to clear,

Each sufferer says his say, his scheme of the weal and woe :

But God has a few of us whom he whispers
in the ear ;

The rest may reason and welcome : 'tis we musicians know.

XII.

Well, it is earth with me ; silence resumes her reign :

I will be patient and proud, and soberly acquiesce.

Give me the keys. I feel for the common chord again,

Sliding by semitones, till I sink to the minor,—yes,

And I blunt it into a ninth, and I stand on alien ground,

Surveying awhile the heights I rolled from into the deep ;

Which, hark, I have dared and done, for my resting-place is found,

The C Major of this life : so, now I will try to sleep.

RABBI BEN EZRA.

I.

GROW old along with me !

The best is yet to be,

The last of life, for which the first was made :

Our times are in His hand

Who saith "A whole I planned,

"Youth shows but half ; trust God : see all nor be afraid !"

II.

Not that, amassing flowers,

Youth sighed "Which rose make ours,

"Which lily leave and then as best recall ?"

Not that, admiring stars,

It yearned "Nor Jove, nor Mars ;

"Mine be some figured flame which blends, transcends them all !"

Not for such hopes and fears

Annulling youth's brief years,

Do I remonstrate : folly wide the mark !

Rather I prize the doubt

Low kinds exist without,

Finished and finite clods, untroubled by a spark.

IV.

Poor vaunt of life indeed,

Were man but formed to feed

On joy, to solely seek and find and feast :

Such feasting ended, then

As sure an end to men ;

Irks care the crop-full bird ? Frets doubt the maw-crammed beast ?

Rejoice we are allied

To That which doth provide

And not partake, effect and not receive !

A spark disturbs our clod ;

Nearer we hold of God

Who gives, than of His tribes that take, I must believe.

VI.

Then, welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough,
Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand but go !
Be our joys three-parts pain !
Strive, and hold cheap the strain ;
Learn, nor account the pang ; dare, never grudge the throe !

VII.

For thence,—a paradox
Which comforts while it mocks,—
Shall life succeed in that it seems to fail :
What I aspired to be,
And was not, comforts me :
A brute I might have been, but would not sink
i' the scale.

VIII.

What is he but a brute
Whose flesh has soul to suit,
Whose spirit works lest arms and legs want
play ?
To man, propose this test—
Thy body at its best,
How far can that project thy soul on its lone
way ?

IX.

Yet gifts should prove their use :
I own the Past profuse
Of power each side, perfection every turn :
Eyes, ears took in their dole,
Brain treasured up the whole ;
Should not the heart beat once " How good to live and learn ? "

X.

Not once beat " Praise be Thine !
" I see the whole design,
" I, who saw power, see now love perfect too :
" Perfect I call Thy plan :
" Thanks that I was a man !
" Maker, remake, complete,—I trust what Thou shalt do ! "

XI.

For pleasant is this flesh ;
Our soul, in its rose-mesh
Pulled ever to the earth, still yearns for rest ;

Would we some prize might hold
To match those manifold Possessions of the brute,—gain most, as we did best !

XII.

Let us not always say
" Spite of this flesh to-day
" I strove, made head, gained ground upon
the whole ! "
As the bird wings and sings,
Let us cry " All good things
" Are ours, nor soul helps flesh more, now.
than flesh helps soul ! "

XIII.

Therefore I summon age
To grant youth's heritage,
Life's struggle having so far reached its
term :
Thence shall I pass, approved
A man, for aye removed
From the developed brute ; a god though in the germ.

XIV.

And I shall thereupon
Take rest, ere I be gone
Once more on my adventure brave and
new :
Fearless and unperplexed,
When I wage battle next,
What weapons to select, what armour to indue.

XV.

Youth ended, I shall try
My gain or loss thereby ;
Leave the fire ashes, what survives is gold :
And I shall weigh the same,
Give life its praise or blame :
Young, all lay in dispute ; I shall know, being old.

XVI.

For note, when evening shuts,
A certain moment cuts
The deed off, calls the glory from the grey :
A whisper from the west
Shoots—" Add this to the rest,
" Take it and try its worth : here dies another day."

XVII.

So, still within this life,
Though lifted o'er its strife,
Let me discern, compare, pronounce at
last,

"This rage was right if the main,
That acquiescence vain :
"The Future I may face now I have proved the Past."

XVIII.

For more is not reserved
To man, with soul just nerved
To act to-morrow what he learns to-day :
Here, work enough to watch
The Master work, and catch Hints of the proper craft, tricks of the tool's true play.

XIX.

As it was better, youth
Should strive, through acts uncouth,
Toward making, than repose on aught found
made :

So, better, age, exempt
From strife, should know, than tempt
Further. Thou waitedest age : wait death nor be afraid !

XX.

Enough now, if the Right
And Good and Infinite
Be named here, as thou callest thy hand thine
own,
With knowledge absolute,
Subject to no dispute
From fools that crowded youth, nor let thee feel alone.

XXI.

Be there, for once and all,
Severed great minds from small,
Announced to each his station in the Past !
Was I, the world arraigned,
Were they, my soul disdained, Right? Let age speak the truth and give us peace at last !

XXII.

Now, who shall arbitrate?
Ten men love what I hate,
Shun what I follow, slight what I receive ;

Ten, who in ears and eyes

Match me : we all surmise,
They this thing, and I that : whom shall my soul believe ?

XXIII.

Not on the vulgar mass
Called "work," must sentence pass,
Things done, that took the eye and had the price ;

O'er which, from level stand,
The low world laid its hand,
Found straightway to its mind, could value in a trice :

XXIV.

But all, the world's coarse thumb
And finger failed to plumb,
So passed in making up the main account ;
All instincts immature,
All purposes unsure,
That weighed not as his work, yet swelled the man's amount :

XXV.

Thoughts hardly to be packed
Into a narrow act,
Fancies that broke through language and escaped ;
All I could never be,
All, men ignored in me,
This, I was worth to God, whose wheel the pitcher shaped.

XXVI.

Ay, note that Potter's wheel,
That metaphor ! and feel
Why time spins fast, why passive lies our clay,—
Thou, to whom fools propound,
When the wine makes its round,
"Since life fleets, all is change ; the Past gone, seize to-day !"

XXVII.

Fool ! All that is, at all,
Lasts ever, past recall ;
Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand
sure :

What entered into thee,
That was, is, and shall be :
Time's wheel runs, back its stops : Potter and clay endure.

XXVIII.

He fixed thee mid this dance
Of plastic circumstance,
This Present, thou, forsooth, wouldst fain arrest :
Machinery just meant
To give thy soul its bent,
Try thee and turn thee forth, sufficiently im-

XXIX.

What though the earlier grooves
Which ran the laughing loves Around thy base, no longer pause and press ?
What though, about thy rim,
Skull-things in order grim
Grow out, in graver mood, obey the sterner stress ?

XXX.

Look not thou down but up !
To uses of a cup,
The festal board, lamp's flash and trumpet's
peal,
The new wine's foaming flow,
The Master's lips a-glow !
Thou, heaven's consummate-cup, what need'st thou with earth's wheel ?

XXXI.

But I need, now as then,
Thee, God, who mouldest men ;
And since, not even while the whirl was
worst,
Did I,—to the wheel of life
With shapes and colours rife,
Bound dizzily,—mistake my end, to slake
Thy thirst :

XXXII.

So, take and use Thy work :
Amend what flaws may lurk,
What strain o' the stuff, what warpings past the aim !

My times be in Thy hand !
Perfect the cup as planned !
Let age approve of youth, and death complete the same !

A DEATH IN THE DESERT.

[SUPPOSED of Pamphylax the Antiochene :
It is a parchment, of my rolls the fifth,
Hath three skins glued together, is all Greek
And goeth from Epsilon down to Mu :
Lies second in the surnamed Chosen Chest,
Stained and conserved with juice of terebinth,
Covered with cloth of hair, and lettered Xi,
From Xanthus, my wife's uncle, now at
peace :

Mu and Epsilon stand for my own name.
I may not write it, but I make a cross
To show I wait His coming, with the rest,
And leave off here : beginneth Pamphylax.]

I said, " If one should wet his lips with wine,
" And slip the broadest plantain-leaf we find,
" Or else the lapet of a linen robe,
" Into the water-vessel, lay it right,
" And cool his forehead just above the eyes,
" The while a brother, kneeling either side,
" Should chafe each hand and try to make it warm,—
" He is not so far gone but he might speak."

This did not happen in the outer cave,
Nor in the secret chamber of the rock
Where, sixty days since the decree was out,
We had him, bedded on a camel-skin;
Aad waited for his dying all the while ;
But in the midmost grotto : since noon's light
Reached there a little, and we would not lose
The last of what might happen on his face.

I at the head, and Xanthus at the feet,
With Valens and the Boy, had lifted him,
And brought him from the chamber in the depths,
And laid him in the light where we might see :
For certain smiles began about his mouth,
And his lids moved, presageful of the end.

Beyond, and half way up the mouth o' the cave;

The Bactrian convert, having his desire,
Kept watch, and made pretence to graze a goat

That gave us milk, on rags of various herb,
Plantain and quitch, the rocks' shade keeps alive :

So that if any thief or soldier passed,
(Because the persecution was aware)
Yielding the goat up promptly with his life,
Such man might pass on, joyful at a prize,
Nor care to pry into the cool o' the cave.
Outside was all noon and the burning blue.

"Here is wine," answered Xanthus,— dropped a drop ;

I stooped and placed the lap of cloth aright,
Then chafed his right hand, and the Boy his left :

But Valens had bethought him, and produced
And broke a ball of nard, and made perfume.
Only, he did—not so much wake, as—turn
And smile a little, as a sleeper does
If any dear one call him, touch his face—
And smiles and loves, but will not be disturbed.

Then Xanthus said a prayer, but still he slept :

It is the Xanthus that escaped to Rome,
Was burned, and could not write the chronicle.

Then the Boy sprang up from his knees, and ran,

Stung by the splendour of a sudden thought,
And fetched the seventh plate of graven lead
Out of the secret chamber, found a place,
Pressing with finger on the deeper dints,
And spoke, as 'twere his mouth proclaiming
first,

"I am the Resurrection and the Life."

Whereat he opened his eyes wide at once,
And sat up of himself, and looked at us ;
And thenceforth nobody pronounced a word :
Only, outside, the Bactrian cried his cry
Like the lone desert-bird that wears the ruff,
As signal we were safe, from time to time.

First he said, "If a friend declared to me,
"This my son Valens, this my other son,
"Were James and Peter,—nay, declared as well

"This lad was very John,—I could believe !
"—Could, for a moment, doubtlessly believe :

"So is myself withdrawn into my depths,
"The soul retreated from the perished brain
"Whence it was wont to feel and use the world

"Through these dull members, done with long ago.

"Yet I myself remain ; I feel myself :
"And there is nothing lost. Let be, awhile!"

[This is the doctrine he was wont to teach,
How divers persons witness in each man,
Three souls which make up one soul : first, to wit,

A soul of each and all the bodily parts,
Seated therein, which works, and is what Does,

And has the use of earth, and ends the man
Downward : but, tending upward for advice,
Grows into, and again is grown into
By the next soul, which, seated in the brain,
Useth the first with its collected use,
And feeleth, thinketh, willeth,—is what

Knows :

Which, duly tending upward in its turn,
Grows into, and again is grown into
By the last soul, that uses both the first,
Subsisting whether they assist or no,
And, constituting man's self, is what Is—
And leans upon the former, makes it play,

As that played off the first : and, tending up,
Holds, is upheld by, God, and ends the man
Upward in that dread point of intercourse,
Nor needs a place, for it returns to Him.

What Does, what Knows, what Is ; three souls, one man.

I give the glossa of Theotypas.]

And then, "A stick, once fire from end to end ;

"Now, ashes save the tip that holds a spark !
"Yet, blow the spark, it runs back, spreads itself

- "A little where the fire was : thus I urge
 "The soul that served me, till it task once
 more
 "What ashes of my brain have kept their
 shape;
 "And these make effort on the last o' the
 flesh,
 "Trying to taste again the truth of things—"
 (He smiled)—"their very superficial truth ;
 "As that ye are my sons, that it is long
 "Since James and Peter had release by death,
 "And I am only he, your brother John,
 "Who saw and heard, and could remember
 all.
 "Remember all ! It is not much to say.
 "What if the truth broke on me from above
 "As once and oft-times ? Such might hap
 again : "
 "Doubtlessly He might stand in presence
 here,
 "With head wool-white, eyes flame, and feet
 like brass,
 "The sword and the seven stars, as I have seen—
 "I who now shudder only and surmise
 "How did your brother bear that sight and live ?"
 "If I live yet, it is for good, more love
 "Through me to men : be nought but ashes
 here
 "That keep awhile my semblance, who was John,—
 "Still, when they scatter, there is left on earth
 "No one alive who knew (consider this !)
 "—Saw with his eyes and handled with his hands
 "That which was from the first, the Word of Life.
 "How will it be when none more saith 'I saw' ?
 "Such ever was love's way : to rise, it stoops.
 "Since I, whom Christ's mouth taught, was bidden teach,
 "I went, for many years, about the world,
 "Saying 'It was so ; so I heard and saw,'
 "Speaking, as the case asked : and men believed.
 "Afterward came the message to myself
 "In Patmosisle ; I was not bidden teach,
 "But simply listen, take a book and write,
 "Nor set down other than the given word,
 "With nothing left to my arbitrament
 "To choose or change : I wrote, and men believed.
 "Then, for my time grew brief, no message
 more,
 "No call to write again, I found a way,
 "And, reasoning from my knowledge, merely taught
 "Men should, for love's sake, in love's strength believe ;
 "Or I would pen a letter to a friend : "
 "And urge the same as friend, nor less nor
 more :
 "Friends said I reasoned rightly, and believed.
 "But at the last, why, I seemed left alive
 "Like a sea-jelly weak on Patmos strand,
 "To tell dry sea-beach gazers how I fared
 "When there was mid-sea, and the mighty
 things ;
 "Left to repeat, 'I saw, I heard, I knew,'
 "And go all over the old ground again,
 "With Antichrist already in the world,
 "And many Antichrists, who answered
 prompt
 "Am I not Jasper as thyself art John ?
 "Nay, young, whereas through age thou mayest forget :
 "Wherefore, explain, or how shall we believe ?"
 "I never thought to call down fire on such,
 "Or, as in wonderful and early days,
 "Pick up the scorpion, tread the serpent
 dumb ;
 "But patient stated much of the Lord's life
 "Forgotten or misdelivered, and let it
 work :
 "Since much that at the first, in dead and
 word,
 "Lay simply and sufficiently exposed,
 Had grown (or else my soul was grown to
 match,

- "Fed through such years, familiar with such light,
 "Guarded and guided still to see and speak)
 "Of new significance and fresh result;
 "What first were guessed as points, I now knew stars,
 "And named them in the Gospel I have writ.
 "For men said, 'It is getting long ago :
 "'Where is the promise of His coming?'—asked
 "These young ones in their strength, as loth to wait,
 "Of me who, when their sires were born, was old.
 "I, for I loved them, answered, joyfully,
 "Since I was there, and helpful in my age ;
 "And, in the main, I think such men believed.
 "Finally, thus endeavouring, I fell sick,
 "Ye brought me here, and I supposed the end,
 "And went to sleep with one thought that, at least,
 "Though the whole earth should lie in wickedness,
 "We had the truth, might leave the rest to God.
 "Yet now I wake in such decrepitude
 "As I had slidden down and fallen afar,
 "Past even the presence of my former self,
 "Grasping the while for stay at facts which snap,
 "Till I am found away from my own world,
 "Feeling for foot-hold through a blank profound,
 "Along with unborn people in strange lands,
 "Who say—I hear said or conceive they say—
 "'Was John at all, and did he say he saw?
 "'Assure us, ere we ask what he might see!"
 "And how shall I assure them? Can they share
 "—They, who have flesh, a veil of youth and strength
 "About each spirit, that needs must bide its time,
 "Living and learning still as years assist.
 "Which wear the thickness thin, and let man
 "With me who hardly ~~am~~ withheld at all,
 "But shudderingly, scarce a shroud between,
 "Lie bare to the universal prick of light?
 "Is it for nothing we grow old and weak,
 "We whom God loves? When pain ends, gain ends too.
 "To me, that story—ay, that Life and Death
 "Of which I wrote 'it was'—to me, it is ;
 "—Is, here and now : I apprehend nought else.
 "Is not God now? the world His power first made?
 "Is not His love at issue still with sin,
 "Visibly when a wrong is done on earth?
 "Love, wrong, and pain, what see I else around?
 "Yea, and the Resurrection and Uprise
 "To the right hand of the throne—what is it beside,
 "When such truth, breaking bounds, o'er-floods my soul,
 "And, as I saw the sin and death, even so
 "See I the need yet transiency of both,
 "The good and glory consummated thence?
 "I saw the power ; I see the Love, once weak,
 "Resume the Power : and in this word 'I see,'
 "Lo, there is recognized the Spirit of both
 "That moving o'er the spirit of man, unblinds
 "His eye and bids him look. These are, I see ;
 "But ye, the children, His beloved ones too,
 "Ye need,—as I should use an optic glass
 "I wondered at erewhile, somewhere in the world,
 "It had been given a crafty smith to make ;
 "A tube, he turned on objects brought too close,
 "Lying confusedly insubordinate
 "For the unassisted eye to master once :
 "Look through his tube, at distance now they lay,
 "Become succinct, distinct, so small, so clear!
 "Just thus, ye needs must apprehend what truth
 "I see, reduced to plain historic fact,
 "Diminished into clearness, proved a point

"And far away: ye would withdraw your sense

"From out eternity; strain it upon time,

"Then stand before that fact, that Life and Death,

"Stay there at gaze, till it dispart, dispread,

"As though a star should open out, all sides,

"Grow the world on you, as it is my world.

"For life, with all it yields of joy and woe,

"And hope and fear, —believe the aged friend,—

"Is just our chance o' the prize of learning love,

"How love might be, hath been indeed, and is ;

"And that we hold thenceforth to the uttermost

"Such prize despite the envy of the world,

"And, having gained truth, keep truth: that is all.

"But see the double way wherein we are led,

"How the soul learns diversely from the flesh!

"With flesh, that hath so little time to stay,

"And yields mere basement for the soul's emprise,

"Expect prompt teaching. Helpful was the light,

"And warmth was cherishing and food was choice

"To every man's flesh, thousand years ago,

"As now to yours and mine; the body sprang

"At once to the height, and stayed: but the soul,—no!

"Since sages who, this noontide, meditate

"In Rome or Athens, may descry some point "Of the eternal power, hid yestereve;

"And, as thereby the power's whole mass extends,

"So much extends the æther floating o'er,

"The love that tops the might, the Christ in God.

"Then, as new lessons shall be learned in these

"Till earth's work stop and useless time run out,

"So duly, daily, needs provision be

"For keeping the soul's prowess possible,

"Building new barriers as the old decay,

"Saving us from evasion of life's proof,

"Putting the question ever, 'Does God love,

"And will ye hold that truth against the world?'

"Ye know there needs no second proof with good

"Gained for our flesh from any earthly source:

"We might go freezing, ages,—give us fire,

"Thereafter we judge fire at its full worth,

"And guard it safe through every chance, ye know!

"That fable of Prometheus and his theft,

"How mortals gained Jove's fiery flower, grows old

"(I have been used to hear the pagans own)

"And out of mind; but fire, howe'er its birth,

"Here is it, precious to the sophist now

"Who laughs the myth of Æschylus to scorn,

"As precious to those satyrs of his play,

"Who touched it in gay wonder at the thing.

"While were it so with the soul,—this gift of truth

"Once grasped, were this our soul's gain safe, and sure "To prosper as the body's gain is wont,—

"Why, man's probation would conclude, his earth

"Crumble; for he both reasons and decides,

"Weighs first, then chooses: will he give up fire

"For gold or purple once he knows its worth?

"Could he give Christ up were His worth as plain?

"Therefore, I say, to test man, the proofs shift,

"Nor may he grasp that fact like other fact,

"And straightway in his life acknowledge it,

"As, say, the indubitable bliss of fire.

"Sigh ye, 'It had been easier once than now?'

"To give you answer I am left alive;

"Look at me who was present from the first!

"Ye know what things I saw; then came a test,

"My first, befitting me who so had seen:

"Forsake the Christ thou sawest transfigured, Him

- "Who trod the sea and brought the dead to life?
 "What should wring this from thee!—ye laugh and ask.
 "What wrung it? Even a torchlight and a noise,
 "The sudden Roman faces, violent hands,
 "And fear of what the Jews might do! Just that,
 "And it is written, 'I forsook and fled.'
 "There was my trial, and it ended thus.
 "Ay, but my soul had gained its truth, could grow:
 "Another year or two,—what little child,
 "What tender woman that had seen no least
 "Of all my sights, but barely heard them told,
 "Who did not clasp the cross with a light laugh,
 "Or wrap the burning robe round, thanking God?
 "Well, was truth safe for ever, then? Not so.
 "Already had begun the silent work
 "Whereby truth, deadened of its absolute blaze,
 "Might need love's eye to pierce the over-stretched doubt.
 "Teachers were busy, whispering 'All is true
 "As the aged ones report; but youth can reach
 "Where age gropes dimly, weak with stir and strain,
 "And the full doctrine slumbers till to-day.'
 "Thus, what the Roman's lowered spear was found,
 "A bar to me who touched and handled truth,
 "Now proved the glozing of some new shrewd tongue,
 "This Ebion, this Cerinthus or their mates,
 "Till imminent was the outcry 'Save our Christ!'
 "Whereon I stated much of the Lord's life
 "Forgotten or misdelivered, and let it work.
 "Such work done, as it will be, what comes next?
 "What do I hear say, or conceive men say,
 "Was John at all, and did he say he saw?
 "Assure us, ere we ask what he might see!
 "Is this indeed a burthen for late days,
 "And may I help to bear it with you all,
 "Using my weakness which becomes your strength?
 "For if a babe were born inside this grot,
 "Grew to a boy here, heard us praise the sun,
 "Yet had but yon sole glimmer in light's place,—
 "One loving him and wishful he should learn,
 "Would much rejoice himself was blinded first "Month by month here, so made to understand
 "How eyes, born darkling, apprehend amiss:
 "I think I could explain to such a child
 "There was more glow outside than gleams he caught,
 "Ay, nor need urge 'I saw it, so believe!'
 "It is a heavy burthen you shall bear
 "In latter days, new lands, or old grown strange,
 "Left without me, which must be very soon.
 "What is the doubt, my brothers? Quick with it!
 "I see you stand conversing, each new face,
 "Either in fields, of yellow summer eves,
 "On islets yet unnamed amid the sea;
 "Or pace for shelter 'neath a portico
 "Out of the crowd in some enormous town
 "Where now the larks sing in a solitude;
 "Or muse upon blank heaps of stone and sand
 "Idly conjectured to be Ephesus:
 "And no one asks his fellow any more
 "Where is the promise of His coming?' but
 "Was he revealed in any of His lives,
 "As Power, as Love, as Influencing Soul?
 "Quick, for time presses, tell the whole mind out,
 "And let us ask and answer and be saved!
 "My book speaks on, because it cannot pass;
 "One listens quietly, nor scoffs but pleads
 "Here is a tale of things done ages since;
 "What truth was ever told the second day?
 "Wonders, that would prove doctrine, go for nought.
 "Remains the doctrine, love; well, we must love,

- "And what we love most, power and love
 in one,
 "Let us acknowledge on the record here,
 "Accepting these in Christ; must Christ then be?
 "Has He been? Did not we ourselves make Him?
 "Our mind receives but what it holds, no
 more.
 "First of the love, then; we acknowledge Christ—
 "A proof we comprehend His love, a proof
 "We had such love already in ourselves,
 "Knew first what else we should not recognize.
 "'Tis mere projection from man's inmost
 mind,
 "And, what he loves, thus falls reflected
 back,
 "Becomes accounted somewhat out of him;
 "He throws it up in air, it drops down earth's,
 "With shape, name, story added, man's old way.
 "How prove you Christ came otherwise at least?
 "Next try the power: He made and rules
 the world:
 "Certes there is a world once made, now ruled,
 "Unless things have been ever as we see.
 "Our sires declared a charioteer's yoked steeds
 "Brought the sun up the east and down the west,
 "Which only of itself now rises, sets,
 "As if a hand impelled it and a will,—
 "Thus they long thought, they who had will and hands:
 "But the new question's whisper is distinct,
 "Wherefore must all force needs be like ourselves?
 "We have the hands, the will; what made and drives
 "The sun is force, is law, is named, not known,
 "While will and love we do know; marks
 of these,
 "Eye-witnesses attest, so books declare—
- "As that, to punish or reward our race,
 "The sun at undue times arose or set
 "Or else stood still: what do not men affirm?
 "But earth requires as urgently reward
 "Or punishment to-day as years ago,
 "And none expects the sun will interpose:
 "Therefore it was mere passion and mistake,
 "Or erring zeal for right, which changed
 the truth.
 "Go back, far, farther, to the birth of things;
 "Ever the will, the intelligence, the love,
 "Man's!—which he gives, supposing he but finds,
 "As late he gave head, body, hands and feet,
 "To help these in what forms he called his gods.
 "First, Jove's brow, Juno's eyes were swept
 away,
 "But Jove's wrath, Juno's pride continued
 long;
 "As last, will, power, and love discarded
 these,
 "So law in turn discards power, love, and will.
 "What proveth God is otherwise at least?
 "All else, projection from the mind of man!
 "Nay, do not give me wine, for I am strong,
 "But place my gospel where I put my hands.
 "I say that man was made to grow, not stop;
 "That help, he needed once, and needs no
 more,
 Having grown but an inch by, is withdrawn:
 "For he hath new needs, and new helps to
 these.
 "This imports solely, man should mount on each
 "New height in view; the help whereby he mounts,
 "The ladder-rung his foot has left, may fall,
 "Since all things suffer change save God the
 Truth.
 Man apprehends Him newly at each stage:
 "Whereat earth's ladder drops, its service
 done;
 And nothing shall prove twice what once was proved.

- "You stick a garden-plot with ordered twigs
 "To show inside lie germs of herbs unborn,
 "And check the careless step would spoil their birth;
 "But when herbs wave, the guardian twigs
 may go,
 "Since should ye doubt of virtues, question kinds,
 "It is no longer for old twigs ye look,
 "Which proved once underneath lay store
 of seed,
 "But to the herb's self, by what light ye boast,
 "For what fruit's signs are. This book's fruit is plain,
 "Nor miracles need prove it any more.
 "Doth the fruit show? Then miracles bade
 'ware
 "At first of root and stem, saved both till now
 "From trampling ox, rough boar and wanton goat.
 "What? Was man made a wheelwork to wind up,
 "And be discharged, and straight wound up anew?
 "No!—grown, his growth lasts; taught, he ne'er forgets:
 "May learn a thousand things, not twice
 the same.
 "This might be pagan teaching: now hear
 mine.
 "I say, that as the babe, you feed awhile,
 "Becomes a boy and fit to feed himself,
 "So, minds at first must be spoon-fed with
 truth:
 "When they can eat, babe's-nurture is withdrawn.
 "I fed the babe whether it would or no:
 "I bid the boy or feed himself or starve.
 "I cried once, 'That ye may believe in Christ,
 "Behold this blind man shall receive his sight!'
 "I cry now, 'Urgest thou, for I am shrewd
 "And smile at stories how John's word could cure—
 "Repeat that miracle and take my faith?'
 "I say, that miracle was duly wrought
 "When, save for it, no faith was possible.
 "Whether a change were wrought i' the shows o' the world,
 "Whether the change came from our minds which see
 "Of shows o' the world so much as and no more "Than God wills for His purpose,—(what do I "See now, suppose you, there where you see
 rock
 "Round us?)—I know not; such was the effect,
 "So faith grew, making void more miracles
 "Because too much: they would compel,
 not help.
 "I say, the acknowledgment of God in Christ
 "Accepted by thy reason, solves for thee
 "All questions in the earth and out of it,
 "And has so far advanced thee to be wise.
 "Wouldst thou unprove this to re-prove the proved?
 "In life's mere minute, with power to use that proof,
 "Leave knowledge and revert to how it sprung?
 "Thou hast it; use it and forthwith, or die!
 "For I say, this is death and the sole death,
 "When a man's loss comes to him from his
 gain,
 "Darkness from light, from knowledge
 ignorance,
 "And lack of love from love made manifest;
 "A lamp's death when, replete with oil, it chokes;
 "A stomach's when, surcharged with food,
 it starves.
 "With ignorance was surety of a cure.
 "When man, appalled at nature, questioned
 first
 "What if there lurk a might behind this might?
 "He needed satisfaction God could give,
 "And did give, as ye have the written word:
 "But when he finds might still redouble might,
 "Yet asks, 'Since all is might, what use of will?'
 "—Will, the one source of might,—he being
 man.

"With a man's will and a man's might, to teach
In little how the two combine in large,—

"That man has turned round on himself and
stands,

"Which in the course of nature is, to die.

"And when man questioned, 'What if there be love

"'Behind the will and might,—as real as they?'—

"He needed satisfaction God could give,

"And did give, as ye have the written word :

"But when, beholding that love everywhere,

"He reasons, 'Since such love is everywhere,

"'And since ourselves can love and would be loved,

"'We ourselves make the love, and Christ was not,—

"How shall ye help this man who knows
himself,

"That he must love and would be loved
again,

"Yet, owning his own love that proveth
Christ,

"Rejecteth Christ through very need of Him?

"The lamp o'erswims with oil, the stomach

"Loaded with nurture, and that man's soul
dies.

"If he rejoice, 'But this was all the while

"'A trick ; the fault was, first of all, in thee,

"'Thy story of the places, names and dates,

"'Where, when and how the ultimate truth had rise,

"'—Thy prior truth, at last discovered none,

"'Whence now the second suffers detriment.

"'What good of giving knowledge if,
because

"'O' the manner of the gift, its profit fall?

"'And why refuse what modicum of help

"'Had stopped the after-doubt, impossible

"'I the face of truth—truth absolute, uniform?

"'Why must I hit of this and miss of that,

"'Distinguish just as I be weak or strong,

"'And not ask of thee and have answer
prompt,

"'Was this once, was it not once?—then
and now

"'And evermore, plain truth from man to
man.

"'Is John's procedure just the heathen bard's?

"'Put question of his famous play again

"'How for the ephemerals' sake, Jove's fire was filched,

"'And carried in a cane and brought to
earth :

"'The fact is in the fable, cry the wise,

"'Mortals obtained the boon, so much is fact,

"'Though fire be spirit and produced on earth.

"'As with the Titan's, so now with thy tale :

"'Why breed in us perplexity, mistake,

"'Nor tell the whole truth in the proper
words?"

"I answer, Have ye yet to argue out

"The very primal thesis, plainest law,

"—Man is not God but hath God's end to
serve,

"A master to obey, a course to take,

"Somewhat to cast off, somewhat to become?

"Grant this, then man must pass from old to new,

"From vain to real, from mistake to fact,

"From what once seemed good, to what now proves best.

"How could man have progression otherwise?

"Before the point was mooted 'What is
God?'

"No savage man inquired 'What am
myself?'

"Much less replied, 'First, last, and best of things.'

"Man takes that title now if he believes

"Might can exist with neither will nor love,

"In God's case—what he names now Nature's Law—

"While in himself he recognizes love :

"No less than might and will : and rightly takes.

"Since if man prove the sole existent thing

"Where these combine, whatever their degree.

- 'However weak the might or will or love,
 'So they be found there, put in evidence,—
 'He is as surely higher in the scale
 'Than any might with neither love nor will,
 'As life, apparent in the poorest midge,
 ' (When the faint dust-speck flits, ye guess
 'Its wing?)
 'Is marvellous beyond dead Atlas' self—
 'Given to the nobler midge for resting-
 'place!
 'Thus, man proves best and highest—God,
 'in fine,
 'And thus the victory leads but to defeat,
 'The gain to loss, best rise to the worst fall,
 'His life becomes impossible, which is
 'death.
- 'But if, appealing thence, he cower, avouch
 'He is mere man, and in humility
 'Neither may know God nor mistake
 'himself;
 'I point to the immediate consequence
 'And say, by such confession straight he
 'falls
 'Into man's place, a thing nor God nor 'beast,
 'Made to know that he can know and not
 'more:
 'Lower than God who knows all and can all,
 'Higher than beasts which know and can
 'so far
 'As each beast's limit, perfect to an end,
 'Nor conscious that they know, nor craving
 'more;
 'While man knows partly but conceives
 'beside,
 'Creeps ever on from fancies to the fact,
 'And in this striving, this converting air
 'Into a solid he may grasp and use,
 'Finds progress, man's distinctive mark
 'alone,
 'Not God's, and not the beasts': God is,
 'they are,
 'Man partly is and wholly hopes to be.
 'Such progress could no more attend his
 'soul
 'Were all it struggles after found at first
 'And guesses changed to knowledge absolute,
- "Than motion wait his body, were all else
 "Than it the solid earth on every side,
 "Where now through space he moves from
 'rest to rest.
 "Man, therefore, thus conditioned, must 'expect
 "He could not, what he knows now, know
 'at first;
 "What he considers that he knows to-day,
 "Come but to-morrow, he will find mis-
 'known;
 "Getting increase of knowledge, since he
 'learns
 "Because he lives, which is to be a man,
 "Set to instruct himself by his past self:
 "First, like the brute, obliged by facts to
 'learn,
 "Next, as man may, obliged by his own mind,
 "Bent, habit, nature, knowledge turned to
 'law.
 "God's gift was that man should conceive of
 'truth
 "And yearn to gain it, catching at mistake,
 "As midway help till he reach fact indeed.
 "The statuary ere he mould a shape
 "Boasts a like gift, the shape's idea, and next
 "The aspiration to produce the same;
 "So, taking clay, he calls his shape thereout,
 "Cries ever 'Now I have the thing I see':
 "Yet all the while goes changing what was
 'wrought,
 "From falsehood like the truth, to truth it-
 'self.
 "How were it had he cried 'I see no face,
 "'No breast, no feet?' the ineffectual clay'?
 "Rather commend him that he clapped his
 'hands,
 "And laughed: 'It is my shape and lives
 'again!
 "Enjoyed the falsehood, touched it on to
 'truth,
 "Until yourselves applaud the flesh indeed
 "In what is still flesh-imitating clay.
 "Right in you, right in him, such way be 'man's!
 "God only makes the live shape at a jet.
 "Will ye renounce this pact of creatureship?
 "The pattern on the Mount subsists no more.

"Seemed awhile, then returned to nothing-
ness ;

"But copies, Moses strove to make thereby,

"Serve still and are replaced as time requires :

"By these, make newest vessels, reach the type !

"If ye demur, this judgment on your head,

"Never to reach the ultimate, angels' law,

"Indulging every instinct of the soul

"There where law, life, joy, impulse are one thing !

"Such is the burthen of the latest time.

"I have survived to hear it with my ears,

"Answer it with my lips : does this suffice ?

"For if there be a further woe than such,

"Wherein my brothers struggling need a
hand,

"So long as any pulse is left in mine,

"May I be absent even longer yet,

"Plucking the blind ones back from the
abyss,

"Though I should tarry a new hundred years !"

But he was dead ; 'twas about noon, the day
Somewhat declining : we five buried him
That eve, and then, dividing, went five ways,
And I, disguised, returned to Ephesus.

By this, the cave's mouth must be filled with sand.

Valens is lost, I know not of his trace ;

The Bactrian was but a wild childish man,

And could not write nor speak, but only
loved :

So, lest the memory of this go quite,

Seeing that I to-morrow fight the beasts,

I tell the same to Phœbas, whom believe !

For many look again to find that face,

Beloved John's to whom I ministered,

Somewhere in life about the world ; they err :

Either mistaking what was darkly spoke

At ending of his book, as he relates,

Or misconceiving somewhat of this speech

Scattered from mouth to mouth, as I suppose.

Believe ye will not see him any more

About the world with his divine regard !

VOL. I.

For all was as I say, and now the man
Lies as he lay once, breast to breast with God.

[Cerinthus read and mused ; one added this :

"If Christ, as thou affirmest, be of men

"Mere man, the first and best but nothing
more,—

"Account Him, for reward of what He was,

"Now and for ever, wretchedest of all.

"For see ; Himself conceived of life as love,

"Conceived of love as what must enter in,

"Fill up, make one with His each soul He
loved :

"Thus much for man's joy, all men's joy for
Him.

"Well, He is gone, thou sayest, to fit reward.

"But by this time are many souls set free,

"And very many still retained alive :

"Nay, should His coming be delayed awhile,

"Say, ten years longer (twelve years, some compute)

"See if, for every finger of thy hands,

"There be not found, that day the world
shall end,

"Hundreds of souls, each holding by Christ's
word

"That He will grow incorporate with all,

"With me as Pamphylax, with him as John,

"Groom for each bride ! Can a mere man do this ?

"Yet Christ saith, this He lived and died to do.

"Call Christ, then, the illimitable God,

"Or lost !"

But 'twas Cerinthus that is lost.]

CALIBAN UPON SETEBOS ; OR, NATURAL THEOLOGY IN THE ISLAND.

"Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself."

[WILL sprawl, now that the heat of day is
best,

Flat on his belly in the pit's much mire,

With elbows wide, fists clenched to prop his chin,

And, while he kicks both feet in the cool slush,
And feels about his spine small eft-things
course,

Run in and out each arm, and make him laugh :
And while above his head a pompion-plant,
Coating the cave-top as a brow its eye,
Creeps down to touch and tickle hair and beard,
And now a flower drops with a bee inside,
And now a fruit to snap at, catch and crunch,—
He looks out o'er yon sea which sunbeams
cross

And recross till they weave a spider-web (Meshes of fire, some great fish breaks at times)

And talks to his own self, howe'er he please,
Touching that other, whom his dām called
God.

Because to talk about Him, vexes—ha,
Could He but know ! and time to vex is now,
When talk is safer than in winter-time.
Moreover Prosper and Miranda sleep
In confidence he drudges at their task,
And it is good to cheat the pair, and gibe,
Letting the rank tongue blossom into speech.]

Setebos, Setebos, and Setebos !

'Thinketh, He dwelleth i' the cold o' the moon.

'Thinketh He made it, with the sun to match,
But not the stars ; the stars came otherwise ;
Only made clouds, winds, meteors, such as
that :

Also this isle, what lives and grows thereon,
And snaky sea which rounds and ends the

'Thinketh, it came of being ill at ease :
He hated that He cannot change His cold,
Nor cure its ache. 'Hath spied an icy fish
That longed to 'scape the rock-stream where she lived,

And thaw herself within the lukewarm brine
O' the lazy sea her stream thrusts far amid,
A crystal spike 'twixt two warm walls of wave ;
Only, she ever sickened, found repulse

At the other kind of water, not her life, (Green-dense and dim-delicious, bred o' the sun)

Flounced back from bliss she was not born to breathe,

And in her old bounds buried her despair,
Hating and loving warmth alike ; so He,

'Thinketh, He made thereat the sun, this isle,
Trees and the fowls here, beast and creeping
thing.

Yon otter, sleek-wet, black, lithe as a leech ;
Yon auk, one fire-eye in a ball of foam,
That floats and feeds ; a certain badger brown
He hath watched hunt with that slant white-wedge eye

By moonlight ; and the pie with the long tongue

That pricks deep into oakwards for a worm,
And says a plain word when she finds her
prize,

But will not eat the ants ; the ants themselves
That build a wall of seeds and settled stalks
About their hole—He made all these and
more,

Made all we see, and us, in spite : how else ?
He could not, Himself, make a second self
To be His mate ; as well have made Himself:
He would not make what he mislikes or slights,

An eyesore to Him, or not worth His pains :
But did, in envy, listlessness or sport,
Make what Himself would fain, in a manner,
be—

Weaker in most points, stronger in a few,
Worthy, and yet mere playthings all the
while,
Things He admires and mocks too,—that
is it.

Because, so brave, so better though they be,
It nothing skills if He begin to plague.
Look now, I melt a gourd-fruit into mash,
Add honeycomb and pods, I have perceived,
Which bite like finches when they bill and kiss,—

Then, when froth rises bladdery, drink up all,
Quick, quick, till maggots scamper through my brain ;

Last, throw me on my back i' the seeded thyme,

And wanton, wishing I were born a bird.
Put case, unable to be what I wish,
I yet could make a live bird out of clay :
Would not I take clay, pinch my Caliban
Able to fly?—for, there, see, he hath wings,
And great comb like the hoopoe's to admire,
And there, a sting to do his foes offence,
There, and I will that he begin to live,
Fly to yon rock-top, nip me off the horns
Of grigs high up that make the merry din, Saucy through their veined wings, and mind
me not.

In which feat, if his leg snapped, brittle clay,
And he lay stupid-like,—why, I should laugh ;
And if he, spying me, should fall to weep,
Beseech me to be good, repair his wrong,
Bid his poor leg smart less or grow again,—
Well, as the chance were, this might take or else

Not take my fancy : I might hear his cry,
And give the mankin three sound legs for
one,

Or pluck the other off, leave him like an egg,
And lessoned he was mine and merely clay.

Were this no pleasure, lying in the thyme,
Drinking the mash, with brain become alive,
Making and marring clay at will? So He.

'Thinketh, such shows nor right nor wrong
in Him,

Nor kind, nor cruel : He is strong and Lord.
'Am strong myself compared to yonder crabs
That march now from the mountain to the sea ;
'Let twenty pass, and stone the twenty-first,
Loving not, hating not, just choosing so.

'Say, the first straggler that boasts purple spots

Shall join the file, one pincer twisted off ;
'Say, this bruised fellow shall receive a worm,
And two worms he whose nippers end in red ;
As it likes me each time, I do : so He.

Well then, 'supposeth He is good i' the main,
Placable if His mind and ways were guessed,
But rougher than His handiwork, be sure !

Oh, He hath made things worthier than Himself,

And envieth that, so helped, such things do
more

Than He who made them ! What consoles but this?

That they, unless through Him, do nought
at all,

And must submit : what other use in things ?
'Hath cut a pipe of pithless elder-joint

That, blown through, gives exact the scream
o' the jay

When from her wing you twitch the feathers
blue :

Sound this, and little birds that hate the jay Flock within stone's throw, glad their foe is hurt :

Put case such pipe could prattle and boast
forsooth

"I catch the birds, I am the crafty thing,

"I make the cry my maker cannot make

"With his great round mouth ; he must blow through mine !"

Would not I smash it with my foot? So He.

But wherefore rough, why cold and ill at ease?

Aha, that is a question ! Ask, for that,
What knows,—the something over Setebos
That made Him, or He, may be, found and fought,

Worsted, drove off and did to nothing, per-
chance.

There may be something quiet o'er His head,
Out of His reach, that feels nor joy nor grief,
Since both derive from weakness in some way.
I joy because the quails come ; would not joy Could I bring quails here when I have a
mind :

This Quiet, all it hath a mind to, doth.

'Esteemeth stars the outposts of its couch,
But never spends much thought nor care that
way.

It may look up, work up,—the worse for those
It works on ! 'Careth but for Setebos

The many-handed as a cuttle-fish,
Who, making Himself feared through what
He does,

Looks up, first, and perceives he cannot soar
To what is quiet and hath happy life ;
Next looks down here, and out of very spite
Makes this a bauble-world to ape yon real,
These good things to match those as hips do grapes.

'Tis solace making baubles, ay, and sport.
Himself peeped late, eyed Prosper at his books

Careless and lofty, lord now of the isle :
Vexed, 'stitched a book of broad leaves,
arrow-shaped,

Wrote thereon, he knows what, prodigious
words ;

Has peeled a wand and called it by a name ;
Weareth at whiles for an enchanter's robe
The eyed skin of a supple oncelot ;

And hath an ounce sleeker than youngling
mole,

A four-legged serpent he makes cower and
couch,

Now snarl, now hold its breath and mind
his eye,

And saith she is Miranda and my wife :

'Keeps for his Ariel a tall pouch-bill crane
He bids go wade for fish and straight disgorge ;

Also a sea-beast, lumpish, which he snared,
Blinded the eyes of, and brought somewhat tame,

And split its toe-webs, and now pens the drudge

In a hole o' the rock and calls him Caliban ;
A bitter heart that bides its time and bites.

'Plays thus at being Prosper in a way,
Taket h his mirth with make-believes : so He.

His dam held that the Quiet made all things
Which Setebos vexed only : 'holds not so.

Who made them weak, meant weakness He might vex.

Had He meant other, while His hand was in,
Why not make horny eyes no thorn could
prick,

Or plate my scalp with bone against the snow,
Or overscale my flesh 'neath joint and joint,
Like an orc's armour? Ay, —so spoil His sport!
He is the One now : only He doth all.

'Saith, He may like, perchance, what profits
Him.

Ay, himself loves what does him good ; but
why?

'Gets good no otherwise. This blinded beast
Loves whoso places flesh-meat on his nose,
But, had he eyes, would want no help, but hate

Or love, just as it liked him : He hath eyes.
Also it pleaseth Setebos to work,
Use all His hands, and exercise much craft,
By no means for the love of what is worked.

'Tasteth, himself, no finer good i' the world
When all goes right, in this safe summer-time,
And he wants little, hungers, aches not much,
Than trying what to do with wit and strength.

'Falls to make something : 'piled yon pile of turfs,

And squared and stuck there squares of soft white chalk,

And, with a fish-tooth, scratched a moon on
each,

And set up endwise certain spikes of tree,
And crowned the whole with a sloth's skull
a-top,

Found dead i' the woods, too hard for one to kill.

No use at all i' the work, for work's sole sake ;
'Shall some day knock it down again : so He.

'Saith He is terrible : watch His feats in proof!

One hurricane will spoil six good months'
hope.

He hath a spite against me, that I know,
Just as He favours Prosper, who knows why?
So it is, all the same, as well I find.

'Wove wattles half the winter, fenced them firm

With stone and stake to stop she-tortoises
Crawling to lay their eggs here : well, one
wave,

Feeling the foot of Him upon its neck, . . .
Gaped as a snake does, lolled out its large
tongue,

And licked the whole labour flat : so much for spite.

'Saw a ball flame down late (yonder it lies)

Where, half an hour before, I slept i' the shade :

Often they scatter sparkles : there is force !

'Dug up a newt He may have envied once
And turned to stone, shut up inside a stone.

Please Him and hinder this ?—What Prosper does ?

Aha, if He would tell me how ! Not He !

There is the sport : discover how or die !

All need not die, for of the things o' the isle
Some flee afar, some dive, some run up trees ;
Those at His mercy,—why, they please Him most

When . . . when . . . well, never try the same way twice !

Repeat what act has pleased, He may grow wroth.

You must not know His ways, and play Him off,

Sure of the issue. 'Doth the like himself :

'Spareth a squirrel that it nothing fears

But steals the nut from underneath my thumb,
And when I threat, bites stoutly in defence :

'Spareth an urchin that contrariwise,
Curls up into a ball, pretending death
For fright at my approach : the two ways please.

But what would move my choler more than this,

That either creature counted on its life
To-morrow and next day and all days to come,
Saying, forsooth, in the inmost of its heart,

"Because he did so yesterday with me,
"And otherwise with such another brute,
"So must he do henceforth and always."—
Ay ?

Would teach the reasoning couple what "must" means !

'Doth as he likes, or wherefore Lord ? So He.

'Conceiveth all things will continue thus,
And we shall have to live in fear of Him
So long as He lives, keeps His strength : no change,

If He have done His best, make no new world

To please Him more, so leave off watching this,—

If He surprise not even the Quiet's self
Some strange day,—or, suppose, grow into :
As grubs grow butterflies : else, here are we,
And there is He, and nowhere help at all.

'Believeth with the life, the pain shall stop.
His dam held different, that after death
He both plagued enemies and feasted friends
Idly ! He doth His worst in this our life,
Giving just respite lest we die through pain,
Saving last pain for worst,—with which, an end.

Meanwhile, the best way to escape His ire
Is, not to seem too happy. 'Sees, himself,
Yonder two flies, with purple films and pink,
Bask on the pompion-bell above : kills both.
'Sees two black painful beetles roll their ball
On head and tail as if to save their lives :
Moves them the stick away they strive to clear.

Even so, 'would have Him misconceive,
suppose

This Caliban strives hard and ails no less,
And always, above all else, envies Him ;
Wherefore he mainly dances on dark nights,
Moans in the sun, gets under holes to laugh,
And never speaks his mind save housed as now :

Outside, 'groans, curses. If He caught me here, O'erheard this speech, and asked "What chucklest at ?"

'Would, to appease Him, cut a finger off,
Or of my three kid yearlings burn the best,
Or let the toothsome apples rot on tree,
Or push my tame beast for the orc to taste :
While myself lit a fire, and made a song
And sung it, "*What I hate, be consecrate
"To celebrate Thee and Thy state, no mate :
"For Thee ; what see for envy in poor me ?*"

Hoping the while, since evils sometimes mend,

Warts rub away and sores are cured with slime,

That some strange day, will either the Quiet catch

And conquer Setebos, or likelier He Decrépit may doze, doze, as good as die.

[What, what? A curtain o'er the world at
once!

Crickets stop hissing; not a bird—or, yes,
There scuds His raven that has told Him all!
It was fool's play, this prattling! Ha! The wind

Shoulders the pillared dust, death's house o'
the move,

And fast invading fires begin! White
blaze—

A tree's head snaps—and there, there, there,
there, there,

His thunder follows! Fool to gibe at Him!
Lo! 'Lieth flat and loveth Setebos!

'Maketh his teeth meet through his upper lip,
Will let those quails fly, will not eat this month
One little mess of whelks, so he may 'scape!]

CONFESSIONS.

WHAT is he buzzing in my ears?

"Now that I come to die,

"Do I view the world as a vale of tears?"

Ah, reverend sir, not I!

II.

What I viewed there once, what I view again

Where the physic bottles stand

On the table's edge,—is a suburb lane,

With a wall to my bedside hand.

III.

That lane sloped, much as the bottles do,

From a house you could descry

O'er the garden-wall: is the curtain blue

Or green to a healthy eye?

To mine, it serves for the old June weather

Blue above lane and wall;

And that farthest bottle labelled "Ether":

Is the house o'ertopping all.

At a terrace, somewhere near the stopper,

There watched for me, one June,

A girl: I know, sir, it's improper,

My poor mind's out of tune.

Only, there was a way . . . you crept

Close by the side, to dodge

Eyes in the house, two eyes except:

They styled their house "The Lodge."

VII.

What right had a lounge up their lane?

But, by creeping very close,

With the good wall's help,—their eyes might strain

And stretch themselves to Oes,

Yet never catch her and me together,

As she left the attic, there,

By the rim of the bottle labelled "Ether,"

And stole from stair to stair,

IX.

And stood by the rose-wreathed gate.

Alas,

We loved, sir—used to meet:

How sad and bad and mad it was—

But then, how it was sweet!

MAY AND DEATH.

I.

I WISH that when you died last May,

Charles, there had died along with you

Three parts of spring's delightful things;

Ay, and, for me, the fourth part too,

A foolish thought, and worse, perhaps!

There must be many a pair of friends

Who, arm in arm, deserve the warm

Moon-births and the long evening ends.

III.

So, for their sake, be May still May !
Let their new time, as mine of old,
Do all it did for me : I bid
Sweet sights and sounds throng manifold.

IV.

Only, one little sight, one plant,
Woods have in May, that starts up green
Save a sole streak which, so to speak,
Is spring's blood, spilt its leaves between,—

That, they might spare ; a certain wood
Might miss the plant ; their loss were small :
But I,—where'er the leaf grows there,
Its drop comes from my heart, that's all.

DEAF AND DUMB.

A GROUP BY WOOLNER.

ONLY the prism's obstruction shows aright
The secret of a sunbeam, breaks its light
Into the jewelled bow from blankest white ;
So may a glory from defect arise :
Only by Deafness may the vexed Love wreak
Its insuppressive sense on brow and cheek,
Only by Dumbness adequately speak
As favoured mouth could never, through the eyes.

PROSPICE.

FEAR death?—to feel the fog in my throat,
The mist in my face,
When the snows begin, and the blasts denote
I am nearing the place,
The power of the night, the press of the storm,
The post of the foe ;
Where he stands, the Arch Fear in a visible
form,
Yet the strong man must go :
For the journey is done and the summit attained,
And the barriers fall,

Though a battle's to fight ere the guerdon be gained,

The reward of it all.

I was ever a fighter, so—
The best and the last !

I would hate that death bandaged my eyes,
and forbore,

And bade me creep past.

No ! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers

The heroes of old,

Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears
Of pain, darkness and cold.

For sudden the worst turns the best to the brave,
The black minute's at end,

And the elements' rage, the fiend-voices that rave,

Shall dwindle, shall blend,

Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,

Then a light, then thy breast,

O thou soul of my soul ! I shall clasp thee
again,

And with God be the rest !

EURYDICE TO ORPHEUS.

A PICTURE BY LEIGHTON.

BUT give them me, the mouth, the eyes, the
brow !

Let them once more absorb me ! One look now
Will lap me round for ever, not to pass.

Out of its light, though darkness lie beyond—
Hold me but safe again within the bond

Of one immortal look ! All woe that was,
Forgotten, and all terror that may be,

Defied,—no past is mine, no future : look at
me !

YOUTH AND ART.

I.

It once might have been, once only :

We lodged in a street together,

You, a sparrow on the housetop lonely,

I, a lone she-bird of his feather.

II.

Your trade was with sticks and clay,
 You thumbed, thrust, patted and polished,
 Then laughed "They will see some day
 "Smith made, and Gibson demolished."

Why did not you pinch a flower
 In a pellet of clay and fling it?
 Why did not I put a power
 Of thanks in a look, or sing it?

III.

My business was song, song, song;
 I chirped, cheeped, trilled and twittered,
 "Kate Brown's on the boards ere long,
 "And Grisi's existence embittered!"

I did look, sharp as a lynx,
 (And yet the memory rankles)
 When models arrived, some minx
 Tripped up-stairs, she and her ankles.

IV.

I earned no more by a warble
 Than you by a sketch in plaster;
 You wanted a piece of marble,
 I needed a music-master.

But I think I gave you as good!
 "That foreign fellow,—who can know
 "How she pays, in a playful mood,
 "For his tuning her that piano?"

XIII.

We studied hard in our styles,
 Chipped each at a crust like Hindoos,
 For air looked out on the tiles,
 For fun watched each other's windows.

Could you say so, and never say
 "Suppose we join hands and fortunes,
 "And I fetch her from over the way.
 "Her, piano, and long tunes and short tunes?"

VI.

You lounged, like a boy of the South,
 Cap and blouse—nay, a bit of beard too;
 Or you got it, rubbing your mouth
 With fingers the clay adhered to.

No, no: you would not be rash,
 Nor I rasher and something over:
 You've to settle yet Gibson's hash,
 And Grisi yet lives in clover.

XV.

And I—soon managed to find
 Weak points in the flower-fence facing,
 Was forced to put up a blind
 And be safe in my corset-lacing.

But you meet the Prince at the Board,
 I'm queen myself at bals-paré,
 I've married a rich old lord,
 And you're dubbed knight and an R.A.

VIII.

No harm! It was not my fault
 If you never turned your eye's tail up
 As I shook upon E in alt,
 Or ran the chromatic scale up:

Each life unfulfilled, you see;
 It hangs still, patchy and scrappy:
 We have not sighed deep, laughed free,
 Starved, feasted, despaired,—been happy.

IX.

For spring bade the sparrows pair,
 And the boys and girls gave guesses,
 And stalls in our street looked rare
 With bulrush and watercresses.

And nobody calls you a dunce,
 And people suppose me clever:
 This could but have happened once,
 And we missed it, lost it for ever.

A FACE.

If one could have that little head of hers
Painted upon a background of pale gold,
Such as the Tuscan's early art prefers!

No shade encroaching on the matchless mould

Of those two lips, which should be opening soft

In the pure profile; not as when she laughs,
For that spoils all: but rather as if aloft

Yon hyacinth, she loves so, leaned its staff's

Burthen of honey-coloured buds to kiss
And capture 'twixt the lips apart for this.

Then her lithe neck, three fingers might sur-
round,

How it should waver on the pale gold ground
Up to the fruit-shaped, perfect chin it lifts!

I know, Correggio loves to mass, in rifts
Of heaven, his angel faces, orb on orb

Breaking its outline, burning shades absorb:
But these are only massed there, I should

think,
Waiting to see some wonder momentarily

Grow out, stand full, fade slow against the sky

(That's the pale ground you'd see this sweet face by),

All heaven, meanwhile, condensed into one eye

Which fears to lose the wonder, should it wink.

A LIKENESS.

SOME people hang portraits up
In a room where they dine or sup:

And the wife clinks tea-things under,
And her cousin, he stirs his cup,

Asks, "Who was the lady, I wonder?"

"'Tis a daub John bought at a sale,"

Quoth the wife,—looks black as thunder:

"What a shade beneath her nose!

"Snuff-taking, I suppose,—"

Adds the cousin, while John's corns ail.

Or else, there's no wife in the case,
But the portrait's queen of the place,
Alone 'mid the other spoils

Of youth,—masks, gloves and foils,
And pipe-sticks, rose, cherry-tree, jasmine,

And the long whip, the tandem-lasher,
And the cast from a fist ("not, alas!
mine,

"But my master's, the Tipton Slasher"),
And the cards where pistol-balls mark ace,

And a satin shoe used for cigar-case,
And the chamois-horns ("shot in the Chablais")

And prints—Rarey drumming on Cruiser,
And Sayers, our champion, the bruiser,

And the little edition of Rabelais:
Where a friend, with both hands in his pockets,

May saunter up close to examine it,

And remark a good deal of Jane Lamb
in it,

"But the eyes are half out of their sockets;
"That hair's not so bad, where the gloss is,

"But they've made the girl's nose a pro-boscis:

"Jane Lamb, that we danced with at Vichy!
"What, is not she Jane? Then, who is she?"

All that I own is a print,

An etching, a mezzotint;

'Tis a study, a fancy, a fiction,

Yet a fact (take my conviction)

Because it has more than a hint

Of a certain face, I never Saw elsewhere touch or trace of

In women I've seen the face of:

Just an etching, and, so far, clever.

I keep my prints, an imbroglio,

Fifty in one portfolio.

When somebody tries my claret,

We turn round chairs to the fire,

Chirp over days in a garret,

Chuckle o'er increase of salary,

Taste the good fruits of our leisure,

Talk about pencil and lyre,

And the National Portrait Gallery;

Then I exhibit my treasure.

After we've turned over twenty,
 And the debt of wonder my crony owes
 Is paid to my Marc Antonios,¹
 He stops me—" Festina lente!
 "What's that sweet thing there, the etching?"
 How my waistcoat-strings want stretching,
 How my cheeks grow red as tomatos,
 How my heart leaps! But hearts, after leaps, ache.

"By the by, you must take, for a keepsake,
 "That other, you praised, of Volpato's."¹
 The fool! would he try a flight further and
 say—
 He never saw, never before to-day,
 What was able to take his breath away,
 A face to lose youth for, to occupy age
 With the dream of, meet death with,—why,
 I'll not engage
 But that, half in a rapture and half in a rage,
 I should toss him the thing's self—" 'Tis only a duplicate,
 "A thing of no value! Take it, I supplicate!"

MR. SLUDGE, "THE MEDIUM."

Now, don't, sir! Don't expose me! Just this once!
 This was the first and only time, I'll swear,—
 Look at me,—see, I kneel,—the only time,
 I swear, I ever cheated,—yes, by the soul
 Of Her who hears—(your sainted mother,
 sir!)
 All, except this last accident, was truth—
 This little kind of slip!—and even this,
 It was your own wine, sir, the good champagne,
 (I took it for Catawba, you're so kind)
 Which put the folly in my head!

"Get up?"
 You still inflict on me that terrible face?
 You show no mercy?—Not for Her dear sake,
 The sainted spirit's, whose soft breath even
 now

¹ Engravers, held in repute by collectors.

Blows on my cheek—(don't you feel something, sir?)
 You'll tell?

Go tell, then! Who the devil cares
 What such a rowdy chooses to . . .
 Aie—aie—aie!
 Please, sir! your thumbs are through my windpipe, sir!
 Ch—ch!

Well, sir, I hope you've done it now!
 Oh Lord! I little thought, sir, yesterday,
 When your departed mother spoke those
 words
 Of peace through me, and moved you, sir,
 so much,
 You gave me—(very kind it was of you)
 These shirt-studs—(better take them back
 again,
 Please, sir)—yes, little did I think so soon
 A trifle of trick, all through a glass too much Of his own champagne, would change my best of friends
 Into an angry gentleman!

Though, 'twas wrong.
 I don't contest the point; your anger's just:
 Whatever put such folly in my head,
 I know 'twas wicked of me. There's a thick
 Dusk undeveloped spirit (I've observed)
 Owes me a grudge—a negro's, I should say,
 Or else an Irish emigrant's; yourself
 Explained the case so well last Sunday, sir,
 When we had summoned Franklin to clear up
 A point about those shares i' the telegraph:
 Ay, and he swore . . . or might it be Tom Paine? . . .
 Thumping the table close by where I crouched,
 He'd do me soon a mischief: that's come
 true!
 Why, now your face clears! I was sure it would!
 Then, this one time . . . don't take your hand away,
 Through yours I surely kiss your mother's
 hand . . .
 You'll promise to forgive me?—or, at least,

Tell nobody of this? Consider, sir!
 What harm can mercy do? Would but the shade
 Of the venerable dead-one just vouchsafe
 A rap or tip! What bit of paper's here?
 Suppose we take a pencil, let her write,
 Make the least sign, she urges on her child Forgiveness? There now! Eh? Oh! 'Twas your foot,
 And not a natural creak, sir?

Answer, then!
 Once, twice, thrice . . . see, I'm waiting to say "thrice!"
 All to no use? No sort of hope for me?
 It's all to post to Greeley's newspaper?

 What? If I told you all about the tricks?
 Upon my soul!—the whole truth, and nought
 else,
 And how there's been some falsehood—for
 your part,
 Will you engage to pay my passage out,
 And hold your tongue until I'm safe on board?
 England's the place, not Boston—no offence!
 I see what makes you hesitate: don't fear!
 I mean to change my trade and cheat no more,
 Yes, this time really it's upon my soul!
 Be my salvation!—under Heaven, of course.
 I'll tell some queer things. Sixty Vs must do.
 A trifle, though, to start with! We'll refer
 The question to this table?

How you're changed!
 Then split the difference; thirty more, we'll
 say.
 Ay, but you leave my presents! Else I'll swear
 'Twas all through those: you wanted yours
 again,
 So, picked a quarrel with me, to get them
 back!
 Tread on a worm, it turns, sir! If I turn,
 Your fault! 'Tis you'll have forced me!
 Who's obliged
 To give up life yet try no self-defence?
 At all events, I'll run the risk. Eh?

Done!
 May I sit, sir? This dear old table, now!
 Please, sir, a parting egg-nogg and cigar!
 I've been so happy with you! Nice stuffed chairs,
 And sympathetic sideboards; what an end
 To all the instructive evenings! (It's alright.)
 Well, nothing lasts, as Bacon came and said.
 Here goes,—but keep your temper, or I'll scream!

Fol-lol-the-rido-liddle-liddle-ol!
 You see, sir, it's your own fault more than
 mine;
 It's all your fault, you curious gentlefolk!
 You're prigs,—excuse me,—like to look so spry,
 So clever, while you cling by half a claw
 To the perch whereon you puff yourselves at roost,
 Such piece of self-conceit as serves for perch
 Because you chose it, so it must be safe.
 Oh, otherwise you're sharp enough! You spy
 Who slips, who slides, who holds by help of wing,
 Wanting real foothold,—who can't keep upright
 On the other perch, your neighbour chose,
 not you:
 There's no outwitting you respecting him!
 For instance, men love money—that, you
 know
 And what men do to gain it: well, suppose
 A poor lad, say a help's son in your house,
 Listening at keyholes, hears the company
 Talk grand of dollars, V-notes, and so forth,
 How hard they are to get, how good to hold,
 How much they buy,—if, suddenly, in pops
 he—
 "I've got a V-note!"—what do you say to
 him?
 What's your first word which follows your last kick?
 "Where did you steal it, rascal?" That's because
 He finds you, fain would fool you, off your perch,

Not on the special piece of nonsense, sir,
 Elected your parade-ground : let him try
 Lies to the end of the list,—“ He picked it up, “ His cousin died and left it him by will,
 “ The President flung it to him, riding by,
 “ An actress trucked it for a curl of his hair,
 “ He dreamed of luck and found his shoe enriched,
 “ He dug up clay, and out of clay made
 gold ”—

How would you treat such possibilities?
 Would not you, prompt, investigate the case
 With cow-hide? “ Lies, lies, lies,” you’d shout : and why?

Which of the stories might not prove mere
 truth?

This last, perhaps, that clay was turned to coin!

Let’s see, now, give him me to speak for him!
 How many of your rare philosophers,
 In plaguy books I’ve had to dip into,
 Believed gold could be made thus, saw it
 made

And made it? Oh, with such philosophers You’re on your best behaviour! While the lad—

With him, in a trice, you settle likelihoods,
 Nor doubt a moment how he got his prize :
 In his case, you hear, judge and execute,
 All in a breath : so would most men of sense.

But let the same lad hear you talk as grand
 At the same keyhole, you and company,
 Of signs and wonders, the invisible world ;
 How wisdom scouts our vulgar unbelief
 More than our vulgarest credulity ;
 How good men have desired to see a ghost,
 What Johnson used to say, what Wesley did,
 Mother Goose thought, and fiddle-diddle-dee :—

If he break in with, “ Sir, I saw a ghost!”
 Ah, the ways change! He finds you perched and prim ;

It’s a conceit of yours that ghosts may be :
 There’s no talk now of cow-hide. “ Tell it
 out!

“ Don’t fear us! Take your time and recollect!

“ Sit down first : try a glass of wine, my boy!

“ And, David, (is not that your Christian
 name?)

“ Of all things, should this happen twice—
 it may—

“ Be sure, while fresh in mind, you let us
 know!”

Does the boy blunder, blurt out this, blab that,
 Break down in the other, as beginners will?
 All’s candour, all’s considerateness — “ No
 haste!

“ Pause and collect yourself! We understand!

“ That’s the bad memory, or the natural shock,
 “ Or the unexplained phenomena!”

Egad,

The boy takes heart of grace ; finds, never
 fear,

The readiest way to ope your own heart wide.
 Show—what I call your peacock-perch, pet post

To strut, and spread the tail, and squawk upon!
 “ Just as you thought, much as you might expect!

“ There be more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,” . . .

And so on. Shall not David take the hint,
 Grow bolder, stroke you down at quickened rate?

If he ruffle a feather, it’s “ Gently, patiently!
 “ Manifestations are so weak at first!

“ Doubting, moreover, kills them, cuts all
 short,

“ Cures with a vengeance!”

There, sir, that’s your style!

You and your boy—such pains bestowed on
 him,

Or any headpiece of the average worth,
 To teach, say, Greek, would perfect him apace,
 Make him a Person (“ Porson?” thank you,
 sir!)

Much more, proficient in the art of lies.
 You never leave the lesson! Fire a light,
 Catch you permitting it to die! You’ve friends;
 There’s no withholding knowledge,—least from those

Apt to look elsewhere for their souls' supply :
 Why should not you parade your lawful prize?
 Who finds a picture, digs a medal up,
 Hits on a first edition,—he henceforth Gives it his name, grows notable : how much
 more,
 Who ferrets out a "medium"? "David's
 yours,
 "You highly-favoured man? Then, pity souls
 "Less privileged! Allow us share your luck!"
 So, David holds the circle, rules the roast,
 Narrates the vision, peeps in the glass ball,
 Sets to the spirit-writing, hears the raps,
 As the case may be.

Now mark! To be precise—
 Though I say, "lies" all these, at this first stage,

'Tis just for science' sake : I call such grubs
 By the name of what they'll turn to, dragonflies.
 Strictly, it's what good people style untruth ;
 But yet, so far, not quite the full-grown thing :
 It's fancying, fable-making, nonsense-work—
 What never meant to be so very bad—
 The knack of story-telling, brightening up
 Each dull old bit of fact that drops its shine.
 One does see somewhat when one shuts one's
 eyes,

If only spots and streaks ; tables do tip
 In the oddest way of themselves : and pens,
 good Lord,

Who knows if you drive them or they drive you?
 'Tis but a foot in the water and out again ;
 Not that duck-under which decides your dive.
 Note this, for it's important : listen why.

I'll prove, you push on David till he dives
 And ends the shivering. Here's your circle,
 now :

Two-thirds of them, with heads like you their host,

Turn up their eyes, and cry, as you expect,
 "Lord, who'd have thought it!" But there's always one

Looks wise, compassionately smiles, submits
 "Of your veracity no kind of doubt,

"But—do you feel so certain of that boy's?
 "Really, I wonder! I confess myself

"More chary of my faith!" That's galling,
 sir!

What, he the investigator, he the sage,
 When all's done? Then, you just have shut your eyes,

Opened your mouth, and gulped down David
 whole,

You! Terrible were such catastrophe!
 So, evidence is redoubled, doubled again,
 And doubled besides; once more, "He heard, we heard,

"You and they heard, your mother and your wife,

"Your children and the stranger in your gates :
 "Did they or did they not?" So much for him,
 The black sheep, guest without the wedding-garb,

The doubting Thomas! Now's your turn to crow :

"He's kind to think you such a fool : Sludge cheats?

"Leave you alone to take precautions!"

Straight

The rest join chorus. Thomas stands abashed,
 Sips silent some such beverage as this,
 Considers if it be harder, shutting eyes
 And gulping David in good fellowship,
 Than going elsewhere, getting, in exchange,
 With no egg-nogg to lubricate the food,
 Some just as tough a morsel. Over the way,
 Holds Captain Sparks his court : is it better
 there?

Have not you hunting-stories, scalping-scenes,
 And Mexican War exploits to swallow plump
 If you'd be free o' the stove-side, rocking-chair,
 And trio of affable daughters?

Doubt succumbs!

Victory! All your circle's yours again!
 Out of the clubbing of submissive wits, David's performance rounds, each chink gets
 patched,

Every protrusion of a point's filed fine,
 All's fit to set a-rolling round the world,
 And then return to David finally,
 Lies seven-feet thick about his first half-inch.
 Here's a choice birth o' the supernatural,
 Poor David's pledged to! You've employed no tool

That laws exclaim at, save the devil's own,
Yet screwed him into henceforth gulling you
To the top o' your bent,—all out of one half-lie!

You hold, if there's one half or a hundredth part
Of a lie, that's his fault,—his be the penalty!
I dare say! You'd prove firmer in his place?
You'd find the courage,—that first flurry over,
That mild bit of romancing-work at end,—
To interpose with "It gets serious, this;

"Must stop here. Sir, I saw no ghost at all.
"Inform your friends I made . . . well,
fools of them,

"And found you ready-made. I've lived in clover

"These three weeks: take it out in kicks of me!"

I doubt it. Ask your conscience! Let me
know,

Twelve months hence, with how few em-bellishments

You've told almighty Boston of this passage
Of arms between us, your first taste o' the foil

From Sludge who could not fence, sir!
Sludge, your boy!

I lied, sir,—there! I got up from my gorge
On offal in the gutter, and preferred.

Your canvas-backs: I took their carver's size,
Measured his modicum of intelligence,

Tickled him on the cockles of his heart
With a raven feather, and next week found myself

Sweet and clean, dining daintily, dizen'd
smart,

Set on a stool buttressed by ladies' knees,
Every soft smiler calling me her pet,

Encouraging my story to uncoil
And creep out from its hole, inch after inch,

"How last night, I no sooner snug in bed,
"Tucked up, just as they left me,—than came raps!

"While a light whisked" . . . "Shaped somewhat like a star?"

"Well, like some sort of stars, ma'am."—
"So we thought!

"And any voice? Not yet? Try hard,
next time,

"If you can't hear a voice; we think you
may:

"At least, the Pennsylvanian 'mediums'
did."

Oh, next time comes the voice! "Just as we hoped!"

Are not the hoppers proud now, pleased, profuse

O' the natural acknowledgment?

Of course!

So, off we push, illy-oh-yo, trim the boat,
On we sweep with a cataract ahead,

We're midway to the Horseshoe: stop, who can,

The dance of bubbles gay about our prow!
Experiences become worth waiting for,

Spirits now speak up, tell their inmost mind,
And compliment the "medium" properly,

Concern themselves about his Sunday coat,
See rings on his hand with pleasure. Ask yourself

How you'd receive a course of treats like these!

Why, take the quietest hack and stall him up,
Cram him with corn a month, then out with
him

Among his mates on a bright April morn,
With the turf to tread; see if you find or no
A caper in him, if he bucks or bolts!

Much more a youth whose fancies sprout as rank

As toadstool-clump from melon-bed. 'Tis
soon,

"Sirrah, you spirit, come, go, fetch and carry,
"Read, write, rap, rub-a-dub, and hang yourself!"

I'm spared all further trouble; all's arranged;
Your circle does my business; I may rave

Like an epileptic dervish in the books,
Foam, fling myself flat, rend my clothes to shreds;

No matter: lovers, friends and countrymen
Will lay down spiritual laws, read wrong things right

By the rule o' reverse. If Francis Verulam Styles himself Bacon, spells the name beside

With a y and a z, says he drew breath in York,

MR. SLUDGE, "THE MEDIUM"

Gave up the ghost in Wales when Cromwell reigned,

(As, sir, we somewhat fear he was apt to say,
Before I found the useful book that knows)

Why, what harm's done? The circle smiles apace,

"It was not Bacon, after all, you see!

"We understand; the trick's but natural:

"Such spirits' individuality

"Is hard to put in evidence: they incline

"To gibe and jeer, these undeveloped sorts.

"You see, their world's much like a jail broke loose,

"While this of ours remains shut, bolted, barred,

"With a single window to it. Sludge, our
friend,

"Serves as this window, whether thin or
thick,

"Or stained or stainless; he's the medium-pane

"Through which, to see us and be seen, they peep:

"They crowd each other, hustle for a chance,

"Tread on their neighbour's kibes, play tricks enough!

"Does Bacon, tired of waiting, swerve aside?

"Up in his place jumps Barnum—'I'm your
man,

"'I'll answer you for Bacon!' Try once
more!"

Or else it's—"What's a 'medium'? He's a means,

"Good, bad, indifferent, still the only means

"Spirits can speak by; he may misconceive,

"Stutter and stammer,—he's their Sludge and drudge,

"Take him or leave him; they must hold their peace,

"Or else, put up with having knowledge strained

"To half-expression through his ignorance.

"Suppose, the spirit Beethoven wants to shed

"New music he's brimful of; why, he turns

"The handle of this organ, grinds with Sludge,

"And what he poured in at the mouth o' the mill

"As a Thirty-third Sonata, (fancy now!)

"Comes from the hopper as bran-new Sludge, nought else,

"The Shakers' Hymn in G, with a natural F,

"Or the 'Stars and Stripes' set to consecutive fourths."

Sir, where's the scrape you did not help me
through,

You that are wise? And for the fools, the folk Who came to see,—the guests, (observe that word!)

Pray do you find guests criticize your wine,
Your furniture, your grammar, or your nose?
Then, why your "medium"? What's the difference?

Prove your madeira red-ink and gamboge,—
Your Sludge, a cheat—then, somebody's a goose

For vaunting both as genuine. "Guests!"
Don't fear!

They'll make a wry face, nor too much of that,
And leave you in your glory.

"No, sometimes

"They doubt and say as much!" Ay, doubt they do!

And what's the consequence? "Of course they doubt"—

(You triumph) "that explains the hitch at once!
"Doubt posed our 'medium,' puddled his pure mind;

"He gave them back their rubbish: pitch chaff in,

"Could flour come out o' the honest mill?"
So, prompt

Applaud the faithful: cases flock in point,
"How, when a mocker willed a 'medium'
once

"Should name a spirit James whose name was George,

"'James' cried the 'medium,'—'twas the test of truth!"

In short, a hit proves much, a miss proves more.

Does this convince? The better: does it fail?

Time for the double-shotted broadside, then—

The grand means, last resource. Look black and big!

"You style us idiots, therefore—why stop short?"

"Accomplices in rascality: this we hear

"In our own house, from our invited guest

"Found brave enough to outrage a poor boy

"Exposed by our good faith! Have you been heard?"

"Now, then, hear us; one man's not quite worth twelve.

"You see a cheat? Here's some twelve see an ass:

"Excuse me if I calculate: good day!"

Out slinks the sceptic, all the laughs explode,
Sludge waves his hat in triumph!

Or—he don't.

There's something in real truth (explain who can!)

One casts a wistful eye at, like the horse
Who mopes beneath stuffed hay-racks and won't munch

Because he spies a corn-bag: hang that truth,
It spoils all dainties proffered in its place!
I've felt at times when, cockered, cosseted
And coddled by the aforesaid company,
Bidden enjoy their bullying,—never fear,
But o'er their shoulders spit at the flying man,—
I've felt a child; only, a fractious child
That, dandled soft by nurse, aunt, grandmother,
Who keep him from the kennel, sun and wind,
Good fun and wholesome mud,—enjoyed be sweet,

And comely and superior,—eyes askance
The ragged sons o' the gutter at their game,
Fain would be down with them i' the thick
o' the filth,

Making dirt-pics, laughing free, speaking plain,
And calling granny the grey old cat she is.
I've felt a spite, I say, at you, at them,
I luggings and humbug—gnashed my teeth to mark

A decent dog pass! It's too bad, I say,
Ruining a soul so!

But what's "so," what's fixed,
Where may one stop? Nowhere! The cheating's nursed
Out of the lying, softly and surely spun

To just your length, sir! I'd stop soon enough:
But you're for progress. "All old, nothing new?"

"Only the usual talking through the mouth,

"Or writing by the hand? I own, I thought

"This would develop, grow demonstrable,

"Make doubt absurd, give figures we might see,

"Flowers we might touch. There's no one doubts you, Sludge!

"You dream the dreams, you see the spiritual sights,

"The speeches come in your head, beyond dispute.

"Still, for the sceptics' sake, to stop all mouths,

"We want some outward manifestation!—well,

"The Pennsylvanians gained such; why not Sludge?

"He may improve with time!"

Ay, that he may!

He sees his lot: there's no avoiding fate.

'Tis a trifle at first. "Eh, David? Did you hear?"

"You joggled the table, your foot caused the squeak,

"This time you're . . . joking, are you not, my boy?"

"N-n-no!"—and I'm done for, bought and sold henceforth.

The old good easy jog-trot way, the . . . eh?
The . . . not so very false, as falsehood goes,
The spinning out and drawing fine, you know,—

Really mere novel-writing of a sort,
Acting, or improvising, make-believe,
Surely not downright cheaterly,—any how,
'Tis done with and my lot cast; Cheat's my name:

The fatal dash of brandy in your tea
Has settled what you'll have the souchong's smack:

The caddy gives way to the dram-bottle.

Then, it's so cruel easy! Oh, those tricks
That can't be tricks, those feats by sleight of hand,

Clearly no common conjuror's!—no indeed!
A conjuror? Choose me any craft? the world
A man puts hand to; and with six months' pains
I'll play you twenty tricks miraculous

To people untaught the trade: have you seen glass blown,

Pipes pierced? Why, just this biscuit that I chip,

Did you ever watch a baker toss one flat
To the oven? Try and do it! Take my word, Practise but half as much, while limbs are lithé,

To turn, shove, tilt a table, crack your joints,
Manage your feet, dispose your hands aright,
Work wires that twitch the curtains, play the glove

At end o' your slipper,—then put out the lights
And . . . there, there, all you want you'll get, I hope!

I found it slip, easy as an old shoe.

Now, lights on table again! I've done my
part,

You take my place while I give thanks and rest.

"Well, Judge Humgruffin, what's your verdict, sir?

"You, hardest head in the United States,—

"Did you detect a cheat here? Wait! Let's see!

"Just an experiment first, for candour's sake!

"I'll try and cheat you, Judge! The table tilts:

"Is it I that move it? Write! I'll press
your hand:

"Cry when I push, or guide your pencil,
Judge!"

Sludge still triumphant! "That a rap, indeed?

"That, the real writing? Very like a whale!

"Then, if, sir, you—a most distinguished man,

"And, were the Judge not here, I'd say, . . .
no matter!

"Well, sir, if you fail, you can't take us in,—

"There's little fear that Sludge will!"

Won't he, ma'am?

But what if our distinguished host, like Sludge,
Bade God bear witness that he played no trick,

While you believed that what produced the raps

Was just a certain child who died, you know,
And whose last breath you thought your lips had felt?

Eh? That's a capital point, ma'am: Sludge begins

At your entreaty with your dearest dead,
The little voice set lisping once again,
The tiny hand made feel for yours once more,
The poor lost image brought back, plain as
dreams,

Which image, if a word had chanced recall,
The customary cloud would cross your eyes,
Your heart return the old tick, pay its pang!
A right mood for investigation, this!

One's at one's ease with Saul and Jonathan, Pompey and Cæsar; but one's own lost
child . . .

I wonder, when you heard the first clod drop
From the spadeful at the grave-side, felt you
free

To investigate who twitched your funeral scarf Or brushed your flounces? Then, it came of course

You should be stunned and stupid; then,
(how else?)

Your breath stopped with your blood, your brain struck work.

But now, such causes fail of such effects,
All's changed,—the little voice begins afresh,
Yet you, calm, consequent, can test and try And touch the truth. "Tests? Didn't the creature tell

"Its nurse's name, and say it lived six years,
"And rode a rocking-horse? Enough of tests!

"Sludge never could learn that!"

He could not, eh?

You compliment him. "Could not?" Speak for yourself!

I'd like to know the man I ever saw Once,—never mind where, how, why, when,
—once saw,

Of whom I do not keep some matter in mind
He'd swear I "could not" know, sagacious
soul!

What? Do you live in this world's blow of blacks,

Falaver, gossipry, a single hour
Nor find one smut has settled on your nose,
Of a smut's worth, no more, no less—one fact
Out of the drift of facts, whereby you learn What someone was, somewhere, somewhen, somewhy?

You don't tell folk—"See what has stuck to me!

"Judge Humgruffin, our most distinguished man,

"Your uncle was a tailor, and your wife
"Thought to have married Miggs, missed him, hit you!"—

Do you, sir, though you see him twice a-week?
"No," you reply, "what use retailing it?

"Why should I?" But, you see, one day you should,

Because one day there's much 'use,—when this fact

Brings you the Judge upon both gouty knees
Before the supernatural; proves that Sludge Knows, as you say, a thing he "could not"
know:

Will not Sludge thenceforth keep an outstretched face

The way the wind drives?

"Could not!" Look you now,
I'll tell you a story! There's a whiskered chap,
A foreigner, that teaches music here
And gets his bread,—knowing no better way:
He says, the fellow who informed of him
And made him fly his country and fall West
Was a hunchback cobbler, sat, stitched soles
and sang,

In some outlandish place, the city Rome,
In a cellar by their Broadway, all day long;
Never asked questions, stopped to listen or
look,

Nor lifted nose from lapstone; let the world
Roll round his three-legged stool, and news run in

The ears he hardly seemed to keep pricked up.
Well, that man went on Sundays, touched his pay,

And took his praise from government; you see;

For something like two dollars every week,
He'd engage tell you some one little thing
Of some one man, which led to many more, (Because one truth leads right to the world's end)

And make you that man's master—when he dined

And on what dish, where walked to keep his health

And to what street. His trade was, throwing
thus

His sense out, like an ant-eater's long tongue,
Soft, innocent, warm, moist, impassible,

And when 'twas crusted o'er with creatures—
slick,

Their juice enriched his palate. "Could not Sludge!"

I'll go yet a step further, and maintain,
Once the imposture plunged its proper depth
I' the rotten of your natures, all of you,—

(If one's not mad nor drunk, and hardly then)
It's impossible to cheat—that's, be found out!

Go tell your brotherhood this first slip of mine,
All to-day's tale, how you detected Sludge,

Behaved unpleasantly, till he was fain confess,
And so has come to grief! You'll find, I think,

Why Sludge still snaps his fingers in your face.
There now, you've told them! What's their prompt reply?

"Sir, did that youth confess he had cheated me,

"I'd disbelieve him. He may cheat at times;

"That's in the 'medium'-nature, thus they're
made,

"Vain and vindictive, cowards, prone to scratch.

"And so all cats are; still, a cat's the beast

"You coax the strange electric sparks from out,

"By rubbing back its fur; not so a dog,

"Nor lion, nor lamb: 'tis the cat's nature, sir!

"Why not the dog's? Ask God, who made them beasts!

"D'ye think the sound, the nicely-balanced
man

"(Like me"—aside)—"like you yourself,"— (aloud)

"—He's stuff to make a 'medium'? Bless your soul,

"'Tis these hysteric, hybrid half-and-halfs,
 "Equivocal, worthless vermin yield the fire !
 "We take such as we find them, 'ware their
 tricks,
 "Wanting their service. Sir, Sludge took in
 you—
 "How, I can't say, not being there to watch :
 "He was tried, was tempted by your easiness,—
 "He did not take in me !"

Thank you for Sludge !

I'm to be grateful to such patrons, eh,
 When what you hear's my best word ? 'Tis a challenge

"Snap at all strangers, half-tamed prairie-dog,
 "So you cower duly at your keeper's beck !
 "Cat, show what claws were made for, muffling them

"Only to me ! Cheat others if you can,
 "Me, if you dare !" And, my wise sir, I
 dared—

Did cheat you first, made you cheat others next,
 And had the help o' your vaunted manliness
 To bully the incredulous. You used me ?
 Have not I used you, taken full revenge,
 Persuaded folk they knew not their own name,
 And straight they'd own the error ! Who was the fool

When, to an awe-struck wide-eyed open-mouthed

Circle of sages, Sludge would introduce
 Milton composing baby-rhymes, and Locke
 Reasoning in gibberish, Homer writing Greek
 In noughts and crosses, Asaph setting psalms
 To crotchet and quaver ? I've made a spirit squeak

In sham voice for a minute, then outbroke
 Bold in my own, defying the imbeciles—
 Have copied some ghost's pothooks, half a
 page,

Then ended with my own scrawl undisguised.

"All right ! The ghost was merely using
 Sludge,

"Suiting itself from his imperfect stock !"
 Don't talk of gratitude to me ! For what ?
 For being treated as a showman's ape,
 Encouraged to be wicked and make sport,
 Fret or sulk, grin or whimper, any mood

So long as the ape be in it and no man—
 Because a nut pays every mood alike.

Curse your superior, superintending sort,
 Who, since you hate smoke, send up boys that climb

To cure your chimney, bid a "medium" lie
 To sweep you truth down ! Curse your women
 too,

Your insolent wives and daughters, that fire up
 Or faint away if a male hand squeeze theirs
 Yet, to encourage Sludge, may play with
 Sludge

As only a "medium," only the kind of thing
 They must humour, fondle . . . oh, to mis-
 conceive

Were too preposterous ! But I've paid them
 out !

They've had their wish—called for the naked
 truth,

And in she tripped, sat down and bade them stare :

They had to blush a little and forgive !

"The fact is, children talk so ; in next world

"All our conventions are reversed,—perhaps

"Made light of : something like old prints, my dear !

"The Judge has one, he brought from Italy,

"A metropolis in the background,—o'er a bridge,

"A team of trotting roadsters,—cheerful groups

"Of wayside travellers, peasants at their work,

"And, full in front, quite unconcerned, why
 not ?

"Three nymphs conversing with a cavalier,

"And never a rag among them : 'fine,' folk
 cry—

"And heavenly manners seem not much unlike !

"Let Sludge go on ; we'll fancy it's in print !"

If such as came for wool, sir, went home shorn,

Where is the wrong I did them ? 'Twas their
 choice ;

They tried the adventure, ran the risk, tossed
 up

And lost, as some one's sure to do in games ;

They fancied I was made to lose,—smoked

Useful to spy the sun through, spare their eyes :

And had I proved a red-hot iron plate

They thought to pierce, and, for their pains, grew blind,

Whose were the fault but theirs? While, as things go,

Their loss amounts to gain, the more's the shame!

They've had their peep into the spirit-world, And all this world may know it! They've fed fat Their self-conceit which else had starved : what chance

Save this, of cackling o'er a golden egg

And compassing distinction from the flock, Friends of a feather? Well, they paid for it,

And not prodigiously; the price o' the play, Not counting certain pleasant interludes,

Was scarce a vulgar play's worth. When you buy

The actor's talent, do you dare propose

For his soul beside? Whereas my soul you buy!

Sludge acts Macbeth, obliged to be Macbeth, Or you'll not hear his first word! Just go through

That slight formality, swear himself's the Thane,

And thenceforth he may strut and fret his hour,

Spout, spawl, or spin his target, no one cares! Why hadn't I leave to play tricks, Sludge as

Sludge?

Enough of it all! I've wiped out scores with you—

Vented your fustian, let myself be streaked Like tom-fool with your ochre and carmine,

Worn patchwork your respectable fingers sewed

To metamorphose somebody,—yes, I've earned

My wages, swallowed down my bread of shame,

And shake the crumbs off—where but in your face?

As for religion—why, I served it, sir! I'll stick to that! With my phenomena

I laid the atheist sprawling on his back, Propped up Saint Paul, or, at least, Swedenborg!

In fact, it's just the proper way to baulk These troublesome fellows—liars, one and all, Are not these sceptics? Well, to baffle them, No use in being squeamish: lie yourself!

Erect your buttress just as wide o' the line, Your side, as they build up the wall on theirs; Where both meet, midway in a point, is truth High overhead: so, take your room, pile bricks,

Lie! Oh, there's titillation in all shame!

What snow may lose in white, snow gains in rose!

Miss Stokes turns—Rahab,—nor a bad exchange!

Glory be on her, for the good she wrought, Breeding belief anew 'neath ribs of death, Browbeating now the unabashed before, Ridding us of their whole life's gathered straws By a live coal from the altar! Why, of old, Great men spent years and years in writing books

To prove we've souls, and hardly proved it then:

Miss Stokes with her live coal, for you and me!

Surely, to this good issue, all was fair—

Not only fondling Sludge, but, even suppose He let escape some spice of knavery,—well,

In wisely being blind to it! Don't you praise Nelson for setting spy-glass to blind eye

And saying . . . what was it—that he could not see

The signal he was bothered with? Ay, indeed!

I'll go beyond: there's a real love of a lie,

Liars find ready-made for lies they make, As hand for glove, or tongue for sugar-plum.

At best, 'tis never pure and full belief; Those furthest in the quagmire,—don't suppose

They strayed there with no warning, got no chance

Of a filth-speck in their face, which they clenched teeth,

Bent brow against ! Be sure they had their doubts,

And fears, and fairest challenges to try
The floor o' the seeming solid sand ! But no !
Their faith was pledged, acquaintance too
apprised,

All but the last step ventured, kerchiefs waved,
And Sludge called "pet" : 'twas easier marching on

To the promised land ; join those who,
Thursday next,

Meant to meet Shakespeare ; better follow
Sludge—

Prudent, oh sure !—on the alert, how else ?—

But making for the mid-bog, all the same !

To hear your outcries, one would think I caught

Miss Stokes by the scruff o' the neck, and pitched her flat,

Foolish-face-foremost ! Hear these simpletons,

That's all I beg, before my work's begun,

Before I've touched them with my finger-tip !

Thus they await me (do but listen, now !

It's reasoning, this is,—I can't imitate

The baby voice, though) "In so many tales

"Must be some truth, truth though a pinpoint big,

"Yet, some : a single man's deceived,
perhaps—

"Hardly, a thousand : to suppose one cheat

"Can gull all these, were more miraculous far

"Than aught we should confess a miracle"—

And so on. Then the Judge sums up—(it's rare)

Bids you respect the authorities that leap

To the judgment-seat at once,—why don't you note

The limpid nature, the unblemished life,

The spotless honour, indisputable sense

Of the first upstart with his story ? What—

Outrage a boy on whom you ne'er till now

Set eyes, because he finds raps trouble him ?

Fools, these are : ay, and how of their opposites

Who never did, at bottom of their hearts,

Believe for a moment ?—Men emasculate,

Blank of belief, who played, as eunuchs use,
With superstition safely,—cold of blood,

Who saw what made for them i' the mystery,

Took their occasion, and supported Sludge

—As proselytes ? No, thank you, far too shrewd !

—But promisers of fair play, encouragers

O' the claimant ; who in candour needs must hoist

Sludge up on Mars' Hill, get speech out of
Sludge

To carry off, criticize, and cant about !

Didn't Athens treat Saint Paul so ?—at any rate,

It's "a new thing" philosophy fumbles at.

Then there's the other picker-out of pearl

From dung-heaps,—ay, your literary man,

Who draws on his kid gloves to deal with Sludge

Daintily and discreetly,—shakes a dust

O' the doctrine, flavours thence, he well knows
how,

The narrative or the novel,—half-believes,

All for the book's sake, and the public's stare,

And the cash that's God's sole solid in this
world !

Look at him ! Try to be too bold, too gross

For the master ! Not you ! He's the man for muck ;

Shovel it forth, full-splash, he'll smooth your brown

Into artistic richness, never fear !

Find him the crude stuff ; when you recognize

Your lie again, you'll doff your hat to it,

Dressed out for company ! "For company,"

I say, since there's the relish of success :

Let all pay due respect, call the lie truth,

Save the soft silent smirking gentleman

Who ushered in the stranger : you must sigh

"How melancholy, he, the only one

"Fails to perceive the bearing of the truth

"Himself gave birth to !"—There's the triumph's smack !

That man would choose to see the whole world roll

I' the slime o' the slough, so he might touch the tip

Of his brush with what I call the best of browns—

Tint ghost-tales, spirit-stories, past the power
Of the outworn umber and bistre !

Yet I think

There's a more hateful form of foolery—
The social sage's, Solomon of saloons
And philosophic diner-out, the fribble
Who wants a doctrine for a chopping-block
To try the edge of his faculty upon,
Prove how much common sense he'll hack and heh

It's the critical minute 'twixt the soup and fish !
These were my patrons : these, and the like of them

Who, rising in my soul now, sicken it,—
These I have injured ! Gratitude to these ?
The gratitude, forsooth, of a prostitute
To the greenhorn and the bully—friends of
 hers,

From the wag that wants the queer jokes for his club,

To the snuff-box-decorator, honest man,
Who just was at his wits' end where to find
So genial a Pasiphae ! All and each
Pay, compliment, protect from the police :
And how she hates them for their pains, like
 me !

So much for my remorse at thanklessness
Toward a deserving public !

But, for God ?

Ay, that's a question ! Well, sir, since you press—

(How you do tease the whole thing out of me !
I don't mean you, you know, when I say
 "them" :)

Hate you, indeed ! But that Miss Stokes, that Judge !

Enough, enough—with sugar : thank you, sir !
Now for it, then ! Will you believe me,
 though ?

You've heard what I confess ; I don't unsay
A single word : I cheated when I could,
Rapped with my toe-joints, set sham hands at
 work ;

Wrote down names weak in sympathetic ink,
Rubbed odic lights with ends of phosphor-
 match,

And all the rest ; believe that : believe this,
By the same token, though it seem to set
The crooked straight again, unsay the said,
Stick up what I've knocked down ; I can't help that

It's truth ! I somehow vomit truth to-day.
This trade of mine—I don't know, can't be sure
But there was something in it, tricks and all !
Really, I want to light up my own mind.
They were tricks ;—true, but what I mean to add

Is also true. First,—don't it strike you, sir ?
Go back to the beginning,—the first fact We're taught is, there's a world beside this
 world,

With spirits, not mankind, for tenantry ;
That much within that world once sojourned
 here,

That all upon this world will visit there,
And therefore that we, bodily here below,
Must have exactly such an interest

In learning what may be the ways o' the world
Above us, as the disembodied folk
Have (by all analogic likelihood)

In watching how things go in the old home
With us, their sons, successors, and what not.
Oh yes, with added powers probably,

Fit for the novel state,—old loves grown pure,
Old interests understood aright,—they watch !
Eyes to see, ears to hear, and hands to help,

Proportionate to advancement : they're ahead,
That's all—do what we do, but noblier
 done—

Use plate, whereas we eat our meals off delf,
(To use a figure).

Concede that, and I ask

Next what may be the mode of intercourse
Between us men here, and those once-men
 there ?

First comes the Bible's speech ; then, history
With the supernatural element,—you know—
All that we sucked in with our mothers'
 milk,

Grew up with, got inside of us at last,
Till it's found bone of bone and flesh of flesh.
See now, we start with the miraculous,
And know it used to be, at all events :

What's the first step we take, and can't but take,

In arguing from the known to the obscure?
Why this: "What was before, may be to-day.

"Since Samuel's ghost appeared to Saul, of course

"My brother's spirit may appear to me."

Go tell your teacher that! What's his reply?
What brings a shade of doubt for the first time

O'er his brow late so luminous with faith?

"Such things have been," says he, "and there's no doubt

"Such things may be: but I advise mistrust

"Of eyes, ears, stomach, and, more than all, your brain,

"Unless it be of your great-grandmother,

"Whenever they propose a ghost to you!"

The end is, there's a composition struck;

'Tis settled, we've some way of intercourse

Just as in Saul's time; only, different:

How, when and where, precisely,—find it out!

I want to know, then, what's so natural

As that a person born into this world

And seized on by such teaching, should begin

With firm expectancy and a frank look-out

For his own allotment, his especial share

I' the secret,—his particular ghost, in fine?

I mean, a person born to look that way,

Since natures differ: take the painter-sort.

One man lives fifty years in ignorance

Whether grass be green or red,—"No kind of eye

"For colour," say you; while another picks

And puts away even pebbles, when a child,

Because of bluish spots and pinky veins—

"Give him forthwith a paint-box!" Just the same

Was I born . . . "medium," you won't let me say,—

Well, seer of the supernatural

Everywhen, everyhow and everywhere,—

Will that do?

Only,—what in the rest you style their sense,
Instinct, blind reasoning but imperative,

This, betimes, taught them the old world had one law

And ours another: "New world, new laws," cried they:

"None but old laws, seen everywhere at work,"

Cried I, and by their help explained my life

The Jews' way, still a working way to me.

Ghosts made the noises, fairies waved the lights,

Or Santa Claus slid down on New Year's Eve

And stuffed with cakes the stocking at my bed,

Changed the worn shoes, rubbed clean the fingered slate

O' the sum that came to grief the day before.

This could not last long: soon enough I found

Who had worked wonders thus, and to what end:

But did I find all easy, like my mates?

Henceforth no supernatural any more?

Not a whit: what projects the billiard-balls?

"A cue," you answer: "Yes, a cue," said I;

"But what hand, off the cushion, moved the cue?"

"What unseen agency, outside the world,

"Prompted its puppets to do this and that,

"Put cakes and shoes and slates into their mind,

"These mothers and aunts, nay even school-masters?"

Thus high I sprang, and there have settled since.

Just so I reason, in sober earnest still,

About the greater godsend, what you call

The serious gains and losses of my life.

What do I know or care about your world.

Which either is or seems to be? This snap

O' my fingers, sir! My care is for myself;

Myself am whole and sole reality

Inside a raree-show and a market-mob

Gathered about it: that's the use of things.

'Tis easy saying they serve vast purposes,

I and all such boys of course
Started with the same stock of Bible-truth;

Advantage their grand selves : be it true or false,

Each thing may have two uses. What's a star?

A world, or a world's sun : doesn't it serve
As taper also, time-piece, weather-glass,
And almanac? Are stars not set for signs
When we should shear our sheep, sow corn, prune trees?

The Bible says so.

Well, I add one use

To all the acknowledged uses, and declare
If I spy Charles's Wain at twelve to-night,
It warns me, "Go, nor lose another day,
"And have your hair cut, Sludge!" You laugh : and why?

Were such a sign too hard for God to give?
No : but Sludge seems too little for such
grace :

Thank you, sir ! So you think, so does not Sludge !

When you and good men gape at Providence,
Go into history and bid us mark

Not merely powder-plots prevented, crowns
Kept on kings' heads by miracle enough,
But private mercies—oh, you've told me, sir,
Of such interpositions ! How yourself
Once, missing on a memorable day
Your handkerchief—just setting out, you
know,—

You must return to fetch it, lost the train,
And saved your precious self from what befell
The thirty-three whom Providence forgot.
You tell, and ask me what I think of this?
Well, sir, I think then, since you needs must
know,

What matter had you and Boston city to boot
Sailed skyward, like burnt onion-peelings?
Much

To you, no doubt : for me—undoubtedly
The cutting of my hair concerns me more,
Because, however sad the truth may seem,
Sludge is of all-importance to himself.
You set apart that day in every year

For special thanksgiving, were a heathen else :
Well, I who cannot boast the like escape,
Suppose I said "I don't thank Providence"

"For my part, owing it no gratitude"?

"Nay, but you owe as much"—you'd tutor
me,

"You, every man alive, for blessings gained

"In every hour o' the day, could you but know!

"I saw my crowning mercy : all have such,

"Could they but see !" Well, sir, why don't they see?

"Because they won't look,—or perhaps, they can't."

Then, sir, suppose I can, and will, and do
Look, microscopically as is right,
Into each hour with its infinitude
Of influences at work to profit Sludge?

For that's the case : I've sharpened up my sight

To spy a providence in the fire's going out,
The kettle's boiling, the dime's sticking fast
Despite the hole i' the pocket. Call such facts
Fancies, too petty a work for Providence,
And those same thanks which you exact
from me

Prove too prodigious payment : thanks for what,

If nothing guards and guides us little men?

No, no, sir ! You must put away your pride,
Resolve to let Sludge into partnership !

I live by signs and omens : looked at the roof
Where the pigeons settle—"If the further
bird,

"The white, takes wing first, I'll confess when thrashed ;

"Not, if the blue does"—so I said to myself
Last week, lest you should take me by surprise:
Off flapped the white,—and I'm confessing,
sir !

Perhaps 'tis Providence's whim and way
With only me, i' the world : how can you tell?

"Because unlikely !" Was it likelier, now,
That this our one out of all worlds beside,
The what-d'you-call-'em millions, should be just

Precisely chosen to make Adam for,
And the rest o' the tale? Yet the tale's true,
you know :

Such undeserving clod was graced so once ;
Why not graced likewise undeserving Sludge?
Are we merit-mongers, flaunt we filthy rags?

All you can bring against my privilege
Is, that another way was taken with you,—
Which I don't question. It's pure grace, my luck :

I'm broken to the way of nods and winks,
And need no formal summoning. You've a
help ;

Holloa his name or whistle, clap your hands,
Slam with your foot or pull the bell : all's one,
He understands you want him, here he comes.
Just so, I come at the knocking : you, sir, wait
The tongue o' the bell, nor stir before you catch

Reason's clear tingle, nature's clapper brisk,
Or that traditional peal was wont to cheer
Your mother's face turned heavenward : short
of these

There's no authentic intimation, eh ?

Well, when you hear, you'll answer them,
start up

And stride into the presence, top of toe,
And there find Sludge beforehand, Sludge that sprang

At noise o' the knuckle on the partition-wall !
I think myself the more religious man.

Religion's all or nothing ; it's no mere smile
O' contentment, sigh of aspiration, sir—

No quality o' the finelier-tempered clay
Like its whiteness or its lightness ; rather, stuff
O' the very stuff, life of life, and self of self.

I tell you, men won't notice ; when they do,
They'll understand. I notice nothing else :

I'm eyes, ears, mouth of me, one gaze and gape,
Nothing eludes me, everything's a hint,
Handle and help. It's all absurd, and yet There's something in it all, I know : how
much ?

No answer ! What does that prove ? Man's still man,

Still meant for a poor blundering piece of work
When all's done ; but, if somewhat's done, like this,

Or not done, is the case the same ? Suppose
I blunder in my guess at the true sense

O' the knuckle-summons, nine times out of ten,—

What if the tenth guess happen to be right ?
If the tenth shovel-load of powdered quartz

Yield me the nugget ? I gather, crush, sift all,
Pass o'er the failure, pounce on the success.
To give you a notion, now—(let who wins, laugh !)

When first I see a man, what do I first ?

Why, count the letters which make up his
name,

And as their number chances, even or odd,
Arrive at my conclusion, trim my course :

Hiram H. Horsefall is your honoured name,
And haven't I found a patron, sir, in you ?

"Shall I cheat this stranger ?" I take apple-pips,

Stick one in either canthus of my eye,
And if the left drops first—(your left, sir, stuck)

I'm warned, I let the trick alone this time.

You, sir, who smile, superior to such trash,

You judge of character by other rules :

Don't your rules sometimes fail you ? Pray, what rule

Have you judged Sludge by hitherto ?

Oh, be sure,

You, everybody blunders, just as I,

In simpler things than these by far ! For see :

I knew two farmers,—one, a wiseacre

Who studied seasons, rummaged almanacs,

Quoted the dew-point, registered the frost,

And then declared, for outcome of his pains,

Next summer must be dampish : 'twas a drought.

His neighbour prophesied such drought would
fall,

Saved hay and corn, made cent. per cent.
thereby,

And proved a sage indeed : how came his lore ?

Because one brindled heifer, late in March,

Stiffened her tail of evenings, and somehow

He got into his head that drought was meant !

I don't expect all men can do as much :

Such kissing goes by favour. You must take

A certain turn of mind for this,—a twist !

I' the flesh, as well. Be lazily alive,

Open-mouthed, like my friend the ant-eater,

Letting all nature's loosely-guarded notes

Settle and, slick, be swallowed ! Think yourself

The one of the world, the one for whom the world

Was made, expect it tickling at your mouth !
Then will the swarm of busy buzzing flies,
Clouds of coincidence, break egg-shell, thrive,
Breed, multiply, and bring you food enough.

I can't pretend to mind your smiling, sir !
Oh, what you mean is this ! Such intimate way,
Close converse, frank exchange of offices,
Strict sympathy of the immeasurably great
With the infinitely small, betokened here
By a course of signs and omens, raps and sparks,—

How does it suit the dread traditional text
O' the "Great and Terrible Name" ? Shall the Heaven of Heavens
Stoop to such child's play ?

Please, sir, go with me
A moment, and I'll try to answer you.
The "Magnum et terribile" (is that right ?)
Well, folk began with this in the early day ;
And all the acts they recognized in proof
Were thunders, lightnings, earthquakes, whirlwinds, dealt

Indisputably on men whose death they caused.
There, and there only, folk saw Providence
At work,—and seeing it, 'twas right enough
All heads should tremble, hands wring hands amain,

And knees knock hard together at the-breath
O' the Name's first letter ; why, the Jews,
I'm told,

Won't write it down, no, to this very hour,
Nor speak aloud : you know best if't be so.
Each ague-fit of fear at end, they crept (Because somehow people once born must live)

Out of the sound, sight, swing and sway o'
the Name,

Into a corner, the dark rest of the world,
And safe space where as yet no fear had reached ;

'Twas there they looked about them, breathed
again,

And felt indeed at home, as we might say.
The current o' common things, the daily life,

This had their due contempt ; no Name pursued

Man from the mountain-top where fires abide,
To his particular mouse-hole at its foot
Where he ate, drank, digested, lived in short :
Such was man's vulgar business, far too small
To be worth thunder : "small," folk kept on,
"small,"

With much complacency in those great days !
A mote of sand, you know, a blade of grass—
What was so despicable as mere grass,
Except perhaps the life o' the worm or fly Which fed there ? These were "small" and men were great.

Well, sir, the old way's altered somewhat since,
And the world wears another aspect now :
Somebody turns our spyglass round, or else
Puts a new lens in it : grass, worm, fly grow big :

We find great things are made of little things,
And little things go lessening till at last Comes God behind them. Talk of mountains
now ?

We talk of mould that heaps the mountain, mites

That throng the mould, and God that makes the mites.

The Name comes close behind a stomach-cyst,
The simplest of creations, just a sac
That's mouth, heart, legs and belly at once, yet lives

And feels, and could do neither, we conclude,
If simplified still further one degree :
The small becomes the dreadful and immense !
Lightning, forsooth ? No word more upon
that !

A tin-foil bottle, a strip of greasy silk,
With a bit of wire and knob of brass, and there's

Your dollar's-worth of lightning ! But the cyst—

The life of the least of the little things ?

No, no !
Preachers and teachers try another tack,
Come near the truth this time : they put aside Thunder and lightning : "That's mistake,"
they cry,

"Thunderbolts fall for neither fright nor sport,
 "But do appreciable good, like tides,
 "Changes o' the wind, and other natural facts—
 "'Good' meaning good to man, his body or soul.
 "Mediate, immediate, all things minister "To man,—that's settled: be our future text
 "'We are His children!'" So, they now harangue
 About the intention, the contrivance, all
 That keeps up an incessant play of love,—
 See the Bridgewater book.

Amen to it!

Well, sir, I put this question: I'm a child?
 I lose no time, but take you at your word:
 How shall I act a child's part properly?
 Your sainted mother, sir,—used you to live
 With such a thought as this a-worrying you?
 "She has it in her power to throttle me,
 "Or stab or poison: she may turn me out,
 "Or lock me in,—nor stop at this to-day,
 "But cut me off to-morrow from the estate
 "I look for"—(long may you enjoy it, sir!)
 "In brief, she may unchild the child I am."
 You never had such crotchets? Nor have I!
 Who, frank confessing childship from the first,
 Cannot both fear and take my ease at once,
 So, don't fear,—know what might be, well
 enough,

But know too, child-like, that it will not be,
 At least in my case, mine, the son and heir
 O' the kingdom, as yourself proclaim my style.
 But do you fancy I stop short at this?
 Wonder if suit and service, son and heir
 Needs must expect, I dare pretend to find?
 If, looking for signs proper to such an one,
 I straight perceive them irresistible?
 Concede that homage is a son's plain right,
 And, never mind the nods and raps and winks,
 'Tis the pure obvious supernatural
 Steps forward, does its duty: why, of course!
 I have presentiments; my dreams come true:
 A fancy a friend stands whistling all in white
 Blithe as a boblink, and he's dead I learn.
 I take dislike to a dog my favourite long,

And sell him; he goes mad next week and snaps.

I guess that stranger will turn up to-day.
 I have not seen these three years; there's his knock

I wager "sixty peaches on that tree!"—
 That I pick up a dollar in my walk,
 That your wife's brother's cousin's name was George—

And win on all points. Oh, you wince at this?

You'd fain distinguish between gift and gift,
 Washington's oracle and Sludge's itch
 O' the elbow when at whist he ought to trump?

With Sludge it's too absurd? Fine, draw the line

Somewhere, but, sir, your somewhere is not mine!

Bless us, I'm turning poet! It's time to end.
 How you have drawn me out, sir! All I ask
 Is—am I heir or not heir? If I'm he,
 Then, sir, remember, that same personage
 (To judge by what we read i' the newspaper)
 Requires, beside one nobleman in gold
 To carry up and down his coronet,
 Another servant, probably a duke,
 To hold egg-nogg in readiness: why want Attendance, sir, when helps in his father's house

Abound, I'd like to know?

Enough of talk!

My fault is that I tell too plain a truth.
 Why, which of those who say they disbelieve,
 Your clever people, but has dreamed his
 dream,

Caught his coincidence, stumbled on his fact
 He can't explain, (he'll tell you smilingly)
 Which he's too much of a philosopher.

To count as supernatural, indeed,
 So calls a puzzle and problem, proud of it:
 Bidding you still be on your guard, you know,
 Because one fact don't make a system stand,
 Nor prove this an occasional escape
 Of spirit beneath the matter: that's the way!
 Just so wild Indians picked up, piece by piece,

The fact in California, the fine gold
That underlay the gravel—hoarded these,
But never made a system stand, nor dug !
So wise men hold out in each hollowed palm
A handful of experience, sparkling fact
They can't explain ; and since their rest of life
Is all explainable, what proof in this ?
Whereas I take the fact, the grain of gold,
And fling away the dirty rest of life,
And add this grain to the grain each fool has found

O' the million other such philosophers,—
Till I see gold, all gold and only gold,
Truth questionless though unexplainable,
And the miraculous proved the commonplace !
The other fools believed in mud, no doubt—
Failed to know gold they saw : was that so strange ?

Are all men born to play Bach's fiddle-fugues,
"Time" with the foil in carte, jump their own height,

Cut the mutton with the broadsword, skate a five,

Make the red hazard with the cue, clip nails
While swimming, in five minutes row a mile,
Pull themselves three feet up with the left arm,

Do sums of fifty figures in their head,
And so on, by the scores of instances ?
The Sludge with luck, who sees the spiritual facts

His fellows strive and fail to see, may rank
With these, and share the advantage.

 Ay, but share

The drawback ! Think it over by yourself ;
I have not heart, sir, and the fire's gone grey.
Defect somewhere compensates for success,
Everyone knows that. Oh, we're equals, sir !
The big-legged fellow has a little arm
And a less brain, though big legs win the race :

Do you suppose I 'scape the common lot ?
Say, I was born with flesh so sensitive,
Soul so alert, that, practice helping both,
I guess what's going on outside the veil,
Just as a prisoned crane feels pairing-time
In the islands where his kind are, so must fall

To capering by himself some shiny night,
As if your back-yard were a plot of spice—
Thus am I 'ware o' the spirit-world : while
you,

Blind as a beetle that way,—for amends,
Why, you can double fist and floor me, sir !
Ride that hot hardmouthed horrid horse of
yours,

Laugh while it lightens, play with the great dog,

Speak your mind though it vex some friend
to hear,

Never brag, never bluster, never blush,—
In short, you've pluck, when I'm a coward—
there !

I know it, I can't help it,—folly or no,
I'm paralyzed, my hand's no more a hand,
Nor my head a head, in danger : you can
smile

And change the pipe in your cheek. Your gift's not mine.

Would you swap for mine ? No ! but you'd add my gift

To yours : I dare say ! I too sigh at times, Wish I were stouter, could tell truth nor flinch,

Kept cool when threatened, did not mind so
much

Being dressed gaily, making strangers stare,
Eating nice things ; when I'd amuse myself,
I shut my eyes and fancy in my brain

I'm—now the President, now Jenny Lind,
Now Emerson, now the Benicia Boy—
With all the civilized world a-wondering.

And worshipping. I know it's folly and
worse ;

I feel such tricks sap, honeycomb the soul,
But I can't cure myself : despond, despair,
And then, hey, presto, there's a turn o' the wheel,

Under comes uppermost, fate makes full
amends ;

Sludge knows and sees and hears a hundred
things

You all are blind to,—I've my taste of truth,
Likewise my touch of falsehood,—vice no
doubt,

But you've your vices also : I'm content.

What, sir? You won't shake hands? "Because I cheat!"

"You've found me out in cheating!" That's enough

To make an apostle swear! Why, when I cheat,

Mean to cheat, do cheat, and am caught in the act,

Are you, or, rather, am I sure o' the fact?

(There's verse again, but I'm inspired somehow.)

Well then I'm not sure! I may be, perhaps, Free as a babe from cheating: how it began, My gift,—no matter; what 'tis got to be

In the end now, that's the question; answer that!

Had I seen, perhaps, what hand was holding mine,

Leading me whither, I had died of fright:

So, I was made believe I led myself.

If I should lay a six-inch plank from roof

To roof, you would not cross the street, one step,

Even at your mother's summons: but, being shrewd,

If I paste paper on each side the plank

And swear 'tis solid pavement, why, you'll cross

Humming a tune the while, in ignorance

Beacon Street stretches a hundred feet below:

I walked thus, took the paper-cheat for stone.

Some impulse made me set a thing o' the move

Which, started once, ran really by itself;

Beer flows thus, suck the siphon; toss the kite,

It takes the wind and floats of its own force.

Don't let truth's lump rot stagnant for the lack

Of a timely helpful lie to leaven it!

Put a chalk-egg beneath the clucking hen,

She'll lay a real one, laudably deceived,

Daily for weeks to come. I've told my lie,

And seen truth follow, marvels none of mine;

All was not cheating, sir, I'm positive!

I don't know if I move your hand sometimes

When the spontaneous writing spreads so far,

If my knee lifts the table all that height,

Why the inkstand don't fall off the desk a-tilt,

Why the accordion plays a prettier waltz

Than I can pick out on the piano-forte,

Why I speak so much more than I intend,

Describe so many things I never saw.

I tell you, sir, in one sense, I believe

Nothing at all,—that everybody can,

Will, and does cheat: but in another sense:

I'm ready to believe my very self—

That every cheat's inspired, and every lie

Quick with a germ of truth.

You ask perhaps

Why I should condescend to trick at all

If I know a way without it? This is why!

There's a strange secret sweet self-sacrifice

In any desecration of one's soul

To a worthy end,—isn't it Herodotus

(I wish I could read Latin!) who describes

The single gift o' the land's virginity,

Demanded in those old Egyptian rites,

(I've but a hazy notion—help me, sir!)

For one purpose in the world, one day in a life,

One hour in a day—thereafter, purity,

And a veil thrown o'er the past for evermore!

Well, now, they understood a many things

Down by Nile city, or wherever it was!

I've always vowed, after the minute's lie,

And the end's gain,—truth should be mine henceforth.

This goes to the root o' the matter, sir,—this plain

Plump fact: accept it and unlock with it

The wards of many a puzzle!

Or, finally,

Why should I set so fine a gloss on things?

What need I care? I cheat in self-defence,

And there's my answer to a world of cheats!

Cheat? To be sure, sir! What's the world worth else?

Who takes it as he finds, and thanks his stars?

Don't it want trimming, turning, furbishing-up

And polishing over? Your so-styled great men,

Do they accept one truth as truth is found,

Or try their skill at tinkering? What's your world?

Here are you born, who are, I'll say at once,
Of the luckiest kind, whether in head and heart,

Body and soul, or all that helps them both.

Well, now, look back: what faculty of yours
Came to its full, had ample justice done

By growing when rain fell, biding its time,
Solidifying growth when earth was dead,

Spiring up, broadening wide, in seasons due?
Never! You shot up and frost nipped you

off,

Settled to sleep when sunshine bade you sprout;

One faculty thwarted its fellow: at the end,
All you boast is "I had proved a topping
tree

"In other climes"—yet this was the right
clime

Had you foreknown the seasons. Young, you've force

Wasted like well-streams: old,—oh, then
indeed,

Behold a labyrinth of hydraulic pipes

Through which you'd play off wondrous waterwork;

Only, no water's left to feed their play.

Young,—you've a hope, an aim, a love: it's tossed

And crossed and lost: you struggle on, some

Shut in your heart against the puffs around,
Through cold and pain; these in due time subside,

Now then for age's triumph, the hoarded
light

You mean to loose on the altered face of
things,—

Up with it on the tripod! It's extinct.

Spend your life's remnant asking, which was
best,

Light smothered up that never peeped forth
once,

Or the cold cresset with full leave to shine?

Well, accept this too,—seek the fruit of it
Not in enjoyment, proved a dream on earth,
But knowledge, useful for a second chance,

Another life,—you've lost this world—you've gained

Its knowledge for the next. What knowledge, sir,

Except that you know nothing? Nay, you
doubt

Whether 'twere better have made you man or brute,

If aught be true, if good and evil clash.

No foul, no fair, no inside, no outside,

There's your world!

Give it me! I slap it brisk

With harlequin's pasteboard sceptre: what's it now?

Changed like a rock-flat, rough with rusty
weed,

At first wash-over o' the returning wave!

All the dry dead impracticable stuff

Starts into life and light again; this world

Pervaded by the influx from the next.

I cheat, and what's the happy consequence?

You find full justice straightway dealt you
out,

Each want supplied, each ignorance set at ease,

Each folly fooled. No life-long labour now
As the price of worse than nothing! No mere film

Holding you chained in iron, as it seems,

Against the outstretch of your very arms

And legs if the sunshine moralists forbid!

What would you have? Just speak and,
there, you see!

You're supplemented, made a whole at last,
Bacon advises, Shakespeare writes you songs,
And Mary Queen of Scots embraces you.

Thus it goes on, not quite like life perhaps,

But so near, that the very difference piques,

Shows that e'en better than this best will
be—

This passing entertainment in a hut

Whose bare walls take your taste since, one stage more,

And you arrive at the palace: all half real,

And you, to suit it, less than real beside,

In a dream, lethargic kind of death in life,

That helps the interchange of natures, flesh

Transfused by souls, and such souls! Oh,
'tis choice!

And if at whiles the bubble, blown too thin,
Seem nigh on bursting,—if you nearly see
The real world through the false,—what do you see?

Is the old so ruined? You find you're in a flock
O' the youthful, earnest, passionate—genius,
beauty,

Rank and wealth also, if you care for these:
And all depose their natural rights, hail you,
(That's me, sir) as their mate and yoke-fellow,
Participate in Sludgehood—nay, grow mine,
I veritably possess them—banish doubt,
And reticence and modesty alike!

Why, here's the Golden Age, old Paradise
Or new Eutopia! Here's true life indeed,
And the world well won now, mine for the first time!

And all this might be, may be, and with good
help

Of a little lying shall be: so, Sludge lies!
Why, he's at worst your poet who sings how Greeks

That never were, in Troy which never was,
Did this or the other impossible great thing!
He's Lowell—it's a world (you smile applause),
Of his own invention—wondrous Longfellow, Surprising Hawthorne! Sludge does more than they,

And acts the books they write: the more his
praise!

But why do I mount to poets? Take plain prose—

Dealers in common sense, set these at work,
What can they do without their helpful lies?
Each states the law and fact and face o' the
thing

Just as he'd have them, finds what he thinks fit,
Is blind to what misleads him, just records
What makes his case out, quite ignores the rest.
It's a History of the World, the Lizard Age,
The Early Indians, the Old Country War,
Jerome Napoleon, whatsoever you please,
All as the author wants it. Such a scribe
You pay and praise for putting life in stones,

Fire into fog, making the past your world.
There's plenty of "How did you contrive to grasp

"The thread which led you through this labyrinth?

"How build such solid fabric out of air?

"How on so slight foundation found this tale,

"Biography, narrative?" or, in other words,

"How many lies did it require to make

"The portly truth you here present us with?"

"Oh," quoth the penman, purring at your
praise,

"'Tis fancy all; no particle of fact:

"I was poor and threadbare when I wrote that book

"Bliss in the Golden City.' I, at Thebes?

"We writers paint out of our heads, you see!"

"—Ah, the more wonderful the gift in you,

"The more creativeness and godlike craft!"

But I, do I present you with my piece,

It's "What, Sludge? When my sainted mother spoke

"The verses Lady Jane Grey last composed

"About the rosy bower in the seventh heaven

"Where she and Queen Elizabeth keep house,—

"You made the raps? 'Twas your invention
that?

"Cur, slave and devil!"—eight fingers and two thumbs

Stuck in my throat!

Well, if the marks seem gone,

'Tis because stiffish cock-tail, taken in time,

Is better for a bruise than arnica.

There, sir! I bear no malice: 't isn't in me,

I know I acted wrongly: still, I've tried

What I could say in my excuse,—to show

The devil's not all devil . . . I don't pretend,

He's angel, much less such a gentleman.

As you, sir! And I've lost you, lost myself,

Lost all-I-I-I- . . .

No—are you in earnest, sir?

O yours, sir, is an angel's part! I know

What prejudice prompts, and what's the common course

Men take to soothe their ruffled self-conceit,

Only you rise superior to it all !
No, sir, it don't hurt much ; it's speaking long
That makes me choke a little : the marks will go !

What ? Twenty V-notes more, and outfit too,
And not a word to Greeley ? One—one kiss O' the hand that 'saves me ! You'll not let me speak,

I well know, and I've lost the right, too true !
But I must say, sir, if She hears (she does)
Your sainted . . . Well, sir,—be it so !
That's, I think,
My bed-room candle. Good-night ! Bl-l-less
you, sir !

R-r-r, you brute-beast and blackguard !
Cowardly scamp !

I only wish I dared burn down the house
And spoil your sniggering ! Oh what, you're the man ?

You're satisfied at last ? You've found out
Sludge ?

We'll see that presently : my turn, sir, next !
I too can tell my story : brute,—do you hear ?—
You throttled your sainted mother, that old hag,

In just such a fit of passion : no, it was . . .
To get this house of hers, and many a note
Like these . . . I'll pocket them, however
. . . five,

Ten, fifteen . . . ay, you gave her throat
the twist,

Or else you poisoned her ! Confound the cuss !
Where was my head ? I ought to have prophesied

He'll die in a year and join her : that's the way.

I don't know where my head is : what had I
done ?

How did it all go ? I said he poisoned her,
And hoped he'd have grace given him to repent,

Whereon he picked this quarrel, bullied me
And called me cheat : I thrashed him,—who 'could help ?

He howled for mercy, prayed me on his knees
To cut and run and save him from disgrace :
I db so, and once off, he slanders me.

An end of him ! Begin elsewhere anew !
Boston's a hole, the herring-pond is wide,
V-notes are something, liberty still more.
Beside, is he the only fool in the world ?

APPARENT FAILURE.

" We shall soon lose a celebrated building."
Paris Newspaper.

I.

No, for I'll save it ! Seven years since,
I passed through Paris, stopped a day
To see the baptism of your Prince ;
Saw, made my bow, and went my way :
Walking the heat and headache off,
I took the Seine-side, you surmise,
Thought of the Congress, Gortschakoff,
Cavour's appeal and Buol's replies,
So sauntered till—what met my eyes ?

Only the Doric little Morgue !

The dead-house where you show your drowned :

Petrarch's Vaucluse makes proud the Sorgue,
Your Morgue has made the Seine renowned.

One pays one's debt in such a case ;

I plucked up heart and entered,—stalked,
Keeping a tolerable face

Compared with some whose cheeks were chalked :

Let them ! No Briton's to be baulked !

First came the silent gazers ; next,

A screen of glass, we're thankful for ;

Last, the sight's self, the sermon's text,

The three men who did most abhor

Their life in Paris yesterday,

So killed themselves : and now, enthroned

Each on his copper couch, they lay

Fronting me, waiting to be owned.

I thought, and think, their sin's atoned.

IV.

Poor men, God made, and all for that !

The reverence struck me ; o'er each head
Religiously was hung its hat,

Each coat dripped by the owner's bed,

Sacred from touch : each had his berth,
 His bounds, his proper place of rest,
 Who last night tenanted on earth
 Some arch, where twelve such slept abreast,—
 Unless the plain asphalte seemed best.

V.

How did it happen, my poor boy?
 You wanted to be Buonaparte
 And have the Tuileries for toy,
 And could not, so it broke your heart?
 You, old one by his side, I judge,
 Were, red as blood, a socialist,
 A leveller! Does the Empire grudge
 You've gained what no Republic missed?
 Be quiet, and unclench your fist!

VI.

And this—why, he was red in vain,
 Or black,—poor fellow that is blue!
 What fancy was it turned your brain?
 Oh, women were the prize for you!
 Money gets women, cards and dice
 Get money, and ill-luck gets just
 The copper couch and one clear nice
 Cool squirt of water o'er your bust,
 The right thing to extinguish lust!

VII.

It's wiser being good than bad;
 It's safer being meek than fierce:
 It's fitter being sane than mad.
 My own hope is, a sun will pierce
 The thickest cloud earth ever stretched;
 That, after Last, returns the First,
 Though a wide compass round be fetched;
 That what began best, can't end worst,
 Nor what God blessed once, prove accurst.

EPILOGUE.

FIRST SPEAKER, as David.

I.

ON the first of the Feast of Feasts,
 The Dedication Day,
 When the Levites joined the Priests
 At the Altar in robed array,
 Gave signal to sound and say,—
 VOL. L

When the thousands, rear and van,
 Swarming with one accord
 Became as a single man
 (Look, gesture, thought and word)
 In praising and thanking the Lord,—

III.

When the singers lift up their voice,
 And the trumpets made endeavour,
 Sounding, "In God rejoice!"
 Saying, "In Him rejoice
 "Whose mercy endureth for ever!"—

IV.

Then the Temple filled with a cloud,
 Even the House of the Lord;
 Porch bent and pillar bowed:
 For the presence of the Lord,
 In the glory of His cloud,
 Had filled the House of the Lord.

SECOND SPEAKER, as Renan.

Gone now! All gone across the dark so far,
 Sharpening fast, shuddering ever, shutting
 still,
 Dwindling into the distance, dies that star Which came, stood, opened once! We gazed our fill
 With upturned faces on as real a Face
 That, stooping from grave music and mild fire,
 Took in our homage, made a visible place
 Through many a depth of glory, gyre on gyre,
 For the dim human tribute. Was this true?
 Could man indeed avail, mere praise of his,
 To help by rapture God's own rapture too,
 Thrill with a heart's red tinge that pure pale bliss?
 Why did it end? Who failed to beat the breast,
 And shriek, and throw the arms protesting
 wide,
 When a first shadow showed the star addressed
 Itself to motion, and on either side
 The rims contracted as the rays retired;
 The music, like a fountain's sickening pulse,
 Subsided on itself; awhile transpired
 Some vestige of a Face no panga convulse,

No prayers retard; then even this was gone,
 Lost in the night at last. We, lone and left
 Silent through centuries, ever and anon
 Venture to probe again the vault bereft
 Of all now save the lesser lights, a mist
 Of multitudinous points, yet suns, mensay—
 And this leaps ruby, this lurks amethyst,
 But where may hide what came and loved our clay?

How shall the sage detect in yon expanse
 The star which chose to stoop and stay
 for us?

Unroll the records! Hailed ye such advance
 Indeed, and did your hope evanish thus?
 Watchers of twilight, is the worst averred?

We shall not look up, know ourselves are seen,
 Speak, and be sure that we again are heard,
 Acting or suffering, have the disk's serene
 Reflect our life, absorb an earthly flame, Nor doubt that, were mankind inert and numb,

Its core had never crimsoned all the same,
 Nor, missing ours, its music fallen dumb?
 Oh, dread succession to a dizzy post,

Sad sway of sceptre whose mere touch
 appals,
 Ghastly dethronement, cursed by those the most
 On whose repugnant brow the crown next falls!

THIRD SPEAKER.

I.

Witless alike of will and way divine,
 How heaven's high with earth's low should intertwine!

Friends, I have seen through your eyes:
 now use mine!

II.

Take the least man of all mankind, as I;
 Look at his head and heart, find how and why
 He differs from his fellows utterly:

Then, like me, watch when nature by degrees
 Grows alive round him, as in Arctic seas
 (They said of old) the instinctive water flees

IV.

Toward some elected point of central rock,
 As though, for its sake only, roamed the flock
 Of waves about the waste: awhile they mock

V.

With radiance caught for the occasion,—hues
 Of blackest hell now, now such reds and blues
 As only heaven could fitly interfuse,—

VI.

The mimic monarch of the whirlpool, king
 O' the current for a minute: then they wring
 Up by the roots and oversweep the thing,

And hasten off, to play again elsewhere
 The same part, choose another peak as bare.
 They find and flatter, feast and finish there.

VIII.

When you see what I tell you,—nature dance
 About each man of us, retire, advance,
 As though the pageant's end were to enhance

His worth, and—once the life, his product,
 gained—

Roll away elsewhere, keep the strife sustained,
 And show thus real, a thing the North but feigned—

X.

When you acknowledge that one world could do
 All the diverse work, old yet ever new,
 Divide us, each from other, me from you,—

XI.

Why, where's the need of Temple, when the walls

O' the world are that? What use of swells and falls

From Levites' choir, Priests' cries, and trumpet-calls?

XII.

That one Face, far from vanish, rather grows,
 Or decomposes but to recompose,
 Become my-universe that feels and knows.

BALAUSTION'S ADVENTURE;

INCLUDING

A TRANSCRIPT FROM EURIPIDES.

1871.

[After the ill-starred expedition under Nikias against Sicily and the crowning disaster of Syracuse had become known to the inhabitants of Rhodes, a great reaction against the supremacy of Athens set in, and a general determination to side with Sparta was expressed. Against this the girl Balaustion (Wild-pomegranate-flower) vehemently protested, and calling together those whom she could muster, they took ship for Athens. Encountering storms and pursued by pirates, they were driven upon Syracuse Harbour, where, however, they were at first refused admission and thrust back upon the pirates. At the last moment, however, curiosity was expressed as to Euripides, and Balaustion came forward and offered to recite the Alkestis, which she did before the whole listening city.]

TO THE COUNTESS COWPER.

If I mention the simple truth: that this poem absolutely owes its existence to you,—who not only suggested, but imposed on me as a task, what has proved the most delightful of May-month amusements—I shall seem honest, indeed, but hardly prudent; for, how good and beautiful ought such a poem to be!

Euripides might fear little; but I, also, have an interest in the performance; and what wonder if I beg you to suffer that it make, in another and far easier sense, its nearest possible approach to those Greek qualities of goodness and beauty, by laying itself gratefully at your feet? R. B.

LONDON: July 23, 1871.

BALAUSTION'S ADVENTURE.

Our Euripides, the human,
With his droppings of warm tears,
And his touches of things common
Till they rose to touch the spheres.

ABOUT that strangest, saddest, sweetest song
I, when a girl, heard in Kameiros once,
And, after, saved my life by? Oh, so glad
To tell you the adventure!

Petalé,

Phullis, Charopé, Chrusion! You must know,
This "after" fell in that unhappy time

When poor reluctant Nikias, pushed by fate,
Went falteringly against Syracuse;
And there shamed Athens, lost her ships and
men,

And gained a grave, or death without a grave.
I was at Rhodes—the isle, not Rhodes the
town,

Mine was Kameiros—when the news arrived:
Our people rose in tumult, cried "No more
Duty to Athens, let us join the League
And side with Sparta, share the spoil,—at worst,

Abjure a headship that will ruin Greece!"
And so, they sent to Knidos for a fleet
To come and help revolters. Ere help came,—

Girl as I was, and never out of Rhodes
The whole of my first fourteen years of life,
But nourished with Ilissian¹ mother's-milk,—
I passionately cried to who would hear
And those who loved me at Kameiros—"No!
Never throw Athens off for Sparta's sake—
Never disloyal to the life and light
Of the whole world worth calling world
at all!

Rather go die at Athens, lie outstretched
For feet to trample on, before the gate
Of Diomedes or the Hippadai,

¹ Athenian.

Before the temples and among the tombs,
 Than tolerate the grim felicity
 Of harsh Lakonia ! Ours the fasts and feasts,
 Choë's and Chutroi ;¹ ours the sacred grove,
 Agora, Dikasteria, Poikilé,
 Pnux, Keramikos ; Salamis in sight,
 Psuttalia, Marathon itself, not far !
 Ours the great Dionusiæc theatre,
 And tragic triad of immortal fames,
 Aischulos, Sophokles, Euripides !
 To Athens, all of us that have a soul, Follow me ! " And I wrought so with my prayer,

That certain of my kinsfolk crossed the strait
 And found a ship at Kaunos ; well-disposed Because the Captain—where did he draw
 breath

First but within Psuttalia ? Thither fled
 A few like-minded as ourselves. We turned The glad prow westward, soon were out at sea,

Pushing, brave ship with the vermilion cheek,
 Proud for our heart's true harbour. But a wind

Lay ambushed by Point Malea of bad fame,
 And leapt out, bent us from our course.

Next day

Broke stormless, so broke next blue day and next.

" But whither bound in this white waste ?"
 we plagued

The pilot's old experience : " Cos or Crete ?"
 Because he promised us the land ahead.

While we strained eyes to share in what he saw,

The Captain's shout startled us ; round we rushed :

What hung behind us but a pirate-ship Panting for the good prize ! " Row ! harder row !

Row for dear life ! " the Captain cried :
 " 'tis Crete,

Friendly Crete looming large there ! Beat this craft

That's but a keles, one-benched pirate-bark,
 Lokrian, or that bad breed off Thessaly !

Only, so cruel are such water-thieves,
 No man of you, no woman, child, or slave,
 But falls their prey, once let them board our boat ! "

So, furiously our oarsmen rowed and rowed ;
 And when the oars flagged somewhat, dash and dip,

As we approached the coast and safety, so
 That we could hear behind us plain the threats

And curses of the pirate panting up
 In one more throe and passion of pursuit,—
 Seeing our oars flag in the rise and fall,
 I sprang upon the altar by the mast
 And sang aloft,—some genius prompting
 me,—

That song of ours which saved at Salamis :
 " O sons of Greeks, go, set your country free,
 Free your wives, free your children, free the fanes

O' the Gods, your fathers founded,—sepulchres

They sleep in ! Or save all, or all be lost ! "
 Then, in a frenzy, so the noble oars
 Churned the black water white, that well
 away

We drew, soon saw land rise, saw hills grow
 up,

Saw spread itself a sea-wide town with towers,
 Not fifty stadia distant ; and, betwixt
 A large bay and a small, the islet-bar,
 Even Ortugia's self—oh, luckless we !
 For here was Sicily and Syracuse :
 We ran upon the lion from the wolf.

Ere we drew breath, took counsel, out there came

A galley, hailed us. " Who asks entry here
 In war-time ? Are you Sparta's friend or foe ? "
 " Kaunians"—our Captain judged his best
 reply,

" The mainland-seaport that belongs to
 Rhodes ;

Rhodes that casts in her lot now with the League,

Forsaking Athens,—you have heard belike ! "
 " Ay, but we heard all Athens in one ode
 Just now ! we heard her in that Aischulos !

You bring a boatful of Athenians here,

Kaunians although you be : and prudence
bids,

For Kaunos' sake, why, carry them unhurt
To Kaunos, if you will : for Athens' sake, Back must you, though ten pirates blocked the bay !

We want no colony from Athens here,
With memories of Salamis, forsooth,
To spirit up our captives, that pale crowd
I' the quarry, whom the daily pint of corn
Keeps in good order and submissiveness."
Then the grey Captain prayed them by the Gods,

And by their own knees, and their fathers'
beards,

They should not wickedly thrust suppliants
back,

But save the innocent on traffic bound —

Or, may be, some Athenian family

Perishing of desire to die at home,—

From that vile foe still lying on its oars,
Waiting the issue in the distance. Vain !

Words to the wind ! And we were just about

To turn and face the foe, as some tired bird

Barbarians pelt at, drive with shouts away

From shelter in what rocks, however rude,

She makes for, to escape the kindled eye,

Split beak, crook'd claw o' the creature, cormorant

Or ossifrage,¹ that, hardly baffled, hangs

Afloat i' the foam, to take her if she turn.

So were we at destruction's very edge,

When those o' the galley, as they had discussed

A point, a question raised by somebody,

A matter mooted in a moment,—“Wait !”

Cried they (and wait we did, you may be sure).

“That song was veritable Aischulos,

Familiar to the mouth of man and boy,

Old glory : how about Euripides ?

The newer and not yet so famous bard,

He that was born upon the battle-day

While that song and the salpinx² sounded him

Into the world, first sound, at Salamis—

Might you know any of his verses too ?”

² A trumpet.

Now, some one of the Gods inspired this
speech :

Since ourselves knew what happened but last year—

How, when Gulippos gained his victory

Over poor Nikias, poor Demosthenes,

And Syracuse condemned the conquered force

To dig and starve i' the quarry, branded
them—

Freeborn Athenians, brute-like in the front

With horse-head brands,—ah, “Region of the Steed” !³—

Of all these men immersed in misery,

It was found none had been advantaged so

By aught in the past life he used to prize

And pride himself concerning,—no rich man

By riches, no wise man by wisdom, no

Wiser man still (as who loved more the Muse)

By storing, at brain's edge and tip of tongue,

Old glory, great plays that had long ago

Made themselves wings to fly about the
world,—

Not one such man was helped, so at his need

As certain few that (wisest they of all)

Had, at first summons, oped heart, flung door
wide

At the new knocking of Euripides,

Nor drawn the bolt with who cried “Decadence !

And, after Sophokles, be nature dumb !”

Such,—and I see in it God Bacchus' boon

To souls that recognized his latest child,

He who himself, born latest of the Gods,

Was stoutly held impostor by mankind,—

Such were in safety : any who could speak

A chorus to the end, or prologize,

Roll out a rhesis,⁴ wield some golden length

Stiffened by wisdom out into a line,

Or thrust and parry in bright monostich,⁵

Teaching Euripides to Syracuse—

Any such happy man had prompt reward :

If he lay bleeding on the battle-field

They staunched his wounds and gave him
drink and food ;

If he were slave i' the house, for reverence

³ Attica was famous for horses.

⁴ A speech in a play.

⁵ A dialogue in which each speaker speaks a single line in turn.

They rose up, bowed to who proved master
 now,
 And bade him go free, thank Euripides !
 Ay, and such did so : many such, he said,
 Returning home to Athens, sought him out,
 The old bard in the solitary house,
 And thanked him ere they went to sacrifice.
 I say, we knew that story of last year !

Therefore, at mention of Euripides,
 The Captain crowed out "Euoi, praise the
 God !

Oöp, boys, bring our owl-shield to the fore !
 Out with our Sacred Anchor ! Here she
 stands,

Balaustion ! Strangers, greet the lyric girl !
 Euripides ? Babai ! what a word there 'scaped
 Your teeth's enclosure, quoth my grandsire's
 song !

Why, fast as snow in Thrace, the voyage
 through,

Has she been falling thick in flakes of him !
 Frequent as figs at Kaunos, Kaunians said.
 Balaustion, stand forth and confirm my speech !
 Now it was some whole passion of a play ;
 Now, peradventure, but a honey-drop
 That slipt its comb i' the chorus. If there rose
 A star, before I could determine steer
 Southward or northward—if a cloud surprised
 Heaven, ere I fairly hollaed 'Furl the sail !—'
 She had at fingers' end both cloud and star ;
 Some thought that perched there, tame and tuneable,

Fitted with wings ; and still, as off it flew,
 'So sang Euripides,' she said, 'so sang
 The meteoric poet of air and sea,
 Planets and the pale populace of heaven,
 The mind of man, and all that's made to soar !'
 And so, although she has some other name,
 We only call her Wild-pomegranate-flower,
 Balaustion ; since, where'er the red bloom
 burns

I' the dull dark verdure of the bounteous tree,
 Dethroning, in the Rosy Isle,¹ the rose,
 You shall find food, drink, odour, all at once ;
 Cool leaves to bind about an aching brow,

¹ Rhodes.

And, never much away, the nightingale.
 Sing them a strophe, with the turn-again,
 Down to the verse that ends all, proverb-
 like,
 And save us, thou Balaustion, bless the name !"

But I cried "Brother Greek ! better than so,— Save us, and I have courage to recite
 The main of a whole play from first to last ;
 That strangest, saddest, sweetest song of his,
 ALKESTIS ; which was taught, long years ago
 At Athens, in Glaukinos' archonship ;
 But only this year reached our Isle o' the Rose.
 I saw it, at Kameiros, played the same,
 They say, as for the right Lenean feast
 In Athens ; and beside the perfect piece—
 Its beauty and the way it makes you weep,—
 There is much honour done your own loved
 God

Herakles, whom you house i' the city here
 Nobly, the Temple wide Greece talks about !
 I come a suppliant to your Herakles !
 Take me and put me on his temple-steps
 To tell you his achievement as I may,
 And, that told, he shall bid you set us free !"

Then, because Greeks are Greeks, and hearts are hearts,
 And poetry is power,—they all outbroke
 In a great joyous laughter with much love :
 "Thank Herakles for the good holiday !
 Make for the harbour ! Row, and let voice
 ring,

'In we row, bringing more Euripides !'"
 All the crowd, as they lined the harbour now,
 "More of Euripides !"—took up the cry.
 We landed ; the whole city, soon astir,
 Came rushing out of gates in common joy
 To the suburb temple ; there they stationed
 me

O' the topmost step : and plain I told the
 play,

Just as I saw it ; what the actors said,
 And what I saw, or thought I saw the while,
 At our Kameiros theatre, clean-scoped
 Out of a mill-side, with the sky above
 And sea before our seats in marble row :
 Told it ; and, two days more, repeated it,

Until they sent us on our way again
With good words and great wishes.

Oh, for me—

A wealthy Syracusan brought a whole
Talent and bade me take it for myself:
I left it on the tripod in the fane,
—For had not Herakles a second time Wrestled with Death and saved devoted ones?—

Thank-offering to the hero. And a band
Of captives, whom their lords grew kinder to Because they called the poet countryman,
Sent me a crown of wild-pomegranate-flower:
So, I shall live and die Balaustion now.
But one—one man—one youth,—three days,
each day,—

(If, ere I lifted up my voice to speak,
I gave a downward glance by accident)
Was found at foot o' the temple. When we sailed,

There, in the ship too, was he found as well,
Having a hunger to see Athens too.
We reached Peiraieus; when I landed—lo,
He was beside me. Anthesterion-month
Is just commencing: when its moon rounds
full,

We are to marry. O Euripides!

I saw the master; when we found ourselves (Because the young man needs must follow
me)

Firm on Peiraieus, I demanded first Whither to go and find him. Would you think?

The story how he saved us made some smile:
They wondered strangers were exorbitant
In estimation of Euripides.

He was not Aischulos nor Sophokles:
—"Then, of our younger bards who boast
the bay,

Had I sought Agathon, or Iophon,
Or, what now had it been Kephisophon?
A man that never kept good company,
The most unsociable of poet-kind,
All beard that was not freckle in his face!"

I soon was at the tragic house, and saw
The master, held the sacred hand of him

And laid it to my lips. Men love him not:
How should they? Nor do they much love his friend

Sokrates: but those two have fellowship:
Sokrates often comes to hear him read,
And never misses if he teach a piece.
Both, being old, will soon have company,
Sit with their peers above the talk. Mean-
time,

He lives as should a statue in its niche;
Cold walls enclose him, mostly darkness
there,

Alone, unless some foreigner uncouth
Breaks in, sits, stares an hour, and so departs,
Brain-stuffed with something to sustain his
life,

Dry to the marrow 'mid much merchandise.
How should such know and love the man?
Why, mark!

Even when I told the play and got the praise,
There spoke up a brisk little somebody,
Critic and whippersnapper, in a rage
To set things right: "The girl departs from
truth!

Pretends she saw what was not to be seen,
Making the mask of the actor move, forsooth!
'Then a fear flitted o'er the wife's white
face,'—

'Then frowned the father,'—'then the husband shook,'—

'Then from the festal forehead slipt each
spray,

'And the heroic mouth's gay grace was gone;'

As she had seen each naked fleshly face,
And not the merely-painted mask it wore!
Well, is the explanation difficult?

What's poetry except a power that makes?
And, speaking to one sense, inspires the rest,
Pressing them all into its service; so
That who sees painting, seems to hear as well
The speech that's proper for the painted
mouth;

And who hears music, feels his solitude
Peopled at once—for how count heart-beats,
plain

Unless a company, with hearts which beat,

Come close to the musician, seen or no?
And who receives true verse at eye or ear,
Takes in (with verse) time, place, and person
too,

So, links each sense on to its sister-sense,
Grace-like: and what if but one sense of three

Front you at once? The sidelong pair
conceive

Thro' faintest touch of finest finger-tips,—

Hear, see and feel, in faith's simplicity,

Alike, what one was sole recipient of:

Who hears the poem, therefore, sees the
play.

Enough and too much! Hear the play itself!

Under the grape-vines, by the streamlet-side,
Close to Baccheion; till the cool increase,
And other stars steal on the evening-star,
And so, we homeward flock i' the dusk, we
five!

You will expect, no one of all the words
O' the play but is grown part now of my
soul,

Since the adventure. 'Tis the poet speaks:
But if I, too, should try and speak at times,
Leading your love to where my love, per-
chance,

Climbed earlier, found a nest before you knew—

Why, bear with the poor climber, for love's
sake!

Look at Baccheion's beauty opposite,
The temple with the pillars at the porch!

See you not something beside masonry?

What if my words wind in and out the stone
As yonder ivy, the God's parasite?

Though they leap all the way the pillar leads,

Festoon about the marble, foot to frieze,

And serpentinaingly enrich the roof,

Toy with some few bees and a bird or two,—

What then? The column holds the cornice up.

There slept a silent palace in the sun,
With plains adjacent and Thessalian peace—
Pherai, where King Admetos ruled the land.

Out from the portico there gleamed a God,
Apollon: for the bow was in his hand,
The quiver at his shoulder, all his shape
One dreadful beauty. And he hailed the house

As if he knew it well and loved it much:

"O Admeteian domes, where I endured,

Even the God I am, to drudge awhile,

Do righteous penance for a reckless deed,

Accepting the slaves' table thankfully!"

Then told how Zeus had been the cause of all,

Raising the wrath in him which took revenge

And slew those forgers of the thunderbolt

Wherewith Zeus blazed the life from out the breast

Of Phoibos' son Asklepios (I surmise,

Because he brought the dead to life again)

And so, for punishment, must needs go slave,

God as he was, with a mere mortal lord:

—Told how he came to King Admetos' land,

And played the ministrant, was herdsman
there,

Warding all harm away from him and his

Till now; "For, holy as I am," said he,

"The lord I chanced upon was holy too:

Whence I deceived the Moirai, drew from
death

My master, this same son of Pheres,—ay,

The Goddesses conceded him escape

From Hades, when the fated day should fall,

Could he exchange lives, find some friendly
one

Ready, for his sake, to content the grave.

But trying all in turn, the friendly list,

Why, he found no one, none who loved so
much,

Nor father, nor the aged mother's self

That bore him, no, not any save his wife,

Willing to die instead of him and watch

Never a sunrise nor a sunset more:

And she is even now within the house,

Upborne by pitying hands, the feeble frame

Gasping its last of life out; since to-day

Destiny is accomplished, and she dies,

And I, lest here pollution light on me,

Leave, as ye witness, all my wonted joy

In this dear dwelling. Ay,—for here comes
Death

Close on us of a sudden ! who, pale priest
Of the mute people, means to bear his prey
To the house of Hades. The symmetric step !

How he treads true to time and place and
thing,
Dogging day, hour and minute, for death's-
due !"

And we observed another Deity,
Half in, half out the portal, — watch and
ward, —

Eyeing his fellow : formidably fixed,
Yet faltering too at who affronted him,
As somehow disadvantaged, should they strive.

Like some dread heapy blackness, ruffled
wing,

Convulsed and cowering head that is all eye,
Which proves a ruined eagle who, too blind
Swooping in quest o' the quarry, fawn or kid, Descried deep down the chasm 'twixt rock and rock,

Has wedged and mortised, into either wall
O' the mountain, the pent earthquake of his power ;

So lies, half hurtless yet still terrible,
Just when—who stalks up, who stands front to front,

But the great lion-guarder of the gorge,
Lord of the ground, a stationed glory there ?
Yet he too pauses ere he try the worst
O' the frightful unfamiliar nature, new
To the chasm, indeed, but elsewhere known
enough,

Among the shadows and the silences
Above i' the sky : so each antagonist
Silently faced his fellow and forbore.
Till Death shrilled, hard and quick, in spite and fear :

"Ha ha, and what mayst thou do at the domes,

Why hauntest here, thou Phoibos ? Here
again

At the old injustice, limiting our rights,
Baulking of honour due us Gods o' the grave ?
Was't not enough for thee to have delayed

Death from Admetos,—with thy crafty art
Cheating the very Fates,—but thou must arm
The bow-hand and take station, press 'twixt me
And Pelias' daughter, who then saved her spouse,—

Did just that, now thou comest to undo,—
Taking his place to die, Alkestis here ?"

But the God sighed "Have courage ! All my arms,

This time, are simple justice and fair words."

Then each plied each with rapid interchange :

"What need of bow, were justice arms
enough ?"

"Ever it is my wont to bear the bow."

"Ay, and with bow, not justice, help this house !"

"I help it, since a friend's woe weighs me too."

"And now,—wilt force from me this second corpse ?"

"By force I took no corpse at first from thee."

"How then is he above ground, not beneath ?"

"He gave his wife instead of him, thy prey."

"And prey, this time at least, I bear below !"

"Go take her !—for I doubt persuading
thee . . ."

"To kill the doomed one ? What my function
else ?"

"No ! Rather, to despatch the true mature."

"Truly I take thy meaning, see thy drift !"

"Is there a way then she may reach old age ?"

"No way ! I glad me in my honours too !"

"But, young or old, thou tak'st one life, no more!"

"Younger they die, greater my praise-reounds!"

"If she die old,—the sumptuous funeral!"

"Thou layest down a law the rich would like."

"How so? Did wit lurk there and 'scape thy sense?"

"Who could buy substitutes would die old men."

"It seems thou wilt not grant me, then, this grace?"

"This grace I will not grant: thou know'st my ways."

"Ways harsh to men, hateful to Gods, at least!"

"All things thou canst not have: my rights for me!"

And then Apollon prophesied,—I think,
More to himself than to impatient Death,
Who did not hear or would not heed the while,—

For he went on to say "Yet even so,
Cruel above the measure, thou shalt clutch
No life here! Such a man do I perceive
Advancing to the house of Pheres now,
Sent by Eurustheus to bring out of Thrace,
The winter world, a chariot with its steeds!"

He indeed, when Admetos proves the host,
And he the guest, at the house here,—he it is Shall bring to bear such force, and from thy hands

Rescue this woman. Grace no whit to me
Will that prove, since thou dost thy deed the same,

And earnest too my hate, and all for nought!"

But how should Death or stay or understand?
Doubtless, he only felt the hour was come,
And the sword free; for he but flung some taunt—

"Having talked much, thou wilt not gain the more!"

This woman, then, descends to Hades' hall
Now that I rush on her, begin the rites
O' the sword; for sacred, to us Gods below,
That head whose hair this sword shall sanctify!"

And, in the fire-flash of the appalling sword,
The uprush and the outburst, the onslaught
Of Death's portentous passage through the door,

Apollon stood a pitying moment-space:
I caught one last gold gaze upon the night
Nearing the world now: and the God was gone,

And mortals left to deal with misery,
As in came stealing slow, now this, now that Old sojourner throughout the country-side,
Servants grown friends to those unhappy here:
And, cloudlike in their increase, all these griefs

Broke and began the over-brimming wail,
Out of a common impulse, word by word.

"What now may mean the silence at the door?
Why is Admetos' mansion stricken dumb?
Not one friend near, to say if we should mourn
Our mistress dead, or if Alkestis lives
And sees the light still, Pelias' child—to me
To all, conspicuously the best of wives
That ever was toward husband in this world!
Hears anyone or wail beneath the roof,
Or hands that strike each other, or the groan
Announcing all is done and nought to dread?
Still not a servant stationed at the gates!
O Paian, that thou wouldst dispart the wave
O' the woe, be present! Yet, had woe o'erwhelmed

The housemates, they were hardly silent thus:
It cannot be, the dead is forth and gone.
Whence comes thy gleam of hope? I dare not hope:

What is the circumstance that heartens thee?

How could Admetos have dismissed a wife
 So worthy, unescorted to the grave?
 Before the gates I see no hallowed vase
 Of fountain-water, such as suits death's door;
 Nor any clipt locks strew the vestibule,
 Though surely these drop when we grieve the
 dead,
 Nor hand sounds smitten against youthful
 hand,
 The women's way. And yet—the appointed
 time—

How speak the word?—this day is even the day
 Ordained her for departing from its light.
 O touch calamitous to heart and soul!
 Needs must one, when the good are tortured so,
 Sorrow,—one reckoned faithful from the first."

Then their souls rose together, and one sigh
 Went up in cadence from the common mouth:
 How "Vainly—anywhither in the world
 Directing or land-labour or sea-search—
 To Lukia or the sand-waste, Ammon's seat—
 Might you set free their hapless lady's soul
 From the abrupt Fate's footstep instant now.
 Not a sheep-sacrificer at the hearths
 Of Gods had they to go to: one there was
 Who, if his eyes saw light still,—Phoibos'
 son,—

Had wrought so she might leave the shadowy
 place

And Hades' portal; for he propped up Death's
 Subdued ones till the Zeus-flung thunder-flame Struck him; and now what hope of life were hailed

With open arms? For, all the king could do
 Is done already,—not one God whereof
 The altar fails to reek with sacrifice:
 And for assuagement of these evils—nought!"

But here they broke off, for a matron moved Forth from the house: and, as her tears
 flowed fast,

They gathered round. "What fortune shall we hear?

For mourning thee, if aught affect thy lord,
 We pardon thee: but lives the lady yet
 Or has she perished?—that we fain would
 know."

"Call her dead, call her living, each style serves,"

The matrons said: "though grave-ward bowed,
 she breathed;

Nor knew her husband what the misery meant
 Before he felt it: hope of life was none:

The appointed day pressed hard; the funeral pomp

He had prepared too."

When the friends broke out:

"Let her in dying know herself at least
 Sole wife, of all the wives 'neath the sun wide,
 For glory and for goodness!"—"Ah, how else
 Than best? who controverts the claim?"
 quoth she:

"What kind of creature should the woman
 prove

That has surpassed Alkestis?—surelier shown
 Preference for her husband to herself

Than by determining to die for him?
 But so much all our city knows indeed:

Hear what she did indoors and wonder then!
 For, when she felt the crowning day was come,
 She washed with river-waters her white skin,
 And, taking from the cedar closets forth
 Vesture and ornament, bedecked herself Nobly, and stood before the hearth, and
 prayed:

"Mistress, because I now depart the world,
 Falling before thee the last time, I ask—

Be mother to my orphans! wed the one
 To a kind wife, and make the other's mate

Some princely person: nor, as I who bore
 My children perish, suffer that they too

Die all untimely, but live, happy pair,
 Their full glad life out in the fatherland!"

And every altar through Admetos' house
 She visited and crowned and prayed before,

Stripping the myrtle-foliage from the boughs,
 Without a tear, without a groan,—no change

At all to that skin's nature, fair to see,
 Caused by the imminent evil. But this done—

Reaching her chamber, falling on her bed,
 There, truly, burst she into tears and spoke:

"O bride-bed, where I loosened from my life
 Virginity for that same husband's sake—

Because of whom I die now—fare thee well!
 Since nowise do I hate thee: me alone

Hast thou destroyed ; for, shrinking to betray
Thee and my spouse, I die : but thee, O bed,
Some other woman shall possess as wife—
Truer, no ! but of better fortune, say !

—So falls on, kisses it till all the couch
Is moistened with the eyes' sad overflow.
But, when of many tears she had her fill,
She flings from off the couch, goes headlong
forth,

Yet,—forth the chamber,—still keeps turning
back

And casts her on the couch again once more.
Her children, clinging to their mother's robe,
Wept meanwhile : but she took them in her
arms,

And, as a dying woman might, embraced
Now one and now the other : 'neath the roof,
All of the household servants wept as well,
Moved to compassion for their mistress ; she Extended her right hand to all and each,
And there was no one of such low degree
She spoke not to nor had an answer from.
Such are the evils in Admetos' house.
Dying,—why, he had died ; but, living, gains
Such grief as this he never will forget !

And when they questioned of Admetos,
“ Well—

Holding his dear wife in his hands, he weeps ;
Entreats her not to give him up, and seeks
The impossible, in fine : for there she wastes
And withers by disease, abandoned now,
A mere dead weight upon her husband's arm.
Yet, none the less, although she breathe so faint,

Her will is to behold the beams o' the sun :
Since never more again, but this last once,
Shall she see sun, its circlet or its ray.
But I will go, announce your presence,—
friends

Indeed ; since 'tis not all so love their lords
As seek them in misfortune, kind the same :
But you are the old friends I recognise.”

And at the word she turned again to go
The while they waited, taking up the plaint
To Zeus again : “ What passage from this strait ?

What loosing of the heavy fortune fast
About the palace ? Will such help appear,
Or must we clip the locks and cast around
Each form already the black peplos' fold ?
Clearly the black robe, clearly ! All the same,
Pray to the Gods !—like Gods' no power so great !

O thou king Paian, find some way to save !
Reveal it, yea, reveal it ! Since of old
Thou found'st a cure, why, now again become Releaser from the bonds of Death, we beg,
And give the sanguinary Hades pause !”
So the song dwindled into a mere moan,
How dear the wife, and what her husband's
woe ;

When suddenly—

“ Behold, behold !” breaks forth :
“ Here is she coming from the house indeed !
Her husband comes, too ! Cry aloud, lament,
Pheraian land, this best of women, bound—
So is she withered by disease away—
For realms below and their infernal king !
Never will we affirm there's more of joy
Than grief in marriage ; making estimate
Both from old sorrows anciently observed,
And this misfortune of the king we see—
Admetos who, of bravest spouse bereaved,
Will live life's remnant out, no life at all !”

So waited they, while a sad procession wound
Slow from the innermost o' the palace, stopped
At the extreme verge of the platform-front :
There opened, and disclosed Alkestis' self,
The consecrated lady, borne to look
Her last—and let the living look their last—
She at the sun, we at Alkestis.

We !

For would you note a memorable thing ?
We grew to see in that severe regard,—
I hear in that hard dry pressure to the point,
Word slow pursuing word in monotone,—
What Death meant when he called her consecrate

Henceforth to Hades. I believe, the sword—
Its office was to cut the soul at once
From life,—from something in this world which hides

Truth, and hides falsehood, and so lets us live

Somehow. Suppose a rider furls a cloak
About a horse's head; unfrightened, so,
Between the menace of a flame, between Solicitation of the pasturage,
Untempted equally, he goes his gait
To journey's end: then pluck the pharos off!
Show what delusions steadied him i' the
straight

O' the path, made grass seem fire and fire seem grass,

All through a little bandage o'er the eyes!
As certainly with eyes unbanded now
Alkestis looked upon the action here,
Self-immolation for Admetos' sake;
Saw, with a new sense, all her death would do,
And which of her survivors had the right,
And which the less right, to survive thereby.
For, you shall note, she uttered no one word
Of love more to her husband, though he wept

Plenteously, waxed importunate in prayer—
Folly's old fashion when its seed bears fruit.
I think she judged that she had bought the ware

O' the seller at its value,—nor praised him
Nor blamed herself, but, with indifferent eye,
Saw him purse money up, prepare to leave
The buyer with a solitary bale—

True purple—but in place of all that coin,
Had made a hundred others happy too,
If so willed fate or fortune! What remained
To give away, should rather go to these
Than one with coin to clink and contemplate.
Admetos had his share and might depart,
The rest was for her children and herself.
(Charopé makes a face: but wait awhile!)

She saw things plain as Gods do: by one stroke

O' the sword that rends the life-long veil
away.
(Also Euripides saw plain enough:
But you and I, Charopé!—you and I
Will trust his sight until our own grow clear.)

“Sun, and thou light of day, and heavenly dance

O' the fleet cloud-figure!” (so her passion paused,

While the awe-stricken husband made his
moan,

Muttered now this now that ineptitude:
“Sun that sees thee and me, a suffering pair,
Who did the Gods no wrong whence thou shouldst die!”)

Then, as if caught up, carried in their course,
Fleeting and free as cloud and sunbeam are,
She missed no happiness that lay beneath:

“O thou wide earth, from these my palace roofs,

To distant nuptial chambers once my own
In that folk of my ancestry!”—

There the flight failed her. “Raise thee, wretched one!

Give us not up! Pray pity from the Gods!”

Vainly Admetos: for “I see it—see
The two-oared boat! The ferryer of the dead,
Charon, hand hard upon the boatman's pole,
Calls me—even now calls—‘Why delayest
thou?

Quick! Thou obstructest all made ready here
For prompt departure: quick, then!”

“Woe is me!

A bitter voyage this to undergo,
Even i' the telling! Adverse Powers above,
How do ye plague us!”

Then a shiver ran:

“He has me—seest not?—hales me,—who
is it?—

To the hall o' the Dead—ah, who but Hades'
self,

He, with the wings there, glares at me, one gaze
All that blue brilliance, under the eyebrow!
What wilt thou do? Unhand me! Such a way
I have to traverse, all unhappy one!”

“Way—piteous to thy friends, but, most of all,
Me and thy children: ours assuredly
A common partnership in grief like this!”

Whereat they closed about her; but “Let be!
Leave, let me lie now! Strength forsakes my feet.

Hades is here, and shadowy on my eyes
Comes the night creeping. Children—children, now

Indeed, a mother is no more for you !
Farewell, O children, long enjoy the light !”

“ Ah me, the melancholy word I hear,
Oppressive beyond every kind of death !
No, by the Deities, take heart nor dare
To give me up—no, by our children too
Made orphans of ! But rise, be resolute,
Since, thou departed, I no more remain !
For in thee are we bound up, to exist
Or cease to be—so we adore thy love !”

—Which brought out truth to judgment. At this word

And protestation, all the truth in her
Claimed to assert itself: she waved away
The blue-eyed black-wing'd phantom, held in check

The advancing pageantry of Hades there,
And, with no change in her own countenance,
She fixed her eyes on the protesting man,
And let her lips unlock their sentence,—so !

“ Admetos,—how things go with me thou seest,—

I wish to tell thee, ere I die, what things
I will should follow. I—to honour thee,
Secure for thee, by my own soul's exchange,
Continued looking on the daylight here—
Die for thee—yet, if so I pleased, might live,
Nay, wed what man of Thessaly I would,
And dwell i' the dome with pomp and queenliness.

I would not,—would not live bereft of thee,
With children orphaned, neither shrank at all,
Though having gifts of youth wherein I joyed.
Yet, who begot thee and who gave thee birth,
Both of these gave thee up ; no less, a term
Of life was reached when death became them
well,

Ay, well—to save their child and glorious die :
Since thou wast all they had, nor hope remained
Of having other children in thy place.

So, I and thou had lived out our full time,
Nor thou, left lonely of thy wife, wouldst groan
With children reared in orphanage ; but thus
Some God disposed things, willed they so should be.

Be they so ! Now do thou remember this,
Do me in turn a favour—favour, since Certainly I shall never claim my due,
For nothing is more precious than a life :
But a fit favour, as thyself wilt say,
Loving our children here no less than I,
If head and heart be sound in thee at least.
Uphold them, make them masters of my house,
Nor wed and give a step-dame to the pair,
Who, being a worse wife than I, thro' spite
Will raise her hand against both thine and mine.
Never do this at least, I pray to thee !

For hostile the new-comer, the step-dame,
To the old brood—a very viper she For gentleness ! Here stand they, boy and girl ;

The boy has got a father, a defence
Tower-like, he speaks to and has answer from:
But thou, my girl, how will thy virginhood
Conclude itself in marriage fittingly ?
Upon what sort of sire-found yoke-fellow
Art thou to chance ? with all to apprehend—
Lest, casting on thee some unkind report,
She blast thy nuptials in the bloom of youth.
For neither shall thy mother watch thee wed,
Nor hearten thee in childbirth, standing by Just when a mother's presence helps the most !
No, for I have to die : and this my ill
Comes to me, nor to-morrow, no, nor yet
The third day of the month, but now, even
now,

I shall be reckoned among those no more.
Farewell, be happy ! And to thee, indeed,
Husband, the boast remains permissible
Thou hadst a wife was worthy ! and to you,
Children ; as good a mother gave you birth.”

“ Have courage !” interposed the friends,
“ For him

I have no scruple to declare—all this
Will he perform, except he fail of sense.”

“ All this shall be—shall be !” Admetos sobbed :

“ Fear not ! And, since I had thee living dead

Alone wilt thou be called my wife : no fear
That some Thessalian ever styles herself

Bride, hail this man for husband in thy place
 No woman, be she of such lofty line
 Or such surpassing beauty otherwise !
 Enough of children : gain from these I have,
 Such only may the Gods grant ! since in thee
 Absolute is our loss, where all was gain.
 And I shall bear for thee no year-long grief,
 But grief that lasts while my own days last,
 love !

Love ! For my hate is she who bore me,
 now :

And him I hate, my father : loving-ones
 Truly, in word not deed ! But thou didst pay
 All dearest to thee down, and buy my life,
 Saving me so ! Is there not cause enough
 That I who part with such companionship
 In thee, should make my moan ? I moan, and more :

For I will end the feastings—social flow
 O' the wine friends flock for, garlands and the Muse

That graced my dwelling. Never now for me
 To touch the lyre, to lift my soul in song
 At summons of the Lydian flute ; since thou
 From out my life hast emptied all the joy !
 And this thy body, in thy likeness wrought
 By some wise hand of the artificers,
 Shall lie disposed within my marriage-bed :
 This I will fall on, this enfold about,
 Call by thy name,—my dear wife in my arms
 Even though I have not, I shall seem to have—

A cold delight, indeed, but all the same
 So should I lighten of its weight my soul !
 And, wandering my way in dreams perchance, Thyself wilt bless me : for, come when they
 will,

Even by night our loves are sweet to see.
 But were the tongue and tune of Orpheus
 mine,

So that to Koré¹ crying, or her lord,
 In hymns, from Hades I might rescue thee—
 Down would I go, and neither Plouton's dog
 Nor Charon, he whose oar sends souls across,
 Should stay me till again I made thee stand
 Living, within the light ! But, failing this,

There, where thou art, await me when I die,
 Make ready our abode, my house-mate still !
 For in the self-same cedar, me with thee
 Will I provide that these our friends shall
 place,
 My side lay close by thy side ! Never, corpse
 Although I be, would I division bear
 From thee, my faithful one of all the world !"

So he stood sobbing : nowise insincere,
 But somehow child-like, like his children, like Childishness the world over. What was new
 In this announcement that his wife must die ?
 What particle of pain beyond the pact
 He made, with eyes wide open, long ago—
 Made and was, if not glad, content to make ?
 Now that the sorrow, he had called for, came,
 He sorrowed to the height : none heard him
 say,

However, what would seem so pertinent,
 "To keep this pact, I find surpass my power.
 Rescind it, Moirai ! Give me back her life,
 And take the life I kept by base exchange !
 Or, failing that, here stands your laughingstock

Fooled by you, worthy just the fate o' the fool
 Who makes a pother to escape the best
 And gain the worst you wiser Powers allot !"
 No, not one word of this : nor did his wife
 Despite the sobbing, and the silence soon
 To follow, judge so much was in his thought—
 Fancy that, should the Moirai acquiesce,
 He would relinquish life nor let her die.
 The man was like some merchant who, in
 storm,

Throws the freight over to redeem the ship :
 No question, saving both were better still.
 As it was,—why, he sorrowed, which sufficed.
 So, all she seemed to notice in his speech
 Was what concerned her children. Children,
 too,

Bear the grief and accept the sacrifice.
 Rightly rules nature : doest the blossomed bough
 O' the grape-vine, or the dry grape's self, bleed wine ?

So, bending to her children all her love,
 She fastened on their father's only word

To purpose now, and followed it with this.

"O children, now yourselves have heard these things—

Your father saying he will never wed
Another woman to be over you,
Nor yet dishonour me!"

"And now at least
I say it, and I will accomplish too!"

"Then, for such promise of accomplishment, Take from my hand these children!"

"Thus I take—
Dear gift from the dear hand!"

"Do thou become Mother, now, to these children in my place!"

"Great the necessity I should be so,
At least, to these bereaved of thee!"

"Child—child!
Just when I needed most to live, below
Am I departing from you both!"

"Ah me!
And what shall I do, then, left lonely thus?"

"Time will appease thee: who is dead is nought."

"Take me with thee—take, by the Gods
below!"

"We are sufficient, we who die for thee."

"Oh, Powers, ye widow me of what a wife!"

"And truly the dimmed eye draws earth-ward now!"

"Wife, if thou leav'st me, I am lost indeed!"

"She once was—now is nothing, thou mayst
say."

"Raise thy face nor forsake thy children thus"

"Ah, willingly indeed I leave them not!
But—fare ye well, my children!"

"Look on them—
Look!"

"I am nothingness."

"What dost thou? Leav'st . . ."

"Farewell!"

And in the breath she passed away.
"Undone—me miserable!" moaned the king,
While friends released the long-suspended sigh
Gone is she: no wife for Admetos more!"

Such was the signal: how the woe broke
forth,
Why tell?—or how the children's tears ran fast
Bidding their father note the eyelids' stare, Hands' droop, each dreadful circumstance of
death.

"Ay, she hears not, she sees not: I and you,
'Tis plain, are stricken hard and have to bear!"

Was all Admetos answered; for, I judge,
He only now began to taste the truth:
The thing done lay revealed, which undone
thing,

Rehearsed for fact by fancy, at the best,
Never can equal. He had used himself
This long while (as he muttered presently)
To practise with the terms, the blow involved
By the bargain, sharp to bear, but bearable
Because of plain advantage at the end.
Now that, in fact not fancy, the blow fell—
Needs must he busy him with the surprise.
"Alkestis—not to see her nor be seen,
Hear nor be heard of by her, any more
To-day, to-morrow, to the end of time—
Did I mean this should buy my life?"
thought he.

So, friends came round him, took him by the hand,
Bade him remember our mortality,

Its due, its doom : how neither was he first,
Nor would be last, to thus deplore the loved.

"I understand" slow the words came at last.
"Nor of a sudden did the evil here
Fly on me : I have known it long ago,
Ay, and essayed myself in misery ;
Nothing is new. You have to stay, you
friends,

Because the next need is to carry forth
The corpse here : you must stay and do your
part,

Chant proper pæan to the God below ;
Drink-sacrifice he likes not. I decree
That all Thessalians over whom I rule
Hold grief in common with me ; let them shear
Their locks, and be the peplos black they show !

And you who to the chariot yoke your steeds,
Or manage steeds one-frontleted,—I charge,
Clip from each neck with steel the mane away !
And through my city, nor of flute nor lyre
Bethere a sound till twelve full moons succeed.
For I shall never bury any corpse
Dearer than this to me, nor better friend :
One worthy of all honour from me, since
Me she has died for, she and she alone."

With that, he sought the inmost of the house,
He and his dead, to get grave's garniture,
While the friends sang the pæan that should peal.

"Daughter of Pelias, with farewell from me,
I the house of Hades have thy unsunned home !
Let Hades know, the dark-haired deity,—
And he who sits to row and steer alike,
Old corpse-conductor, let him know he bears
Over the Acherontian lake, this time,
I the two-oared boat, the best—oh, best by far

Of womankind ! For thee, Alkestis Queen !
Many a time those hauntings of the Muse
Shall sing thee to the seven-stringed mountain-shell,

And glorify in hymns that need no harp,
At Sparta when the cycle comes about,
And that Karneian month wherein the moon
Rises and never sets the whole night through :

So too at splendid and magnificent
Athenai. Such the spread of thy renown,
And such the lay that, dying, thou hast left
Singer and sayer. O that I availed
Of my own might to send thee once again
From Hades' hall, Kokutos' stream, by help
O' the oar that dips the river, back to day !"

So, the song sank to prattle in her praise :
"Light, from above thee, lady, fall the earth,
Thou only one of womankind to die,
Wife for her husband ! If Admetos take Anything to him like a second spouse—
Hate from his offspring and from us shall be
His portion, let the king assure himself !
No mind his mother had to hide in earth
Her body for her son's sake, nor his sire
Had heart to save whom he begot,—not they,
The white-haired wretches ! only thou it was,
I' the bloom of youth, didst save him and so
die !

Might it be mine to chance on such a mate
And partner ! For there's penury in life
Of such allowance : were she mine at least,
So wonderful a wife, assuredly
She would companion me throughout my days
And never once bring sorrow !"

A great voice—

"My hosts here !"

Oh, the thrill that ran through us
Never was aught so good and opportune
As that great interrupting voice ! For see !
Here maundered this dispirited old age
Before the palace ; whence a something crept
Which told us well enough without a word
What was a-doing inside, every touch
O' the garland on those temples, tenderest
Disposure of each arm along its side,
Came putting out what warmth i' the world
was left.

Then, as it happens at a sacrifice
When, drop by drop, some lustral bath is brimmed :

Into the thin and clear and cold, at once
They slaughter a whole wine-skin : Bacchos'
blood

Sets the white water all a-flame ; even so,
Sudden into the midst of sorrow, leapt

Along with the gay cheer of that great voice,
 Hope, joy, salvation : Herakles was here !
 Himself, o' the threshold, sent his voice on first
 To herald all that human and divine
 I' the weary happy face of him,—half God, Half man, which made the god-part God the

"Hosts mine," he broke upon the sorrow with,
 "Inhabitants of this Pheraian soil, Chance I upon Admetos inside here?"

The irresistible sound wholesome heart
 O' the hero,—more than all the mightiness
 At labour in the limbs that, for man's sake,
 Laboured and meant to labour their life long,—
 This drove back, dried up sorrow at its source.
 How could it brave the happy weary laugh
 Of who had bantered sorrow "Sorrow here?
 What have you done to keep your friend from harm?"

Could no one give the life I see he keeps?
 Or, say there's sorrow here past friendly help,
 Why waste a word or let a tear escape.
 While other sorrows wait you in the world,
 And want the life of you, though helpless here?"

Clearly there was no telling such an one
 How, when their monarch tried who loved him more

Than he loved them, and found they loved, as he,

Each man, himself, and held, no otherwise,
 That, of all evils in the world, the worst
 Was—being forced to die, what'er death gain:
 How all this selfishness in him and them
 Caused certain sorrow which they sang
 about,—

I think that Herakles, who held his life
 Out on his hand, for any man to take—
 I think his laugh had marred their threnody.

"He is in the house" they answered, After all,
 They might have told the story, talked their beat.

About the inevitable sorrow here,
 Nor changed nor checked the kindly nature,
 —no!

So long as men were merely weak, not bad,

He loved men : were they Gods, he used to help?

"Yea, Pheres' son is in-doors, Herakles.
 But say, what sends thee to Thessalian soil,
 Brought by what business to this Pherai
 town?"

"A certain labour that I have to do.
 Eurustheus the Tirunthian," laughed the God.

"And whither wendest—on what wandering Bound now?" (they had an instinct, guessed what meant
 Wanderings, labours, in the God's light
 mouth.)

"After the Thrakian Diomedes' car
 With the four horses."

"Ah, but canst thou that?
 Art inexperienced in thy host to be?"

"All-inexperienced : I have never gone
 As yet to the land o' the Bistones."

"Then, look
 By no means to be master of the steeds
 Without a battle!"

"Battle there may be :
 I must refuse no labour, all the same."

"Certainly, either having slain a foe
 Wilt thou return to us, or, slain thyself,
 Stay there!"

"And, even if the game be so,
 The risk in it were not the first I run."

"But, say thou overpower the lord o' the place,
 What more advantage dost expect thereby?"

"I shall drive off his horses to the king."

"No easy handling them to bit the jaw!"

"Easy enough ; except, at least, they breathe Fire from their nostrils!"

"But they mince up men
 With those quick jaws!"

"You talk of provender
For mountain-beasts, and not mere horses' food!"

"Thou mayst behold their mangers caked with gore!"

"And of what sire does he who bred them boast Himself the son?"

"Of Ares, king o' the targe—Thrakian, of gold throughout."

Another laugh.

"Why, just the labour, just the lot for me
Dost thou describe in what I recognize!
Since hard and harder, high and higher yet,
Truly this lot of mine is like to go
If I must needs join battle with the brood
Of Ares: ay, I fought Lukaon first,
And again, Kuknos: now engage in strife
This third time, with such horses and such lord.

But there is nobody shall ever see Alkmene's son shrink foemen's hand before!"

—"O'erhear him say" (the Chorus thought)
"That death is terrible; and help us so
To chime in—'terrible beyond a doubt,
And, if to thee, why, to ourselves much more:
Know what has happened, then, and sympathise'!"

Therefore they gladly stopped the dialogue,
Shifted the burthen to new shoulder straight,
As, "Look where comes the lord o' the land, himself,
Admetos, from the palace!" they outbroke
In some surprise, as well as much relief.
What had induced the king to waive his right
And luxury of woe in loneliness?

Out he came quietly; the hair was clipt,
And the garb sable; else no outward sign
Of sorrow as he came and faced his friend.
Was truth fast terrifying tears away?
"Hail, child of Zeus, and sprung from Per-seus too!"

The salutation ran without a fault.

"And thou, Admetos, King of Thessaly!"

"Would, as thou wishest me, the grace might fall!
But my good-wisher, that thou art, I know."

"What's here? these shorn locks, this sad show of thee?"

"I must inter a certain corpse to-day."

"Now, from thy children God avert mis-
chance!"

"They live, my children; all are in the house!"

"Thy father—if 'tis he departs indeed,
His age was ripe at least."

"My father lives,
And she who bore me lives too, Herakles."

"It cannot be thy wife Alkestis gone?"

"Two-fold the tale is, I can tell of her."

"Dead dost thou speak of her, or living yet?"

"She is—and is not: hence the pain to me!"

"I learn no whit the more, so dark thy speech!"

"Know'st thou not on what fate she needs must fall?"

"I know she is resigned to die for thee."

"How lives she still, then, if submitting so?"

"Eh, weep her not beforehand! wait till
then!"

"Who is to die is dead; doing is done."

"To be and not to be are thought diverse."

"Thou judgest this—I, that way, Herakles!"

"Well, but declare what causes thy complaint!
Who is the man has died from out thy friends?"

"No man : I had a woman in my mind."

"Alien, or someone born akin to thee?"

"Alien : but still related to my house."

"How did it happen then that here she died?"

"Her father dying left his orphan here."

"Alas, Admetos—would we found thee gay,
Not grieving!"

"What as if about to do Subjoinest thou that comment?"

"I shall seek Another hearth, proceed to other hosts."

"Never, O king, shall that be ! No such ill Betide me !"

"Nay, to mourners should there come
A guest, he proves importunate !"

"The dead—
Dead are they : but go thou within my house!"

"'Tis base carousing beside friends who mourn."

"The guest-rooms, whither we shall lead thee, lie
Apart from ours."

"Nay, let me go my way !
Ten thousandfold the favour I shall thank !"

"It may not be thou goest to the hearth
Of any man but me !" so made an end
Admetos, softly and decisively,
Of the altercation. Herakles forbore :
And the king bade a servant lead the way,
Open the guest-rooms ranged remote from view
O' the main hall ; tell the functionaries, next,
They had to furnish forth a plenteous feast,
And then shut close the doors o' the hall,
midway,

"Because it is not proper friends who feast Should hear a groaning or be grieved," quoth
he.

Whereat the hero, who was truth itself,
Let out the smile again, repressed awhile
Like fountain-brilliance one forbids to play.
He did too many grandnesses, to note
Much in the meaner things about his path :
And stepping there, with face towards the sun,
Stopped seldom to pluck weeds or ask their names.

Therefore he took Admetos at the word :
This trouble must not hinder any more
A true heart from good will and pleasant ways.
And so, the great arm, which had slain the snake,

Strained his friend's head a moment in embrace
On that broad breast beneath the lion's hide,
Till the king's cheek winced at the thick rough gold ;

And then strode off, with who had care of him,
To the remote guest-chamber : glad to give Poor flesh and blood their respite and relief
In the interval 'twixt fight and fight again—
All for the world's sake. Our eyes followed
him,

Be sure, till those mid-doors shut us outside.
The king, too, watched great Herakles go off
All faith, love, and obedience to a friend.

And when they questioned him, the simple
ones,

"What dost thou ? Such calamity to face,
Lies full before thee—and thou art so bold
As play the host, Admetos ? Hast thy wits?"

He replied calmly to each chiding tongue :
"But if from house and home I forced away
A coming guest, wouldst thou have praised me more ?

No, truly ! since calamity were mine,
Nowise diminished ; while I showed myself
Unhappy and inhospitable too :
So adding to my ills this other ill,
That mine were styled a stranger-hating house.
Myself have ever found this man the best
Of entertainers when I went his way
To parched and thirsty Argos."

"If so be—
Why didst thou hide what destiny was here,
When one came that was kindly, as thou say'st ?"

"He never would have willed to cross my door

Had he known aught of my calamities.
And probably to some of you I seem Unwise enough in doing what I do ;
Such will scarce praise me : but these halls
of mine
Know not to drive off and dishonour guests."

And so, the duty done, he turned once more
To go and busy him about his dead.
As for the sympathisers left to muse,
There was a change, a new light thrown on
things,

(Contagion from the magnanimity
O' the man whose life lay on his hand so light,
As up he stepped, pursuing duty still "Higher and harder," as he laughed and said.
Somehow they found no folly now in the act
They blamed erewhile : Admetos' private grief

Shrank to a somewhat pettier obstacle
I' the way o' the world : they saw good days had been,

And good days, peradventure, still might be,
Now that they overlooked the present cloud
Heavy upon the palace opposite.
And soon the thought took words and music
thus.

"Harbour of many a stranger, free to friend,
Ever and always, O thou house o' the man
We mourn for ! Thee, Apollon's very self,
The lyric Puthian,¹ deigned inhabit once,
Become a shepherd here in thy domains,
And pipe, adown the winding hill-side paths,
Pastoral marriage-poems to thy flocks
At feed : while with them fed in fellowship,
Through joy i' the music, spot-skin lynxes ;
ay,
And lions too, the bloody company,
Came, leaving Othrus' dell ;² and round thy lyre,
Phoibos, there danced the speckle-coated fawn,

¹ Apollo was so called on account of his victory over the Python.

² The home of the Centaurs in Thessaly.

Pacing on lightsome fetlock past the pines
Tress-topped, the creature's natural boundary,
Into the open everywhere ; such heart
Had she within her, beating joyous beats,
At the sweet reassurance of thy song !
Therefore the lot o' the master is, to live
In a home multitudinous with herds,
Along by the fair-flowing Boibian lake,³
Limited, that ploughed land and pasture-plain,
Only where stand the sun's steeds, stabled
west

I' the cloud, by that mid-air which makes the climate

Of those Molossoi : and he rules as well
O'er the Aigaian, up to Pelion's shore,— Sea-stretch without a port ! Such lord have
we :

And here he opens house now, as of old,
Takes to the heart of it a guest again :
Though moist the cyclid of the master, still Mourning his dear wife's body, dead but
now !"

And they admired : nobility of soul
Was self-impelled to reverence, they saw :
The best men ever prove the wisest too :
Something instinctive guides them still aright.
And on each soul this boldness settled now,
That one, who revered the Gods so much,
Would prosper yet : (or—I could wish it ran—

Who venerates the Gods, i' the main will
still
Practise things honest though obscure to judge).

They ended, for Admetos entered now ;
Having disposed all duteously indoors,
He came into the outside world again,
Quiet as ever : but a quietude
Bent on pursuing its descent to truth,
As who must grope until he gain the ground
O' the dungeon doomed to be his dwelling
now.

Already high o'er head was piled the dusk,
When something pushed to stay his downward step,

³ In Thessaly.

Pluck back despair just reaching its repose.
He would have bidden the kind presence
there

Observe that,—since the corpse was coming
out,

Cared for in all things that befitted the case,
Carried aloft, in decency and state,
To the last burial place and burning pile,—
'Twere proper friends addressed, as custom prompts,
Alkestis bound on her last journeying.

"Ay, for we see thy father" they subjoined
"Advancing as the aged foot best may;
His servants, too: each bringing in his hand
Adornments for thy wife, all pomp that's due To the downward-dwelling people." And in truth,

By slow procession till they filled the stage,
Came Phereas, and his following, and their gifts.

You see, the worst of the interruption was,
It plucked back, with an over-hasty hand,
Admetos from descending to the truth,
(I told you)—put him on the brink again,
Full of the noise and glare where late he stood:

With no fate fallen and irrevocable,
But all things subject still to chance and
change:

And that chance—life, and that change—happiness.

And with the low strife came the little mind:
He was once more the man might gain so
much,

Life too and wife too, would his friends but
help!

All he felt now was that there faced him one
Supposed the likeliest, in emergency,
To help: and help, by mere self-sacrifice
So natural, it seemed as if the sire
Must needs lie open still to argument,
Withdraw the rash decision, not to die
But rather live, though death would save his son:—

Argument like the ignominious grasp
Of the drowner whom his fellow grasps as fierce,

Each marvelling that the other needs must hold

Head out of water, though friend choke thereby

And first the father's salutation fell.
Burthened, he came, in common with his
child,

Who lost, none would gainsay, a good chaste
spouse:

Yet such things must be borne, though hard
to bear.

"So, take this tribute of adornment, deep
In the earth let it descend along with her!
Behoves we treat the body with respect
—Of one who died, at least, to save thy life,
Kept me from being childless, nor allowed
That I, bereft of thee, should peak and pine
In melancholy age! she, for the sex,
All of her sisters, put in evidence,
By daring such a feat, that female life

Might prove more excellent than men suppose.

O thou Alkestis!" out he burst in fine,
"Who, while thou savedst this my son, didst
raise

Also myself from sinking,—hail to thee!
Well be it with thee even in the house
Of Hades! I maintain, if mortals must Marry, this sort of marriage is the sole Permitted those among them who are wise!"

So his oration ended. Like hates like:
Accordingly Admetos,—full of the face
Of Phereas, his true father, outward shape
And inward fashion, body matching soul,— Saw just himself when years should do their work

And reinforce the selfishness inside
Until it pushed the last disguise away:
As when the liquid metal cools in the mould,
Stands forth a statue: bloodless, hard, cold bronze.

So, in old Phereas, young Admetos showed,
Pushed to completion: and a shudder ran,
And his repugnance soon had vent in speech:
Glad to escape outside, nor, pent within,
Find itself there fit food for exercise.

"Neither to this interment called by me
Comest thou, nor thy presence I account
Among the covetable proofs of love.
As for thy tribute of adornment,—no !
Ne'er shall she don it, ne'er in debt to thee
Be buried ! What is thine, that keep thou
still !

Then it behoved thee to commiserate
When I was perishing : but thou—who stood'st

Foot-free o' the snare, wast acquiescent then
That I, the young, should die, not thou, the old—

Wilt thou lament this corpse thyself hast slain ?

Thou wast not, then, true father to this flesh ;
Nor she, who makes profession of my birth
And styles herself my mother, neither she Bore me : but, come of slave's blood, I was cast

Stealthily 'neath the bosom of thy wife !
Thou showedst, put to touch, the thing thou
art,

Nor I esteem myself born child of thee !
Otherwise, thine is the preëminence
O'er all the world in cowardice of soul :
Who, being the old man thou art, arrived
Where life should end, didst neither will nor dare

Die for thy son, but left the task to her,
The alien woman, whom I well might think
Own, only mother both and father too !
And yet a fair strife had been thine to strive,
—Dying for thy own child ; and brief for thee
In any case, the rest of time to live ;
While I had lived, and she, our rest of time,
Nor I been left to groan in solitude.

Yet certainly all things which happy man
Ought to experience, thy experience grasped.
Thou wast a ruler through the bloom of youth,
And I was son to thee, recipient due
Of sceptre and demesne,—no need to fear
That dying thou shouldst leave an orphan
house

For strangers to despoil. Nor yet wilt thou
Allege that as dishonouring, forsooth,
Thy length of days, I gave thee up to die,—
I, who have held thee in such reverence !

And in exchange for it, such gratitude
Thou, father,—thou award'st me, mother
mine !

Go, lose no time, then, in begetting sons !
Shall cherish thee in age, and, when thou diest,

Deck up and lay thee out as corpses claim !
For never I, at least, with this my hand
Will bury thee : it is myself am dead
So far as lies in thee. But if I light
Upon another saviour, and still see
The sunbeam,—his, the child I call myself,
His, the old age that claims my cherishing,
How vainly do these aged pray for death,
Abuse the slow drag of senility !
But should death step up, nobody inclines
To die, nor age is now the weight it was !"

You see what all this poor pretentious talk
Tried at,—how weakness strove to hide itself
In bluster against weakness,—the loud word
To hide the little whisper, not so low
Already in that heart beneath those lips !
Ha, could it be, who hated cowardice
Stood confessed craven, and who lauded so
Self-immolating love, himself had pushed
The loved one to the altar in his place ?
Friends interposed, would fain stop further
play

O' the sharp-edged tongue : they felt love's champion here
Had left an undefended point or two,
The antagonist might profit by ; bade
"Pause !

Enough the present sorrow ! Nor, O son,
Whet thus against thyself thy father's soul !"

Ay, but old Pheres was the stouter stuff !
Admetos, at the flintiest of the heart,
Had so much soft in him as held a fire :
The other was all iron, clashed from flint
Its fire, but shed no spark and showed no bruise.

Did Pheres crave instruction as to facts ?
He came, content, the ignoble word, for him,
Should lurk still in the blackness of each breast,

As sleeps the water-serpent half surprised :

Not brought up to the surface at a bound,
By one touch of the idly-probing spear,
Reed-like against unconquerable scale,
He came pacific, rather, as strength should,
Bringing the decent praise, the due regret,
And each banality prescribed of old.

Did he commence "Why let her die for you?"

And rouse the coiled and quiet ugliness
"What is so good to man as man's own life?"

No: but the other did: and, for his pains,
Out, full in face of him, the venom leapt.

"And whom dost thou make bold, son—
Ludian slave,
Or Phrugian whether, money made thy ware,
To drive at with revilings? Know'st thou not

I, a Thessalian, from Thessalian sire
Spring and am born legitimately free?
Too arrogant art thou; and, youngster words
Casting against me, having had thy fling,
Thou goest not off as all were ended so!
I gave thee birth indeed and mastership
I' the mansion, brought thee up to boot:
there ends

My owing, nor extends to die for thee!
Never did I receive it as a law
Hereditary, no, nor Greek at all,
That sires in place of sons were bound to die.
For, to thy sole and single self wast thou
Born, with whatever fortune, good or bad;
Such things as bear bestowment, those thou hast;

Already ruling widely, broad-lands, too,
Doubt not but I shall leave thee in due time:
For why? My father left me them before.
Well then, where wrong I thee?—of what defraud?

Neither do thou die for this man, myself,
Nor let him die for thee!—is all I beg.
Thou joyest seeing daylight: dost suppose Thy father joys not too? Undoubtedly,
Long I account the time to pass below,
And brief my span of days; yet sweet the same:

Is it otherwise to thee who, impudent,

Didst fight off this same death, and livest now
Through having sneaked past fate appointed thee,

And slain thy wife so? Cryest cowardice
On me, I wonder, thou—whom, poor poltroon,

A very woman worsted, daring death,
Just for the sake of thee, her handsome spark?
Shrewdly hast thou contrived how not to die
For evermore now: 'tis but still persuade
The wife, for the time being, to take thy place!

What, and thy friends who would not do the like,

These dost thou carp at, craven thus thyself?
Crouch and be silent, craven! Comprehend
That, if thou lovest so that life of thine,
Why, everybody loves his own life too:
So, good words, henceforth! If thou speak us ill,

Many and true an ill thing shalt thou hear!"

There you saw leap the hydra at full length!
Only, the old kept glorying the more,
The more the portent thus uncoiled itself,
Whereas the young man shuddered head to foot,

And shrank from kinship with the creature.

Why
Such horror, unless what he hated most,
Vaunting itself outside, might fairly claim
Acquaintance with the counterpart at home?
I would the Chorus here had plucked up heart,

Spoken out boldly and explained the man,
If not to men, to Gods. That way, I think,
Sophokles would have led their dance and song.

Here, they said simply "Too much evil spoke
On both sides!" As the young before, so now
They bade the old man leave abusing thus.

"Let him speak,—I have spoken!" said the youth:

And so died out the wrangle by degrees
In wretched bickering. "If thou wince at fact,

Behoved thee not prove faulty to myself!"

"Had I died for thee I had faulted more!"

"True!

"All's one, then, for youth's bloom and age to die?"

Thou couldst not call thy young wife impudent:
She was found foolish merely."

"Our duty is to live one life, not two!"

"Get thee gone!
And let me bury this my dead!"

"Go then, and outlive Zeus, for aught I

"I go.
Thou buriest her whom thou didst murder
first;

"What, curse thy parents with no sort of cause?"

Whereof there's some account to render yet
Those kinsfolk by the marriage-side! I think,
Brother Akastos may be classed with me,
Among the beasts, not men, if he omit
Avenging upon thee his sister's blood!"

"Curse, truly! All thou lovest is long life!"

"And dost not thou, too, all for love of life, Carry out now, in place of thine, this corpse?"

"Go to perdition, with thy housemate too!
Grow old all childlessly, with child alive,
Just as ye merit! for to me, at least,
Beneath the same roof ne'er do ye return.
And did I need by heralds' help renounce
The ancestral hearth, I had renounced the same!

"Monument, rather, of thy cowardice, Thou worst one!"

"Not for me she died, I hope!
That, thou wilt hardly say!"

"No, simply this:
Would, some day, thou mayst come to need
myself!"

But we—since this woe, lying at our feet
I' the path, is to be borne—let us proceed
And lay the body on the pyre."

"Meanwhile, woo many wives—the more will die!"

I think,
What, thro' this wretched wrangle, kept the
man

"And so shame thee who never dared the like!"

From seeing clear—beside the cause I gave—
Was, that the woe, himself described as full
I' the path before him, there did really lie—
Not roll into the abyss of dead and gone.

"Dear is this light o' the sun-god—dear, I
say!"

How, with Alkestis present, calmly crowned,
Was she so irrecoverable yet—
The bird, escaped, that's just on bough above,
The flower, let flutter half-way down the brink?

"Proper conclusion for a beast to draw!"

"One thing is certain: there's no laughing
now,
As out thou bearest the poor dead old man!"

Not so detached seemed lifelessness from life
But—one dear stretch beyond all straining
yet—

"Die when thou wilt, thou wilt die infamous!"

And he might have her at his heart once
more,
When, in the critical minute, up there comes
The father and the fact, to trifle time!

"And once dead, whether famed or infamous,
I shall not care!"

"Alas and yet again!
How full is age of impudency!"

"To the pyre!" an instinct prompted: pallid
face,
And passive arm and pointed foot, when these

No longer shall absorb the sight, O friends,
Admetos will begin to see indeed
Who the true foe was, where the blows should fall!

So, the old selfish Pheres went his way,
Case-hardened as he came; and left the
youth,
(Only half-selfish now, since sensitive)
To go on learning by a light the more,
As friends moved off, renewing dirge the
while:

"Unhappy in thy daring! Noble dame,
Best of the good, farewell! With favouring
face

May Hermes the infernal, Hades too, Receive thee! And if there,—ay, there,— some touch

Of further dignity await the good,
Sharing with them, mayst thou sit throned by her

The Bride of Hades, in companionship!"

Wherewith, the sad' procession wound away,
Made slowly for the suburb sepulchre.
And lo,—while still one's heart, in time and
tune,

Paced after that symmetric step of Death
Mute-marching, to the mind's eye, at the head
O' the mourners—one hand pointing out their path

With the long pale terrific sword we saw,
The other leading, with grim tender grace,
Alkestis quieted and consecrate,—

Lo, life again knocked laughing at the door!
The world goes on, goes ever, in and through,
And out again o' the cloud. We faced about,
Fronted the palace where the mid-hall-gate
Opened—not half, nor half of half, perhaps—
Yet wide enough to let out light and life,
And warmth and bounty and hope and joy,
at once.

Festivity burst wide, fruit rare and ripe
Crushed in the mouth of Bacchos, pulpy-prime,
All juice and flavour, save one single seed
Duly ejected from the God's nice lip,
Which lay o' the red edge, blackly visible—

To wit, a certain ancient servitor
On whom the festal jaws o' the palace shut,
So, there he stood, a much-bewildered man.
Stupid? Nay, but sagacious in a sort:

Learned, life long, i' the first outside of things,
Though bat for blindness to what lies beneath
And needs a nail-scratch ere 'tis laid you bare.
This functionary was the trusted one

We saw deputed by Admetos late
To lead in Herakles and help him, soul
And body, to such snatched repose, snapped-
up

Sustainment, as might do away the dust
O' the last encounter, knit each nerve anew
For that next onset sure to come at cry
O' the creature next assailed,—nay, should it prove

Only the creature that came forward now
To play the critic upon Herakles!

"Many the guests"—so he soliloquized
In musings burdensome to breast before,
When it seemed not too prudent tongue should wag—

"Many, and from all quarters of this world,
The guests I now have known frequent our
house,

For whom I spread the banquet; but, than
this,

Never a worse one did I yet receive.
At the hearth here! One who seeing, first
of all,

The master's sorrow, entered gate the same,
And had the hardihood to house himself.
Did things stop there! But, modest by no means,

He took what entertainment lay to hand,
Knowing of our misfortune,—did we fail
In aught of the fit service, urged us serve
Just as a guest expects! And in his hands
Taking the ivied goblet, drinks and drinks
The unmixed product of black mother-earth,
Until the blaze o' the wine went round about
And warmed him: then he crowns with myrtle sprigs

His head, and howls discordance—twofold lay!
Was thereupon for us to listen to—
This fellow singing, namely, nor restrained:

A jot by sympathy with sorrows here—
While we o' the household mourned our mistress—mourned,

That is to say, in silence—never showed
The eyes, which we kept wetting, to the guest—

For there Admetos was imperative.

And so, here am I helping make at home
A guest, some fellow ripe for wickedness,
Robber or pirate, while she goes her way
Out of our house : and neither was it mine
To follow in procession, nor stretch forth
Hand, wave my lady dear a last farewell,
Lamenting who to me and all of us
Domestics was a mother : myriad harms
She used to ward away from everyone,
And mollify her husband's ireful mood.
I ask then, do I justly hate or no
This guest, this interloper on our grief?"

"Hate him and justly !" Here's the proper
judge

Of what is due to the house from Herakles !
This man of much experience saw the first
O' the feeble duckings-down at destiny,
When King Admetos went his rounds, poor
soul,

A-begging somebody to be so brave

As die for one afraid to die himself—

"Thou, friend ? Thou, love ? Father or mother, then !

None of you ? What, Alkestis must Death
catch ?

O best of wives, one woman in the world !
But nowise droop : our prayers may still assist :
Let us try sacrifice ; if those avail
Nothing and Gods avert their countenance,
Why, deep and durable our grief will be !"

Whereat the house, this worthy at its head,
Re-echoed "deep and durable our grief !"

This sage, who justly hated Herakles,

Did he suggest once "Rather I than she !"

Admonish the Turannos—"Be a man !

Bear thine own burden, never think to thrust

Thy fate upon another and thy wife !

It were a dubious gain could death be doomed

That other, and no passionatest plea

Of thine, to die instead, have force with fate ;

Seeing thou lov'st Alkestis : what were life
Unlighted by the loved one ? But to live—
Not merely live unsolaced by some thought,
Some word so poor—yet solace all the same—

As 'Thou i' the sepulchre, Alkestis, say !
Would I, or would not I, to save thy life,
Die, and die on, and die for evermore ?'

No ! but to read red-written up and down
The world 'This is the sunshine, this the shade,

This is some pleasure of earth, sky or sea,
Due to that other, dead that thou mayst
live !'

Such were a covetable gain to thee ?

Go die, fool, and be happy while 'tis time !"

One word of counsel in this kind, methinks,
Had fallen to better purpose than Ai, ai,
Pheu, pheu, e, papai, and a pother of praise
O' the best, best, best one ! Nothing was to hate

In King Admetos, Pheres, and the rest
O' the household down to his heroic self !

This was the one thing hateful : Herakles
Had flung into the presence, frank and free,
Out from the labour into the repose,
Ere out again and over head and ears

I' the heart of labour, all for love of men :
Making the most o' the minute, that the soul
And body, strained to height a minute since,
Might lie relaxed in joy, this breathing-space,
For man's sake more than ever ; till the bow,
Restrung o' the sudden, at first cry for help,
Should send some unimaginable shaft

True to the aim and shatteringly through
The plate-mail of a monster, save man so.
He slew the pest o' the marish yesterday :
To-morrow he would bit the flame-breathed stud

That fed on man's-flesh : and this day between—

Because he held it natural to die,
And fruitless to lament a thing past cure,
So, took his fill of food, wine, song and
flowers,

Till the new labour claimed him soon
enough,—

"Hate him and justly !"

True, Charopé mine !

The man surmised not Herakles lay hid
 I' the guest ; or, knowing it, was ignorant
 That still his lady lived—for Herakles ;
 Or else judged lightness needs must indicate
 This or the other caitiff quality :
 And therefore—had been right if not so
 wrong !

For who expects the sort of him will scratch
 A nail's depth, scrape the surface just to see
 What peradventure underlies the same ?

So, he stood petting up his puny hate,
 Parent-wise, proud of the ill-favoured babe.
 Not long ! A great hand, careful lest it crush,
 Startled him on the shoulder : up he stared,
 And over him, who stood but Herakles !
 There smiled the mighty presence, all one
 smile

And no touch more of the world-weary God,
 Through the brief respite. Just a garland's
 grace

About the brow, a song to satisfy Head, heart and breast, and trumpet-lips at
 once,

A solemn draught of true religious wine,
 And,—how should I know ? half a mountain
 goat

Torn up and swallowed down,—the feast was fierce

But brief : all cares and pains took wing and flew,

Leaving the hero ready to begin
 And help mankind, whatever woe came next,
 Even though what came next should be nought more

Than the mean querulous mouth o' the man, remarked

Pursing its grievance up till patience failed
 And the sage needs must rush out, as we saw
 To sulk outside and pet his hate in peace.
 By no means would the Helper have it so :

He who was just about to handle brutes
 In Thrace, and bit the jaws which breathed the flame,—

Well, if a good laugh and a jovial word
 Could bridle age which blew bad humours
 forth,

That were a kind of help, too !

"Thou, there !" hailed

This grand benevolence the ungracious one—
 "Why look'st so solemn and so thought-absorbed ?

To guests a servant should not sour-faced be,
 But do the honours with a mind urbane.

While thou, contrariwise, beholding here
 Arrive thy master's comrade, hast for him
 A churlish visage, all one beetle-brow—
 Having regard to grief that's out-of-door !
 Come hither, and so get to grow more wise !
 Things mortal—know'st the nature that they have ?

No, I imagine ! whence could knowledge
 spring ?

Give ear to me, then ! For all flesh to die,
 Is nature's due ; nor is there any one
 Of mortals with assurance he shall last
 The coming morrow : for, what's born of
 chance

Invisibly proceeds the way it will,
 Not to be learned, no fortune-teller's prize.

This, therefore, having heard and known through me,

Gladdden thyself ! Drink ! Count the day-by-day

Existence thine, and all the other—chance !

Ay, and pay homage also to by far
 The sweetest of divinities for man,
 Kupris !¹ Benignant Goddess will she prove !
 But as for aught else, leave and let things be !

And trust my counsel, if I seem to speak
 To purpose—as I do, apparently.

Wilt not thou, then,—discarding overmuch
 Mournfulness, do away with this shut door,
 Come drink along with me, be-garlanded
 This fashion ? Doso, and—I well know what—
 From this stern mood, this shrunk-up state of mind,

The pit-pat fall o' the flagon-juice down
 throat

Soon will dislodge thee from bad harbourage !
 Men being mortal should think mortal-like :
 Since to your solemn, brow-contracting sort,
 All of them,—so I lay down law at least,—
 Life is not truly life but misery."

Whereto the man with softened surliness :

"We know as much : but deal with matters,
now,
Hardly befitting mirth and revelry."

"No intimate, this woman that is dead :

Mourn not too much ! For, those o' the house itself,
Thy masters live, remember !"

"Live indeed ?

Ah, thou know'st nought o' the woe within these walls !"

"I do—unless thy master spoke me false Somehow !"

"Ay, ay, too much he loves a guest,
Too much, that master mine !" so muttered he.

"Was it improper he should treat me well, Because an alien corpse was in the way ?"

"No alien, but most intimate indeed !"

"Can it be, some woe was, he told me not ?"

"Farewell and go thy way ! Thy cares for
thee—

To us, our master's sorrow is a care."

"This word begins no tale of alien woe !"

"Had it been other woe than intimate,
I could have seen thee feast, nor felt amiss."

"What ! have I suffered strangely from my host ?"

"Thou cam'st not at a fit reception-time :
With sorrow here beforehand : and thou seest
Shorn hair, black robes."

"But who is it that's dead ?
Some child gone? or the aged sire perhaps ?"

"Admetos' wife, then ! she has perished, guest !"

"How sayest ? And did ye house me, all the same ?"

"Ay : for he had thee in that reverence
He dared not turn thee from his door away !"

"O hapless, and bereft of what a mate !"

"All of us now are dead, not she alone !"

"But I divined it ! seeing, as I did,
His eye that ran with tears, his close-clipt hair,
His countenance ! Though he persuaded me,
Saying it was a stranger's funeral
He went with to the grave : against my wish,
He forced on me that I should enter doors,
Drink in the hall o' the hospitable man
Circumstanced so ! And do I revel yet
With wreath on head ? But—thou to hold thy peace

Nor tell me what a woe oppressed my friend !
Where is he gone to bury her ? Where am I
To go and find her ?"

"By the road that lead-
Straight to Larissa, thou wilt see the tomb,
Out of the suburb, a carved sepulchre."

So said he, and therewith dismissed himself
Inside to his lamenting : somewhat soothed,
However, that he had adroitly spoilt
The mirth of the great creature : oh, he marked
The movement of the mouth, how lip pressed
lip,

And either eye forgot to shine, as, fast,
He plucked the chaplet from his forehead,
dashed

The myrtle-sprays down, trod them underfoot !
And all the joy and wonder of the wine
Withered away, like fire from off a brand
The wind blows over—beacon though it be,
Whose merry ardour only meant to make
Somebody all the better for its blaze,
And save lost people in the dark : quenched
now !

Not long quenched ! As the flame, just hurried off

The brand's edge, suddenly renews its bite, Tasting some richness caked i' the core o' the tree,—

Pine, with a blood that's oil,—and triumphs up

Pillar-wise to the sky and saves the world :
So, in a spasm and splendour of resolve,
All at once did the God surmount the man.

"O much-enduring heart and hand of mine !
Now show what sort of son she bore to Zeus,
That daughter of Elektruon, Tiruns' child,
Alkméné ! for that son must needs save now
The just-head lady : ay, establish here
I' the house again Alkestis, bring about
Comfort and succour to Admetos so !
I will go lie in wait for Death, black-stoled
King of the corpses ! I shall find him, sure,
Drinking, beside the tomb, o' the sacrifice :
And if I lie in ambushade, and leap
Out of my lair, and seize—encircle him
Till one hand join the other round about—
There lives not who shall pull him out from me,
Rib-mauled, before he let the woman go !
But even say I miss the booty,—say,
Death comes not to the bolted blood,—why
then,
